Richardson, the prosecutor, said the postal service wanted to fire Thompkins years ago, but couldn't serve him with termination papers because they couldn't find him.

John P. Martin covers federal courts and law enforcement. He may be reached at jmartin@starledger.com or (973) 622-3405.

Seminole Man Charged In Online Hacking Plot (TAMPTRIB)

By Elaine Silvestrini, The Tampa Tribune

Tampa Tribune, October 28, 2006

TAMPA - A Seminole man slowed a Massachusetts company's Web site by electronically hijacking other people's computers and directing them to launch an attack, a federal criminal complaint alleges.

Federal authorities in Massachusetts charged John Bombard, 32, with two counts of intentionally accessing a protected computer without authorization, charges that carry a maximum of two years in federal prison.

The complaint charges Bombard with hacking into two computer systems June 15, 2004, to establish a "bot" network of compromised computers from which he launched a denial of service attack on Akamai Technologies servers.

A bot, short for robot, is a computer program that seeks vulnerable computers and runs silently in the background until it receives directions from a controlling computer.

According to the Justice Department, some experts think networks of bots, also called "botnets," now send up to three-quarters of all spam.

A denial of service attack is one in which many compromised computers attack a single target, consuming the target's bandwidth or overloading its resources. Legitimate users of the targeted system are unable to use its services.

The federal charges say Bombard used a variant of the Gaobot worm to infect networks of computers at two major universities, which are not named. The complaint also doesn't say how many computers were used in the attack.

Akamai, headquartered in Cambridge, Mass., distributes online content and business processes over a network of computer servers.

The charges allege that, on the day of the attack, Akamai suffered a significant increase in Web traffic to a number of its domain name system servers. The affected customers' Web sites were rendered inaccessible or had their access slowed.

Bombard's attorney did not return a reporter's call seeking comment.

Federal authorities declined to specifically discuss Bombard's case.

John Lynch, deputy chief for the Justice Department's Computer Crime and Intellectual Property Section, said botnets are a growing problem, however.

Experts say people can protect their computers by using firewalls, antivirus programs and spyware protection.

Reporter Elaine Silvestrini can be reached at (813) 259-7837 or esilvestrini@tampatrib.com.

Jury Spares Convicted Murderer From Death Penalty In Puerto Rico (FINDLAW/AP)

By Yaisha Vargas, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 28, 2006

(AP) - SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico-A jury sentenced a man to life in prison Friday for murder instead of giving him a death sentence sought by prosecutors in a case that sparked renewed opposition to capital punishment nearly 80 years after it was outlawed in this U.S. territory. Carlos Ayala Lopez wept and hugged his attorney after hearing the verdict. Ayala was found guilty three months ago of killing Jose Rodriguez Reyes, a guard at the Veteran's Medical Center in suburban Rio Piedras, in 2002.

Critics, including the governor and Catholic church leaders, spoke out against federal prosecutors' decision to seek the death penalty. Puerto Rico abolished capital punishment in 1929. The last execution was in 1927, when a man was hanged for murder.

DOJ_NMG_0088449

Federal prosecutors can seek the death penalty in some cases because Puerto Rico is subject to U.S. federal law. Federal prosecutors claimed jurisdiction in Ayala's case because the killing took place at a federally run institution.

Prosecutors said Ayala shot Rodriguez while trying to steal his gun for a planned drug trafficking operation.

The jury of six men and six women, which convicted Ayala in July, reconvened for the penalty phase of the trial and deliberated for about six hours before delivering the sentence.

Rodriguez's family members said they had hoped Ayala would be executed.

"As long as Puerto Rico doesn't impose death sentences, they won't understand the pain suffered by a family that loses a relative," said Nardelis Rodriguez, the guard's daughter. "It's not a matter of revenge. They killed a good person."

During the trial, protesters held a vigil outside the courthouse. Puerto Rico Gov. Anibal Acevedo Vila, who has urged the U.S. Justice Department not to seek the death penalty in Puerto Rico, said a death sentence in the case would be a "collective tragedy." In May, the Puerto Rican legislature approved a resolution reaffirming the island's anti-death penalty stance.

Death penalty opponents declared victory after learning of the verdict.

"We're very happy there's no death sentence in this case because Puerto Rico doesn't deserve that," said Edgardo Roman, a leader of the Coalition Against the Death Penalty.

Porter Releases Phone Records, Schedules (LVS)

By Tony Cook, Las Vegas Sun

Las Vegas Sun, October 28, 2006

Former aide sticks by his claims

U.S. Rep. Jon Porter released phone records and copies of his daily schedule Friday that he claims disprove a former staffer's allegations that the congressman made illegal fundraising phone calls from his government offices in Henderson and Washington, D.C.

While the records - which in some cases had names and phone numbers blacked out - do not prove that the allegations are false, they appear to conflict with some of the charges leveled by Porter's one-time executive assistant and scheduler, Jim Shepard.

The records show, for example, that Porter made fundraising and other phone calls from a campaign cell phone on April 18, a day when his schedule shows that he was at his district office.

But his chief of staff, Mike Hesse, said he and Porter were out to lunch when the calls were made, and offered a receipt from about 11:45 a.m. at Sweet Tomatoes to prove it.

Federal law and House ethics rules prohibit lawmakers from making fundraising calls from federal buildings, even if the calls are paid for by a campaign.

Similarly, on April 21, when Shepard claims he witnessed Porter make fundraising calls between 1:30 p.m. and 2:30 p.m. at his Henderson office, Porter's schedule shows that the congressman left for a meeting with Clark County School District officials at 1:15 p.m. and remained out of the office the rest of the day.

Shepard said he remembers the meeting with school officials being delayed and that the schedule - which he kept while he was on Porter's staff - does not match e-mails and call logs he retained. He said he could not share the call logs on the advice of his attorney.

The documents from Porter came on the same day that the U.S. attorney's office turned over a complaint about the calls to the FBI.

"We did receive a referral," said FBI spokesman Dave Staretz. "I can't go into any particulars. We will evaluate the case and determine whether we will open a preliminary inquiry."

In a statement, Las Vegas-based U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden emphasized that no decision has been made on whether to proceed on the request for an investigation from Nevada Democratic Party Chairman Tom Collins.

"There is a distinction between reviewing a request for an investigation and opening an investigation," Bogden said. "We are not stating that Mr. Porter is under investigation, only that the matter will be referred for review."

DOJ_NMG_0088450

Shepard told the Sun last week that he witnessed Porter making fundraising calls on a campaign cell phone from his district office on April 17, 18 and 21, and from his Washington office on June 15 and 16.

The records released Friday by Porter also show that on April 17 Porter made several fundraising phone calls during "call time" allotted in his schedule.

The schedule does not specify a location where the calls were made, but Shepard contends they occurred at Porter's district office.

"I can tell you he was not at the district office," Hesse said. He said he wasn't sure, however, where the calls were made.

On June 15, Porter's schedule shows that no call time was allotted, although Shepard insists Porter made fundraising calls from his Washington office that day.

In phone records provided by Porter for June 15, the names and phone numbers of those he called are blacked out.

Hesse said Porter blacked out the names and numbers of any phone calls that did not occur during a scheduled "call time," a period set aside for the congressman to make calls - professional, personal or political.

The information was blacked out, Hesse said, for privacy reasons.

"We are taking an extraordinary step to prove this is false," Hesse said.

Shepard on Friday stuck by his allegations.

"It is not a complete picture," he said of the records released.

E-mails among Shepard, Hesse and Porter's campaign staff back up his account, Shepard said. Asked about the e-mails, Hesse said he does not remember them and that a search of House computer archives did not turn up any e-mails that Shepard contends he sent to Hesse, including one in which Shepard tells Hesse, "We can NOT let him do this anymore."

Hesse admitted Friday that he did not search for e-mails except those listing him as a recipient. Many e-mails that Shepard points to as proof of his claims were not sent to Hesse.

Hesse also noted that if e-mails were deleted before they were archived, there would be no record of them.

Both Hesse and Shepard agree on at least one thing: Both said they welcome an investigation of the allegations. Tony Cook can be reached at 259-2320 or at tony.cook@lasvegassun.com.

Rolling Admitted Shreveport Murders Before Execution (AP)

AP, October 28, 2006

SHREVEPORT, La. - Before being executed for five Florida murders, serial killer Danny Rolling gave his spiritual adviser a handwritten confession to a grisly murder triple slaying 17 years ago in his home town of Shreveport.

Police and the Rev. Mike Hudspeth released copies of that apology and confession on Friday, two days after Rolling's execution.

Police have long suspected that Rolling stabbed William T. Grissom, 55, his 24-year-old daughter, Julie, and his 8-year-old grandson, Sean, as they got ready for dinner on Nov. 4, 1989, in Grissom's Shreveport home.

They had been sure of it since 1997, when Rolling sent a detailed confession, including a description of the crime scene, to the woman he had married in prison, and she sent it to police, said retired police detectives Don Ashley and Danny Fogger, who had worked on the case.

Since Rolling had pleaded guilty in Florida to killing five college students and his execution was expected, Louisiana authorities saw little reason to try him.

Still, police said Friday, it is a relief to have a signed, public confession.

Hudspeth said that during a two-hour visit on Tuesday, Rolling told him that he had killed the Grissoms, and would give him a written confession the following day. That was the document released at Friday's news conference.

Rolling was executed for killing Sonja Larson, Christina Powell, Christa Hoyt, Tracy Paules and Manny Taboada in 1990 in Gainesville, Fla.

He told a Florida television interviewer in 2000 that he accepted responsibility for the Grissoms' deaths, but stopped short of confessing.

Mafia Figure Is Sentenced To Life Term In 2 Murders (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

Baldassare Amato, a powerful Bonanno crime family figure who represents the group's traditional Sicilian roots, stood silently with his arms crossed yesterday as a federal judge denounced him and meted out a life sentence for two 1992 Mafia murders.

As the judge, Nicholas G. Garaufis of United States District Court in Brooklyn, tore into him for "using murder as a business tactic," at several points Mr. Amato raised his right hand to his chin and then crossed his arms again in front of his chest.

"Mr. Amato," said the judge, making no effort to mask his disgust, "you're just a plain, wanton murderer and a Mafia assassin. The sentence I'm going to give you, as far as I'm concerned, is a gift."

Mr. Amato, 54, dressed in a gray prison sweatshirt and khaki trousers, appeared unmoved when the judge handed down the life sentence, almost as though it were a cost of doing business. He and his lawyer had both declined to address the court.

After pronouncing the sentence, Judge Garaufis asked the lead prosecutor in the case, Assistant United States Attorney John Buretta, how much of a fine he could levy.

Mr. Buretta said the maximum was $250,000, and the judge levied it.

Mr. Amato, who is known as Baldo and who immigrated to New York from the Sicilian fishing village of Castellammare del Golfo when he was 18, was convicted on July 12 of racketeering conspiracy charges, including the murders of two Bonanno associates.

The jury concluded that he ordered the murder of restaurant owner Sebastiano DiFalco and carried out a second killing himself, shooting Robert Perrino in the head several times.

Prosecutors had presented evidence that the Bonanno family was concerned that Mr. Perrino, a delivery supervisor for The New York Post, might help expose an infiltration of The Post's delivery operation by the crime family.

The judge said that Mr. DiFalco was killed "possibly because Mr. Amato and his Mafia colleagues wanted to take over the business and they might have had a disagreement over price or some other detail."

The six-week trial was a primer on the devastation that federal prosecutors in Brooklyn have wrought on the Bonannos, cutting a swath through the family's ranks and upending its traditions with a growing cadre of informers.

Mr. Amato was also stoical when Judge Garaufis rejected a request by his lawyer, Diarmuid White, for a recommendation that he be sent to a prison in the New York area so his family could visit. "It's for them, your honor," Mr. White said of the family.

The judge was unmoved.

"I have compassion for the defendant's family, and I also have compassion for the members of the families of Sebastiano DiFalco and Robert Perrino," the judge said. "This defendant made it certain that they would never visit their family member, anywhere."

Mr. DiFalco's two nephews were in court yesterday and said they were gratified by the life sentence and the fine against Mr. Amato. "He's a cold and evil person," said one of them, Sal Montoro, 42. He said Mr. Amato had gone to their uncle's wake and vowed to help find the killer.

For Mr. Amato, after the sentence was handed down, it was a brisk, businesslike handshake and a small smile for his lawyer, and he walked out the courtroom's side door to the holding cells, accompanied by United States marshals.

MAFIA MURDERER GETS LIFE (NYPOST)

By Patrick Gallahue

The New York Post, October 28, 2006

October 28, 2006 -- A U.S. judge lit into a convicted Mafia hit man before giving him a life sentence in Brooklyn federal court yesterday.

"Mr. Amato, you're just a plain, wanton murderer and assassin, and the sentence I'm going to give you is a gift," Judge Nicholas Garaufis said.

Garaufis tore into Baldassare "Baldo" Amato, convicted of two murders, after his lawyer asked him to consider sending him to a prison close to New York City for the sake of the Bonnano-family soldier's relatives.

"My compassion is overcome by my disgust and disdain for this defendant," he said.

Amato was convicted of racketeering and murdering two men, restaurant owner Sabastiano DiFalco and New York Post delivery supervisor Robert Perrino.

CIVIL LAW:

Ruling Upholds Air Force On Religious Issue (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 27 (AP) — A federal judge on Friday threw out a lawsuit against the Air Force that contended that evangelical Christian values were being illegally pushed on academy cadets.

An academy graduate said he would appeal the decision by the judge, James A. Parker of Federal District Court in Albuquerque. "Our fight is far from over," said the graduate, Mikey Weinstein of Albuquerque.

The case was brought by Mr. Weinstein and other Air Force Academy graduates who contended that a military chaplain had violated their right to religious freedom by urging cadets to attend Christian services or face "the fires of hell." That incident, the group asserted, reflected a broader policy of efforts to evangelize members of the Air Force.

But Judge Parker said the graduates could not claim that their First Amendment rights were violated, because they no longer attended the academy. Moreover, he said, the group failed to give specific examples of which cadets had been harmed, or when.

Last year, an Air Force committee concluded that there was no overt religious bias at the academy.

Suit Against Air Force Academy Dismissed (WT/AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

A federal judge yesterday threw out a lawsuit against the U.S. Air Force that contended evangelical Christian values were illegally pushed on Air Force Academy cadets.

U.S. District Judge James A. Parker said the academy graduates who filed suit could not claim their First Amendment rights were violated because they no longer attended the academy.

Moreover, the judge in Albuquerque, N.M., said the group failed to give specific examples of which cadets were harmed or when.

"Without that personal link or connection to future misconduct, plaintiffs have simply not shown that they will suffer an injury in fact that is both concrete and particularized and actual or imminent," Judge Parker wrote.

The case was brought by honors graduate Mikey Weinstein and other Air Force Academy graduates who said a military chaplain violated their religious freedom rights by urging cadets to attend Christian services or face being burned "in the fires of hell." That incident reflected a broader policy, the group charged, of efforts to evangelize Air Force staff.

Mr. Weinstein said he would appeal the decision.

"Our fight is far from over," said the Albuquerque resident.

Last year, an Air Force task force concluded there was no overt religious discrimination at the school but that some cadets and staff were insensitive. And in a step welcomed by conservative Christians, the Air Force in February released new guidelines for religious expression that dropped cautions to top officers about promoting their personal religious views.

The judge also rejected claims by Air Force Master Sgt. Phillip T. Burleigh, who asked to be included in the lawsuit, saying he was discriminated against in 1997 for not attending prayer meetings. Sgt. Burleigh, of Alamogordo, N.M., also said his supervisor used government resources to evangelize recruits, including hiring religious motivational speakers to lecture at mandatory-attendance conferences.

Judge Parker called Sgt. Burleigh's concerns "simply conjectural and hypothetical in nature."

DOJ_NMG_0088453

Mr. Weinstein and a religious freedoms watchdog group in Washington said the ruling delays efforts to protect the rights of people serving in the military.

"Religious bias and the outrageous violations of the separation of church and state continue to spread rampantly throughout our military," Mr. Weinstein said.

The Rev. Barry W. Lynn of the Washington-based Americans United for Separation of Church and State said the case revealed "very serious, systematic violations of the Constitution at the Air Force Academy."

"This is clearly not the end of the story," Mr. Lynn said. "Chaplains and officers are there to meet spiritual needs, and not to convert people to Christianity."

An Air Force Academy spokeswoman declined comment, referring calls to the Pentagon. An Air Force spokesman at the Pentagon said he was not aware of the decision, thus did not have an immediate comment.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Drifter Sought Over Hate Graffiti (WT)

By Matthew Cella, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

Federal and Arlington County authorities are searching for a drifter they believe has been drawing swastikas and other graffiti in the area around Arlington National Cemetery.

Police say that Ronald Bost, 47, of no fixed address, is responsible for a rash of vandalism near Arlington Memorial Bridge and Memorial Drive.

One July incident on a construction site at the Memorial Avenue Rehabilitation Project cost $1,000 to clean.

U.S. Park Police Detective Kevin Fornshill said that Bost is the "chief suspect" in the case, based largely on the fact that Bost has been arrested four times by park police on vandalism charges since the mid-1990s.

"He's out again and he's doing it again," Detective Fornshill said.

In 2004, Bost was arrested for painting swastikas and anti-Semitic obscenities over signs near the Netherlands Carillon at Arlington Cemetery.

His vandalism has been identified around the George Washington Parkway, as far south as Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport and as far north as the Francis Scott Key Bridge.

"The first documented cases we have that are linked to this guy go back to 1997," Detective Fornshill said.

The latest vandalism includes nine cases in which anti-Semitic and anti-Muslim statements and obscene drawings have appeared on construction equipment and road signs in the District and near Arlington National Cemetery and the Iwo Jima Memorial.

Arlington police say they are investigating with the U.S. Park Police because they suspect Bost is connected to at least six recent cases of vandalism in the Rosslyn area.

"We do have a number of cases dating back to 2004 that we think he's responsible for," said John Lisle, a spokesman for Arlington police.

He said the graffiti includes swastikas drawn on signs along a bike path and on newspaper boxes that distribute The Washington Post.

Bost has an extensive arrest record in Virginia, Maryland and the District, mostly for disorderly conduct but also for battery, and he has a felony assault conviction.

Detective Fornshill said that Bost also has been arrested for shouting anti-Semitic statements in Pershing Park in Northwest and outside the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.

U.S. marshals have an arrest warrant for Bost for a parole violation.

Police say Bost is 6-feet-2, weighs 200 pounds and has several tattoos on his arms and hands. Anyone who sees Bost is asked to contact police immediately.

DOJ_NMG_0088454

11 In O.C. Charged With Voter Registration Fraud (LAT)

By Christian Berthelsen And Christine Hanley, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

Dozens of people who thought they were signing up to be Democrats ended up Republican. Those accused in the case are low-level, per-signature workers.

The Orange County district attorney's office has charged 11 people with fraudulent voter registration stemming from a Republican registration drive this year that resulted in dozens of Democrats unwittingly being signed up as Republicans.

Those charged had been paid as much as $10 for each voter they registered as part of a Republican Party effort to recruit more voters in central Orange County. The area includes the district represented by Democratic Rep. Loretta Sanchez, a regular target of Republicans, and a competitive state Senate race.

The cases were filed Tuesday, and three defendants were arrested Wednesday and Thursday. They are in custody and are scheduled to be arraigned today and Monday. The district attorney's office refused to release any information about them, including details usually available, such as the names and charges.

Sources said a press conference is scheduled for Monday, a week before the Nov. 7 election, with Republican Secretary of State Bruce McPherson, who is locked in a tight election battle with Democratic state Sen. Debra Bowen.

"The only thing I can say is it is our policy to not make comments on pending matters, and I don't have any information to share at this time," said Susan Kang Schroeder, spokeswoman for Dist. Atty. Tony Rackauckas. "That's all I'm saying."

A spokeswoman for McPherson declined to comment.

Frank Barbaro, chairman of the Orange County Democratic Party, issued a statement Thursday congratulating Rackauckas on the arrests, putting the district attorney in the awkward position of not withholding comment on his own case.

"Hopefully, these arrests are a good first step toward discouraging those who would wish to suppress the democratic process, and we are hopeful that more preemptive action will be taken in the future," Barbaro said.

The prosecution highlights problems that can occur with signature-gathering and voter registration campaigns in which the workers are paid by the signature. Campaign watchdogs have derisively called it a "bounty hunter" system that creates incentives for often transient, low-paid workers to pad their results to make more money.

The case has been an embarrassment for the Orange County Republican Party since it first became known in February.

The charges come as the party finds itself reeling from a letter linked to GOP congressional candidate Tan Nguyen that was sent to Latino voters this month in what has been described as an effort to keep them from the polls in next month's election. Nguyen is running against Sanchez.

In both cases, Republican officials have quickly distanced themselves from the actions.

The voter registration charges cover at least 37 instances in which Democratic and Green Party voters and even one noncitizen were registered as Republicans. Each defendant was charged with felony counts of fraudulent completion of registration affidavits. The defendants are all low-level workers who circulated registration cards.

No charges have been filed against the companies or executives whom the Republican Party hired to conduct the registration drive, or party officials.

As many as 100 cases were turned over to prosecutors. In other cases, invalid phone numbers and incorrect addresses had been filled in on the forms.

Orange County election officials discovered the allegedly fraudulent registrations during a routine review in February, and Democrats conducting their own registration drive found more. Barbaro, the Democratic Party chairman, said he forwarded 500 complaints to prosecutors.

Scott Baugh, the chairman of the county Republican Party, said he received complaints from people who received letters welcoming them to the party and that registration workers were fired for being too aggressive or submitting faulty paperwork.

The actions did not benefit the party, he said, because the voters would not vote Republican, and it cost the party money to pay the signature gatherers.

"I hope they rot in jail for stealing from us and disenfranchising other voters," he said Thursday.

The recruiters were working for Bader & Associates, a Newport Beach petition consulting firm contracted by the Republican Party to register voters, and a subcontractor.

Tom Bader, the company owner, said Thursday his firm was never under investigation and cooperated fully.

He said it was difficult to control field workers. He said he no longer conducted voter registration drives, and that the news about the criminal cases hopefully would prevent future fraud.

"This action is really helpful," he said. "It's going to send a signal to those out in the field."

One of his subcontractors, John Burkett of Lake Elsinore, said Thursday that he discovered problems with his recruiters' work when he conducted random checks on the forms they had submitted, and notified his clients about it.

He said his three workers who had been charged quit this year. Like Bader, he no longer works on voter registration drives.

"I had questioned them on their voter registrations, because we found a few that were not sufficient," Burkett said. "That's why I don't work with them anymore."

*

christian.berthelsen@latimes.com
christine.hanley@latimes.com

Justice Department Official Meets With Residents Regarding Shooting (LCAP)

By Eric Cormier, AMERICAN PRESS

Lake Charles (LA) American Press, October 28, 2006

Several Lake Charles residents met with an official representing the U.S. Justice Department to start a dialogue about the relationship between the community and police since the Oct. 12 fatal police shooting of 29-year-old Trent Buckins.

The official with the Justice Department's Community Relations Service declined to speak to the American Press, citing governmental restrictions.

Since the November 2004 Chateau Du Lac fatal shooting by police, the Justice Department has had an official visit Lake Charles to help build more trust between the public and police.

The residents who attended Friday's meeting at City Hall — two police officials also attended — are pleased with the Justice Department's involvement.

"I think this is another positive step in the long process to gain clarity to what happened," the Rev. Henry Mancuso said. He was representing the city's Leadership Team for Community and Race Relations.

"This will be a long process to find out the truth of what happened. Until then, there will be tension in the community."

The federal government's response will be helpful in healing whatever wounds have been created since the most recent fatal police shooting, Mancuso said.

District A City Councilman Marshall Simien said the Louisiana State Police report on the shooting might not settle the issues that some residents have with police. That is why he respects the work the Justice Department is trying to initiate to end ill will.

"The Police Department is concerned that if the final report comes back and clears the police officer in question, will that end the situation? Our position is no," said Simien.

"The community at this point is not going to take somebody else's word that the shooting was correct because the question is going to be why did it have to happen? Somebody is dead. Why? What part of the training and protocol at the Police Department says this is justified?"

Wilbert Lewis, president of the NAACP's Lake Charles chapter, said the Justice Department's suggestions for dealing with police shootings, and other actions that might adversely affect a city, correspond with programs the nation's oldest civil rights group has championed.

"During the meeting, the issues of the shooting and alleged acts of brutality committed by the Lake Charles Police Department were discussed," Lewis said. "We do have a serious problem, and the key is to get everybody together and solve it."

One of the programs proposed by the Justice Department representative was a course on racial profiling. The NAACP chapter has asked that a citizen's panel, helping to oversee complaints against the Police Department, also be created.

"Everyone plays a major part in this," Lewis said. "We're not saying we can prevent other shootings from happening, but we have to try."

Police spokesman Sgt. Mark Kraus said the meeting was helpful in starting a dialogue between residents and the department. Police officials believe that as long as the public and police can talk, issues can be resolved.

"When that common ground is generally met, situations are helped," Kraus said.

Kraus said it's important that residents understand the issues that officers face every day before wrong conclusions are made regarding shootings and other incidents that may occur.

Mayor Randy Roach is optimistic that the Justice Department's involvement will help curb perceived problems between the police and residents.

"This is an opportunity for us to look at the relationship between law enforcement and the community and make sure we create an atmosphere of mutual trust and respect Roach said.

"The government's community relations officers are trained to make sure incidents like the shooting don't divide a community. Community relations officials help make us sensitive to issues and to address them up front and not ignore them. If we don't, then we will not have dialogue, and then we run the risk of other problems growing."

Union Claims Police-recruit Bias (INDYSTAR)

By Brendan O'Shaughnessy

The Indianapolis Star, October 28, 2006

IPD chief denies white applicants were passed over

The police union is accusing the city of racial discrimination by stacking the first recruit class of the merged Indianapolis Metropolitan Police Department with minorities.

Vince Huber, president of the Indianapolis Fraternal Order of Police, said the department added minority candidates to its new recruit class at the expense of white applicants.

Indianapolis Police Chief Michael Spears acknowledged that the department reached into the next recruit class for qualified minorities to increase the diversity in the class, which begins training Nov. 13.

But he said adding minorities to the list did not come at the expense of any white applicants. Instead, he said the move simply increased the number of names submitted for approval to the department's merit board.

The upcoming recruit class will be the largest in history, reflecting a need to keep up with planned retirements and provide enough officers for the larger, merged department. The IPD and Marion County Sheriff's Department will complete the consolidation of their operations Jan. 1.

"We want to make sure we get the most qualified applicants possible," Huber said. "(But) the process should be color-blind."

"We believe we're following the law," Spears said. "None of the white candidates were dropped off simply because they were white."

The merit board, which must approve hiring, promotion and termination decisions, approved 55 candidates. The class includes 16 black, one Hispanic and 38 white candidates, for a minority representation of 31 percent.

The city's Police and Fire departments have operated under a U.S. Justice Department consent decree since 1978 that requires them to reflect the racial composition of the county workforce, which is about 21 percent black. That hasn't been met.

Currently, 15 percent of the IPD's 1,184 sworn officers are black, and 10 percent of the 397 sheriff's deputies are black.

The decree says the departments should aim to hire classes that are 25 percent black until the long-term goal is achieved. In the late 1970s, blacks made up 11 percent of IPD.

Richard Crenshaw, a retired IPD major who leads Fairness in Law Enforcement, which represents black officers, said that group was formed because the Fraternal Order of Police has never supported quotas or conscious efforts to achieve racial equality.

He said black officers who did not feel they got equal treatment never received FOP support and therefore filed the lawsuits leading to the consent decree.

DOJ_NMG_0088457

Huber said he disagrees with Crenshaw's assessment of the FOP. Black officers are members of the organization, too, he said.

"We don't want any discrimination to take place in any shape or form. The membership overwhelmingly supports challenging hiring and promotions when we don't feel they are right," Huber said.

The merger of the city and county forces will hurt the numbers because the Sheriff's Department does not have as many minorities. As a single department, black representation will drop by 1 percentage point before factoring in the newest recruit class.

Kobi Wright, the city's top lawyer, said his unit and the merit board authorized the Police Department to interview minorities for this class who had been pre-screened for the second class of recruits. He said the city did that because it wants the department to reflect the diversity of the city.

He, too, denied Huber's allegations.

Nobody was bumped from the first IMPD recruit class, he said, because no list of recruits exists until the merit board approves one. Before that happens, he said, the department relies on a pool of applicants so the police force can keep up with retirements.

Wright said Huber's accusation of discrimination is a perfect example of why the city needs to continue operating under the consent decree.

"The consent decree requires that the city take all reasonable measures to meet the goal," Wright said. "It acts as a shield against lawsuits."

Call Star reporter Brendan O'Shaughnessy at (317) 444-2751.

New Voters Likely Out Of City Elections (BSH)

By Ryan Lafontaine

Biloxi Sun Herald, October 28, 2006

WAVELAND - Nearly 1,000 new residents here likely will be left out of next month's city elections, according to Waveland attorneys.

City leaders hired an independent consulting firm this year to figure a way to include hundreds of new voters living in a newly annexed section of town.

Waveland attorney Zach Butterworth said the Justice Department has not yet determined whether the new voters will be allowed to vote in the Nov. 7 election.

"The new area could have a minimal impact on the elections and the federal government needs to decide if the new voters can be included," he said.

According to federal legislation adopted in the 1960s, the Justice Department must review changes in ballot procedures, voting districts and other electoral rules in several states - mostly in the South - to ensure that minorities maintain influence in elections.

The city settled an annexation dispute in July with neighboring Bay St. Louis in a deal that gave Waveland a stretch of land along the western right of way of Mississippi 603.

Butterworth said new voters in the annexed area will be able to vote in the congressional elections, but not the city.

Before the annexation dispute was settled, the federal government approved a request from the city to merge its voting precincts into one location at the City Hall complex on Coleman Avenue, since Katrina damaged or destroyed many polling places.

Urban planners have created several options for redrawing the city's four ward lines, but it's unlikely the federal government will approve any of them in time for elections.

Butterworth said if the Justice Department approves the annexed voters, the most likely scenario would be to include them as part of Ward 4, rather than redrawing the ward lines.

Besides the several hundred annexed voters, City Hall said Friday that a few hundred new voters living in the old city limits had registered since the 2002 elections, but no one seems to know how many people were displaced and have not returned since the storm.

For Gay Couples, Ruling Has A Cash Value (NYT)

By Tina Kelley

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

TRENTON, Oct. 26 — The New Jersey Supreme Court granted gay couples the same rights as married couples this week, leaving it to the State Legislature whether to call their partnerships marriages or civil unions.

But for Cynthia and Lucy Vandenberg, the landmark ruling is also about another M-word: money.

The Vandenbergs, who have been partners for 12 years, have been forced to open their checkbooks repeatedly over the years to pay thousands of dollars in taxes on health benefits and for legal transactions that married couples rarely face.

There was the $1,500 to change their surnames, for instance, the $1,400 or so in taxes they paid annually for additional health benefits, and the $1,000 they spent so one could adopt the biological child of the other.

"For all of this, you need to hire an attorney, or you find out the hard way," said Lucy Vandenberg, 37, the director of the state's Council on Affordable Housing.

Now they wonder how the court's decision will affect their next child, a son Lucy is carrying. Will Cynthia Vandenberg have to pay to adopt him?

The court gave the State Legislature 180 days to amend New Jersey's marriage laws to allow same-sex couples to marry, or to create a parallel system such as a civil union to provide them with all the rights of married couples.

In their decision, the justices made it clear that they understood "the social indignities and economic difficulties" gay couples have faced.

"Without the benefits of marriage, some plaintiffs have had to endure the expensive and time-consuming process of cross-adopting each other's children and effectuating legal surname changes," the court said.

Other "economic disadvantages," the court added, included "paying excessive health insurance premiums because employers did not have enough to provide coverage to domestic partners, not having a right to 'family leave' time, and suffering adverse inheritance tax consequences."

The Vandenbergs, who live in Mill Hill, a gentrifying neighborhood in downtown Trenton, have formed a family with another gay couple, John Hatch, 44, and David Henderson, 48, who live a block and a half away and have been together 18 years.

In a 20-page parental contract signed by all four of them, Mr. Hatch and Mr. Henderson each agreed to be the biological father of one of the Vandenbergs' children, to give up his parental rights so the biological mother's partner could adopt the child, and to share in parenting responsibilities.

In other words, a contractually constructed partnership of four adults to raise the children.

Their daughter, Devin, who is almost 2, calls Lucy "Mama," Cynthia "Mommy," Mr. Hatch "Daddy" and Mr. Henderson "Dad." Devin spends most of her time at the Vandenbergs', though as she gets older she will stay with Mr. Hatch and Mr. Henderson on Tuesday nights and weekends.

They say some straight couples they know envy the arrangement. "It's great having more adults around," Lucy Vandenberg said.

Mr. Henderson, a real estate developer, said so many areas of law involve marriage that it is hard for him to imagine a new legal system that would provide equal protection for him and his family.

If the New Jersey Legislature refuses to approve a same-sex marriage law, he said, "it scares me that they could ever actually create some parallel system that was truly equal. Is separate ever equal?"

During an interview with the family, Cynthia Vandenberg, 43, who stays home with Devin, asked Mr. Hatch whether he and Mr. Henderson would marry, should the New Jersey Legislature agree to same-sex marriage.

"You wouldn't go to Las Vegas?" she asked, then stopped herself. "I mean Atlantic City?"

No, he said, he fantasizes about a celebration in nearby Mill Hill Park.

DOJ_NMG_0088459

All four drove to a rally in Montclair on Wednesday night after the court handed down its decision. Also there was Whitney Pillsbury-Clarke, 37, who lives in South Orange with his partner, John Pillsbury-Clarke, 41, and the three children they took in as foster children and later adopted.

"They'd give us the kids, they wouldn't even blink," he said, referring to the State of New Jersey. "But we were not good enough to get married. That's always burned us."

He described a wall in their house with the various validations of their commitment.

"There's our certificate of domestic partnership in New York City, a commitment ceremony certificate from the Metropolitan Community Church, and a domestic partnership certificate from New Jersey we got two years ago," he said.

As he spoke, his children, Sabrina, 5; Caitlin, 4; and Dylan, 2, piled in and out of a double stroller and skillfully negotiated the sharing of a bag of bread.

"And now maybe there will be a civil union, and eventually, a marriage certificate," he said, adding that he would like to see federally recognized marriage, so his family could move to any state.

"We'll probably need more wall space," he said.

Looming somewhere beyond the Legislature's decision is the question of how other states will treat New Jersey's same-sex couples. The United States Constitution does not require states to recognize marriages from other states, said Andrew Koppelman, a law professor at Northwestern University and the author of "Same Sex, Different States."

"No court in American history has ever so held," he said.

As Mr. Hatch said, "Domestic partnership is pretty good when you're in New Jersey, but it has no benefit when you're not."

And there are other legal questions that have yet to be resolved. For instance, if a same-sex couple lives in New Jersey, would both partners be eligible for health care benefits under a plan offered by a New York company where one of them works?

Debra E. Guston, a Glen Rock lawyer with several gay and lesbian clients, including the Vandenbergs, said she suspected that many thorny legal issues would arise before a new law was in place.

"I'm sure there'll be a partner who passes away during these six months, and the survivor has to deal with whether or not they're exempt from the estate tax," she said.

Already, one of Ms. Guston's clients, a schoolteacher in West Paterson, may be helped by the ruling. The teacher's school board had refused to extend benefits to her partner, but will probably have to reconsider, after the Supreme Court decision.

"It certainly has accelerated the discussion," Ms. Guston said.

Alicia Heath-Toby, 43, of Newark, one of the plaintiffs in the Supreme Court case, spoke at the Montclair rally, summing up her desire to have the same marital rights as straight people, and to have her love described in the same terms — in legal documents, in daily conversation, on insurance forms.

"No longer is it O.K. to check the 'other' box — if I have to check the 'other' box one more time. ..." she said, as the cheering crowd drowned out the rest of her sentence.

" 'Other' is no longer acceptable," she added. "Let us as a state be able to say, I am more than an 'other.' "

Civil Union Or Marriage? A Long Wait In New Jersey (NYT)

By Laura Mansnerus

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

TRENTON, Oct. 27 — New Jersey legislators, sorting through the few options given them by the State Supreme Court's ruling that gay couples be granted the full rights and benefits of heterosexual husbands and wives, cautioned today that it might take months to decide what to call the solution — marriage or something else.

But the next few months are booked up.

"There's a tremendous confluence of pretty significant issues the Legislature must resolve" within the six months allotted by the court, Albert Porroni, the chief counsel of the Office of Legislative Services, said on Friday. He noted that both the Senate and the Assembly were heavily scheduled to work on property tax relief until January, and committed to start working on the budget early next spring. That has stopped some legislators from beginning to work on possible measures, which they were instructed to do by the state's high court on Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0088460

On the liberal end of the political spectrum, at least one bill is already being written by a Democratic lawmaker to extend the term "marriage" to same-sex couples. And on the conservative end, some Republicans have revived a proposed constitutional amendment, introduced long ago, that would override the court's decision.

Many legislators, speaking informally since neither chamber has met since the ruling was issued, say the most likely result would be legislation providing for civil unions rather than marriage.

State Senator John Adler, a Democrat from Camden County who is a supporter of expanded rights for gay couples, said on Friday that whatever solution was arrived at, he would object to any interruption of the property tax discussions.

"I understand that for some New Jersey residents this is a burning issue," Mr. Adler said of the gay-marriage ruling. But he added: "For my constituents, the burning issue is property taxes. I don't want to get sidetracked from this crisis."

For now, Mr. Porroni and spokesmen for the legislative party caucuses said they were not aware of any requests to draft measures that would set up a system of civil unions. Bills cannot be introduced until the next session of each chamber — Nov. 9 for the General Assembly and Nov. 13 for the Senate — although legislators may release drafts at any time.

State Senator Loretta Weinberg, a Democrat of Bergen County, said she was "very interested in sponsoring legislation on civil unions," adding that legislation following the court's directions would not be complex. The only real point of contention, Ms. Weinberg said, was whether to use the word "marriage."

"I have trouble explaining this to a fourth grader," Senator Weinberg said. "We're going to do this, but we're going to have an argument over what to call it."

If the argument lasts too long and the Legislature does not meet its deadline, "the court didn't exactly make clear what would happen," Mr. Porroni said.

The Legislature has had other brushes with the court over ambitious mandates handed down. But Mr. Porroni said that in those instances, like any involving state funds, the deadline was imposed by the yearly budget process.

"We never got to the point where we were at loggerheads and the court would have to figure out what to do," he said.

In Massachusetts, the only state to be ordered by its high court to provide for gay marriage, the Legislature also had a 180-day deadline. Within a month of the ruling in November 2003, lawmakers asked for a clarification — which the court gave by ruling that civil unions would not suffice. As a result, the 180-day deadline for the granting of marriage licenses was enforced on schedule.

Laurence Tribe, a constitutional scholar at Harvard Law School, said the Massachusetts Legislature's request "strongly suggested that they were interpreting the 180-day window as perhaps an opportunity to monkey around and not recognize the full rights in the opinion."

"The New Jersey court has not allowed that ambiguity," Professor Tribe said.

In Massachusetts, the deadline was enforced, and gay couples have been able to marry there since May 2004. By that time, however, the Legislature had adopted a constitutional amendment defining marriage as a union of a woman and a man, and providing for civil unions for same-sex couples.

That proposal is to go before the voters on Nov. 7.

Conserving That Compassion (NYT)

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

When future generations of Americans look back on the current era, they'll puzzle over what it was about George W. Bush that made people imagine there was anything compassionate to his conservatism.

Having apparently lost all hope that he can use terrorism to scare voters into electing Republicans this November, the president has now begun raising the threat of gay marriage.

The moment the New Jersey Supreme Court issued a ruling on the subject this week, Mr. Bush began using every possible excuse to bring up "activist" judges and gay weddings on the campaign trail. "I mentioned his love for his family," Mr. Bush said at a rally for a Republican Senate candidate in Michigan. "He understands what I know, that marriage is a fundamental institution of our civilization. Yesterday in New Jersey we had another activist court issue a ruling ..."

DOJ_NMG_0088461

The court in New Jersey, for what it's worth, was hardly activist. The State Legislature had given gay couples the ability to unite in domestic partnerships that gave them most, but not all, of the legal protections available to married heterosexuals. The court simply said that both kinds of partners deserved the same legal protection, and left it up to the lawmakers to figure out how to do it. Hardly a thunderbolt from the sky, but Mr. Bush took up the cause of protecting the "sacred institution that is critical to the health of our society" as if a cadre of antifamily jurists had just abolished matrimony.

All this is, as everyone knows, just a show for rousing the base. If the last month has taught us anything about the Republican Party, it is that homophobia is campaign strategy, not conviction. Congressmen who trust their careers to gay staffers vote for laws to enshrine second-class citizenship for gays in the Constitution. Gay appointees and their partners are treated as married people at official ceremonies and social gatherings. Then whenever an election rolls around, the whole team pretends it's on a mission to save America from gay marriage.

Mr. Bush and his faithful acolytes seem perfectly willing to stoke fears that create division and sorrow in a country that doesn't need any more of either. The president has just a little more than two years left in office. You'd think that for once he'd want to consider devoting his time to making things better instead of worse.

Thought Police In The Lecture Hall (WP)

By Asheesh Kapur Siddique

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Universities are the bulwark of democratic societies -- places where individuals with diverse viewpoints come together to learn and to produce new knowledge for addressing social concerns, free of ideological interference. But these centers of freedom are under attack from people who want to inject partisan politics into our classrooms.

Led by activist David Horowitz, some conservatives are pushing for the adoption of an "Academic Bill of Rights" (ABOR) across America. The bill takes the form of student resolutions or legislative proposals claiming to protect the academic freedom of college students from ideological indoctrination by professors.

My classmates at Princeton passed a modified version of the bill in a student referendum in April. In July, Philadelphia's Temple University became the first institution to officially adopt the policy. Arizona's legislature is preparing to consider a version of the bill.

The College Access and Opportunity Act, passed by the House in March and under consideration in the Senate, aims to deny federal funding to institutions -- even private ones -- that refuse to comply with ABOR's limitations on speech.

In truth, these efforts only hurt the students they purport to help. Horowitz and his backers aren't protecting our rights; they're impeding our educations. The Academic Bill of Rights would substitute political correctness for the free exchange of ideas on campus by preventing faculty and students from discussing fresh or controversial ideas in class. It would restrict what professors can teach and what students can learn.

This exchange between teachers and pupils lies at the heart of liberal education. But ABOR's backers argue that professors presenting new ideas might "indoctrinate" or offend students. Their bill denies us the right to evaluate the merits of ideas and arguments for ourselves by banning "political" or "anti-religious" speech from classrooms.

College students are much smarter and more capable of distinguishing between propaganda and informed opinion than Horowitz and his supporters think. We have a right to learn about any issue our knowledgeable professors deem important to our intellectual growth. This proposal would curtail students' discussion of topics deemed "politically controversial" and liable to "offend" a sensitive classmate.

How can I learn about the modern Middle East in my political science classes if my professor isn't allowed to discuss the "controversial" topic of the Iraq war and its regional effects? Should my biology instructor be prevented from teaching evolution out of fear of offending a creationist classmate? And why should schools allow some left-wing campus agitator in Economics 101 to file a complaint because a lecturer discusses market efficiency rather than Marxist theories of labor?

All these scenarios are possible at institutions cowed into incorporating Horowitz's restrictions into their academic policy. The bill's vague language invites any student with an ideological agenda to use its provisions to politicize syllabi and restrict campus speech.

DOJ_NMG_0088462

No disgruntled individual has a right to inhibit everyone else's ability to learn. Youthful skepticism about received wisdom is, of course, essential for intellectual maturation. And a student who puts forth an unpopular argument in class or on an assignment should not be disparaged by an instructor or given a bad grade.

But almost every university has policies prohibiting such harassment along with independent appeals procedures to protect both students and the integrity of the academic environment. Horowitz's restrictions, in contrast, would invite outside monitoring of the classroom, creating hostility between students and professors, and politicizing the intellectual environment at school. It would allow the whims of partisan legislators, rather than the judicious advice of knowledgeable PhDs, to dictate what and how young adults learn.

My classmates and I want our elected leaders to focus on addressing our real concerns when it comes to getting an education -- student loans, skyrocketing tuition and the post-graduation job market. We don't want them making it harder for us to learn by restricting the free exchange of ideas on campus.

The writer is a senior at Princeton University.

ANTITRUST:

Tribune Is Said To Get Bids From Private Equity Firms (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

The Tribune Company received several preliminary offers late yesterday from a series of private equity firms, according to people briefed on the auction.

The preliminary offers, which are nonbinding and known as “indications of interest,” are the first step in an auction for Tribune, which said last month that it would consider selling its 11 newspapers and 25 television stations.

The company includes assets like The Los Angeles Times, The Chicago Tribune, The Baltimore Sun, Newsday and the Chicago Cubs.

Among Tribune’s suitors, these people said, are a group including Providence Equity Partners, Madison Dearborn Partners and Apollo Management; another consortium including Thomas H. Lee Partners and the Texas Pacific Group; and the Carlyle Group and Bain Capital, which are each planning to bid separately.

Notably absent from the bidding was any major newspaper company, though it remained possible that Gannett or another rival company could emerge.

Tribune has a market value of $8.2 billion. Analysts have had scattered estimates about how much the company could be sold for, with some estimating a price as high as $10 billion and others estimating Tribune will not fetch any premium.

The preliminary offers from the teams of private equity firms were only for the entire company; it was unclear last night whether Tribune was formally entertaining offers for specific assets like The Los Angeles Times, which has been the target of several wealthy Los Angelenos like David Geffen and Eli Broad.

Exact terms of the preliminary offers could not be learned and it was likely they would change substantially once bidders have access to Tribune’s confidential records and books.

Shares of Tribune, which is based in Chicago, fell 32 cents, to $33.47.

Local Support Boosts Baltimore Sun Bidder (WT)

By Sean Lengell, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

BALTIMORE -- The man behind a local effort to buy the Baltimore Sun from the Tribune Co. said yesterday he is encouraged by the amount of community support he has received.

"I have never witnessed this kind of response to a business transaction," said Theodore G. Venetoulis, a former Baltimore County politician and current owner of a Maryland news and political magazine. "Newspapers still have a very substantial role in people's lives. It touches the core of people."

DOJ_NMG_0088463

Mr. Venetoulis said he received several telephone calls from potential investors after reports were published yesterday revealing the group's intentions.

"The group we've put together understand two things," said Mr. Venetoulis, who lost a Democratic primary bid for governor in 1978. "One, that this will not be an investment that will provide the usual yield and return that some investors will be used to. Secondly, they've agreed that they would not in any way attempt to jeopardize the paper's independence or attempt to give it a certain ideological bent."

The group includes Abell Foundation President Robert C. Embry Jr. and longtime civic leader Walter Sondheim, the Sun reported.

The founders of the Abell Foundation sold the Baltimore Sun Co. to the Times Mirror Co. in 1986, which sold itself to the Tribune Co. in 2000.

The group has contacted the Tribune Co. about its interest but hasn't made a formal offer for the paper. The Tribune Co. has declined to comment.

Meanwhile, two Boston buyout firms, Bain Capital LLC and Thomas H. Lee Partners LP, may make competing bids for the entire Tribune Co., according to reports published yesterday.

Mr. Venetoulis said that for tax reasons the Tribune Co. was more likely to sell itself as a whole rather than in pieces.

"We'll probably have our best shot at owning the Sun once a private-equity group chooses to spin off the properties," he said. "We can't afford to buy the whole company ourselves."

The Washington-Baltimore Newspaper Guild, which represents the Sun's newsroom staff, recently meet with Mr. Venetoulis' group and said it is open to the idea of a change in ownership.

"It's early to say, but they seem sincere and we like what we've heard so far," said Bill Salganik, a Sun reporter and president of the Washington-Baltimore guild. "We could imagine working with the Venetoulis group."

The Baltimore group is the latest to seek to buy metropolitan daily newspapers from embattled corporations.

A group led by public relations and advertising executive Brian Tierney recently paid $515 million for the Philadelphia Inquirer and Philadelphia Daily News.

A group led by Jack Welch, the former head of General Electric Co., said this week that it was interested in buying the Boston Globe. And in Los Angeles, three billionaires, including music executive David Geffen, have said they want to buy the Los Angeles Times, which also is owned by the Tribune Co.

Most large newspaper companies are publicly held, but as the sector has struggled with declining circulation and advertising revenue, it has fallen into disfavor on Wall Street, often leading to calls to break apart the businesses.

• This article is based in part on wire services reports.

A New Advertising Engine (WP)

By Sara Kehaulani Goo, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Google Expands Its Web Reach to Madison Avenue

NEW YORK -- At Google Inc.'s new office near the Hudson River, Volvo's top U.S. advertising manager has just flown in from California to talk about next year's launch of a new car, aimed at the hip, 20-something crowd.

Linda Gangeri, a Volvo executive, wants to hear Google's ideas about online video. She high-fives the company for its recent decision to purchase online video phenomenon YouTube Inc. and asks for Google's thoughts about how to advertise the new car, which Volvo is considering launching with commercials only on the Internet.

"This is a target we've never reached before and one you cannot reach via traditional marketing messages -- they reject it," she tells them. "We look to you and challenge you, with Google being more of that young, targeted mind-set."

Just a few years ago, Google was a bit player on Madison Avenue. It specialized in tiny text ads shown alongside search results and in the margins of thousands of Web sites that partner with Google.

DOJ_NMG_0088464

But recently Google has moved beyond search, reaching out to big advertisers to sell them online graphical or display ads on its partner sites. The firm is developing new Web video ad formats that could give TV commercials a run for their money and has been staffing up new projects to sell ads offline in newspapers and magazines and on radio.

Earlier this month, Google's ambitions were on display when it opened its new office in the old Port Authority building, covering 1 1/2 floors on an entire Manhattan block in the funky Chelsea neighborhood. The company has recruited executives from some of the biggest media firms and is rapidly expanding its 500-member team here in an attempt to cultivate relationships with Madison Avenue and large advertisers.

"There's probably a false assumption in the marketplace that Google is a bunch of machines in Mountain View [Calif.] and we don't have relationships like you might see at Conde Nast up the street or at ABC television," said Patrick Keane, Google's director of product marketing.

Google's strategy is to bring the math and science that fueled its search-engine ad success to other forms of marketing. The company's existing text-ad system allows advertisers to see how many people click on each ad and pay only when someone clicks, helping advertisers calculate the return on their marketing dollars. Eventually Google hopes to offer similar metrics for online video ads and off-line campaigns, though it is still in the early stages of figuring out how those might work.

"They're trying to take the DNA of search marketing" to apply it to other kinds of advertising, said Timothy Hanlon, senior vice president at Denuo, a new-media consulting division of Publicis Groupe. Hanlon added that the bigger pot of money in traditional "brand-marketing budgets" is a natural target for Google.

In wooing Madison Avenue, Google faces some challenges. Its foray into display and video ads brings it face to face with rival Yahoo Inc., which established its office here in 1997 and is regarded as the leader in helping large companies develop branding campaigns on the Web. Last year, Google reorganized its entire sales force into 12 industry-specific teams after realizing that big advertisers didn't want a sales team of "generalists"; they wanted experts familiar with their field.

Ad agencies seem open to working with Google, though some said the search firm has tried to go around them and pitch advertisers directly. And while Google's ad products beyond search are experimental, they seem worth trying, some said.

"The scariest thing about Google is they don't know what they don't know," said Jason Clement, associate director of search engine marketing at Carat Fusion, an advertising agency. "There's a difference between a Harvard mathematician and someone who's been selling ads for 20 years. The mathematician is smarter, but if you want Coca-Cola's dollars, the guy selling billboards for 20 years is the one you want."

Unlike Yahoo, AOL or other Web sites that attract a big audience, Google doesn't sell ads on its home page, Google.com. Instead, it partners with thousands of other Web sites and places ads on them. Most of the ads today are small text items, titled "Ads by Google," but increasingly Google is helping companies place banner and video ads on these same partner sites.

By applying technology to measure their impact, Google plans to differentiate its banner and video ads from those of its competitors. Teaming with online research firm ComScore Networks Inc., Google is trying to correlate the effectiveness of each ad by tracking the number of people exposed to it who later perform searches about the product.

For example, people who visited the AutoTrader.com site this summer were shown an image of a Volvo sport-utility vehicle advertising the car for lease at $389 a month. ComScore placed "cookies," or tracing files, on the computers of visitors and tracked how many typed the word "Volvo" or "Volvo SUV" into a search box weeks or months later. During the Web campaign for the Volvo's XC90, Google said 39 percent of Internet users who were exposed to the ads later conducted online searches for Volvo cars.

While the online campaign was running, Google also measured a 183 percent increase in visits to the Volvo Car Corp. site, Volvocars.com, and a 164 percent increase in the number of people who clicked more deeply into Volvo's site, indicating greater interest.

Google did not try to correlate viewership of the online ads with car sales data. Nor could it say how much impact a TV campaign Volvo also was running might have had on Internet searches or site visits.

Anna Papadopoulos, interactive media director of Volvo's campaign with ad agency Euro RSCG 4D, said Google's data provided Volvo with confidence and made clear that Google wanted to be accountable for the results. "At the very least, we were able to know that the Google campaign was attributed to" those numbers, she said. Papadopoulos said Volvo also advertises with other major Internet networks, including Yahoo, Microsoft Corp.'s MSN and AOL, and that each has its strengths. Yahoo and MSN, for example, use technology that can show ads to potential customers who have indicated an interest in products based on past browsing. While Google doesn't offer that capability, Papadopoulos likes Google's hands-on customer service. She said she also was impressed with how Google matched the demographics of likely Volvo buyers with visitor demographics at dozens of small sites.

DOJ_NMG_0088465

Google, which announced this month that it was buying online video site YouTube for $1.65 billion in stock, has big plans to expand into video advertising. The firm hasn't announced exactly what it plans to do with YouTube, but both properties are pushing a new kind of Internet advertising called "click to play." The ads are essentially online video commercials that don't play unless a visitor clicks on the image.

Google said it opposes "pre-roll" Web ads, which resemble TV commercials by interrupting site visitors and forcing them to watch a video before they can see the content they are seeking. With Google's click-to-play ad service, advertisers will be able to select specific Web sites where they want their video ad displayed or allow Google to select the sites, based on whether the audience of a Web site or its content matches that of the advertiser.

Google thinks the ads will do well with movie studios, which could use trailers as click-to-play ads, and with carmakers, who can use video to draw Internet users shopping for a car. But the format remains new and largely untested.

As one of the most-searched automakers on the Web, Volvo agreed to use Google's new video format to apply its recent "Who Would You Give a Volvo To?" TV ads to the Web. And it is thinking about using the format for its new car next year.

"As a small brand, we do have to take risks," said Volvo's Gangeri. "But at the same time, if you want to reach a target like [our new vehicle], you can't do that in the safe, secure world of Volvo as we know it."

Arcelor Mittal Takes Stake In Mich. Auto Supplier Noble (AP)

AP, October 28, 2006

BRUSSELS, Belgium - Arcelor Mittal SA said Friday it was merging a unit that makes steel for the auto industry with Michigan-based laser welder Noble International Ltd. in return for a 40 percent stake in the business and a $300 million payment.

The Luxembourg-based steelmaker - currently being formed from a tie-up between Arcelor SA and Mittal Steel Co. NV - said it would become Noble's largest stockholder when the deal was complete.

Arcelor Mittal said this would strengthen the company's position with the global car industry. The transaction will combine Arcelor's laser-welded tailored blank business TBA - the largest in Europe - with Noble, North America's largest producer of laser-welded steel products.

Mittal has significant U.S. operations through its earlier acquisition of International Steel Group.

Combining expected results for this year, the combined Arcelor-Noble business would have a revenue of $1.1 billion and earnings before interest, taxes, depreciation and amortization of $122 million.

The Arcelor unit employs 670 people at nine plants in Europe, one in the U.S. and a quarter stake in a joint venture in China. The company said its revenue would be around $500 million this year.

Noble, headquartered in Warren, has more than 2,000 workers at 12 plants in the U.S., Canada, Mexico and Australia. It expects 2006 revenue to hit $600 million. Earlier this month, it bought Pullman Industries Inc., which makes steel tubular parts for carmakers.

Arcelor Mittal said the deal should close in March 2007 after it wins approval from Noble's stockholders and antitrust regulators.

ON THE NET

Arcelor Mittal SA: http://www.arcelormittal.com

Noble International, Ltd.: http://www.nobleintl.com

FCC Sets Vote On AT&T Purchase Of BellSouth To Nov. 3 (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Molly Peterson

Bloomberg, October 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088466

Oct. 27 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Federal Communications Commission plans to vote Nov. 3 on AT&T Inc.'s $82 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp., three weeks after a deadlock on the terms of approval derailed a previously scheduled vote.

The commission, which released its agenda for the meeting today, hasn't indicated what types of conditions it may place on the deal, the biggest telephone-company combination ever.

Facing pressure from the panel's two Democrats, AT&T earlier this month offered concessions including a price freeze on certain business data services and $10-a-month high-speed Internet access for some BellSouth customers. Rival companies want tougher conditions, such as price controls.

``We still continue to believe there's a good chance the FCC will conditionally approve the necessary AT&T-BellSouth license transfers at some point in November," Stifel Nicolaus & Co. analyst Blair Levin said today in an investor note.

FCC approval is the last regulatory hurdle for San Antonio-based AT&T, the biggest U.S. phone company, to complete the transaction, which the companies announced almost eight months ago. The Justice Department and 18 states cleared the deal without conditions. FCC deliberations have been complicated by the likely recusal of one member, which leaves the panel evenly split between Democrats and Republicans.

FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, a Republican who initially proposed approving the deal without conditions, postponed an Oct. 13 vote after Democrats Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein, who are seeking conditions, asked for public comment on AT&T's proposals.

The vote could be postponed again if Martin and fellow Republican Deborah Tate fail to reach an agreement with Copps and Adelstein by Nov. 3, analysts said.

Shares of AT&T fell 18 cents to $34.22 at 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading and have risen 40 percent this year. Atlanta-based BellSouth fell 14 cents to $45.04 and has climbed 66 percent this year.

Smithfield Foods Gambling On Merger; Foes Fighting Expansion (DPHR)

By Chris Flores 247-4738

Newport News (VA) Daily Press, October 28, 2006

The pork company's opponents were fighting this week for federal regulators to deny the merger.

Smithfield Foods adversaries are trying to ensure that the world's largest pork company loses a $100 million bet.

If the Department of Justice allows Smithfield to purchase Premium Standard Farms, the $674 million deal will help Smithfield further bolster its position as the company that raises and slaughters the most hogs in the country.

A line of opponents has formed to protest, saying Smithfield will dominate the price of hogs. Smithfield and Premium knew the fight was coming, so the deal stipulates that Smithfield will pay $100 million to Premium if anti-trust regulators deny the deal.

But Smithfield was willing to take the risk. Smithfield gained confidence by surviving federal regulatory scrutiny when it bought Farmland Foods in 2003. Many of the same groups that opposed that deal also oppose this new one. The National Farmers Union, along with a coalition of rural and farm groups, made a case to the Justice Department this week, arguing the deal should be denied.

"The packing industry is already pretty drastically consolidated," said Fred Stokes, spokesman for the Organization for Competitive Markets, an agricultural think tank funded by independent farmers. "And here's the No. 1 hog producer buying the No. 2 guy."

The opponents of the deal include a growing list of Midwestern politicians, who say the deal will give Smithfield the ability to determine hog prices. They formally asked the Justice Department to scrutinize the merger and have called for congressional hearings.

Smithfield is already the largest processor of hogs, with 26 percent of the market. By adding Premium, the company will have 31 percent. Farmers worry that with less competition for buying hogs, Smithfield can drive down prices.

Smithfield opponents say Premium had the only other slaughter facility in the Southeast. Without that competitor, Smithfield can set the prices it pays all farmers in the region to raise hogs, said Michael Stumo, general counsel for the competitive markets group.

"That, per se, should disqualify the acquisition on anti-trust grounds," said Stumo.

DOJ_NMG_0088467

And all sales are under contracts that pay farmers a fee for raising hogs - there is no market price for the hogs themselves to be sold.

"You cannot sell hogs in that region unless you are contracted," said Stumo.

The company also will have a greater concentration of power in the Western and Southern part of the Midwestern hog production area. Even there, only about 10-15 percent of the hogs are sold on an open market.

By purchasing the second-biggest hog producer, Smithfield will raise about 20 percent of the hogs nationwide if the deal closes. Its clout on that side of the business will also help Smithfield influence the purchase of hogs by its competitors.

Stokes said he thinks the case is about as strong as possible, but that doesn't mean the government will intervene. He believes lower-level staff members at the Justice Department will support rejection, but will be overruled by political appointees.

"The chances are good that they're going to approve it," he said.

A Smithfield spokesman didn't return a call for comment.

BD Wins Federal Antitrust Approval For TriPath Deal (BERGCR)

By Dunstan Prial, STAFF WRITER

Bergen County Record, October 28, 2006

Becton, Dickinson and Co. said Friday that federal antitrust approval has moved it a step closer to its planned $350 million acquisition of TriPath Imaging Inc., a manufacturer of cancer-screening products.

BD has said adding TriPath's technology will help it expand its presence in the field of cancer diagnostics.

The deal, which the Franklin Lakes-based maker of medical devices announced in August, still needs to be approved by TriPath's shareholders, said BD spokeswoman Colleen White.

The Federal Trade Commission, which oversees antitrust matters in the United States, said in a statement that it had completed its investigation of the deal and did not plan to take action.

As advances in research have created new opportunities for treating various forms of cancer, the potentially broad -- and lucrative -- market for cancer treatments has prompted health care companies large and small to target oncology.

TriPath, based in Burlington, N.C., uses sophisticated computer imaging to detect cell abnormalities that might indicate the onset of cancer.

BD already owns a 6.5 percent stake in TriPath.

The shares were purchased in 2001, when the two companies first began collaborating to find markers to diagnose cancer.

The acquisition calls for BD, maker of the Ace bandage brand and the world's biggest manufacturer of hypodermic needles, to pay TriPath's stockholders $9.25 a share.

BD's shares fell 18 cents to $70.69 on Friday. TriPath's shares fell 1 cent to $9.13.

At the time the deal was announced, TriPath's shares were valued at $5.12.

A TriPath spokesman did not immediately return a phone call on Friday.

BD's chief executive officer, Edward J. Ludwig, has said the company's strong recent fiscal results will allow BD to pursue growth through acquisitions.

For its fiscal third quarter, which ended June 30, BD reported profit rose 9 percent.This was due in part to the $230 million acquisition in February of GeneOhm, a San Diego-based biotechnology company that has developed a rapid test for diagnosing a powerful virus frequently transmitted among hospital patients.

ENVIRONMENT:

Appeals Court Halts Stryker Activity Here (HSB)

By Gregg K. Kakesako

Honolulu Star-Bulletin, October 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088468

The Army lost a major court battle to local environmentalists and anti-war activists yesterday and might not be ready to deploy a Stryker brigade to Iraq late next year.

A 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals panel in San Francisco, in a 2-1 decision, issued a temporary injunction halting construction, training and any other activities dealing with the $1.5 billion Stryker Combat Brigade planned for the 25th Infantry Division.

David Henkin, Earthjustice attorney, said the case now reverts to U.S. District Judge Dave Ezra to determine if any Stryker-related construction or training can occur while the Army works on a new environmental impact statement.

Henkin said he will not only ask Ezra to prevent the Army from causing "irreparable harm" to environment, but he also does not want the Stryker conversion to be so far along that it cannot be stopped.

The Army has said the 2nd Brigade Combat Team has completed 60 percent of its training and received 70 percent of its equipment. The 2nd Brigade is slated to grow into a 3,500-member combat unit built around 328 of the 19-ton, eight-wheeled vehicles.

Before the injunction was put into effect, the Army had said the 2nd Brigade would be ready to deploy to Iraq by November 2007 as the fifth of seven planned Stryker units.

In court papers, Ron Borne, director of transformation for the 25th Infantry Division's 2nd Brigade Combat Team, listed Stryker-related construction projects that must be completed for the Army to meet its deadline.

The Army issued a terse statement yesterday: "We are in receipt of the court order, and we are complying."

A federal appeals panel ruled Oct. 5 that the Army had violated the National Environmental Policy Act by failing to consider other locations outside of Schofield Barracks for its fifth Stryker brigade.

The court ordered the Army to amend its environmental impact statement -- a process that could take as long as a year. Despite the court's ruling, the Army maintained that it could proceed with 28 Stryker-related construction projects, totaling $693 million, during the review period.

Earthjustice, representing Ilioulaokalani Coalition, Na Imi Pono and Kipuka, sought the temporary injunction last week because the Army planned to start construction Wednesday on a nearly 1,000-acre live-fire training complex at Schofield Barracks.

Henkin said the Army now concedes that this training range is no longer "a critical construction project either for Stryker conversion or to train other units."

Kyle Kajihiro, an anti-war activist, said yesterday that cultural monitors discovered this month what they believe are more than 200 cultural sites, including what could be ancient burial areas.

"It really raises the level of concern since some of them could be sacred burial sites," Kajihiro said.

In court filings last week, Henkin said the Army acknowledged that construction of the $6 million urban-assault course could result in destruction or damage of Hawaiian cultural sites.

Cultural monitors also have had no opportunity to inspect areas where the motor pool and the vehicle wash facility will be built, the environmental group said.

"We're pleased the court recognized the Army's plans to plow ahead with Stryker conversion in Hawaii -- before even looking at other places where it could achieve its goals without destroying cultural sites -- violated both the law and common sense," Henkin said.

In opposing Earthjustice's request for a temporary injunction, U.S. Justice Department attorneys said the appeals court "must balance national security implications of enjoining those activities against the harm alleged by the plaintiffs."

But Earthjustice argued that the Army's "rhetoric rings hollow" that any delay in the development of a Stryker Combat Brigade would jeopardize national security. In an 11-page rebuttal, Henkin said the Army used the same arguments last year.

At that time, Henkin pointed out the Army said any postponement of the 2nd Brigade Combat Team's conversion beyond May 2007 would "significantly degrade the Army's ability to provide effective and ready forces to meet strategic commitments, including ongoing operations in Iraq, and reduce the Army's strategic posture to deter conflict and respond to crisis situations in the Pacific area of responsibility, including the Republic of Korea."

DOJ_NMG_0088469

Initially, May 2007 was the date 25th Infantry Division officials had said the Stryker Brigade Combat Team would be ready for wartime duty.

"The Army fails to explain why this half-year delay, which allegedly posed such dire ramifications, did not, when it came to pass, have any adverse consequences," Henkin said.

Fireman Fights To Live, Comrades Fight Blaze (LAT)

By David Kelly, Jonathan Abrams, Maeve Reston And Scott Gold, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

BEAUMONT — Battling gusting Santa Ana winds, fire crews today fought to try to contain the fast-moving Esperanza arson fire that has killed four firefighters.

Officials this morning released the names of the dead.

Killed were engine Capt. Mark Loutzenhiser, 44, of Idyllwild; engine operator Jess McLean, 27, of Beaumont; assistant engine operator Jason McKay, 27, of Phelan; and firefighter Daniel Hoover-Najera, 20, of San Jacinto.

A fifth firefighter was in critical condition this morning in Arrowhead Regional Medical Center in Colton. He was identified as Pablo Cerda, 23, of Fountain Valley.

Cerda has burns over 90% of his body, severe lung injuries and was placed on life support. His chances of survival are considered poor.

At an afternoon news conference at Arrowhead, David T. Wong, chief of trauma, said Cerda has had some improvement in his "minute-to-minute condition," but the overall prognosis remains poor because of the severity of the burns.

Cerda may be sent to surgery later today to have the burned skin removed. Cerda remains under heavy sedation, Wong said.

The rough terrain in the San Jacinto Mountains of Riverside County just west of Palm Springs posed difficult problems for firefighters trying to keep the blaze from the more populated areas, Janet M. Upton, of the California Department of Forestry and Fire Protection, said today. Winds are expected to gust up to 45 mph and firefighters are facing a long day.

"It's mountain goat territory," Upton said.

The sharp winds are expected to continue until at least tonight, said Mike Giannini, battalion chief of the Marin County Fire Department, one of the agencies supplying some 1,750 firefighters.

"The next 36 hours are going to be key for this thing," he said.

Firefighters ignited a small backfire in Beaumont about half of a mile away from a school with 80 children with special needs. The children moved into the gymnasium but did not leave the building. The fire was started to ensure that the Esperanza fire did not leap to the school's grounds.

"Anytime we get winds blowing by we are worried, but we were all ready to go if necessary," said Lynn Elder, who handles community relations for the school, Child's Help, in the foothills of the San Jacinto Mountains.

The Esperanza fire was deliberately set Thursday about 1:12 a.m. in the San Gorgonio Wash. Fed by dry fuel and bitter winds, it has consumed more than 24,000 acres, according to the official website.

The fire is about 5% contained, with no indication when it will be fully controlled. The fire continues to move mainly to the west and southwest, being driven by east to northeast winds.

The fire is moving toward Highway 79, south of Interstate 10, threatening to push toward Idyllwild and San Jacinto this morning. It has destroyed 10 homes and another 500 homes and three commercial structures are threatened, according to the CDF.

The Air Quality Management District also warned that smoke from the Esperanza wildfire is expected to create unhealthful air quality conditions today in areas of Riverside and Orange counties.

Despite the loss of four of their own, firefighters this morning braced for their difficult day. At one camp here, firefighters rose from their tents and grabbed coffee. The about 200 to 300 firefighters were briefed about their assignments, which are detailed down to the specific roads and structures they are to protect.

DOJ_NMG_0088470

The sun rose but the wind was already gusting so much that it sent swirling dust devils across the fields at the command post.

About 3 a.m., firefighters evacuated another 100 homes at the south end of Banning, near the foothills below Silent Valley. There were some gusts of wind during the night that sent the fire down toward Banning. The residents went to community centers and to friends' homes.

The South Banning evacuations were in addition to Thursday's at Twin Pines and Poppet Flats. More than 700 people have been evacuated, according to officials.

In Washington, the White House joined the list of public officials to express their condolences over the firefighters' deaths.

"A little bit ago, the president placed a phone call to Tom Tidwell, who's the deputy regional forester of the U.S. Forest Service, to express condolences over what is now being called the Esperanza incident, a fire near Palm Springs, California, that has claimed the lives of four firefighters," said spokesman Tony Snow.

The president also "said he hopes that whoever is the perpetrator will be caught quickly and brought to justice."

More than 100 tips have been delivered to the Riverside County Sheriff's Department as the search continued for those who set the arson fire. Anyone arrested could also face murder charges because of the firefighters' deaths.

Sheriff's spokesman Sgt. Earl Quinata said this morning that there are no suspects and denied a television report that authorities were searching for a suspect in a white van.

The pool of reward money for information grew to $400,000 from the $100,000 Riverside County officials pledged Thursday.

This morning, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger announced a state reward of $100,000 for information leading to the arrest and conviction in a California court of the person or persons responsible for setting the Esperanza wildfire.

At another news conference, San Bernardino County Board of Supervisors Chairman Bill Postmus said the county would also offer $100,000.

And the Morongo band of Mission Indians offered $100,000.

On Thursday, Schwarzenegger said that he had instructed his administration "to put every resource into fighting this fire and making sure that the evacuees have everything they need."

The governor declared a state of emergency in Riverside County, which allows the state to provide any needed assistance.

Even as officials pursued the arson investigation, the dead firefighters were a grim reminder of the dangers brought by Santa Ana conditions.

"These winds were devil winds. They came out of nowhere," Pat Boss, a U.S. Forest Service spokesman, said Thursday. "They were fleeing for their lives and the flames caught them."

Thursday's death toll was the highest for California's wild land firefighting community in nearly three decades. In 1979, four state forestry department firefighters were killed when flames overtook them as they walked a bulldozed fire line near San Luis Obispo. The most firefighter deaths in a California wildfire occurred in 1933, when 25 firefighters were killed fighting a Griffith Park blaze.

Three years ago — almost to the day — 14,000 firefighters battled California's worst recorded wildfires, which killed 24 people, destroyed 3,361 homes and burned 739,597 acres in Southern California. One firefighter died, and hundreds more had unforgettable close calls. One of those fires, the Old fire in San Bernardino County, also was an arson fire and remains unsolved.

Earlier Thursday, the fire trapped several hundred people for more than eight hours in the Silent Valley recreational vehicle park. A small army of firefighters circled the park to keep the flames at bay, and by afternoon the danger had subsided, allowing residents to leave the park if they wished.

The fire's speed shocked longtime residents of the remote area who are accustomed to the threat.

John Atherton, a 33-year-old construction manager who was working overnight Thursday, raced home after calling home and telling his wife and children to flee. He grabbed his dog, videos of his three daughters — and tax papers.

"You kind of try to prioritize your whole life in a matter of a half an hour," he said.

He placed sprinklers on his roof. As he left, "the fire all of a sudden turned direction and headed straight toward our home," he said. "That was pretty scary."

DOJ_NMG_0088471

As he made his way down a road toward Banning, traffic was thick with people fleeing. Atherton stopped to help a neighbor herd a llama. "At that point the fire officials told us we were going to have to leave the animals and get out," he said.

Flames hundreds of feet high jumped Highway 243, setting even the guardrail posts ablaze, and were moving toward Highway 79, which was closed between Beaumont and Hemet.

Evacuation centers were established at Banning Community Center and Hemet High School.

Officials said the fire could burn thousands more acres if it reaches parts of the San Bernardino National Forest where an infestation of pine bark beetles has left stands of dead trees. A red flag warning remains in effect throughout much of Southern California because of low humidity and strong winds.

A brush fire burned early this morning in rural southeast Orange County, prompting officials to evacuate 140 people from a campground and to shut down a long stretch of highway for a short time.

The fire broke out about 4:20 a.m. in a wooded area east of Rancho Santa Margarita, near Cleveland National Forest. Authorities safely evacuated 140 people, mostly children, from the nearby Lazy W Ranch camping ground.

The fire, dubbed the "Lazy W", had consumed less than five acres so far, Lynnette Round, a spokeswoman for the Orange County Fire Authority said this morning.

But the blaze, which is mostly contained, forced officials to close Ortega Highway for roughly 30 miles. One of the key arteries to Riverside County was shut down from Antonio Parkway to the Lake Elsinore exits. The highway reopened before 9 a.m.

david.kelly@latimes.com

jonathan.abrams@latimes.com

maeve.reston@latimes.com

scott.gold@latimes.com

Times staff writers Michael Muskal, Mike Anton and Lance Pugmire contributed to this report. Staff writer James Gerstenzang contributed from Washington

Sheriff's Office 'Taking Lots Of Calls' With Arson Tips (LAT)

By Lance Pugmire, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

More than 100 tips have been received by the Riverside County Sheriff's Department as the intense hunt for the person or group that started the fatal Esperanza fire near Cabazon continued today.

The pool of reward money also grew from $100,000 to $400,000 when the state added $100,000, as did San Bernardino County and the Morongo band of Mission Indians.

"We're taking lots of calls," sheriff's spokesman Sgt. Earl Quinata said this morning. "Our investigators are looking at all the information and following up when necessary."

Quinata said there are no suspects in custody, but an arson-homicide investigation "to find the culprits" is urgently working to "resolve this and assist our firefighters and their families" after the blaze claimed the lives of four U.S. Forest Service crew members Thursday.

The U.S. Forest Service members were caught by flames that shifted in the wind, destroying their firetruck and leaving a fifth member clinging to life.

Fire officials say the Esperanza fire began about 1:10 a.m. Thursday in the foothill area along Esperanza Avenue. Forensic specialists combed the ground near the area searching for clues.

One neighbor near the fire's starting point told The Times he saw two white males in their early 20s fleeing the area. Residents in a Cabazon mobile home community reported they had seen teenagers smoking marijuana in the area.

"There's no indication that [the marijuana smokers are] the source, but we're investigating all tips," Quinata said.

The Riverside County Board of Supervisors has offered a $100,000 reward for anyone providing information that leads to the arrest and conviction of the person or people responsible for starting the blaze.

"The urgency is for people with relevant information to call in," Quinata said.

Anyone with information about how the fire started can report tips to (951) 922-7116.

Calif. Blaze Spreads After Firefighters' Deaths (WP)

By Sonya Geis And John Pomfret, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Reward Increased To $500,000 in Suspected Arson

BANNING, Calif., Oct. 27 -- A wildfire that has consumed thousands of acres west of Palm Springs and has killed four U.S. Forest Service firefighters continued to roar Friday, fed by hot, fast and dry winds, while state and local officials boosted the reward to $500,000 to find the suspected arsonist who ignited the blaze.

The Forest Service and the California Department of Forestry and Fire Protection are investigating the deaths, and on Friday a half-dozen investigators wearing yellow protective suits studied the steep dirt driveway of 15400 Gorgonio View Rd. As a fierce wind whipped past the gutted house on a blackened hill above them, an investigator knelt down, then gestured at the canyon wall, from where the flames had come.

Five Forest Service firefighters were trying to protect the house from the wildfire Thursday when the inferno suddenly overwhelmed them. Three died at the scene, and a fourth died soon afterward at a hospital. On Friday the fifth remained in grave condition, with more than 95 percent of his body burned.

The deaths constituted the worst disaster involving a wildfire since 2001, when four firefighters were trapped by flames and killed in a remote part of Washington state.

On Friday, investigators, as well as the men's families and colleagues, struggled to understand how an experienced fire captain and his crew could have been killed.

"They had a real good, experienced crew," said Jerry Garcia, 29, a firefighter who worked with Capt. Mark Loutzenhiser, 43, and Jess McLean, 27, a fire engine operator. "I've been with them on fires, and I felt real safe with them."

McLean, Garcia said, "was someone I really looked up to. Last season was my first season, and I really trusted him."

The doomed firemen were outside their fire engine, apparently running, when flames caught up with them, said Pat Boss, a Forest Service spokesman. Firefighters carry protective shelters, similar to pup tents, that can shield them from flames, but they did not use them, Boss said.

"They had no time to deploy anything, much less even pull it out of their bag," he said. "They had no idea what hit them."

Also killed were Jason McKay, 27, and Daniel Hoover-Najera, 20.

Michael Wakowski, a fire division chief in the San Bernardino National Forest, told the Associated Press it did not appear the crew did anything wrong.

"Sometimes things go bad, I hate to say," he said.

Fires move at varying speeds, as leisurely as an adult on an evening stroll or as fast as a sprinter, said Shankar Mahalingam, an engineering professor and wildfire expert at the University of California at Riverside.

"Sometimes, however, it can move hundreds of yards in an instant when it's pushed by the wind. It can climb up canyons incredibly fast with embers shooting forth," Mahalingam said.

Garcia and his crew were eating lunch under a tree while they waited for counselors and a chaplain. Some watched the progress of the fire from a ridge nearby. More than 1,500 firefighters managed to contain the blaze to 24,000 acres overnight, before winds fanned it again. By sundown Friday, the fire had consumed nearly 40,000 acres -- more than 60 square miles.

Forest Service firefighters were pulled off the fire Thursday to give them a chance to grieve. Garcia said he was "emotionally, mentally, physically drained out. It was a good thing they gave us the day off."

But Capt. Garett Armsby, on the same crew as Garcia, was less patient. "We've got a fire happening at our backdoor," he said. "It's hard to just watch it."

Loutzenhiser left behind a wife and five children. Boss said he was active as a youth coach and umpire.

"The kids loved him," said Boss, a friend of Loutzenhiser's for 23 years. "They used to come up and grab his leg. He was a joy to have around."

Arson investigators said they had no major breakthroughs. Witnesses told the Associated Press that, shortly after the fire started in the town of Cabazon, two young men were seen leaving the area, close to a teenage hangout known as Raccoon Rock.

DOJ_NMG_0088473

Riverside County sheriff's detectives interviewed other witnesses and fielded about 100 tips.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) added $100,000 in state money to a reward posted by Riverside County for information leading to the suspected arsonist's arrest. A Rancho Mirage resident, the Morongo Indian tribe and San Bernardino County each contributed $100,000, raising the total to $500,000.

The terrain in this mountainous area 25 miles west of Palm Springs is rocky and steep, making it difficult to tackle fires. Winds shift direction quickly. Desert scrub and low bushes make explosive tinder for fire. In addition, some fire experts said, the tendency of government authorities to put out smaller wildfires as quickly as they begin can allow the chaparral to grow unhindered, creating the foundation for even bigger blazes.

"We generally try to catch fires and put them out before they reach a critical size," said Walter Boyce, director of the Wildlife Health Center at the University of California at Davis. "Unfortunately, once they reach critical size, it's only a combination of effort, luck, wind and weather -- and mostly it's the weather -- that allows things to get back under control."

Fire officials said the blaze was only 25 percent contained, and in the areas already burned a sloping, blackened moonscape was still smoldering. Many houses in the area -- such as the one on Gorgonio View Road -- are down long, rutted dirt roads, far from neighbors, with views of oak-filled canyons or the desert floor 3,000 feet below. Several houses were melted ruins, with a satellite dish or a scorched refrigerator barely recognizable.

Pomfret reported from Los Angeles.

Burst Of Wind-Driven Flames Engulfed Firefighters (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

BEAUMONT, Calif., Oct. 27 — The five firefighters of Engine Crew 57 did what they had been trained to do. Spotting great licks of flame nearing a modest house on Thursday morning, they jumped from their truck and began cutting brush and hosing the building.

But then the wildfire did what wind-driven blazes can do: it exploded from a bowl-like gully with deadly ferocity, according to fellow firefighters close to the scene.

There was no time to run, no time to duck into the fire shelters the crew members carried. By the time other firefighters reached them, the Esperanza fire, as the blaze in Twin Pines near here is called, had done its work.

The four other United States Forest Service crews watched helplessly from up on a ridge nearby as the engine crew disappeared in the smoke and flames.

Officials say they believe the fire was intentionally set.

“It blew up like a fireball,” said Pat Boss, a friend of the crew’s captain and a public affairs officer for the Forest Service in Idyllwild, where the captain lived. “They did not see it coming.”

Three of the firefighters died at the scene. They were Jess McLean of Beaumont and Jason McKay of Phelan, who were both 27 and had been in the Forest Service for several years, and Daniel Hoover-Najera, 20, a seasonal worker from San Jacinto on his second tour of fire duty.

The captain, Mark Loutzenhiser, 44, a 21-year veteran and a father of five known for coaching youth sports, died later at a hospital. The fifth crew member, Pablo Cerda, 23, a seasonal worker who lived in Fountain Valley, was in critical condition with burns over almost his entire body.

All firefighting is dangerous, but wildfires bring challenges of wind and difficult terrain. Friends said these crew members measured success by each house or even acre of their forest they preserved.

“He talked about saving the forest, about being proud to save even a few acres,” said Marlene Lopez, a neighbor of Mr. McLean, whom she often saw roaring off to work on his motorcycle or working on fixing up the motorboat in his driveway and his yard.

On Thursday, she said, hours after Mr. McLean’s death, his wife, Karen, wheeled the motorcycle inside the house — not the garage, the house.

“I knew something was terribly wrong and she just cried when I asked her if Jess was O.K.,” Ms. Lopez said.

DOJ_NMG_0088474

State and local authorities have posted rewards totaling $400,000 for information leading to the arrest of the arsonist they believe caused the fire, 90 miles east of downtown Los Angeles.

The deaths have shaken the close-knit world of firefighters here, mostly outdoorsmen who camp and play in the forests they protect, and develop a respect, the word most often used, for the capricious nature of wildfires.

Except for the deaths, this fire probably would not have stood out. It has burned about 39,900 acres, but is dwarfed by other more recent fires, including one in early September that burned more than 200,000 acres north of Los Angeles and was among the largest in state history.

This fire has consumed 10 structures, including five houses, while wildfires in the fall of 2003 in Southern California killed 24 people, destroyed 3,700 homes, and burned 750,000 acres. The record for firefighter deaths is 14 — 10 men and four women who died July 2, 1994, on the side of a ravine in Glenwood Springs, Colo., when fire shot up as if sucked through a chimney.

Groups of firefighters have died before, often caught in the furious Santa Ana winds that blow this time of year and give each fire tricky, hard-to-foresee elements. In this case, the winds have been particularly erratic, so much so that firefighting aircraft have not always been able to attack.

Commanders use computer modeling and mapping and other technology and techniques to get a fix on how the fire is burning and its direction, but a good deal of guesswork and intuition come into play, particularly at the front lines.

"As far as what the fire will do at any particular foot, at any particular second, we can't really say," said Mark Finney, a research forester at the Missoula Fire Sciences Laboratory in Montana. "And those are critical scales for firefighters, and for lots of things: for damage, for effects on vegetation, on houses."

Capt. Joel Vela, a spokesman for the California Department of Forestry, which is coordinating firefighting efforts, said the men experienced hurricane-like conditions at the house, "only instead of rain coming down it was fire."

"It's dark because the smoke has blocked the sun, the wind is blowing, it is like a hurricane," Captain Vela said.

The wind and towering columns of smoke have made it difficult for the authorities to assess their progress, but with additional firefighters and equipment, they say they are making headway. About 2,000 firefighters are at work, and 25 percent of the fire has been contained, they said.

People in Idyllwild, a mountain hamlet of 3,500 people, began organizing fund-raisers for the families of the Crew 57 members. They recalled the firefighters as devoted to family and community.

Captain Loutzenhiser coached volleyball, basketball and baseball, and ran adult athletic leagues, diligently reporting the results to the local newspaper.

Michael Herman, a Forest Service firefighter at the nearby Kenworthy Fire Station, said Mr. McLean was known for hiking steep slopes without breaking a sweat.

Mr. Cerda and Mr. Hoover-Najera were working in the summer and fall and training the rest of the year, on the road toward full-time firefighting jobs, Mr. Boss said.

Mr. McKay, who was raised in the High Desert of Southern California, wanted to be a firefighter since he was a child, family members said. When he was 14, he became a Fire Explorer with the City of Adelanto Fire Department, and later went to Victor Valley College, where he trained to be a wildland firefighter.

The crew members had experienced tough fires before, but with winter approaching and bringing the rains that dampen the hillsides and reduce the fire danger, they were getting ready to wind down. It had been a busy summer here and elsewhere; nationwide 9.4 million acres have burned, well above the 5.3 million average of the past 10 years.

Mr. Loutzenhiser was in the middle of remodeling his house and wanted to finish the work.

" 'I am looking forward to the winter when things slow down,' " Mr. Boss recalled Mr. Loutzenhiser saying last week.

Taking On A Coal Mining Practice As A Matter Of Faith (NYT)

By Neela Banerjee

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088475

HALE GAP, Va. — The windswept ridge that Sharman Chapman-Crane hiked to on a recent fall afternoon is the kind of place, she said, that she normally would avoid. From there, she could see what she loved about Appalachia and what it had lost, and she wanted her visitors to see it, too.

The old rounded peaks of the mountains encircled the ridge, dense with trees smudged red and gold. But in the middle of the peaks, several stood stripped bare and chopped up, a result of an increasingly common and controversial coal mining practice called mountaintop removal.

"Doesn't it say in Scripture, 'Who can weigh a mountain, measure a basket of earth?' " Ms. Chapman-Crane said, recalling descriptions of God's omnipotence in Isaiah 40:12. "Well, only God can. But now, the coal companies seem to be able to do it, too."

Ms. Chapman-Crane, her colleagues at the Mennonite Central Committee Appalachia and other Appalachian Christians are trying to halt mountaintop removal, and at the heart of their work, they say, is their faith.

They are part of an awakening among religious people to environmental issues, said Paul Gorman, executive director of the National Religious Partnership for the Environment, an interreligious alliance. Increasingly, religious people across denominations are organizing around local issues, like preventing a landfill, preserving wetlands and changing mining.

"People of faith are thinking afresh about human place and purpose in the greater web of life," Mr. Gorman said. "They are asking, What does it mean to be present in a crisis of God's creation made by God's children?"

Although Christian environmental activists speak out against mountaintop removal at different levels of government, many believe that showing the practice's toll will persuade others to join them in seeking stricter regulation of it, if not an outright ban.

A new group, Christians for the Mountains, urges religious people to take up mountaintop removal "as a spiritual issue," and it has made a DVD that it is distributing to churches and individuals, said Allen Johnson, an evangelical Christian and a founder of the group.

The Rev. John Rausch, director of the Catholic Committee of Appalachia, has led tours of mountaintop removal sites since 1994. Mr. Rausch estimates that 400 people have taken his tour. They learn of the tours by word of mouth or from their churches, pay a few hundred dollars to stay in simple accommodations, hike several miles through forests and mined lands and talk to people whose lives have been affected by mountaintop removal.

The Mennonite Central Committee Appalachia, based in Whitesburg, Ky., gave its first tour in October, focusing on a corner of southeastern Kentucky and southwestern Virginia rich in coal and diverse forests.

On the second morning of the four-day tour, the trip's leaders, Ms. Chapman-Crane and the Rev. Duane Beachey, marched their three-member group up the mile-long trail to Bad Branch Falls. Poplars, beeches, hemlocks and magnolias thatched together a canopy above the trail, and the rain of their leaves made a soft ticking sound. Wild ginseng and wintergreen lined the path. Cottage-size boulders leaned forward over a rushing stream below the trail.

"Not every place on the mountains has waterfalls like Bad Branch," Ms. Chapman-Crane said. "But this is pretty much what it's like on the mountains here. The forests of the Appalachian range are like a northern rain forest."

Mary Yoder, who had volunteered to come on the trip for her congregation, Columbus Mennonite Church in Columbus, Ohio, asked, "So this is the kind of place that gets blown up in mountaintop removal?"

Mr. Chapman-Crane replied, "This is what would be lost, is lost, when they blast a mountaintop."

The United States is rich with coal, and mountaintop removal has begun to replace underground mining in Appalachia as the preferred method of extraction because of its efficiency and lower cost. Mountaintop removal involves leveling mountains with explosives to reach seams of coal. The debris that had once been the mountain is usually dumped by bulldozers and huge trucks into neighboring valleys, burying streams.

The coal industry asserts that mountaintop removal is a safer way to remove coal than sending miners underground and that without it, companies would have to close mines and lay off workers.

Luke Popovich, a spokesman for the National Mining Association, a coal lobbying group, said that by fighting mountaintop removal religious groups might find their priorities colliding.

DOJ_NMG_0088476

"They find themselves in a difficult position," Mr. Popovich said, "because they're expressing support for those who purport to protect nature, and, at the same time, that activism carries implications for the human side of the natural equation. Human welfare depends on the rational exploitation of nature."

Christianity runs wide and deep in Appalachia. At the Courthouse Cafe in Whitesburg, Mr. Beachey explained that as a Christian concern for his neighbors drove his desire to rein in mountaintop removal. But as in much of Appalachia, pastors and churchgoers here are reluctant to stir up trouble: many work for coal companies, or the people next to them in the pew do. Others believe stopping mountaintop removal would eliminate the few jobs that remain.

Many understand their faith differently than Christian environmentalists do. One night, Darrell Caudill and several friends gathered to play their guitars for the environmental tour and sing traditional songs and hymns. Mr. Caudill, 57, works for a coal company and believes in being a good steward of the earth. But to him, he said, being a Christian means being saved and spreading the Gospel. There is no tension between being committed to his faith and supporting mountaintop removal.

"Why did God produce coal then and put it underground?" said Mr. Caudill, who attends a nondenominational evangelical church. "He produced things that we need on this earth. Without coal, you wouldn't have the warmth and light you have right now."

Late in the trip, the tour group drove Lucious Thompson, 63, a former coal miner, to the horseshoe of peaks above McRoberts, where he lives. The peaks have been leveled. The woods where he had hunted are gone. The new grass on the new plateaus barely clings to the soil, which means that McRoberts often floods now after hard rains, he said.

"I've been flooded three times since they started working on the mountaintop," Mr. Thompson said.

He talked of neighbors whose house foundations had been cracked because of the daily blasting, of a pond lost to sludge and of respiratory ailments because of the coal dust flying from the coal trucks.

"The coal company says it's God's will," he said. "Well, God ain't ever run no bulldozer."

People like Mr. Thompson and the woods and mountains of Appalachia seemed to make the point the tour's organizers hoped for. After the tour, Ms. Yoder returned to Columbus to tell her congregation of about 200 what she had learned.

"My comment to the church was that I would do the tour with an open mind," she said, "and my conclusion is there is no room for mountaintop removal in our country."

Preparations For A Flu Pandemic (NYT)

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

The World Health Organization's new plan for ramping up the production of flu vaccine is a measure of how unprepared the world is to cope with an onslaught of pandemic influenza. The plan, conceived by a group of more than 120 experts, lays out a sensible path toward vaccine sufficiency— but it will take years to complete and cost up to $10 billion.

There are no signs yet that the influenza strain causing the greatest concern — a virulent form of avian flu — is ready to sweep through human populations. So far it has infected only 256 people in 10 countries — mostly people in close contact with chickens in Asia — but the highly lethal pathogen has killed some 60 percent of those.

Fortunately, it has not yet developed the ability to spread easily from one person to another, the critical transition for unleashing a pandemic. But if this strain or another does, it will move so rapidly there will be little chance of containing it — unless we start preparing now.

This week, the W.H.O. warned that if a flu pandemic were to occur, the global vaccine supply would fall several billion doses short. It recommended three overlapping responses: increasing the use of vaccines in the normal flu season so that manufacturers are encouraged to expand capacity; new techniques to raise production yields; and development of more potent vaccines that could provide broad and long-lasting immunity.

The price tag would be $3 billion to $10 billion for a global effort that might yield results in three to five years, provided action started now. The Bush administration's pledge of $10 million to W.H.O. to help other countries develop vaccines and manufacturing capacity is prompt but woefully short.

DOJ_NMG_0088477

The administration has also invested substantially in vaccine research, including $1 billion to develop new cell-based technologies that would allow rapid expansion of production in an emergency. Although those investments are primarily for our own benefit, the knowledge generated is likely to help others around the world.

Still, both the American and global efforts ought to be intensified. The administration's goal of being able to make enough vaccine quickly to protect all Americans is also probably four to five years away. Neither America nor the rest of the world is yet ready to handle a worst-case pandemic.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Man Gets Probation For Owning Firearms (HIR)

By Eve Byron, IR Staff Writer

Helena (MT) Independent Record, October 28, 2006

A Jefferson County man was sentenced to three years of probation and a $2,500 fine for being a convicted felon in possession of firearms.

Edward Betka, 61, received the sentence Friday in U.S. District Court in Missoula.

According to information from the office of Bill Mercer, United States Attorney for the District of Montana, Betka's possession of firearms came to the attention of federal officials after a fire raced through his Basin home in July 2005.

The fire was being investigated as a possible arson case, and a deputy fire marshal accompanied Betka into the home while he retrieved various firearms.

The fire marshal watched Betka pull an undamaged gun case from under his bed, which contained two expensive-looking, high-powered scope-mounted rifles. A friend offered to store the firearms at his home, and took possession of three rifles, one shotgun and a .44-revolver from Betka.

However, Betka wasn't supposed to have any guns, since he was convicted of making false income tax returns, mail fraud, and false representation of a Social Security number in U.S. District Court in Wisconsin in 1990. Convicted felons are not allowed to own or be around firearms.

On Aug. 22, 2005, the friend turned the firearms over to an ATF special agent, and Betka later was charged and pleaded guilty to being a felon in possession of firearms.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Paulette L. Stewart prosecuted the case for the United States.

Feds Were Planning Raid On Vroman's Home (SRPD)

By Mike Geniella, THE PRESS DEMOCRAT

Santa Rosa (CA) Press-Democrat, October 28, 2006

Agents preparing to search D.A.'s property for suspected pot, weapons

Federal agents were preparing to raid the secluded Hopland home of Mendocino County District Attorney Norman Vroman at the time of his death to search for maturing marijuana plants and a possible stash of illegal weapons.

Agents said overflights had detected at least 25 marijuana plants growing on Vroman's property at the end of Sanel Valley Road.

Investigators also suspected Vroman, a self-described "gun nut," may have added to his personal gun collection by taking home weapons seized during drug and other raids or bought with drug-related asset forfeiture money, according to federal Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms agents.

Three days before Vroman died Sept. 21 after a massive heart attack, the FBI's Public Corruption Unit began reviewing results of an investigation involving agents from the ATF and the Drug Enforcement Agency, according to internal documents obtained by The Press Democrat and statements from agents who asked not to be identified.

Documents show federal investigators were completing affidavits in support of warrants to search Vroman's home when he suffered the heart attack Sept. 19 as he prepared to drive to work. Vroman was found by a family member slumped over the wheel of his county-owned car. Vroman died two days later at a Santa Rosa hospital.

DOJ_NMG_0088478

Raleigh Vroman said Friday she was unaware of a federal investigation into her husband's activities.

"I don't know what this is about. I don't know anything about marijuana," she said, refusing further comment.

The federal government doesn't recognize California's medical marijuana laws. Vroman was the first district attorney in the state to implement identity cards for patients who have a doctor's permission to use marijuana. Whether Vroman obtained one himself is unknown because confidentiality laws prevent that disclosure.

Documents show tensions rose within federal agencies as investigators pressed to raid the home of a high-profile district attorney who at the time of his death was engaged in a tough re-election fight with Fort Bragg attorney Meredith Lintott.

Vroman's name remains on the Nov. 7 ballot, and there is an active campaign to have voters select his name on Election Day.

FBI spokesman Joseph Shadler said Friday that "given the political sensitivities involved, we won't be making any comments."

In a written statement, an ATF investigator said the U.S. Attorney's Office in San Francisco believed the agents had "probable cause to issue a search warrant for marijuana on Vroman's property, but they refused."

Luke Macaulay, spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in San Francisco, said the office's policy is to neither confirm nor deny an investigation.

After the apparent refusal by the U.S. Attorney's Office, ATF and DEA agents took the case to the FBI's Public Corruption Unit, according to documents and a source close to the case.

Local authorities were deliberately kept out of the federal loop because of fear of leaks to Vroman's office. Vroman and federal authorities often had been at odds since he served nine months in federal prison in 1993 for failure to file income taxes.

In addition, local authorities said federal agents were aware of Vroman's close political and personal ties with former Sheriff Tony Craver. As a result, county Sheriff Kevin Broin and other high-ranking sheriff's officials were in the dark until the end.

"We learned about the federal investigation the day Mr. Vroman was stricken at his home," Capt. Kurt Smallcomb said.

Craver, reached Friday by phone at his new home in Caldwell, Idaho, said he was surprised to learn of the federal inquiry.

"I think it highly unlikely Norm would have contraband, whether marijuana or illegal weapons, at his home," he said.

About the suspicions of federal agents, Craver said, "It's too bad the search warrants weren't served so this kind of stuff could have been cleared up once and for all."

Interim District Attorney Keith Faulder, Vroman's chief deputy, said he learned of the investigation after Vroman was stricken and entered the hospital. Faulder said ATF investigators called and questioned staff members about serial numbers identifying two submachine guns and silencers that were kept in a gun safe in the District Attorney's Office.

The federal investigation stopped days later when Vroman died, and no warrants were issued.

The marijuana allegedly growing on Vroman's property "vanished" the day Vroman was rushed to the hospital, according to documents outlining the DEA investigation.

Since Vroman's death, family and supporters have campaigned aggressively to block the election of Lintott. Vroman's name remains on the Nov. 7 ballot, and if more votes are cast for him than for Lintott, the county Board of Supervisors will appoint a new district attorney.

In the meantime, a legal fight is being waged in the state Court of Appeal, First District, in San Francisco over Mendocino County's decision to proceed with the Nov. 7 election rather than setting a special election. In either case, Faulder has made it clear he wants to succeed Vroman.

Neither Lintott nor her campaign consultant, Terry Price of Santa Rosa, would comment Friday on the Vroman investigation.

In May, it was disclosed that since 1999 Vroman's office had spent $646,348 of $853,122 that flowed into a special "asset forfeiture" account. The total represented the amount of drug-related money and other assets, including guns and cars, seized during county drug raids by local, state and federal agencies. The distribution is overseen by the state Department of Justice.

Vroman's spending included the two submachine guns stored in the office, firearm sound suppressors, a gun safe for the District Attorney's Office and $39,100 in firearms training for his staff.

Comments can take a few minutes to display.

Comment Guidelines

Your opinions should contribute to a candid and constructive community conversation. Personal attacks and profanity are not permitted. See our full User Agreement and use THIS LINK to notify us of concerns about a comment. We'll then promptly review and remove it if it falls outside our guidelines.

Guilty Plea In Plot To Bomb Abortion Clinic (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

A Prince George's County man admitted in federal court yesterday that he intended to attack a Berwyn Heights abortion clinic with a pipe bomb this past summer.

During a hearing in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt, Robert Weiler Jr., 25, pleaded guilty to possessing a pipe bomb, being a felon in possession of a firearm and attempting to destroy or damage an abortion clinic.

A plea agreement worked out between Weiler's attorney and Assistant U.S. Attorney Bryan E. Foreman calls for Weiler to be sentenced to five years in federal prison.

U.S. District Judge Deborah K. Chasanow scheduled sentencing for Dec. 18.

Weiler said little during the hearing. He gave brief answers to Chasanow's questions about his background and mental health and about whether he understood the terms of his plea.

When asked whether he had been treated for alcoholism or mental illness, Weiler replied that he had met with a mental health expert at the Charles County Detention Center. He did not elaborate.

"Do you agree that you are, in fact, guilty?" Chasanow asked.

"Yes, your honor, I do," Weiler responded.

Weiler's father, Robert F. Weiler Sr., and mother, Catherine, were in the courtroom yesterday. They and Weiler's attorney, Assistant Federal Public Defender Michael CitaraManis, declined to comment after the hearing.

The defendant's parents had tipped off Prince George's police to his plans, calling to report their suspicions June 4, more than a week after he disappeared from their home and stopped returning their calls.

On June 7, Robert Weiler Jr. called agents of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives to turn himself in. When he was arrested the next morning at a rest stop in Western Maryland, he told agents that he had a handgun stolen from a friend and that he had made a pipe bomb and left it in the closet of a house in Riverdale Heights. Hours later, the bomb was partially detonated by bomb squad technicians.

The next day, Weiler provided a recorded confession in which he said he had intended to use the pipe bomb to blow up an abortion clinic on Greenbelt Road, a short drive from the federal courthouse, according to a statement of facts that is part of the plea agreement. He also said he had planned to use the gun to shoot doctors who perform abortions.

When he appeared in court four days after his arrest, Weiler wore a T-shirt with "Help Cure Abortion" on the front. On the back was "ABORTION: The leading cause of death in America." Yesterday, Weiler wore a short-sleeved white dress shirt and dark trousers.

TAX:

No Taxes Until After The Election (NYT)

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

To avoid looking like Scrooge, the Internal Revenue Service typically lets up around the holidays in its hounding of tax delinquents.

But this month, the indulgence began even before Macy's was decorated. The Times's David Cay Johnston reported yesterday that on Oct. 10, the I.R.S. commissioner Mark Everson told his troops to delay tax enforcement in areas affected by Hurricane Katrina — until after the midterm elections and the holiday season.

Until after the elections?

DOJ_NMG_0088480

To explain his action, Mr. Everson said that a pre-election reprieve was as routine as the Christmastime hiatus. Four former I.R.S. commissioners interviewed by Mr. Johnston disputed that.

Mr. Everson also said that in his mind the elections were part of a continuum that ran through the holidays. That would make him the only person in the country who envisions Congressional campaigns as the start of Christmas shopping season.

Mr. Everson does his agency and law-abiding taxpayers a disservice. In delaying the enforcement actions, there's no avoiding the appearance of a political motivation. Many voters in the devastated areas are bound to be angry at President Bush and, by extension, Republicans. By easing up now, the I.R.S. avoids stoking that anger.

The possibility that Mr. Everson is wielding power in ways to please his boss, President Bush, is especially disturbing given that he has courted that suspicion before. After the administration failed repeatedly this year to achieve its goal of repealing the estate tax, the I.R.S. moved to eliminate the jobs of nearly half of the agency's lawyers who audit estate tax returns. Mr. Everson's explanation that the employees were no longer needed was unconvincing because the agency would not release enough data for researchers to independently verify his claim.

Mr. Everson needs to admit his mistakes, rather than trying to say they were not mistakes at all. And to make the I.R.S. more transparent. And to stay out of politics.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Tax-Cut Rollback Not On Table, Rangel Says (WP)

By Lori Montgomery, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Lawmaker Tries to Counter GOP Alerts

To hear Republicans talk, Rep. Charles B. Rangel, the gravel-voiced New York Democrat who stands to take over the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, is "giddy" about the chance to undo popular tax cuts enacted during President Bush's first term in office.

But Rangel said yesterday that he had no intention of rolling back the cuts, most of which are scheduled to expire in 2010, if Democrats claim the House on Nov. 7.

"I think it would be ridiculous for us in 2007 to be talking about 2010 tax cuts," Rangel said in an interview. "I don't want to go retroactive in terms of any of the tax cuts. I think retroactive tax increases are bad tax policy."

As the prognosis for Republicans to maintain control has grown increasingly gloomy, Rangel has become a favorite rhetorical punching bag for President Bush and Republican leaders. At fundraisers, in news releases and on the campaign trail, Republicans have been warning voters that a Democratic House would raise taxes and wreak havoc on the nation's economic recovery. They raise the specter of Rangel's bejeweled hands on the controls of federal tax policy like some terrifying Halloween goblin.

Last week, House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) attacked Rangel by name two days in a row in news releases with such headlines as "Dem Tax Hikes Would Threaten Strong Economy." "The American people don't trust Charlie Rangel and his tax-happy Democrat friends because they know Democrats will work overtime to raise their taxes," Boehner said.

At a fundraiser this week in Florida, Bush reminded the crowd that Rangel, "the ranking member of the Ways and Means Committee . . . would be the one who would take the lead in taxes" if the Democrats take over. Noting that Rangel has said he "couldn't think of one of our tax cuts he would extend," Bush joked, to laughter and applause: "See? They're genetically disposed to raise your taxes."

Rangel, a firebrand liberal and partisan brawler who has represented New York City in Congress since 1971, laughs at such statements. "It's really working my base, too, you know. So it works out for everybody," he said.

Of his comment to Bloomberg News in September that he "cannot think of one" of Bush's tax cuts that merit renewal, Rangel said he was discussing the ground rules for broad-based tax reform to fix what most experts agree is an inefficient and unnecessarily complicated tax system.

DOJ_NMG_0088481

"I was asked, 'Are there any tax cuts you would say you want to extend?' And I said no. And I mean it," Rangel said. "That's what tax simplification is all about -- determining what we're going to keep and what we're not going to keep. I have to say everything is on the table."

Does that mean the cuts that have so far saved taxpayers an estimated $1.1 trillion will not survive their expiration date? Rangel demurs.

"I'm 76 years old. I don't buy green bananas," he said. "Who knows what's going to happen in 2010? It just doesn't make sense, with all the problems we are facing, to be discussing the extension of tax cuts that don't expire till 2010."

If Rangel does become the first Democrat to chair Ways and Means since 1994, he said his first priority will be to restore bipartisan cooperation to a committee that he said has been ruled by Republican fiat. Some "low-hanging fruit" to prove his good intentions: Moving stalled trade agreements and making permanent the research and development tax credit, which firms can claim for research done in the United States. Corporate groups are working to save the credit, which is in danger of expiring unless Congress acts quickly to extend the credit.

Rangel said he also plans to hold a bipartisan retreat to start cracking all the tough fiscal nuts: the spiraling cost of Medicare, the expanding reach of the alternative minimum tax and Social Security reform. But talks will start on his terms, he said. For example, if Bush does not abandon his plan to divert Social Security tax dollars to private accounts, Rangel said, "that means he's not going to deal with it."

"It's much easier to fight [the Republicans] than to work with them. But the American people want us to work together. And I am not convinced [voters] are just teed off with Republicans," he said, laughing. "I'm not being benevolent. I'm not being fair. I'm being as political as I've ever been. It's in the best interest of my party to get something done."

Waxman Plans Tougher Oversight Of Companies (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- California Rep. Henry Waxman, the vocal corporate critic slated to run a powerful committee if Democrats win the House, said he would aggressively expand oversight of many large industries -- with a focus on drug prices, oil-company profits and Halliburton Co.'s contracting work in Iraq.

In an interview, Rep. Waxman, the senior minority member of the House Government Reform Committee, said he also would boost oversight of the Bush administration, along with "waste, fraud and abuse" across the federal government -- especially rebuilding efforts in Iraq and the Hurricane Katrina-ravaged Gulf Coast. The committee has extensive -- and vaguely defined -- oversight responsibilities covering broad swaths of corporate America and the government, and the chairman has the power to issue subpoenas, compel testimony and call hearings.

Of particular concern, Mr. Waxman said, would be rooting out what he called "profiteering." His aides define the term broadly enough that it encompasses Iraq contracting, the massive growth in homeland security expenditures, pharmaceutical prices and soaring oil-industry profits. Probes into prices and profits could prove controversial, however, because the government itself has never been able to define precisely what constitutes price-gouging or profiteering.

In discussing his goals, Mr. Waxman is touching on many of the hot-button issues being aired both in the campaign and behind the scenes among Democrats. The party has been debating how much to spotlight what could be controversial actions before voters go to the polls, or how much to stick to more general policy slogans. Republicans already have begun trying to cast Mr. Waxman as a partisan who would abuse his investigative powers.

A 32-year veteran of the House, Mr. Waxman, 67 years old, has had little real power since Republicans took control of the House in 1994. Democrats currently are 15 seats shy of a majority, but polls suggest they could win enough seats on Nov. 7 to make up the gap. A Democratic takeover of the Senate also is widely seen as possible, though less likely.

When Democrats last held power, Mr. Waxman headed the Commerce Committee's subcommittee on health and environment, where he was a thorn in the side of big business. He led well-publicized crusades to get tobacco regulated as an addictive drug, increase federal oversight of dietary supplements and toughen auto-emissions standards, and helped write a raft of landmark legislation like the Clean Air Act, the Ryan White AIDS bill and laws mandating smoke-free airplanes, clearer nutritional labeling and access to generic drugs.

DOJ_NMG_0088482

He also showed a keen eye for the theatrical in hearings -- such as the April 14, 1994 session in which the seven chief executive officers of the nation's largest tobacco companies famously testified that "nicotine is not addictive."

In the minority, Mr. Waxman has carved out a role as a self-appointed watchdog. He has issued more than 2,000 investigative reports in the past eight years, cataloging everything from shortcomings in the Department of Homeland Security to misleading information being provided in federally funded abstinence-only programs.

Several business trade groups declined comment on Mr. Waxman. Political analysts said executives -- particularly in industries like managed care and pharmaceuticals -- have reason to fear being targeted by the lawmaker and his investigators.

"Corporate executives may not be familiar with Waxman yet, but some of them will be by this time next year," said Andy Laperriere, a political analyst at the International Strategy & Investment, a brokerage and research firm which has released a series of reports on the business implications of a Democratic House.

As for the administration, he said, "When Republicans wake up at night worrying about oversight, they probably envision Henry Waxman."

Mr. Waxman is only one of several Democrats critical of business and the administration who stand to hold prominent posts if Democrats retake the House. Republicans seeking to bolster their base are pointing out that incoming Democratic chairmen -- particularly those with oversight responsibilities like Mr. Waxman -- would emerge as some of the most important, and powerful, members of the new majority.

Beyond Mr. Waxman, the main Republican targets are Democrats Michigan Rep. John Conyers, who could take over the Judiciary Committee and has talked about the prospect of impeachment proceedings against Mr. Bush; Michigan Rep. John Dingell, who stands to take over the Energy and Commerce Committee; and New York Rep. Charles Rangel, who would run the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, and who opposes extending many of Mr. Bush's tax cuts.

As chairman, Mr. Waxman would see his committee staff double, to 70. How he used his expanded powers would help shape the direction of a Democratic majority and send an early signal about whether the party plans to spend the next two years battling the administration or seeking common ground so that policy initiatives on issues like health care and the economy stand a better chance of becoming law.

Should Democrats win, Mr. Waxman's ascension to the helm of the Government Reform Committee could further highlight the debate simmering within the party since its 2004 electoral losses. The more liberal wing, represented by candidates like Connecticut Senate challenger Ned Lamont and activist organizations like MoveOn.org, wants the party to take a harsher stance against the Iraq war and corporate conduct. Centrists like New York Sen. Hillary Clinton, by contrast, have tried to shore up the party's standing with the business community and declined to call for an Iraq withdrawal, arguing that would alienate many moderate voters.

Mr. Waxman said he is mindful that his decisions about where to focus his potential new investigative muscle -- and how hard-line a stance to take with the administration and the oil and pharmaceutical industries -- carry political risks for the Democrats. The lawmaker stressed that he has no "agenda" in place to guide his first months as chairman of the committee, no investigations teed up, and that he saw subpoenas as a "last resort" for compelling information that he hoped could be obtained through less confrontational methods.

Mr. Waxman, a fierce critic of the Iraq war, also said he was unlikely to investigate whether the administration had manipulated prewar intelligence on Iraq, a stance likely to disappoint many Democratic liberals.

"I know a lot of people feel it should be investigated, but I just don't know if it would be productive now," he said. "The whole premise of that war has been discredited so thoroughly that I don't know what a hearing would establish that goes beyond that."

Instead, Mr. Waxman said his main focus would be on pocketbook issues like the billions of dollars alleged by government investigators and critics to have been stolen or misspent in Iraq, the high price of many prescription drugs and the oil industry's soaring profits.

In part, Mr. Waxman appears to be falling in line behind the economically populist positions increasingly espoused by Democratic leaders like Nancy Pelosi, the California lawmaker who could become the first female House Speaker in the nation's history. Many Democrats this fall are railing against the oil and drug industries. Ms. Pelosi has said that within the first 100 hours of taking power, Democrats would work to raise the minimum wage, cut student-loan interest rates and rewrite the Medicare prescription-drug benefit to take away advantages given pharmaceutical makers.

DOJ_NMG_0088483

In recent years, Mr. Waxman has forced the State Department to retract a report that erroneously had suggested that terror-related casualties had declined in 2003 and replace it with one that showed that both fatalities and the overall number of large-scale terror attacks had soared that year. As the ranking member of the Government Reform Committee, he has repeatedly lambasted the administration for the failure to find weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, faulty prewar intelligence and the billions of dollars of no-bid contracts awarded to Halliburton and Kellogg, Brown & Root, its engineering and construction unit.

Halliburton declined to comment about Mr. Waxman specifically, but said the company would cooperate with either party. "KBR has been performing work for the U.S. military for more than 60 years, in both Democratic and Republican administrations, and the company will continue to cooperate with the appropriate government agencies as they fulfill their important oversight responsibilities," says Cathy Mann, a spokeswoman for the company.

Rep. Waxman also has harshly scrutinized the 2003 Medicare prescription-drug bill. In the summer of 2004, he led a group of 19 lawmakers who filed a federal lawsuit demanding that the Department of Health and Human Services disclose disputed cost estimates about the bill after evidence emerged suggesting that former Medicare chief Thomas Scully threatened to fire the program's chief actuary if the staffer told lawmakers the true cost of the program.

Mr. Waxman has in the past said that he wanted to modify the bill to eliminate the so-called donut hole, a coverage gap that impacts many senior citizens, and allow the government to negotiate lower drug prices with pharmaceutical companies.

Write to Yochi J. Dreazen at yochi.dreazen@wsj.com1

This Chairmanship Fight May Not Have Been Anticipated By Democrats (CQ)

By Patrick Yoest

CQ Daily, October 27, 2006

Rep. Bob Filner, D-Calif., may be in line to become the next chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee if the Democrats win control of the House, but his behavior as ranking member has raised questions about whether he's the right Democrat for the job.

Enter Rep. Michael H. Michaud of Maine, who plans to challenge Filner for the gavel.

Neither Filner nor Michaud is a veteran, but the similarities end there.

Filner is a fiery former college professor who was jailed in Mississippi as a Freedom Rider in 1961. Michaud is a high school graduate who spent years working in a paper mill.

Filner's hot temperament, visible in his fights with current chairman Steve Buyer, R-Ind., and a profanity-laced tirade outside VA headquarters in June, have raised some eyebrows.

Michaud favors a calmer approach to committee work.

"We'll fight very hard for veterans. . . . But we can do that without loud speeches and rhetoric," Michaud said.

Filner, however, said you have to be loud sometimes to get things done. "I only take the position of the bomb thrower when they exclude me," he said.

The Non-Contract With America (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

A joke in Washington these days is that the only thing that can save the Republicans on Election Day is the Democrats. House Speaker-in-waiting Nancy Pelosi seems to get this joke, because with few exceptions she's kept her Members tight-lipped and unspecific: As New York Senator Chuck Schumer has put it, why take the focus off the GOP?

This is in notable contrast to 1994, when the Gingrich Republicans ended a 40-year Democratic House majority by laying out a 10-item agenda known as the Contract with America. What Democrats are campaigning on this year is a Non-Contract with America -- mostly generalities about "helping the middle class" and "ending the corruption in Washington."

As a campaign strategy, this may well pay off. But if they do win, Democrats will have to fill their campaign vacuum with something, and the best clue to what that would be is what they've already proposed. We've taken some time to inspect these policy priorities and thought we'd share a few of the highlights, if that's the right word. (Warning: Keep sharp objects away from drug-company and Wal-Mart shareholders.)

DOJ_NMG_0088484

Tax increases. The Bush tax cuts expire in 2010, and any chance that they'll be made permanent will vanish with a Democratic Congress. The question is whether Democrats will try to raise taxes even sooner. Most Democrats voted against the Bush tax cuts, but this week Ms. Pelosi said on CNBC's Kudlow & Co. that "Democrats like tax cuts. We support middle-class tax cuts."

The same isn't true, however, for the "investor" tax cuts of 2003 that coincided with the acceleration of the current expansion. Ms. Pelosi says reversing these tax cuts "at the high end" would be "an earlier resort." This would raise the top income and dividend tax rate back to 39.6% from 35%, and the capital-gains rate back to 20% from 15%, substantially raising the cost of new investment in the United States. Economist John Rutledge estimates that raising the dividend rate alone would reduce the value of the S&P 500 stocks by between 5% and 8.5%, roughly a $500 to $700 billion decline in the wealth of the 52% of American households that own stock.

"Paygo budgeting." President Bush would no doubt promise to veto any direct tax increase, but having the power of the purse would give Democrats plenty of leverage. What if they framed the political choice as a tax increase on "the rich" versus funding the war on terror?

Democrats have also pledged to restore so-called pay-as-you-go budget rules, which sound like a restraint on budget deficits but in practice restrain only tax cuts. They don't apply to the growth of current entitlement programs or to domestic discretionary spending, only to tax cuts or new entitlements. This formula would probably take us back to the 1980s, when Democrats insisted on higher domestic spending while fighting Ronald Reagan's increases in defense spending.

Health-care regulation. Big Pharma and private insurers, watch out. Michigan's John Dingell, who would run the Energy and Commerce Committee, has co-sponsored the "Patients Before Profits Act" that would gut funding for the new Medicare Advantage plans that are proving so popular with seniors. Instead, he and the other Democrats who run health-care panels want to direct all seniors into a single government-run Medicare drug plan. Another proposal from top Democrats, the Medicare for All Act, would make all Americans, of any age, eligible for Medicare and pay for it with a new 1.7% payroll tax on workers and 7% on employers.

Ms. Pelosi has also pledged to pass, in her first 100 hours as Speaker, legislation to require the government to "negotiate lower drug prices." That's a euphemism for imposing price controls on new medicines, which can take as much as $800 million in research and development to bring to market. The actor Michael J. Fox is getting headlines for his ads in favor of Democrats who support stem-cell research, but price controls would do far more to delay the introduction of new treatments for Alzheimer's, Parkinson's or cancer.

The union label. AFL-CIO headquarters would be rocking with hope once again. A job-killing hike in the minimum wage, to $7.25 from $5.15, would whisk through Congress, and we'd expect that Mr. Bush would sign it.

But another top priority for Democrats is the Employee Free Choice Act, which has at least 215 co-sponsors in the House and 44 in the Senate. This would allow labor to turn workplaces into union shops without an election or secret ballot. Unions would merely have to gather signatures from a majority of workers at a work site, which means labor organizers could strongarm employees who opposed such a petition. This would almost surely pass the House.

Democrats have also moved well to the left on trade since the Bill Clinton-Nafta era. Mr. Bush's trade-promotion authority, allowing up-or-down votes on trade deals without amendment, expires next July, and there's little chance House Democrats would extend it. The entire Democratic leadership opposed free trade with tiny Oman and with Central America, so deals now in the works with Vietnam and other countries would also be long shots. Sorry, Robert Rubin.

Energy. The Pelosi Democrats favor a "windfall" profits tax on oil companies and a virtual moratorium on drilling for more domestic oil in Alaska and on the outer continental shelf (where the U.S. may have more energy than Saudi Arabia). These policies would make the U.S. more dependent on foreign oil. There would also be an effort to pass new, and higher, fuel-mileage mandates, which would make things tougher on what's left of Detroit. And lobbying would begin for the U.S. to sign the Kyoto Protocol on global warming and to subsidize, even more than Republicans already have, ethanol and other "alternative" fuels.

DOJ_NMG_0088485

We could go on, in particular in the regulatory arena, where agencies would be under greater pressure to restrict mergers, among other things. But you get the idea. A Democratic triumph would produce a major shift in the national policy debate, and we can understand why Ms. Pelosi isn't plastering most of this agenda on billboards around the country. Not everything would become law, to be sure, especially if Mr. Bush were finally willing to use his veto pen. However, elections have consequences, and we thought our readers might like to know about them before November 7.

White House Is Trimming Army Budget For Next Year, Officials Say (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 27 — White House budget officials are planning on asking for a $121 billion budget for the Army next year, not the $138 billion that senior Army officials have been seeking, two senior Pentagon officials said.

Army officials were told of the decision in an Oct. 19 memorandum from Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon R. England, which noted that changes in the Army allotment were still possible, as deliberations continued over the Bush administration's budget for the 2008 fiscal year, said officials who had seen the memorandum.

The Army budget figure was first reported by Bloomberg News. The request will go to Congress in February.

But it appears that the preliminary decision to scale back the annual budget request for the Army could be offset later in the year, in a so-called supplemental appropriation like those Congress has passed every year since 2001. The extra money in those bills has financed the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, as well as unanticipated costs elsewhere.

In another memorandum issued this week, Mr. England informed the Army and other military services that the administration's ground rules covering what costs can be included in so-called supplemental spending bills "are being expanded" to include "costs related to the longer war against terror," not just continuing operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

He said that in some cases the supplemental spending could be used to buy newer equipment or to speed other improvements in military capabilities.

Steven Kosiak, a defense budget analyst at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, said the Pentagon was "sending a signal to the services" that they now have permission not to limit their request to war-related costs.

Supplemental financing for the Defense Department this year totaled $117 billion, Mr. Kosiak said.

Though the administration has decided to seek only a $7 billion increase over this year's $114 billion appropriation for the Army, supplemental financing offers a chance for the Army to restore some of the money it has been denied, officials said.

Rice's Counselor Gives Advice Others May Not Want To Hear (NYT)

By Helene Cooper And David E. Sanger

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 27 — For the last 18 months, Philip D. Zelikow has churned out confidential memorandums and proposals for his boss and close friend, Condoleezza Rice, that often depart sharply from the Bush administration's current line.

One described the potential for Iraq to become a "catastrophic failure." Another, among several that have come to light in recent weeks, was an early call for changes in a detention policy that many in the State Department believed was doing tremendous harm to the United States.

Others have proposed new diplomatic initiatives toward North Korea and the Middle East, and one went as far as to call for a reconsideration of the phrase "war on terror" because it alienated many Muslims — an idea that quickly fizzled after opposition from the White House.

Such ideas would have found a more natural home under President George H. W. Bush, for whom Mr. Zelikow and Ms. Rice worked on the staff of the National Security Council. They reflect a sense that American influence is perishable, and can be damaged by overreaching, as allies and other partners react against decisions made in Washington. They form a kind of foreign policy realism that was eclipsed in Mr. Bush's first term, in favor of a more ideological, unilateral ethos, but that has made something of a comeback in his second term.

DOJ_NMG_0088486

Whether Mr. Zelikow, 52, is giving voice to Ms. Rice's private views, or simply serving as an in-house contrarian, remains unclear. Some of his ideas have become policy: he had called for the closure of secret prisons run by the Central Intelligence Agency a year before the Supreme Court decision that prodded the Bush administration to empty them.

The United States offered North Korea a chance to negotiate a permanent peace treaty, per Mr. Zelikow's advice, and he, along with Ms. Rice, was one of the backers of the Iran initiative, in which President Bush offered to reverse three decades of American policy against direct talks with Tehran if Iran suspended its uranium enrichment.

Neither North Korea nor Iran has bitten on the initiatives, but America's allies have applauded them. Mr. Zelikow's assessments of the Iraq war, first disclosed in Bob Woodward's book "State of Denial," were presented to Ms. Rice in 2005.

Ms. Rice keeps Mr. Zelikow close at hand, and the fact that his memorandums have surfaced in recent books and news articles suggests, at a minimum, that he and his allies are aggressively lobbying for his ideas. Mr. Zelikow (pronounced ZELL-i-ko) is being talked about inside the State Department as an outside shot for the vacant job of deputy secretary of state, but some believe that his management style is too combative for the job.

Friends of both officials say that Ms. Rice appears to regard Mr. Zelikow as a kind of intellectual anchor during what has been a turbulent period for American foreign policy, in Iraq and beyond.

"He's a very important intellectual resource, even if she may not always agree with him," said Brent Scowcroft, the former national security adviser, who has been a mentor to both.

Michael A. McFaul, a political science professor at Stanford University who knows both the secretary of state and Mr. Zelikow, said that "the limited results" of the administration's approach had "created space for guys like" Mr. Zelikow.

Mr. Zelikow is hardly a household name, even at the State Department, where his title is counselor to the secretary of state. He has few staffers, no line authority, and occupies an office at the very end of the hall on the seventh floor, where Ms. Rice and other top officials also have their offices. He is a sometimes-geeky intellectual known for fingernails that are bitten down to nubs.

But questions about his role were sharpened last month after Mr. Zelikow gave a speech at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy in which he offered what many believed was an oblique criticism of the decision by Mr. Bush and Ms. Rice not to push Israel to return to the negotiating table with the Palestinians. He also said progress in that conflict was essential to forming a consensus among the United States, moderate Arabs and Europeans on Iran.

The address may have been an example of what Mr. Zelikow, in two speeches last year, called "practical idealism." But it did not go over well. The State Department quickly distanced itself from the speech, issuing a statement denying any linkage, and Israeli officials, flustered by Mr. Zelikow's remarks, said Ms. Rice later assured the Israeli foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, that the United States saw the Iranian and Palestinian issues as two separate matters.

Neither Ms. Rice nor Mr. Zelikow would comment for this article.

But friends of both Ms. Rice and Mr. Zelikow say her initial decision to appoint Mr. Zelikow to the counselor post last year reflects her openness to views at odds with the more ideological approach that has been dominant under President Bush.

Ms. Rice had to expend a substantial amount of her own political capital to get the White House to support her choice, friends say, given Mr. Zelikow's previous job as staff director of the 9/11 Commission, where he played a major role in writing the report that took both the Clinton and Bush administrations to task for failing to act with sufficient seriousness against the threat from Al Qaeda.

But Ms. Rice arrived at the State Department insistent that she would surround herself with her own people, friends say. Vice President Dick Cheney wanted her to appoint his former deputy national security adviser, Eric S. Edelman, as her political director; she balked and instead chose R. Nicholas Burns, a friend who had worked for her at the security council during the administration of the first President Bush. Likewise, in choosing Mr. Zelikow as her counselor, she eschewed Elliott L. Abrams, a darling of neoconservatives and the pro-Israel lobby.

Mr. Zelikow and Ms. Rice co-authored a book about Germany's reunification, "Germany Unified and Europe Transformed: A Study in Statecraft" (Harvard University Press, 1995). It is not exactly light reading, but at its core it is a study in realpolitik, examining — and admiring — the tempered, carefully managed American response to the collapse of the Soviet Union.

It is a book that Mr. Zelikow could write again today, but one that Ms. Rice could not, friends and associates of both say. Ms. Rice herself has said that she went through something of a transformation after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, in which she moved away from the classical realism of her own roots and Mr. Zelikow's, and closer to the neoconservatives who dominated policy discussions in the first term. Ms. Rice has told friends that President Bush has had a major impact on her thinking in terms of reintroducing values-based politics and ideology.

DOJ_NMG_0088487

An example of the distance between Mr. Zelikow and his boss emerged this summer, at the start of the Israel-Hezbollah conflict. The position adopted by Ms. Rice — that Israel be permitted to continue its bombardment of Hezbollah despite the mounting civilian death toll in Lebanon — satisfied conservatives in the administration, including Mr. Cheney, who were pushing for strong American support of Israel.

That support also included the decision by the administration to heed Israel's desire that America not push it to resolve the Palestinian conflict until the Palestinian Authority improved security and cracked down on attacks by groups considered to be terrorist entities by Israel and the United States.

But in his speech to the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, Mr. Zelikow implicitly acknowledged that that stance does not win America any friends in the Muslim world, and thwarts other American foreign policy objectives.

Joseph Nye, the former dean of the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard and one of Mr. Zelikow's friends, said, "If you look at the distance where the administration went away from the realism of the 2000 campaign, Philip never went on that kind of excursion."

Mr. Zelikow sat out the first Bush term, running the Miller Center of Public Affairs at the University of Virginia. But Ms. Rice turned to him for key tasks, and he drafted much of the 2002 "National Security Strategy of the United States," the document that fundamentally reordered American national security doctrine after the Sept. 11 attacks.

He became the executive director of the 9/11 Commission, from where he pressured Ms. Rice to turn over highly classified intelligence estimates and testify in front of the commission. Officials who worked with him marveled at his industry and precision, but described him as far more opinionated than his gather-the-numbers approach might first suggest. Staffers on the commission said other colleagues were assigned the task of smoothing over the bruised egos of those who had crossed Mr. Zelikow.

The position of counselor to the secretary of state, a post that over the years has been filled by some of Washington's brightest diplomatic lights, allows Mr. Zelikow to fly under the radar, and Ms. Rice has used that flexibility from the beginning of her term, when he was sent off to Iraq to provide an outsider's assessment of what had gone wrong.

OTHER NEWS:

Housing Slump Slows Economy (WP)

By Nell Henderson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Growth Far Below Pace Early in Year

The cooling housing market sent a chill through the economy in the third quarter, helping to slow growth to its weakest pace in more than three years, the government said yesterday.

The nation's gross domestic product, the value of all goods and services produced, expanded at a sluggish 1.6 percent annual rate in the quarter, down from a moderate 2.6 percent pace in the second quarter, the Commerce Department reported. In the first three months of the year, the economy grew at a sizzling 5.6 percent annual rate.

With less than two weeks to go before the midterm congressional elections, the report instantly became campaign ammunition. Democrats emphasized the slowdown while Republicans highlighted signs of economic strength.

Financial analysts were split on whether the report reflected an economy poised for a rebound or headed into a prolonged slump. The debate turns on differing forecasts of how the housing market will affect consumer spending.

The sharp slowdown during the year resulted from a combination of soaring energy prices, rising interest rates and plunging home construction and sales. Oil prices and the cost of a 30-year fixed-rate mortgage peaked in July, and gasoline averaged around $3 a gallon for much of the summer.

DOJ_NMG_0088488

Home building plunged at a 17.4 percent annual rate in the third quarter, the steepest fall in four consecutive quarters of declines, the report showed.

"A downturn in the housing market packed a wicked punch for the U.S. economy in the third quarter, but it was not a knockout blow," said Stuart G. Hoffman, chief economist of PNC Financial Services Group.

Optimists note that some forces behind the slowdown have eased. The Federal Reserve has held short-term interest rates steady since June, and mortgage rates have fallen since July. Gaso line and other fuel prices have tumbled since mid-August, putting more cash into consumers' pockets to spend on other things.

Both consumer spending and business investment outside of housing rose faster in the third quarter than in the second, and unemployment remains low, encouraging many analysts to predict that the economy will regain momentum in the coming months.

"The recent slowdown will prove temporary," said James W. Paulsen, chief investment strategist at Wells Capital Management. "Outside of the housing and auto industries, economic growth remains strong and has actually been accelerating."

Other observers were more pessimistic, expecting the housing slump to deepen and continue into next year. That would push up unemployment and prompt consumers to rein in spending, holding economic growth to a crawl through 2007, they said.

"The correction in the housing sector still has a long way to go and the full impact on consumption won't become apparent until next year," said Paul Ashworth, senior U.S. economist for Capital Economics Ltd.

The divergent forecasts explain why the Federal Reserve left its benchmark short-term rate unchanged Wednesday. Central bank policymakers generally share the more upbeat outlook but see the possibility that the economy could weaken more than they expect.

The Commerce Department report also supported the Fed's forecast that slowing economic growth will gradually weaken inflation. Consumer prices, excluding food and energy prices, rose at a 2.3 percent annual rate in the third quarter, according to a Commerce Department price index. That's higher than many central bank policymakers prefer but lower than the 2.7 percent pace of the second quarter.

Heading into the final campaign stretch, President Bush and other Republicans have emphasized the good economic news, such as the low 4.6 percent unemployment rate, rising incomes and falling oil prices.

"It is a healthy economy," Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson said yesterday during an interview on CNBC. "The economy is creating new jobs . . . there has a been a real increase in wages."

Democrats countered that the Commerce Department figures reflect a weakening economy.

"Once again, the Bush economy is going in the wrong direction," said Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney (N.Y), the senior House Democrat on Congress's Joint Economic Committee. "An economic recovery that never benefited working Americans in the first place now has slowed to a crawl. President Bush's economic happy talk is betrayed by the facts on the ground and the stats released today."

U.S. Economic Growth Cools Down (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Economic growth slowed in the third quarter to its most anemic pace since 2003, highlighting the impact of the housing downturn and raising questions about the economy's direction.

The Commerce Department Friday said the economy expanded at an inflation-adjusted annual rate of 1.6% from July through September. That was slower than the 2.6% rate in the second quarter and the 5.6% surge in the first.

Stocks tumbled in reaction to the weaker-than-expected report, which came after a three-month rally on Wall Street. The Dow Jones Industrial Average retreated from its record, falling 73.40 points to close at 12090.26. Bond prices rose slightly, and the yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note fell to 4.67%. (See related story4.)

With midterm elections less than two weeks away, the report also sparked debate. Some economists said a long period of tepid growth is in store, citing an expected decrease in production in the housing and auto sectors. Others said recession is a possibility. Yet, many economists predicted the economy will bounce back during the current quarter, particularly if gasoline prices don't soar again.

DOJ_NMG_0088489

"A downturn in the housing market packed a wicked punch for the U.S. economy in the third quarter, but it was not a knockout blow," wrote Richard Moody, senior economist at PNC Financial Services Group.

David Huether, chief economist of the National Association of Manufacturers, said rising exports, business investment and consumer spending will cushion the economy from any further downturn in the housing market. "With three of the four pillars of the expansion remaining firm, the foundation for continued growth going forward is solid," he said.

Mr. Huether projects the economy will expand between 2.7% and 3% in the fourth quarter. Similarly the Fed's monetary-policy committee said in the statement accompanying its decision to hold short-term interest rates steady earlier in the week that "Going forward, the economy seems likely to expand at a moderate rate."

Others are less certain. Ian Shepherdson of High Frequency Economics said he expects little improvement in the fourth quarter and minuscule growth next year. He puts the chance of a recession at 40%. Joseph Carson of AllianceBernstein sees 1.9% growth for 2007 and a roughly 25% chance of recession. The economic slowdown "may not be severe in depth," Mr. Carson said, "but it may be pretty long."

Recession, as a rule of thumb, is when the economy contracts for two consecutive quarters. One reason many economists say a slowdown is more likely than an outright recession is because they believe the Fed would lower interest rates if the economy doesn't recover.

Most economists said the Fed will need to see more evidence before it changes its current stance of keeping rates steady as it waits for inflation to ebb. "They're far away from easing at this point," said Jan Hatzius, chief U.S. economist at Goldman Sachs.

Friday's report contained good news on inflation. The Fed's preferred measure of core inflation -- the index of personal consumption expenditures excluding food and energy -- rose at a 2.3% annual rate in the third quarter, down from the second quarter's 2.7%.

Consumers were resilient last quarter, despite high gasoline prices in July and August, but much of their stepped-up activity was offset by a steep plunge in residential construction and greater spending on imported goods.

Separately, the University of Michigan Friday said its index of consumer sentiment rose to 93.6 from 92.3 earlier this month and 85.4 in September. Buoyed by lower gasoline prices, consumers' assessment of current and future conditions rose. The survey also found many people are still concerned about the housing market. "Consumers remain uncertain about how much more home prices might fall and therefore reported their continued reluctance to purchase a home any time soon," said Richard Curtin, who oversees the survey.

Write to Christopher Conkey at christopher.conkey@wsj.com13

Oil And Housing Put Brake On US Growth (FT)

By Krishna Guha

Financial Times, October 28, 2006

US economic growth slowed to an annualised rate of just 1.6 per cent in the third quarter of 2006, figures revealed on Friday, as a brutal correction in housing construction and an oil-fuelled rise in imports dragged down economic activity.

The news of the sharper-than-expected slowdown comes at a bad time for the Republican party, which has been leaning on its economic record to shore up support damaged by the war in Iraq in the run-up to midterm elections for Congress on November 7. Growth in the quarter was the slowest since early 2003.

However, strong consumer spending – particularly on automobiles – ensured the economy continued to expand, though below its potential growth rate.

Inflation pressures eased a little, with the core personal consumption expenditure deflator rising at an annualised rate of 2.3 per cent, down from 2.7 per cent.

Bond prices rallied on the evidence of economic weakness, with the yield on 10-year Treasuries falling to 4.68 per cent, while equity prices stalled.

DOJ_NMG_0088490

Most analysts expect growth will rebound in the current fourth quarter, as lower oil prices depress imports, though it will probably remain below trend.

Figures from the eurozone showed growth in lending to the private sector equalled its highest rate since the launch of the euro in 1999, highlighting robust economic activity in Europe but raising expectations of possible further interest rate rises by the European Central Bank.

Democrats seized on the weak US third-quarter growth numbers as more evidence that the US was "on the wrong track".

However, Hank Paulson, the Treasury secretary, dismissed weak third-quarter growth as a "blip".

In an interview with the Financial Times, Carlos Gutierrez, the commerce secretary, said the capacity of the economy to absorb the correction in housing was "another example of how resilient and how strong this economy is".

Although headline growth was lower than consensus, the report is unlikely to prompt the Federal Reserve into early consideration of interest rate cuts. This week, it issued a statement saying: "Going forward, the economy seems likely to expand at a moderate pace."

The statement was widely seen as a pre-emptive strike ahead of the third-quarter growth report.

Additional reporting by Michael Mackenzie

Growth Slackened In Summer (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

Chilled by a summer slowdown in the housing market, the economy was held to a growth rate of 1.6 percent in the third quarter, the lowest since early 2003, the government reported yesterday.

But evidence of a decline in inflation coupled with vigorous consumer spending left most economists saying that the overall economy is unlikely to be dragged into a recession even as the housing market continues to falter.

"We are in a housing recession, but we are not in a broader economic recession," said Richard B. Hoey, chief economist of Mellon Financial.

The government report, which showed growth slowing from a 5.6 percent pace in the first quarter and 2.6 percent in the second, appeared to validate the expectation of the Federal Reserve chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, that the economy is settling softly into a pace consistent with what he considers an acceptably low level of inflation.

"Ben Bernanke's forecast was that past Fed tightening would slow demand," Mr. Hoey said. "The forecast is tracking as far as I can see."

Stocks fell and bond prices rose as investors factored in the weaker-than-expected growth this summer, concluding that the Fed was less likely to raise interest rates next year.

With the midterm elections little more than a week away, the Bush administration sought to persuade voters that the economy, while beating at a slower pace, remains healthy.

"We have a very strong, large resilient economy that can absorb a housing correction," said Carlos M. Gutierrez, the commerce secretary. "If you isolate the impact of the housing correction and look at all the rest, those are solid numbers."

But Democrats seized on the report to criticize the administration's economic management.

"Economic growth has slowed even before most ordinary Americans have benefited from this recovery," Senator Jack Reed of Rhode Island, the ranking Democrat on the Congressional Joint Economic Committee, said in a statement. "It's clear that we need a new direction in policy to create an economy that works for all Americans."

The economic deceleration in the third quarter was almost single-handedly brought about by the steep contraction in home building.

Residential investment plummeted 17.4 percent in the quarter, its biggest decline in more than 15 years. This alone reduced economic growth in the third quarter by over 1.1 percentage points.

The building of factories, warehouses and commercial structures picked up some of the slack. Business investment, including structures and machinery, added nearly 0.9 percentage point to gross domestic product in the quarter.

DOJ_NMG_0088491

But what is most remarkable is that the pricking of the housing bubble has barely spilled over into consumer spending, which is still chugging along. The government reported that consumer spending grew 3.1 percent in the third quarter — nearly twice as fast as overall economic growth.

"We have the most reckless and relentless consumers in the world," said David Kelly, economic adviser at Putnam Investments in Boston. "It's wonderful."

The housing freeze had long been expected to put a chill on consumers' appetites. Sales of existing homes have declined almost 14 percent over the last year. The median price of new homes has fallen by almost 10 percent in the last 12 months and existing-home prices have started to decline nationwide.

Many economists assumed that just as consumers had leveraged their buying power by borrowing against the value of their homes when house prices were rising, now that house prices are falling they would start saving some money.

That, however, has not happened. Rather, increasing employment and falling gas prices seem to be providing consumers with new reasons to spend. The personal savings rate remained negative, at minus 0.5 percent of total disposable income.

The University of Michigan's index of consumer confidence recorded its eighth-largest monthly gain in October, vaulting to its highest level since June 2005. Optimism was driven by falling gas prices as well as expectations of faster economic growth, larger wage gains and low unemployment.

Richard Curtin, who runs the university's surveys of consumers, noted that consumers remain reluctant to buy a home, keenly aware of the decline in house prices. Still, their overall appetite to spend remains as brisk as ever.

Inflation, meanwhile, has started to abate — at least for now. The measure of inflation preferred by the Fed, which measures the prices of goods and services, excluding food and energy, that consumers buy, rose 2.3 percent in the third quarter. This is down from the 2.7 percent rate of the second quarter, bringing inflation closer to the 1-to-2 percent range Mr. Bernanke considers acceptable.

The growth rate reported by the government is only a preliminary approximation. Historical experience suggests that subsequent revisions could change it substantially, for better or worse.

But whatever the ultimate verdict on the summer period, several economists argue that growth in the fourth quarter is likely to be higher, as consumers spend the extra money in their wallets from lower gasoline prices on other items.

"So far the quarter is going swimmingly," said Richard Yamarone, director of economic research at Argus Research.

The outlook for next year will depend on whether the continuing weakness in the housing market affects spending.

Orawin Velz, director of economic forecasting at the Mortgage Bankers' Association, estimated that the fall in residential investment would continue to drag on the economy through the middle of next year, but that its impact would decline over time. "We think the third quarter will be the peak of the damage," Ms. Velz said.

While many economists foresee a longer period of housing weakness, she said that supply and demand should come into balance by mid-2007 and that home construction would start rising next summer.

Still, if the weak housing market starts cutting into consumption, the drag on overall growth could be more intense.

While it is not yet evident in the official numbers, builders are starting to shed workers as older projects are completed and there are fewer new ones to take up the slack. This will probably cut into workers' income and spending, slowing growth.

In contrast to many business economists, Dean Baker, co-director of the liberal Center for Economic Policy and Research in Washington, argued that a consumer reaction to the weak housing market would pull the economy into a recession next year.

"Homeowners had been pulling equity out of their homes at more than a $700 billion annual rate," Mr. Baker wrote yesterday. "This borrowing will slow sharply in the quarters ahead."

But others insisted that consumer appetites should not be underestimated. "Consumer spending hasn't stopped growing in 59 straight quarters, and some pretty awful things have happened in those 59 quarters," Mr. Yamarone said. "We all keep forgetting that the consumer is resilient."

Housing Slows Economic Growth (WT)

By Patrice Hill, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088492

The steep downturn in the housing market took its toll on the economy in the summer quarter, holding growth down to a 1.6 percent pace, the slowest in more than three years, the Commerce Department reported yesterday.

Housing construction fell by 17.4 percent after declining by 11 percent in the spring quarter, the biggest drops since 1991, which was the last time the housing market went into such a sharp downturn. The slump in housing largely offset greater strength in business investment in office buildings, plants and computers, as well as an uptick in consumer spending during the third quarter.

"We are feeling the effects of the housing bubble bursting," said Joel Naroff, president of Naroff Economic Advisors, a Pennsylvania forecasting company, expressing hope that housing will rebound quickly. "While the ill wind is not pleasant, it is not likely to be long lasting," he said. "Businesses and households did their part to keep the economy going."

Consumer spending expanded by 3.1 percent while commercial construction jumped by 14 percent and equipment spending rose by 6.4 percent -- all strong showings that muted the collapse in housing.

"Consumers and business investment continued to stave off the recession that the housing adjustment and the tide of imports could easily cause," said Peter Morici, business professor at the University of Maryland.

He calculated that housing subtracted 1.1 percentage points from economic growth while burgeoning imports -- primarily purchases of fuel and goods from China -- deducted another 1.3 points. The trade deficit during the quarter remained at a record 6.1 percent of economic output.

Still, consumers have survived the downdraft in housing pretty well so far, because they still have substantial equity in their homes built up after five years of double-digit gains in many areas, Mr. Morici said. He expects growth to pick up in the months ahead.

Consumers have been bolstered by a record fast drop in oil and gasoline prices since Labor Day, and a move by the Dow Jones Industrial Average to surpass its previous record high set in 2000. A measure of consumer sentiment published by the University of Michigan yesterday showed an uptick in response to both developments, which may stimulate stronger consumer spending in the final quarter of the year.

Some economists are not so sure the economy will bounce back quickly from the housing debacle, however.

Jason Schenker, economist at Wachovia Securities, said the depth of housing's troubles caught many analysts by surprise and is forcing Wachovia and others to revise their forecasts for economic growth.

"We still expect a bumpy-to-soft landing, but not a hard landing" for the economy, he said. "We won't get a recession."

Christian E. Weller, senior economist at the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank, said the economy cannot easily shake off the effects of the housing slump because of the critical role housing played in boosting economic growth between 2000 and 2005.

"The underlying story is that since the sharp end to the housing boom, there has not yet been a replacement to drive the economy," he said. "Other sectors of the economy either failed to grow fast enough to compensate for these declines, or presented an additional strain on the economy."

Consumers had to dip further into their savings and go deeper into debt to keep contributing to economic growth during the quarter, and federal spending on defense and other areas already is high and cannot be expected to fill in gap, Mr. Weller said.

"The important question is whether the continued expansion in business investment will be enough to create new jobs with higher wages and spur income-led consumption growth," he said. "For the economy to regain a healthier footing and end its dependence on debt, income needs to grow faster again."

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, sought to put the best face on the news, noting that the economy expanded forthe 20th straight quarter and remains on solid footing.

After A Strong Week, A Whimper (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

Stocks pulled back yesterday after a government report stirred concerns that the economy may be slowing too much.

DOJ_NMG_0088493

Investors have bid up stocks sharply this month on the notion that the economy is slowing but that the slackening pace poses no threat to corporate profits and consumer spending. Investors are also counting on a gradual slowdown to reduce the threat of inflation and persuade the Federal Reserve to lower short-term interest rates.

While investors expected that yesterday's advance reading on gross domestic product from the Commerce Department would show slowing growth, the report underscored concern that a cooling housing market could spill over into other parts of the economy.

"I think that the market actually was poised for profit taking and consolidation," said Quincy Krosby, chief investment strategist at the Hartford. The G.D.P. report gave investors an excuse to catch their breath after the recent run-up, she said, calling the pullback a healthy pause.

The Dow Jones industrial average was down 73.40 points, or 0.60 percent, at 12,090.26. The average had achieved a new high close in each of the previous four sessions and in 13 of the previous 18 sessions.

Broader stock indicators also moved lower yesterday. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slipped 11.74 points, or 0.85 percent, to 1,377.34, and the Nasdaq composite index fell 28.48 points, or 1.20 percent, to 2,350.62.

Technology stocks retreated afternoon after a report from Goldman Sachs that warned of weakness in orders for computer parts.

Over all, the major indexes showed gains for the week despite yesterday's decline. The Dow rose 0.73 percent for the week, while the S.& P. gained 0.64 percent and the Nasdaq added 0.36 percent. Even with the overall advances in the market, the S.& P. stands about 9.8 percent below its high close of 1,527.46 and the Nasdaq is even further off, about 53 percent below its high.

Bonds rose, with the benchmark 10-year Treasury note gaining 11/32, to 10118/32, and the yield, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, falling to 4.67 percent from 4.72 percent late Thursday. The dollar was mixed against other major currencies, while gold prices rose.

The G.D.P., the broadest measure of the economy, showed that growth slowed to 1.6 percent in the third quarter; economists had been expecting a 2.1 percent expansion. The report identified the slumping housing market as a significant drag on growth, as money pumped into home building fell by the largest amount since 1991.

The University of Michigan reported that its consumer sentiment index rose to 93.6 for October from a reading of 85.4 last month, which provided some optimism. A decline in oil prices, which hit lows for the year a week ago and are sharply off midsummer's highs, has left more money in consumers' wallets.

Light crude oil settled up 39 cents, to $60.75 a barrel, on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Subodh Kumar, chief investment strategist for CIBC World Markets, said the markets moved lower yesterday as investors tried to balance expectations about the economy with Fed policy and oil prices. The central bank left short-term interest rates unchanged on Thursday, as expected, and offered a little-changed opinion on the health of the economy.

"The fact that there is a moderate pullback tells you that the overall market risk is not extreme," he said.

A flood of corporate earnings has held investor attention in recent weeks, with record profits from Chevron giving a dose of good earnings news yesterday. Chevron, which rose 18 cents to $67.68, reported its third-quarter profit surged 40 percent, to $5.02 billion, topping estimates. The year-ago quarter in part reflected costs tied to Hurricane Katrina.

Microsoft fell 1 cent, to $28.34, even though it reported better-than-expected profit and raised its forecast.

Alltel, a wireless carrier, declined $4.19, or 7.2 percent, to $53.99 after its third-quarter profit, though up 11 percent, missed expectations.

BorgWarner fell $3.06, or 5 percent, to $58.25, after its third-quarter profit fell 36 percent as global sales failed to offset sizable production cuts by automakers in North America.

Ingersoll-Rand, which makes industrial equipment, declined $1.45, or 3.7 percent, to $37.45, after posting a 4 percent drop in its third-quarter earnings, in part because of tax expenses and lower sales of its Bobcat equipment. The company also said its fourth-quarter profit would be below what Wall Street had expected.

Dow Steps Back On Concerns About Economy (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0088494

By Shefali Anand

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

What goes up, must eventually take a breather.

After finishing at a record high on each of the week's first four days, the Dow Jones Industrial Average fell Friday amid news of a softer-than-expected economy.

Even so, October is shaping up as the blue-chip average's strongest month in more than a year. The Dow industrials are up 3.52% in October. If that holds up it would be the best month since July 2005, when they jumped 3.56%.

On Friday on normal trading volume, the Dow retreated 73.40 points, or 0.60%, to 12090.26, but it was up 0.7% for the week, and 12.8% year-to-date.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slid 0.85%, or 11.74 points, to 1377.34, up 0.6% for the week, and 10.2% in 2006.

The last few weeks' gains have been driven largely by strong corporate earnings, coupled with falling gasoline prices and the perception of a benign economy.

"We've really had a heck of a run...at some point you are going to consolidate a little bit and pause," said Andy Brooks, head of stock trading at Baltimore money-management group T. Rowe Price.

On Friday, investors focused on Commerce Department figures showing quarterly economic growth at the slowest rate in three years, a seasonally adjusted 1.6% annual rate for the third quarter.

The report suggested weakness in the housing market, with investment in residential housing dropping 17%, the steepest drop since the first quarter of 1991.

But worries were muted somewhat because investors already knew housing was weak. Business and consumer spending, about which investors have been concerned lately, rose for the quarter, 8.6% and 3.1% respectively.

Crude-oil futures contracts for December delivery rose on Friday by 39 cents or 0.65% per barrel, to $60.75 at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

The Nasdaq Composite Index, filled with volatile technology stocks, fell 1.20%, or 28.48 points, to 2350.62, its biggest drop since early September, pulled down by big technology stocks such as Intel. The stocks were hit following a report from Goldman Sachs that Asian demand for motherboards is declining.

Meanwhile, oil major Chevron provided an upbeat note by releasing better-than-expected earnings, as did Microsoft after regular trading hours on Thursday.

Microsoft's earnings rose 11% in its first fiscal quarter, while Chevron's third-quarter net income jumped about 40% over the same period last year.

Microsoft stock declined marginally, however, as the company offered disappointing guidance about performance in the current quarter.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks fell1 and bonds gained2. The 10-year Treasury note rose 11/32, or $3.44 for every $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.681%. The 30-year bond was up 21/32 to yield 4.799%.

The dollar weakened3. Late in New York, it traded at 117.58 yen, down from 118.39. The euro rose against the dollar to $1.2735 from $1.2690.

Write to Shefali Anand at shefali.anand@wsj.com4

Dollar Declines Against Rivals After A Sign Of Slowing Growth (WSJ)

By Dan Molinski

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

The dollar dropped to a one-month low against the yen Friday as worries of a slowing U.S. economy boosted the chances of interest-rate cuts next year by the Federal Reserve.

DOJ_NMG_0088495

The dollar's downward spiral was triggered by a weaker-than-expected third-quarter gross-domestic-product report, which sent the dollar to the one-month low of 117.13 yen, while the euro hit a three-week high at $1.2751. The dollar recovered slightly against its rivals later in the session, but remained overall in negative territory.

Speaking on CNBC television shortly after the data were released, U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson sought to reassure markets, saying the U.S. economy was "healthy," but many currency analysts weren't convinced.

"Although the optimists will be looking for a rebound in the fourth quarter, the [dollar's] momentum now has clearly downshifted going toward the end of the year," said Brian Dolan, head of currency research at Forex.com.

Late Friday, the euro stood at $1.2735 from $1.2690 late Thursday, while the dollar was at 117.58 yen from 118.39 yen. Sterling was fetching $1.8967 from $1.8906 late Thursday. Coming as it did just after the Federal Reserve, in its statement after this week's meeting, seemed to be backing off from further monetary-policy tightening, the GDP number banished any remaining worries of further rate hikes from currency traders minds.

"The GDP report gives the Coup de Grace to the tightening cycle," said Ashraf Laidi, chief foreign exchange analyst at CMC Markets.

In Brazil, where a presidential-election runoff is set for Sunday, the real closed slightly stronger against the dollar Friday.

The dollar's weakness also lifted the Chinese currency, the yuan, to fresh postrevaluation highs in the over-the-counter market of 7.8870 yuan to the dollar. The U.S. currency exited active trade at 7.8891 yuan, down from Thursday's close of 7.8959 yuan.

Onshore markets were little affected by rules from China's foreign-exchange regulator, the State Administration of Foreign Exchange, that banned onshore domestic institutions and individuals from trading in offshore yuan derivatives, dealers said.

--J.R. Wu contributed to this report.

Write to Dan Molinski at Dan.Molinski@dowjones.com1

Wholesale Gasoline Prices Rise, Cost At Pump Could Follow Suit (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

Wholesale gasoline prices have shot up over the past week, and prices at the pump may soon follow.

U.S. prices have dropped an average of 27% to $2.20 a gallon of regular gas Friday from a peak of $3.03 a gallon in August, according to the AAA, the motorist organization. That has left more money in the pockets of motorists, giving a shot in the arm to retail spending and the U.S. economy.

But the retail price slide may be coming to a halt. Wholesale gasoline prices have risen 8.9% over the past 10 days, to $1.56 a gallon in New York Mercantile Exchange trading Friday. Spot crude-oil prices, meanwhile, have gone up 5.4% over the past nine days period, to $60.75 a barrel Friday, stemming a plunge that had taken the price from $77.03 a barrel in July to $57.22 a barrel Oct. 12.

There's often a 10-day or two-week time lag before changes in the wholesale gasoline market show up at the pump. And more than a week of data is needed to mark a trend in the volatile energy market.

Yet, as another indicator that the price trend may be shifting back up, the average U.S. price of regular gasoline rose a little over a penny Thursday and Friday, to $2.20 a gallon, the first consecutive-day increases since the first week of August, according to the AAA.

The price increases came after key members of the Organization of Petroleum Producing Countries made good on their pledge to cut crude deliveries by 1.2 million barrels a day, and put a floor under the plunging price of crude oil.

In recent days, Saudi Arabia, Iran, the United Arab Emirates and Nigeria all informed their customers that November crude-oil deliveries will be lower. Venezuela suggested that OPEC cut an additional 300,000 barrels a day in December.

Then, in a report Wednesday, the Energy Information Administration said U.S. gasoline, crude oil and distillate fuel inventories fell by 11 million barrels, their largest weekly decline since Hurricane Katrina 13 months ago.

Together, the OPEC and EIA reports helped to persuade traders to bid up wholesale crude oil and gasoline prices.

DOJ_NMG_0088496

Oil Prices, Now Likely At Bottom, Are Poised To Rise, But Moderately By MATT CHAMBERS (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

After losing a quarter of its value from record highs, crude oil has very likely bottomed for the year as the northern hemisphere winter ushers in the prospect of a modest resurgence in prices.

Growing belief in the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries' ability to cut oil production and the advent of cold temperatures whittling away high U.S. oil stockpiles pushed prices above $60 a barrel again this week.

Oil was given additional support Friday by reports that Saudi Arabia and Bahrain are leading a deployment of naval forces in the Persian Gulf after receiving information suggesting "a strong possibility" that insurgents may attack a major oil-loading facility in Saudi Arabia. The warning served as a reminder of oil's vulnerability to terror threats.

Traders on the New York Mercantile Exchange floor say that with prices having held at around $60 a barrel for more than a month, after a rapid drop from their July 14 record of $78.40, chart analysis is also starting to favor a price rise.

"With supplies tightening, participants' confidence in OPEC growing, and colder weather raising heating demand during the current refinery maintenance period, the supertanker that represents market perception is beginning to turn," said Mike Fitzpatrick, an analyst and trader at Fimat USA in New York.

Oil prices skyrocketed during the summer. But traders began selling in earnest near the end of the U.S. summer-driving season, with the trend only exacerbated by the fact the hurricane season turned out to be tame and the Iran nuclear standoff faded from the market's radar.

That prompted investors holding long positions in oil, or bets prices would gain, to bail out, speeding the fall in the price of oil and ultimately pushing benchmark futures in New York to an 11-month low of $56.55 a barrel on Oct. 20.

"We are not sure if we still have longs losing money from much higher levels, but they have been a factor whenever crude prices have tried to rally in October," said Peter Beutel, president of trading advisory firm Cameron Hanover.

Oil prices hit their bottom for the year after OPEC said it planned to cut production by 1.2 million barrels a day to buoy prices. The initial decline was attributed to skepticism about the cartel's ability to enforce the cuts.

But with the United Arab Emirates joining Saudi Arabia in telling customers to expect less oil in November and Iran indicating it is going to follow suit, the prospect of the cuts tightening the crude market is starting to be factored into trades.

"I think a combination of the OPEC meeting and the actual cuts they are putting in place, the fact the market is oversold and with winter coming, has kind of turned the market around," said Tom Bentz, an analyst and trader at BNP Paribas in New York.

Still, the huge price drops of August and September are fresh in analysts' minds and no one expects a fast rise.

Nymex crude prices rose 39 cents to $60.75 a barrel Friday.

In other commodity markets:

SOYBEANS: Prices on the Chicago Board of Trade rose, supported by technical-chart strength and speculative buying. November soybeans advanced 7.75 cents to $6.3550 a bushel.

NATURAL GAS: Futures extended losses for a second straight day on moderating weather forecasts and high levels of gas in underground storage. The November contract expired 34.4 cents lower at $7.153 a million British thermal units on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Write to Matt Chambers at matt.chambers@dowjones.com1

Campaigns Go Negative For A Reason (LAT)

By Richard Simon And Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

It works, says one expert. But the nastiness of this election season leaves some wondering what line is left to cross.

In the waning days of this year's closely contested midterm election, attacks aimed at impugning a candidate's character and morals are increasingly dominating campaigns, raising questions about the appropriate boundaries and tenor of the debate.

On Friday Jim Webb, the Democratic Senate candidate in Virginia, came under harsh attack for explicit sexual passages he wrote in a novel several years ago — the latest twist in his tight race with Republican incumbent George Allen.

DOJ_NMG_0088497

In Tennessee, much of the week's campaign focused on a television ad featuring a woman suggesting that she had met U.S. Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., the Senate Democratic candidate, at a Playboy-sponsored party and saying, with a wink: "Harold, call me."

In New York, Michael Arcuri, a Democratic candidate for Congress, was accused of calling a phone-sex line and billing taxpayers for the charge.

And in Pennsylvania, Democrats recently needled President Bush for signing a bill for National Character Counts Week a few days before campaigning for Republican Rep. Don Sherwood, who has admitted to having an affair.

"We've reached the point where negative ads have become more important than positive campaigns, and there's almost no line left to cross," said University of Pennsylvania political scientist Don Kettl. "If it's there to be found, the highly paid opposition researchers will find it. And if they find it, they'll use it."

Looking at it from a campaign strategist's point of view, Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, said: "Negative ads work, which is why you see so many of them."

The focus on the conduct of candidates comes against the backdrop of a sex scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) that has added to GOP jitters about their ability to hold on to control of Congress.

"High stakes can mean low tactics," said Jack Pitney Jr., a political professor at Claremont McKenna College. "When a great deal is riding on an election, partisans may feel justified in doing things that might otherwise seem out of bounds."

Conservative commentator Tamar Jacoby, who recently called for dialogue between Democrats and Republicans, said the ascendancy of personal attacks reflected a "fundamental mistrust" between political parties in a polarized nation.

"When you think that somebody is fundamentally different from you, and doesn't share your goals for the country, it gets easier and easier to say mean things about them," said Jacoby, a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute think tank. "It's like what often happens when countries are preparing for war against one another. They start to say really mean things, so it dehumanizes [the opponent] and allows you to go to war."

Jacoby added that the public is both repelled and fascinated by the personal attacks.

"I think the public is fed up with it, but people do pay attention to the ads," she said. "Everybody likes a good fight."

Some candidates are fighting back.

When the National Republican Congressional Committee aired an ad accusing Arcuri of calling a sex hotline, the candidate dug out 2004 phone records to show that an aide had misdialed the number. It had the same last seven digits as the number for the state Department of Criminal Justice Services, which was dialed shortly after the first call, his campaign said. Threatening legal action, Arcuri's campaign persuaded TV stations not to run the ad.

But with control of Congress at stake, even a work of fiction can become a true-to-life campaign issue.

In Virginia, where turnout by conservative voters could prove pivotal, the Allen campaign on Friday seized on Webb's writings — issuing a statement from a "mother of three" calling portions of his books "shocking" and reflecting "a pattern of demeaning treatment toward women."

The conservative Traditional Values Coalition demanded that Webb withdraw from the race, citing his "XXX-rated writing." Webb, a decorated former Marine who fought in Vietnam, has written several war novels.

The attack on Webb came as the Allen campaign has been rocked by charges of racial insensitivity, which have put in play what was once considered a safe GOP seat.

Webb, a former Navy secretary, called the attack a "classic example of the way this campaign has worked. It's smear after smear."

Democrats responded Friday by citing racy novels written by Republicans, including the 1981 novel "Sisters" by Lynne Cheney, Vice President Dick Cheney's wife, which includes a lesbian love affair. Lynne Cheney said Friday on CNN, "I have never written anything sexually explicit."

The attacks are expected to escalate even more before the Nov. 7 election, especially in Virginia, one of three states — along with Tennessee and Missouri — whose races may determine which party controls the Senate. If Democrats can capture two of the three, they could gain a Senate majority, given other expected pickups.

DOJ_NMG_0088498

The Republicans' eleventh-hour attacks follow GOP promises to make the 2006 elections not just about broad national themes but about sharp personal differences between candidates. GOP strategists have said for weeks that they will work to localize races by making them a "choice" between two candidates rather than a referendum on President Bush.

Democrats have focused on character too. In a New York race, Republican Rep. John E. Sweeney is the target of a Democratic-sponsored online ad that uses an actor to portray him carousing at a frat party. "We deserve a congressman who fights for more than his right to party," says the ad. Sweeney was criticized earlier this year after attending a party at Union College.

Such attacks make it harder to govern, Jacoby said, once the election is over and lawmakers have to coexist if not cooperate with one another.

"It's very hard to get to a compromise," she said, " if you don't trust the other guy."

richard.simon@latimes.com

ricardo.alonso-zaldivar@

latimes.com

Times staff writers Peter Wallsten and Moises Mendoza contributed to this report.

Swinging Along (NATJOUR)

By Charlie Cook

National Journal, October 28, 2006

Another week has gone by and little has changed. The Republican Party still seems to be headed toward a very tough election.

In the House, Republicans are most likely to see a net loss of 20 to 35 seats, and with it their majority. In the Senate, the GOP could lose at least four, but a five- or six-seat loss is more likely. A six-seat change tips the chamber into Democratic hands.

Could the situation change? Could the trajectory of this election be altered if the spotlight shifts from Iraq, congressional scandals, budget deficits, Hurricane Katrina, Terri Schiavo, stem-cell research and immigration onto something else, like terrorism or national security? Of course it could. In the time it takes to read this article, something could happen. A confrontation at sea involving a freighter going into or coming out of North Korea, for example, could dominate the news and the public consciousness. But unless something of that magnitude happens, we have to go with the situation as it stands.

While some stick to the assumption that this is a normal political environment, that this election is an "all politics is local" election like 1996, 1998, 2000, 2002 and 2004, they do so in the face of an enormous amount of polling data that demonstrates a horrendous political climate -- the kind that one sees periodically in midterm elections like 1958, 1966, 1974 and 1994, and even occasionally in presidential election years like 1932, 1964 and 1980.

Since 1994 is the most recent of these "wave" elections, when all politics is hardly local, compare the most recent NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll, conducted October 13-16 among 1,006 registered voters nationwide, with the comparable NBC/WSJ poll from October 1994. President Bill Clinton and the Democrats were in the hot seat, headed toward a 52-seat loss in the House and an eight-seat Senate defeat.

In the October 1994 NBC/WSJ poll, 39 percent of voters thought the country was headed in the right direction, compared with 48 percent who said it was on the wrong track -- a nine-point lead for wrong track. In the recent poll, just 26 percent said right direction and 61 percent said wrong track; a net difference of 35 points, significantly worse than 1994.

The October 1994 poll gave Clinton a job approval rating of 48 percent and a disapproval rating of 43 percent, a five-point difference. This month, just 38 percent approved of President Bush's performance compared to 57 percent who disapproved, a net disapproval of 19 points. Again, it's significantly worse than 1994.

In the poll taken 12 years ago, 24 percent approved of the job Congress was doing and 67 percent disapproved, a net disapproval of 43 points. In last week's poll, just 16 percent approved of Congress and a whopping 75 percent disapproved, a 59-point net disapproval.

At this point in 1994, the GOP had moved into a six-point lead in the generic congressional ballot test (44 percent to 38 percent). In the latest poll, the Democrats have a 15-point lead -- 52 percent to 37 percent. Once again, much worse than '94.

DOJ_NMG_0088499

Finally, in October 1994, 39 percent said their congressman had performed well enough to deserve re-election compared with 49 percent who thought it was time to give a new person a chance -- a 10-point difference. In the new poll, the same 39 percent favored re-election, but the percentage preferring a new representative was a bit lower at 45 percent, a six-point difference and only marginally better for incumbents than 12 years ago.

In short, in four of the five diagnostic indicators, the situation is significantly worse for Republicans today than it was for Democrats in 1994. And in the remaining one, this year is marginally better.

Before anyone can erroneously draw the conclusion that this survey is just another mainstream/liberal media effort, the poll was supervised by designates from both the NBC News Political Unit and the political editor of the Wall Street Journal, collaborating with a top pollster from each party. The Democrat is Peter D. Hart, truly one of the deans of the political and Democratic polling communities. The Republican side was headed up by the late Robert Teeter, a true pioneer and leader in polling for the GOP. After Teeter passed away several years ago, Bill McInturff took over. McInturff is a senior partner in Public Opinion Strategies (R), the largest and most-respected survey research firm in the party, with the largest share of sitting senators, governors and House members. So this is hardly a poll that could be labeled slanted, and in fact is designed by two of the best practitioners on the planet.

Does this mean that Democrats are headed to victories of 52 or more seats in the House and eight or more seats in the Senate? Of course not. The number of vulnerable GOP House and Senate seats is smaller than the number Democrats faced in 1994, and the number of retirements this year is less than 12 years ago. But then again, no one is talking about a 52-seat House or eight-seat Senate gain for Democrats this year. In the House in fact, the halfway point between the 20- to 35-seat estimate mentioned above is 27.5 seats, just a bit over half of the 52 seats gained by the GOP in 1994.

Do Republicans have a financial advantage over Democrats in terms of national party spending? Yes, but that advantage is the narrowest its been in 20 years. The Sept. 30 cash-on-hand figures for the Republican National Committee and the GOP Senate and House campaign committees were just $10 million more than the Democratic National Committee and its Senate and House committees, $77 million to $67 million. The GOP spending advantage is there, but it's nothing like the 50- to 125-percent advantages that we have seen in previous elections.

Do Republicans, in their "72-hour program," have a superior get-out-the-vote operation compared with Democrats? No question. But the rule of thumb that campaign professionals have always used is that a strong GOTV operation is good for a point or two, certainly not much more than that. Having to pull out voters who are disillusioned by Iraq, scandals and other issues will be a challenge even for this exquisitely designed operation.

One way of looking at it is that the wave this year may be as big as or even bigger than in 1994, but there are fewer structures on and near the beach, and those that are in danger are made with somewhat sturdier construction than those in 1994, hence the likelihood of smaller losses. But smaller losses like 20 to 35 seats still would cost the GOP the House, and losses of five or six in the Senate put that chamber right at the tipping point.

At this stage, the Cook Political Report puts four GOP seats in the "Lean Democratic" column, and classifies 27 more as "Toss Ups." (Keep in mind that the almost ironclad, years-old policy of the Cook Political Report is to not rate unindicted incumbents worse than a Toss Up.) Another 17 GOP seats are in competitive races, but are still ahead by enough to warrant a "Lean Republican" rating, and then there are 18 more long-shot opportunities for Democrats, those rated in the "Likely Republican" column, leaving 166 as "Solid Republican." No Democratic seats remain in the Toss Up column, while seven are considered "Lean Democratic."

In the Senate, GOP incumbents Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania and Mike DeWine in Ohio remain distinct underdogs. Conrad Burns of Montana and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island also run consistently behind and face uphill struggles, but in most polls they are not nearly as far behind as Santorum and DeWine. In Missouri, incumbent Jim Talent is basically running even, while George Allen maintains a modest but consistent lead in Virginia. In the Tennessee Republican open seat, there has been a small but potentially important shift in momentum away from Democratic Rep. Harold Ford Jr. in favor of former Chattanooga Mayor Bob Corker, the GOP standard-bearer. Ford had maintained a small lead and a world-class campaign but stumbled a little bit recently, while the Corker campaign, for the first time in this general election campaign, is showing signs of life. The race is likely to remain very close, but there were no positive signs for the GOP until the last week or two -- now there are.

DOJ_NMG_0088500

Will Republicans pick off a Democratic seat? Republicans continue to argue that Democratic incumbent Debbie Stabenow remains highly vulnerable and that Macomb County Sheriff Mike Bouchard is within single digits and showing signs of life. That seat looks to be a better shot for the GOP than the Cantwell race in Washington state or the open seat in Minnesota.

But the seat most recently considered the best GOP pickup opportunity has seen a bit of a reversal. Republican state Sen. Tom Kean Jr.'s momentum appears to have halted in the last week or two, with very real questions arising about whether Kean will have the funding to compete in the extraordinarily expensive New York City and Philadelphia media markets. Appointed Sen. Robert Menendez (D) remains plagued by ethical and legal allegations -- he clearly has problems -- but the inability of the GOP to commit the $5 million or so necessary to do the job could make the difference.

Could things change, as they did in early September when the pendulum swung from Iraq and scandals to terrorism, national security and appreciation for falling gasoline prices, only to swing back at the end of the month? Sure. But it has to swing, and that does not appear to have happened yet. Maybe it will, but maybe it won't.

Polls And Pundits: How Reliable Are Forecasts? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

But will today's polls translate into a Democratic victory on Election Day? History suggests the vagaries of polling and the importance of the final two weeks of campaigning make that far from certain.

Here's a look at how well polls and pundits predict elections:

How reliable are polls? Polls can't predict the outcome of an election; they only take a snapshot at a given moment. Opinions often change in the final days before an election. Up to a quarter of voters don't decide whom they'll vote for until the week before an election, according to Republican pollster Bill McInturff. As many as 8% don't decide until Election Day.

In 1994, when Republicans won control of Congress, few pundits predicted the landslide. In July 1994, the Pew Research Center said that 47% of voters would likely vote Democratic, while 45% would vote Republican. By November, the poll showed Republicans ahead by just two percentage points. Yet Republicans actually ended up trouncing the Democrats, winning 52 House seats and eight Senate seats.

Polls in the run-up to this election are more consistent than usual. From June to late October of this year, people who said they plan to vote Democratic have fluctuated by two percentage points, compared with seven percentage points over the same time period in 1994.

Are polls biased? Polls are only as good as their sample and the questions asked. If the sample group is too narrow or too small, it can skew results. The average size of a poll is 1,000 adults, and pollsters have models that try to include all races, ages and socioeconomic backgrounds.

But modern technology poses new challenges. Most polls depend on land-line phones, but one in 10 adults now has only a cellular telephone. That poses a potential sampling problem, since nearly half of voters with only a cellular phone are under 30 years old, compared with 13% who have land-lines. Still, a recent Pew report concluded that cellphone-only users are not yet "creating a measurable bias in the overall finding."

Early voters also can affect poll bias. About a fifth of all votes cast in the U.S. are cast before Election Day, up from at least 8% in 1994, according to Michael McDonald of George Mason University. This "very subtly biases the results," he says, since this growing category isn't always accounted for in polling models.

What might change in the final days? A lot. A key factor is voter turnout, which is hard to predict. Pew reports that more than half of Democrats say they're enthusiastic about voting, up from 40% in 2002, while Republican enthusiasm is down. Republicans hope the polls aren't capturing large numbers who may be unenthusiastic but nonetheless are dedicated party voters. In recent years, get-out-the-vote campaigns have been the Republican Party's forte.

Democrats are trying to capture Republican and independent voters who are dissatisfied with the Iraq war or Congress. But some traditionally Republican-leaning independents now inclined to vote Democratic could get cold feet in the voting booth, says Andrew Kohut, president of the Pew Research Center.

--Lauren Etter

GOP Retains Cash Edge Over Resurgent Democrats (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0088501

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Democrats continued to raise large amounts of campaign cash this month, but not enough to erase the Republicans' multimillion-dollar lead.

According to the parties' latest financial disclosure statements, Democratic Party committees outraised the national GOP committees during the first 18 days of October. Riding a wave of optimism about the party's chances of gaining seats in the House and the Senate in the Nov. 7 midterm elections, the Democrats' national reelection committees collected $25.9 million in the period. The Republican committees raised $18.6 million in the same period.

In addition, three dozen or more Democrats seeking seats in the House that are occupied by Republicans raised at least $1 million in the current election cycle -- the minimum that, political experts say, would enable a challenger to mount a full-fledged election bid.

Nevertheless, the Democrats' last-minute fundraising surge was not enough to overcome the GOP's earlier fundraising advantage. The three national Republican Party committees had $17 million more cash on hand than their Democratic counterparts as of Oct. 18, according to this week's financial reports.

What's more, Republican committees spent nearly twice as much on their toughest House races than Democratic committees did. The nonpartisan Campaign Finance Institute calculated that Republican committees spent $1 million on average to help each of the 35 GOP incumbents who are considered to be most in danger of losing reelection bids. Democratic committees spent an average of about $574,000 on behalf of each of the party's challengers in those races.

In addition, most of the Republican candidates in the House's tightest contests reported having more money in the bank than their Democratic rivals.

With the midterm elections so near, both parties are pouring huge sums into the House's three dozen or so competitive races.

"During the endgame, the parties are spending as much as the candidates themselves," said Michael J. Malbin, executive director of the Campaign Finance Institute.

Even so, Malbin noted, so many GOP candidates are behind in recent polls that not even their well-funded party committees can afford to expend resources on all of them.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee -- the party's House reelection organization -- reported raising $6.9 million and spending $25.8 million from Oct. 1 to 18, retaining $17.1 million in the bank. The National Republican Congressional Committee reported $6.6 million in receipts and $27.4 million in disbursements over the same period; it still had $18.3 million available.

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee raised $9.1 million and spent $22.5 million from Oct. 1 to 18; it had $9.7 million in the bank. The National Republican Senatorial Committee reported that it collected less than half as much -- $3.6 million -- and dispensed a third as much -- $6.8 million -- from Oct. 1 to Oct. 18, and was left with $8.9 million.

The Democratic National Committee said it collected $10.2 million and spent $13.6 million during the first 18 days of this month. It had $4.8 million in cash as well as $4 million in debt.

The Republican National Committee reported raising $8.4 million and spending $12.9 million during the period. Its cash on hand: $21.8 million.

Politics Campaign Cash Clues (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A rush of final campaign spending next week will provide important clues to where the Republican firewall against a Democratic takeover of the Senate is shifting -- and whether Republicans are even trying to build one to protect their House majority.

Overall, Republican committees have raised more money than the Democrats, $445 million to $330 million. They also have a cash advantage in the final weeks -- $17 million, reports released Friday show.

DOJ_NMG_0088502

The big Senate questions: Now that the Republican Party has decided to stop investing in Ohio, where incumbent Sen. Mike DeWine is trailing in polls, where does the money go? Will the party divert big money from the Buckeye State to make a last stand in Tennessee, where Republican Bob Corker is fighting to hold the seat of departing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, or double-down its bet on Virginia Sen. George Allen, who is clinging to a razor-thin lead?

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee recently sunk $1.7 million into ads attacking Mr. Allen; Republican Party committees countered with $1.4 million, according to a study released this week by the Campaign Finance Institute, a nonpartisan political-money watchdog group.

But the Virginia race remains a dead heat, and party officials on both sides are predicting another $3 million could be spent in the Old Dominion by Election Day.

Republican Party leaders also will have to show their hand in New Jersey, where they have been flirting with spending millions to try to oust freshman Democratic Sen. Bob Menendez. Democrats have used $2 million to build a firewall of their own around Mr. Menendez, who is viewed as their most -- and perhaps only -- vulnerable incumbent in that chamber.

The balance of the Democrats' Senate payout, roughly $16 million, has been used to attack Republicans. Republican Party committees have spent $12 million -- all of it aimed at holding Democrats' net victories to fewer than six, the magic number that would flip control of the chamber.

In the House, where Democrats need 15 seats to win control, the field continues to worsen for Republicans. Party leaders have been forced to spend in such states as Idaho, which wasn't on anyone's map of contested races at the start of the year. It isn't clear they have the money to sustain such a broad defense through Election Day.

In the first two weeks of October, Republican Party committees spread millions of dollars across 53 House races while Democrats concentrated on 33. The Republican expenditures include eleventh-hour contributions to protect incumbents in New Mexico, Virginia, Pennsylvania and West Virginia who have suddenly seen their races turn more competitive. Overall, Republican committees have spent $45 million on House races.

The Democrats have spent $26 million, almost all of it trying to snatch Republican-held seats. Of the eight races in which Democratic incumbents are facing serious challenges, the Republican committees stopped spending money in four earlier this month, all but ceding them.

Among the trends that can be detected in this year's midterms is that both political parties have become more-cohesive units, with members of Congress working as teams to defeat the other side, says Anthony Corrado, an expert on campaign finance at Colby College in Maine.

Behind their loyal small-donor bases, the most important set of contributors for both sides this year are their own incumbents, sitting in safe districts, who are transferring large sums into the central committees to help their colleagues.

Democrats Get Late Donations From Business (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny And Aron Pilhofer

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 27 — Corporate America is already thinking beyond Election Day, increasing its share of last-minute donations to Democratic candidates and quietly devising strategies for how to work with Democrats if they win control of Congress.

The shift in political giving, for the first 18 days of October, has not been this pronounced in the final stages of a campaign since 1994, when Republicans swept control of the House for the first time in four decades.

Though Democratic control of either chamber of Congress is far from certain, the prospect of a power shift is leading interest groups to begin rethinking well-established relationships, with business lobbyists going as far as finding potential Democratic allies in the freshman class — even if they are still trying to defeat them on the campaign trail — and preparing to extend an olive branch the morning after the election.

Lobbyists, some of whom had fallen out of the habit of attending Democratic events, are even talking about making their way to the Sonnenalp Resort in Vail, Colo., where Representative Nancy Pelosi of California is holding a Speaker's Club ski getaway on Jan. 3. It is an annual affair, but the gathering's title could be especially apt for Ms. Pelosi, the House minority leader, who will be on hand to accept $15,000 checks, and could, if everything breaks her way, become the first woman to be House speaker.

DOJ_NMG_0088503

"Attendance will be high," said Steve Elmendorf, a former Democratic Congressional aide who has a long list of business lobbying clients. "All Democratic events will see a big increase next year, no question."

While business groups contained their Democratic contributions to only a handful of candidates throughout the year, a shifting political climate and an expanding field of competitive Congressional races has drawn increased donations from corporate political action committees.

For the first nine months of the year, for example, Pfizer's political action committee had given 67 percent of contributions to Republican candidates. But October ushered in a sudden change of fortune, according to disclosure reports, and Democrats received 59 percent of the Pfizer contributions.

Over all, the nation's top corporations still placed larger bets on Republican candidates. But at the very time Republicans began to fret publicly about holding control of Congress, a subtle shift began occurring in contributions to candidates, particularly in open seats.

"We keep fighting up until the last minute of the last day," said William C. Miller, vice president for political affairs at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, carefully measuring his words to remain positive about the Republicans' chances. "But when the smoke clears on Nov. 8, there are certainly going to be lots of opportunities for us to get to know the new freshman class."

An analysis by The New York Times of contributions from Oct. 1 to 18, the latest data available, shows that donations to Republicans from corporate political action committees dropped by 11 percentage points in favor of Democratic candidates, compared with corporate giving from January through September.

Republicans still received 57 percent of contributions, compared with 43 percent for Democrats, but it was the first double-digit October switch since 1994. "A lot will hold their powder for now," said Brian Wolff, deputy executive director of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "But after the election, we will have a lot of new friends."

Even before the election, many new contributions were funneled toward open races, like the Eighth Congressional District in Arizona. The Democratic candidate, Gabrielle Giffords, received checks of $5,000 each from the political action committees of United Parcel Service and Union Pacific. Lockheed Martin split the difference, donating $3,000 to Ms. Giffords and sending the same amount to her Republican rival, Randall Graf.

Until October, Lockheed Martin, the giant military contractor, had been following its pattern from recent elections of giving about 70 percent of contributions from its political action committee to Republicans. But Lockheed Martin's generosity shifted in the first half of October, with Democrats receiving 60 percent of donations, or $127,000.

While Republicans and Democrats are feverishly soliciting contributions until Election Day, campaign finance reports filed this week provide a window into the final days of a raucous midterm election campaign. The analysis of 288 corporate political action committees, which have contributed more than $100,000 this election cycle, found that at least 65 committees had increased their ratio of contributions to Democrats by at least 15 percentage points, including Sprint, United Parcel Service and Hewlett-Packard.

A notable exception to the flurry of last-minute giving is Wal-Mart.

"We had a two-year strategy to build up relationships with Democrats," said Lee Culpepper, the vice president for federal government relations at Wal-Mart. "This wasn't something that we decided in August that we needed to do and we ran out helter-skelter to try to do it."

One sign of fresh interest in the prospects of Democratic Congressional races came one morning this week when more than 100 lobbyists crowded into Democratic Party headquarters on Capitol Hill. Over Dunkin' Donuts and coffee, the executive director of the party's Congressional committee, Karin Johanson, delivered a private briefing on the race to a sea of unfamiliar faces, despite spending 30 years in politics.

"People are excited," she said later in an interview. "It was, by far, the best attended one ever."

As some young Republican lobbyists fled Washington to spend the final days working on too-close-to-call races in Ohio or Pennsylvania, their senior counterparts stayed behind to begin studying prospective members of the new freshman class. Even if

DOJ_NMG_0088504

Republicans hold control, the next Congress will almost certainly include at least a handful of moderate Democrats who defeated Republicans and will be looking for allies in the corporate world.

Peter Welch, the Democratic candidate for Vermont's single House seat, has already been telephoning some members of the Washington business lobby, offering an opportunity to begin a good relationship if he wins election. Never mind that his Republican opponent, Martha Rainville, has received a host of endorsements from the business community.

"The real story of the 2006 contributions is what happens in the early phase of 2007, with a change in party control," said Bernadette A. Budde, senior vice president of the Business-Industry Political Action Committee. "There will be proverbial meet-and-greets all over town so we will have a sense of who these people are."

Many of these meet-and-greet sessions will have a dual purpose: political action committees will offer contributions to help candidates wipe away debt their campaigns accrued during the race.

Spending in the midterm election campaign is forecast to reach $2.6 billion, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, including $1 billion from political action committees. While many business groups have been eager to appear as if they have been handily contributing to Democratic efforts, it was not until this month that the trend became apparent enough to quantify beyond party leaders or prospective committee chairmen.

Democrats who are not in tight races — or even standing for re-election in some cases — have seen their contributions increase more than some of those facing the most competitive contests. That is an easy way, lobbyists say, for political action committees to increase the share of their Democratic contributions, a percentage that is carefully tracked by party leaders when they reach the majority.

Representative Adam Smith of Washington, who leads a coalition of centrist Democrats, said he has detected a friendlier relationship with the business community in recent months, a welcome change from years of Republican rule when "Democrats were basically frozen out in every way."

"I hope that the new Democratic majority will take a more open and cooperative approach," Mr. Smith said in an interview. "I hope there won't be a sense of, 'Oh, you gave too much money to Republicans, so we're not going to talk to you.' "

Moderate Republicans Feeling Like Endangered Species (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 27 — Facing the loss of fellow moderates in the Nov. 7 elections, Republican centrists in the House and Senate are faulting Congressional and party leaders for pursuing a strategy dominated by conservative themes.

Leading moderates say Republicans concentrated on social wedge issues like same-sex marriage while pressing national security almost to the exclusion of popular wage and health policies that could have helped endangered Republicans in the Northeast and the Midwest.

"There wasn't an impetus to help develop a political and legislative plan that incorporated the broad umbrella of philosophy in our party," said Senator Olympia J. Snowe, Republican of Maine, whom experts expect to be easily re-elected. "I think they always operated under the wrong assumption that you just appeal to the base and no more than that."

Ms. Snowe and other moderates, while holding out hope that most of their counterparts would hang on, were dismayed by the prospect of depleted ranks, saying it could lead to a more polarized Congress.

Two Senate Republicans often found in the small moderate bloc, Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and Mike DeWine of Ohio, are in serious jeopardy. Two leading House moderates are retiring, another lost a primary, and at least six others are in difficult re-election fights in Connecticut, New Hampshire, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania and elsewhere.

The centrists said heavy losses outside strongholds in the South and parts of the West and Midwest could imperil the party's future. They say Republicans cannot sustain a long-term majority unless the party thrives throughout the country.

"There are some people who, because they are so pure and so sure of themselves, they are willing to run the risk of having the Republican Party no longer be national but be more regional," said Representative Sherwood L. Boehlert of New York, a respected moderate who is retiring. "They think they can maintain their majority as a regional party."

DOJ_NMG_0088505

Conservatives say the overall party message was developed to draw the most loyal voters to the polls by emphasizing bedrock principles. The leader of one group that backed conservative candidates in Republican primaries, angering the moderate wing, said some moderates were in trouble simply because they strayed too far, alienating Republicans without attracting Democrats.

"We have people who are certainly well left of the center of the Republican conference on all issues, including economic and growth issues," said the leader, Pat Toomey, a former congressman from Pennsylvania who heads the Club for Growth. "I'm not hoping they lose. But if they do, I think we will be able to recapture those seats with pro-growth candidates who distance themselves from Democrats."

Even conservatives acknowledge that the push did not make it easy for candidates in close races in New England and Ohio.

"It is a real quandary," Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas, said. "It is true that in order to motivate folks there has been an appeal made to turn out our conservatives, which by definition doesn't help those who are not as in tune with the base."

In past election cycles, Republican moderates, like their right-leaning Democratic colleagues in the South, have survived by emphasizing differences with their own party on pivotal issues. Independent voters at home have indicated a willingness to back their lawmakers and draw a distinction between them and the party.

But this year, given the Iraq war, dissatisfaction with President Bush and a series of Republican scandals, some voters no longer seem willing to separate the two.

"It appears we have finally pushed them far enough to vote for the Democratic Party," said Sarah Chamberlain Resnick, executive director of the Republican Mainstreet Partnership. "As a loyal Republican, I think that is scary."

Democrats have also made a concerted effort against vulnerable Republican moderates, which Senator Susan Collins, another Republican of Maine, said was not much of a reward for those willing to try to work with the opposition party.

"There is no one who has voted more often with the Democrats than Linc Chafee," Ms. Collins said. "Yet that didn't stop them from going after him with everything they had. That is a good lesson."

Ms. Collins and Ms. Snowe noted that although voters indicate a strong desire for bipartisanship, some lawmakers most likely to be punished are the very ones who have reached across the aisle.

Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, made no apologies for focusing on Republican moderates and said Republicans should blame the party leaders for its approach.

"They left these guys to fend for themselves in districts that have been trending Democratic," Mr. Emanuel said. "What we did was recruit and fully fund our candidates."

Republicans leaning toward the middle on social, environmental and spending matters have been raising the alarm for months, saying the party was missing opportunities to bolster moderate candidates with measures on raising the minimum wage, expanding stem cell research and ethics reform.

But the minimum-wage increase died when it was tied to a move to repeal the estate tax, President Bush vetoed the stem cell measure, and the drive for ethics reform collapsed.

"I don't think the agenda has been particularly helpful," said Representative Michael N. Castle, Republican of Delaware, who said some Republicans had been dismissive of the centrists until the leadership was desperate for votes on major bills.

"I will be the first to say there are those in the Republican Party who feel moderates are essential only in terms of numbers," Mr. Castle said.

While Republican moderates struggle to maintain their numbers, some top Democratic challengers are from the more moderate wing of that party, raising the prospect that some gains will come from the right.

That possibility also gives Republican moderates hope that even if they number fewer, they could potentially band with Democrats in the center to influence measures.

"I think," Ms. Collins said, "the moderates in both parties could be empowered."

DNC Wooing Black Voters (WT)

By Brian Debose, The Washington Times

DOJ_NMG_0088506

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

The Democratic National Committee is hiring more black advertisers, pollsters and grass-roots operatives in a revamped effort to increase turnout by black voters on Election Day.

Democratic officials say the black vote is essential -- particularly in Senate races -- to beat Republicans.

"There are a lot of races that will be impacted by African-American and Hispanic voters in crucial states, and we had a lot of candidates stress that they need these votes to win," DNC spokeswoman Amaya J. Smith said.

She said the DNC is running a national ad campaign targeting black and Hispanic voters. It also is funding phone banks and has people on call to take voters to the polls.

"We are reaching out to people who we know are our voters but may not have come out in the last election," Miss Smith said.

The difference is the party is not outsourcing its get-out-the-vote operations as it has in the past, said Donna Brazile, a political consultant who heads the DNC Voting Rights Institute.

She said that for the first time in recent memory, the party is taking its political destiny in its own hands, with the operations all being managed by people with experience turning out black and Hispanic voters in their specific cities and states.

"They have been remarkable in correcting the mistakes of the past, and this is the best work I've seen for a midterm election," Miss Brazile said.

Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, the District's nonvoting representative, has warned the party for years about the importance of ensuring black voters get to the polls.

"I think they understand that the black vote is a solid, sure vote that you don't have to wonder about," Mrs. Norton said.

According to exit polls in 2004, black voters constituted 11 percent of the electorate, and 88 percent voted for Democrat John Kerry. The impact of black voters in key states is even larger. In Maryland, for example, 23 percent of voters in 2004 were black, and 93 percent of those voted to re-elect Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski, a Democrat.

Historically, Mrs. Norton said, both Republicans and Democrats have underestimated the difficulty in turning out voters for midterm elections, but she said Republicans woke up to that fact in 1994 when they used their get-out-the-vote efforts to wrest control of Congress.

"What gives me hope is that the poll figures are so much better for us than they were for the Republicans in 1994, also a non-presidential year," Mrs. Norton said. But, she added, "Republicans didn't have the turnout machine that they have now and their turnout is better than ours."

Longtime Democratic pollster Ron Lester said Republicans have had more time to perfect their turnout strategies.

Mr. Lester, who lives in Prince George's County, has polled Maryland elections for decades. He said his main problem has been that the national Democratic Party never communicated with the local party and had no system in place to track its voters.

He said Republicans work on turnout year-round and are in constant contact with their voters, making it easy to find them and track their voting habits.

"They use a database that they have been building for years, to the point where today my friends who are Republican pollsters, they can go to a block somewhere in some town and tell you exactly where the three Republican voters live on that block, right off the bat," Mr. Lester said.

Terry McAuliffe recognized this problem in 2001 when he became DNC chairman. He copied the Republican model, investing heavily in building a similar database using credit-card information, vehicle registrations and other data to identify likely Democratic voters.

This database, which cost the party tens of millions of dollars to assemble, has given the Democrats a tool to challenge Republican turnout nearly vote for vote, Mr. Lester said.

"The DNC probably has the most effective technical operation they have had in years, but as always they are still playing catch-up," he said.

Hollywood Director Targets Democrats In Ads (WT)

By Marc Ballon, Special To The Washington Times

DOJ_NMG_0088507

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

Movie director David Zucker has made a living off of satirical comedies, including "Airplane" and "The Naked Gun," but the one-time liberal activist is now focusing his camera to mock Democrats in political ads.

In Mr. Zucker's opinion, portrayed in Internet ads for the Republican National Committee, Democrats are unable or unwilling to confront threats to America and are fiscally irresponsible.

"I still can't believe I'm a Republican," said Mr. Zucker, a former campaign adviser to President Bill Clinton.

"There are just certain things ingrained in our Jewish roots. Our fathers voted for Roosevelt, and we voted for JFK, [Hubert] Humphrey and Clinton. But the Democratic Party has changed."

Mr. Zucker defected to the Republican Party after the September 11 attacks, supported President Bush in 2004 and has become more vocal in his beliefs -- disregarding the possible impact on his career in Hollywood, a liberal haven.

Mr. Zucker, 58, said he's tired of Democrats calls for "talk, talk, talk" and looking to the United Nations to solve the world's most tangled problems.

Hollywood happily forgives druggy actors and boozy directors, "but I don't think a Republican can be rehabbed," Mr. Zucker said.

Mr. Zucker made an ad attacking Massachusetts Democratic Sen. John Kerry in 2004, appeared on a few talk shows to discuss his political conversion and "fell in with the dark side," quipped his brother Jerry Zucker,co-director of "Airplane" and director of "Ghost."

The RNC asked Mr. Zucker to make the new spoof ads because of his "stellar reputation and high-quality production," said Tara Wall, RNC director of outreach communications.

Like his movies, the Internet spots that Mr. Zucker directed and co-wrote employ fast-paced, gag-a-second slapstick humor that has made him a king of spoof.

One of Mr. Zucker's ads -- funded by the RNC and now available on YouTube.com and an RNC parody site called "America Weakly" -- spoofs the Democrats' reputation as the party of tax-and-spend liberals.

It opens with a shot of a couple peacefully sleeping in bed. A narrator's voice interrupts the calm: "What if you woke up a year from today, the Democrats had taken over, and you were able to see their new taxes?"

Suddenly, a man in a dark suit, the Democratic tax man, appears in the bedroom and holds out his hand for a payoff. He shows up again and again. He hits up a woman who has just given birth, and even demands payment from her newborn. The 90-second spot ends with an army of ominous-looking Democratic tax men, briefcases in hand, marching down the street like some spooky army.

The RNC rejected a second Zucker spot that mocked the Democrats as weak on defense. The controversial ad, which has leaked to YouTube.com, features a Madeleine Albright look-alike handing a basketball autographed by Michael Jordan to North Korean leader Kim Jong-il, an event that actually took place in 2000.

"The Democrats' thoughtful gift had two major results," an ominous voiceover says. Suddenly, an image of a nuclear missile being fired followed flashes on the screen, followed by Mr. Kim doing a reverse dunk.

Republican political strategist Arnold Steinberg thinks such funny ads "can be very effective.". Humorous spots, he said could generate lots of press, thereby broadcasting Mr. Zucker's message to an audience beyond the Internet.

Having spent nearly 30 years spoofing police dramas, disaster flicks and horror films, beginning with the 1977 cult-classic, "The Kentucky Friend Movie," Mr. Zucker now wants to turn his withering satirical eye to politics.

Without divulging too many details, Mr. Zucker said he plans to make a film lampooning politics, sandwiched between a super-heroes spoof and "Scary Movie 5."

"You have people like Michael Moore going into foreign countries saying Americans are the stupidest people in the world," said Mr. Zucker, a father of a 4-year-old daughter and 6-year-old son.

"I want to tell the real America story, that America is a force for good."

Allen Blasts Webb Novels For Sex Scenes (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Tim Craig, Washington Post Staff Writers

DOJ_NMG_0088508

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Veteran Says Works Reflect Trauma of War

RICHMOND, Oct. 27 -- Virginia Sen. George Allen (R) has accused his Democratic opponent, James Webb, of writing inappropriate sex scenes and demeaning descriptions of women in his fictional books, the latest character attack in a close and nasty campaign.

With 10 days remaining before Election Day, the allegations about sex-laced passages in Webb's writings inject a new question into a campaign that has centered almost exclusively on character issues: Should the author of a fictional work who runs for office be personally held to account for the scenes in his books?

Webb, a former U.S. Navy secretary, responded angrily Friday on Washington Post Radio, defending his novels as "serious" works and calling Allen's attack part of the senator's negative campaign that is devoid of ideas. "To take these things out and pull excerpts out and force them on people . . . is just a classic example of the way this campaign is run," Webb said. "Literature is literature. I've made my career as a novelist. George Allen doesn't have a record to run on."

Webb's books, including "Lost Soldiers," "Something to Die For" and "Fields of Fire," are historical novels that describe wartime horrors in Vietnam and people dealing with the aftermath of combat. Webb is a decorated Marine who served in Vietnam.

Allen campaign officials provided excerpts from the books -- some of them depicting acts of incest and graphic sexuality -- to the Drudge Report Web site Thursday night. Matt Drudge's Internet blog often breaks or promotes stories with sensational angles, most recently the scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.). Allen's aides, who have been trying to get other news organizations to write about the excerpts for weeks, issued statements saying the fictional scenes in Webb's novels reflect poorly on Webb's character and fitness for office.

Allen told reporters after a campaign stop in Harrisonburg that Webb's books are demeaning to women. "My opponent hasn't been in public office," he said. "But he talks about the books he's written and his creative writing, his novels. Those are some of his writings. . . . People can make that judgment."

Allen's aides would not say whether the senator had read Webb's books. They said he did not know about the books' contents six years ago, when he accepted Webb's endorsement for his first Senate campaign.

Webb said the graphic scenes in his novels, many of which are set in wartime, are taken out of context and do not accurately reflect the books or their content: combat. He said he has written about disturbing scenes that he witnessed on the battlefield or as a journalist in Southeast Asia.

"It is an observation about how the human species lives," Webb said after Mark Plotkin, the radio show's host, read one of the more lurid passages, prompting objections from the candidate.

Webb told Plotkin that listeners should read a book by Allen's sister, Jennifer, who described her brother's harsh physical treatment toward her. He also shot back that Vice President Cheney's wife, Lynne, wrote a novel, "Sisters," which contains scenes of rape and a lesbian love affair. "You can read Lynne Cheney's lesbian love scenes if you want to get graphic on stuff," he said.

In an interview later on CNN, Cheney declared Webb to be "full of baloney" and denied that she wrote anything in "Sisters" that is sexually explicit.

"His novels are full of sexually explicit references to incest -- sexually explicit references," she said.

Her book is out of print and difficult to find, but independent reviews describe it as highly sexual and "steamy" and mention lesbian characters.

Allen's attack on Webb's novels occurred three weeks after the senator gave a two-minute speech pleading for a return to issues after having defended himself against personal-character scandals for months. "The negative personal attacks and baseless allegations have also pulled us away from what you expect and deserve," Allen told voters in the unusual paid television commercial.

By Friday morning, however, the new allegations unleashed by his campaign had become the highlight of morning talk-radio shows and cable news outlets. Conservative groups seized on the news, with one calling for Webb to withdraw for writing "Triple X" novels. Cable news shows debated the issue throughout the day.

DOJ_NMG_0088509

Several Web sites and blogs printed the passages. One, from "Fields of Fire," was: "He saw the invitation with every bouncing breast and curved hip. . . . He was thirteen. . . . She was fifteen. . . ." Another was about a man seeing his mother: "She was naked underneath the robe . . . and the robe fell loosely away, revealing her."

Kay James, an Allen campaign adviser, criticized the writings: "How can women trust Jim Webb to represent their views in the Senate when chauvinistic attitudes and sexually exploitative references run throughout his fiction and nonfiction writings?"

Webb's allies rushed to his defense, saying the attempt to criticize an author for scenes in a work of fiction reflects a Republican campaign in Virginia that is in disarray and desperately searching for a way to win at any cost.

Steve Jarding, a senior Webb adviser, said Allen's lack of wartime experience disqualifies him from commenting on Webb's novels.

"Senator, you have not earned the right to question Jim Webb's wartime experiences," Jarding said. "Perhaps if you had gone to Vietnam and served as a company commander instead of serving as a [cattle] driver at a dude ranch . . . you would temper your feigned indignation."

Best-selling author John Grisham, who with Stephen King held a fundraiser for Webb in Charlottesville, said Friday in an interview: "This is a clear sign of a desperate campaign if they plow through novels trying to find evidence of character. I seriously doubt George Allen is much of a reader, but if he would read more, maybe he would understand the difference between fiction and nonfiction."

Some people said Webb's novels are works of imagination intended to be informative and provide entertainment, not statements of actions that Webb endorses.

Margaret R. Soltan, an English professor at George Washington University, said voters should not regard Webb's novels as indicative of his views, any more than voters in England should have been deterred by some of Winston Churchill's more shocking writing.

"To think along those lines exposes you as a person who has no culture," she said.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a Vietnam war hero who has endorsed Allen, praises "Lost Soldiers" on the book jacket. "It captures well the lingering scars of the war," he says. "A novel of revenge and redemption that tells us much about both where Vietnam is headed and where it has been."

An aide to McCain said Friday she could not reach the senator.

Staff writer Robert Barnes contributed to this report.

Virginia Senate Candidate Attacked Over His Novels (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 27 — The volatile Virginia Senate race took another turn on Friday when the Republican incumbent, George Allen, drew attention to sexually explicit passages from novels written years ago by his Democratic challenger, Jim Webb.

With less than two weeks before Election Day, Mr. Allen, who has been on the defensive because of accusations that he made racially insensitive remarks, issued a news release that quoted the passages and called them “very disturbing for a candidate hoping to represent families of Virginians.”

In the release, titled “Webb’s Weird World,” which was released to and displayed on the Drudge Report Web site, the Allen campaign also asserted that Mr. Webb’s writings were filled with “chauvinistic attitudes and sexually exploitive references.”

Mr. Webb, who was secretary of the Navy in the Reagan administration, has written six novels about the military and wartime, including “Fields of Fire,” an acclaimed 1978 work about the Vietnam War, according to his campaign Web site.

Democrats aligned with the Webb campaign immediately denounced the Allen statement as the act of a desperate politician trying to deflect attention from his own troubles. They also circulated comments by Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, praising one of the novels, “Lost Soldiers,” that the Allen campaign had singled out because it described a provocative scene involving a boy.

DOJ_NMG_0088510

Mr. Webb, a Vietnam veteran, reacted angrily in an interview Friday morning on WTOP radio in Washington when the host asked him about the passages, including one in his novel "Something to Die For" involving a stripper that the host read on the air.

"I don't think that's appropriate for you to read on WTOP," Mr. Webb said, according to The Associated Press.

"There are hundreds of thousands of American servicemen who have been in that environment," he added. "It's an observation about how the human species lives."

Mr. Webb then attacked Mr. Allen personally. "You ought to read what George Allen's sister wrote about him if you want to read about attitudes toward females," he said, alluding to an autobiography by Jennifer Allen in which she describes her brother as a bully who once dragged her upstairs by her hair because she had defied her father at bedtime.

The Allen campaign's effort to draw attention to Mr. Webb's writing comes at a particularly sensitive time, as Washington grapples with the political fallout of the Congressional page scandal involving sexually suggestive messages from a Republican congressman.

Beyond that, the statement from Mr. Allen plays neatly into the campaign's larger effort to portray Mr. Webb as hostile to women. The campaign, for example, recently ran advertising accusing Mr. Webb of insensitivity to women's rights, based on an article Mr. Webb wrote nearly 30 years ago arguing against admitting women to the Naval Academy or combat service.

Mr. Webb has apologized for that article and said that he played a significant role in expanding the number of women in Navy leadership positions while he was in the Reagan administration.

In its latest attack, the Allen camp takes particular issue with the portrayal of women in Mr. Webb's novels, saying female characters are consistently "servile, subordinate, inept, incompetent, promiscuous, perverted, or some combination of these."

Until the start of the general election season, Mr. Allen, who was once considered a front-runner for the party's 2008 presidential nomination, appeared to have a significant edge in his race against Mr. Webb.

But two episodes late this summer renewed questions about racial and ethnic insensitivity that have hung over Mr. Allen.

The first involved his use of the word "macaca" to describe a Democratic operative of Indian descent — a word that critics attacked as a racial slur with origins in the name of a type of monkey.

A few weeks later Mr. Allen, who is Presbyterian, responded angrily when a reporter asked whether his mother had been born Jewish. After that exchange, Mr. Allen later said, his mother told him for the first time that her family was indeed Jewish.

On Friday, Chris LaCivita, a consultant for the Allen campaign, issued a statement that Mr. Webb had extolled his experience as a writer "but has anyone really read what he has written?"

"Some of the references are simply disturbing and continue to show a pattern of disrespectful treatment of women," Mr. LaCivita said.

Democrats, who view the Virginia race as possibly one of the most decisive battles of the midterm election, have been bracing for the Allen campaign to mount an attack based on Mr. Webb's novels.

On Friday, they offered a vigorous defense of Mr. Webb, pointing out that Republican authors like Lynne Cheney and I. Lewis Libby Jr., the vice president's wife and his former chief of staff, have produced sexually explicit novels.

Mr. Libby wrote a thriller, "The Apprentice," that includes references to bestiality, pedophilia and rape; Mrs. Cheney, in turn, published "Sisters," a novel that describes a lesbian love affair.

Kristian Denny Todd, a spokeswoman for the Webb campaign, said that a scene in "Lost Soldiers" that describes a father placing his naked son's penis in his mouth involved a cultural expression of affection that Mr. Webb had witnessed as a journalist in Thailand. "He doesn't get it," she said. "But it's a cultural thing."

Ms. Denny Todd said that fiction writers often wrote about things that they do not condone. She added: "It's fiction."

Webb Hit For Novels' Sex-laced Language (WT)

By Seth Mclaughlin, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

U.S. Senate candidate James H. Webb Jr. faced more criticism yesterday about his characterizations of women, when critics publicized excerpts of his novels, including graphic sexual passages involving women and children.

DOJ_NMG_0088511

"There is nothing that's been in any of my novels that has not been illuminating of the surroundings, or defining a character or moving a plot," said Mr. Webb, a Democrat. "I'm a serious writer."

Andrea Lafferty, executive director of the Traditional Values Coalition, said she was "sickened" by what she had read.

"Democrat or Republican, an individual like that belongs on the couch of a therapist, not on the floor of the United States Senate," she said.

Laura MacLeod, another woman in the Virginia coalition, said she will take Mr. Webb's novel "Lost Soldiers" to "every ballet practice and every soccer game" until the Nov. 7 election.

Mr. Webb's writings started appearing on conservative blog sites as early as Oct. 16, but were not picked up by the press until Thursday night, which prompted the coalition to hold a press conference yesterday outside Mr. Webb's office in Arlington.

The passages come from five of Mr. Webb's wartime novels, starting with "Fields of Fire" in 1978. The excerpts include pedophilia, acrobatic young strippers and the homosexual behavior of guards at a prison in Vietnam.

The women said Mr. Webb's character is a bigger issue than the Iraq war and that the content of Mr. Webb's work was worse than the sexually explicit e-mails Rep. Mark Foley, Florida Republican, sent to congressional pages.

Mr. Webb said he was warned by friends before entering the race that the 2 million words he has published made him an opposition researcher's dream and that they would be taken out of context to be used against him.

Excerpts were read yesterday morning on the Don Imus radio show on MSNBC and on The Washington Post radio show "The Politics Program With Mark Plotkin," despite Mr. Webb saying that would be inappropriate and that people chose to read his novels.

"Some of Webb's writings are very disturbing for a candidate hoping to represent the families of Virginians in the U.S. Senate," the campaign of incumbent Sen. George Allen, a Republican, stated in a press release. "Webb's novels disturbingly and consistently -- indeed, almost uniformly -- portray women as servile, subordinate, inept, incompetent, promiscuous, perverted or some combination of these."

Webb adviser Steve Jarding responded by saying: "Senator, you have not earned the right to question Jim Webb's wartime experiences, from the ugliness of combat to the ugliness of what happens to civilians in nations ravaged by war. Senator, Jim Webb wrote of things he witnessed. They may have been ugly, but we should learn from their ugliness about the consequences of our votes and actions before we send men and women into war."

The Allen campaign could not be reached for further comment.

Mr. Webb, 60, has been criticized for his views on women since the beginning of the race, particularly for an article he wrote in 1977 that questioned a woman's place at the U.S. Naval Academy.

The criticism yesterday was the latest personal attack in a campaign that has focused more on character than policy issues.

Mr. Allen seemed poised to get the race back on course when he aired a rare, two-minute TV address asking that the final weeks focus only on the major issues, including fighting international terrorism.

But Mr. Allen has continued to run ads hammering Mr. Webb's character, and the Webb campaign has responded.

In August, Mr. Allen, 54, was videotaped at a campaign stop calling an Indian-American volunteer for the Webb campaign "macaca." And former classmates at the University of Virginia have said he used the "n-word" while attending school there in the 1970s.

The coalition's small press conference yesterday sparked a strong reaction from a Webb volunteer going to the headquarters.

"What is outrageous is that the guys who are dying in Iraq and Afghanistan, that's the tragedy," Pat Heineman, the mother of an Army National Guardsman who spent a year in Afghanistan, said to the women.

'Brothels, Sex Kittens, Pedophilia?' (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

Republicans panicking is not a pretty sight.

DOJ_NMG_0088512

Candidates around the country have been race-baiting, gay-baiting, Michael J. Fox-baiting and Hispanic-baiting. But now it has come to this: Republicans are novel-baiting.

Still trying to recover his balance, after slipping on a macaca and admitting he was a Jewish bubba, one criticized for using racist language, displaying a Confederate flag at home and keeping a hangman's noose at his old law office, Senator George Allen of Virginia unleashed a vicious attack on Jim Webb Thursday night. He called him a fiction writer.

Senator Macacawitz, as he is now known in Washington, sent the cyber- gossip Matt Drudge a press release called "Webb's Weird World." It featured racy quotes from his rival's novels and the contention that they were "very disturbing for a candidate hoping to represent the families of Virginians." It said Mr. Webb's novels about the military and war portrayed women as "servile, subordinate, inept, incompetent, promiscuous, perverted, or some combination of these."

Excerpts from Webb novels included passages in which a man performs a sexual act on his son; a "naked young stripper" performs a sexual act on a banana, and male guards at a Vietnamese prison camp perform a sexual act on each other.

"There is nothing that's been in any of my novels that, in my view, hasn't been either illuminating surroundings or defining a character or moving a plot," Mr. Webb said on Washington Post radio yesterday.

Mr. Webb, a 60-year-old former Republican and Vietnam vet who was President Reagan's secretary of the Navy, was already defending himself for a 1979 magazine article called "Women Can't Fight," in which he called a Naval Academy dorm a "horny woman's dream."

He bridled at the latest attack, snapping, "You ought to read what George Allen's sister wrote about him if you want to read about attitudes toward females." Mr. Allen's younger sister, Jennifer, wrote a memoir in which she described her brother pulling a Michael Jackson and dangling her over a railing at Niagara Falls, and slamming a pool cue against her boyfriend's head. (She later said the pool-cue story was a joke, calling the book a novelization of the past.)

So the Old Dominion race now comes down to one guy denying he's a racist and the other denying he's a sexist, and the supposed sexist attacking the supposed racist as a sexist. Webb's campaign sent out a press release yesterday noting that Mr. Allen nearly joined a males-only country club in the '90s, when he was Virginia's governor, and opposed co-education at the Virginia Military Institute.

Women make up half of all Virginia voters, so it's a good bet they will determine who wins the race between two candidates who "exude machismo," as The Washington Post put it: "James Webb, the marine firing his M50 antitank rifles in the jungles of Vietnam, and George Allen, the tobacco-chewing cowboy who as governor once stirred G.O.P. delegates with this line about Democrats: 'Let's enjoy knocking their soft teeth down their whining throats.' "

The Republicans' usual trick — having Dick Cheney terrify women into thinking that terrorists will kill their children if they vote for girly Democrats — isn't flying this year, so now the G.O.P. is resorting to more personal, and goofy, attacks.

Senator Allen may be able to hurt Mr. Webb, especially if he prints up all the steamy quotes on fliers and puts them on the windshields of Virginia churchgoers on Sunday.

Gary Hart, who used to write novels with another former senator, William Cohen, once told me that politicians are suspicious of other pols who read novels, much less write them. "They thought I was strange," he said, "because I was caught reading Tolstoy and Kierkegaard."

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee fought back yesterday by putting out excerpts from G.O.P. pulp fiction. "Brothels, sex kittens, pedophilia?" they began their sampling of Republican scribblers, including Lynne Cheney, Newt Gingrich and Scooter Libby.

The Democrats also turned up a romance novel by Susan Combs, a Republican candidate for Texas comptroller. Ms. Combs wrote "A Perfect Match" about "a freckle-faced brunette," a cryptologist from the National Security Agency who falls for her "gray-eyed bodyguard" with his "powerful, strong arms" and his erotic pistol-cleaning technique. She desired him to "fill the aching void at her center" where a "deep heaviness throbbed in her belly."

It's what the Democrats' candidate, Jim Webb, would diplomatically call "a horny woman's dream."

Hot-Button Social Issues Dim In Ohio Senate Race (WP)

By Stephen Koff And Bill Sloat, Religion News Service

DOJ_NMG_0088513

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Economy, War Have Grabbed Voters' Attention

SPRINGFIELD, Ohio -- Russell Mossbarger, a Republican regular, saw President Bush in 2004 as a man who reflected his own moral and Christian beliefs. But then, he says, his party overplayed its churchiness.

"People got tired of it all the time," said Mossbarger, 71, in a bowling alley near Springfield, a small industrial city that is one of Ohio's bellwether communities. "They wore it out, I think."

A Free Will Baptist, Mossbarger wears a ball cap with the U.S. flag. He worries that politicians will try to take "under God" out of the Pledge of Allegiance.

"But this year, other issues are more important," he said. "Jobs are leaving the country. There's war. It's doubtful the Pledge of Allegiance is more important right now."

Two years after Republicans fused love of God and love of country into such a potent political message in Ohio that national Democrats were discombobulated, the combination of patriotic and religious fervor seems dimmed. Now, with a midterm election approaching and one of the hottest Senate races in the country being waged, not much is being said on the campaign trail about the "three G's" -- gays, guns and God -- in any part of Ohio. Here in the southwestern part of the state, barely a peep is heard about abortion or other social issues.

"Actually, I'm not hearing anything. You just hear the usual kind of stuff, like the economy," said Linda S. Rosicka, Clark County's elections director.

Whether the primacy of social issues was overstated in 2004, those issues have largely fallen off the stump in this year's election. When they do come up, it's usually in ways that are less public, such as in gatherings of Christian conservatives supporting Republican Ken Blackwell's gubernatorial campaign.

Sen. Mike DeWine (R), an ardent foe of abortion, hasn't launched any ads or campaign offensives using social issues, but he says he talks about them when asked. He didn't hesitate in an interview to criticize his opponent, Rep. Sherrod Brown (D), on one such issue, saying Brown has failed repeatedly to vote to outlaw late-term or what opponents call "partial birth" abortion.

"There are fundamental differences between Congressman Brown and myself, and one of the fundamental differences is he voted to continue to practice partial-birth abortion," DeWine said.

Brown's campaign says that's because the bill did not allow an exception for the health of the mother.

Social issues still could become crucial behind the scenes in coming weeks, when interest groups try to motivate members to vote for the sake of balance on the Supreme Court or constitutional battles over abortion rights.

But voters rarely hear those issues mentioned in political speeches, in political news stories and commercials, even in talk around the town square. The reason is pretty simple, political experts say: It's the economy. And the war in Iraq. And the war on terrorism.

"They're hearing the news every day about Iraq, they're getting their paycheck every week" and making decisions about taxes, said Brian Nienaber, a vice president of the Tarrance Group, a Republican-leaning Washington polling firm. "In times of war, it is hard to think, 'What kind of social direction should our country be taking?' " he said.

Celinda Lake, a Democratic pollster, says evangelical voters still care deeply about social issues. But, Lake said, "the next tier of voters, the kind of blue-collar, exurban voters who take their kids regularly to church, they're really economically hard-pressed."

Of course, abortion, same-sex marriage, gun rights and fights over religious symbols and words are not the only social issues that can light up a campaign. The minimum wage goes to the heart of a social issue, says the campaign of Brown, the Senate candidate.

"He's met and held events with ministers and pastors across the state in churches on those issues," said Brown spokesman Ben LaBolt. "He believes it's a moral imperative to support working people."

DeWine also supports a ballot measure to raise Ohio's minimum wage.

Back in Springfield, inside a used-car dealership, Barbara Courtney, a Democrat, says hot-button social issues subsided after the 2004 election, when voters approved a state constitutional ban on same-sex marriage.

DOJ_NMG_0088514

"The voters stopped it, and there are other things on people's minds now than all that this year. There's a war, and it hasn't stopped. It's still going on. There are so many people unemployed," she said.

"They aren't praying to stop the gays," she said. "They are praying for work."

Evangelicals Fire Up The Faithful (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

Even Those Disappointed With Republicans Seek To Turn Out the Vote

SHARONVILLE, Ohio -- If Republicans still have an ace up their sleeve in this fall campaign, it's people like Phil Burress.

Mr. Burress, a thrice-married, self-described former pornography addict, is president of Citizens for Community Values, a statewide network of politically active Christian conservatives. His work here in 2004 helped turn out evangelical voters who put President Bush over the top in Ohio -- the state that made the difference between victory and defeat.

This time around, Mr. Burress isn't nearly so happy with the president and his party. In fact, he can hardly say enough about how fed up he is with Republicans from Columbus to Washington for not following through on promised social initiatives. He is especially exercised about Ohio's Republican Sen. Mike DeWine, who incensed conservatives last year by helping to broker a compromise with Democrats over confirming the president's judicial nominees.

So what is his advice to others? Hold your nose and vote. And that includes voting for Mr. DeWine, whose fate could determine whether Republicans keep control of the Senate.

That attitude represents an important firewall for the Republican Party at a time when most polls and independent analysts forecast big midterm election losses Nov. 7, threatening the party's majorities in Congress, the governorships and some state legislatures. Republicans worry that religious conservatives, so critical to Republicans' wins of recent years, will stay home this time.

But a look at the movement in Ohio suggests otherwise. The turnout machine that has pulled evangelical conservatives to the polls in massive numbers is churning away, and for a reason little appreciated outside their circles: the sense that voting is their Christian duty. Ron Martin, pastor of Cincinnati's Central Parkway Ministries just south of here, is typical when he tells his church members, worn Bible in hand, "You have a moral obligation to vote." And because such voters' litmus-test issues are abortion and gay marriage, that typically means vote Republican.

Earlier this month, Mr. Burress's organization sent a million voter guides to 7,500 churches statewide for distribution in Sunday bulletins. The guide refers voters to the group's election Web site, where they can type their zip code and see all candidates who will be on their ballots, alongside each candidate's stance on abortion, marriage, pornography and other social issues. Those guides are based on candidates' responses to a questionnaire. Many Democrats, and moderate Republicans, didn't respond; the site notes that.

The 64-year-old Mr. Burress is an essential player in the Bush-era Republican Party's vaunted get-out-the-vote machine. In 2004, he led the drive to put on the Ohio ballot a state constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriages and civil unions. Then he put his organization, based in this conservative Cincinnati suburb, to work registering tens of thousands of new voters to support the amendment.

Those voters turned out and, by and large, also cast ballots for President Bush. On election night, as the battle between Mr. Bush and Sen. John Kerry swung back and forth, Ohio emerged as the state that would decide the outcome. By morning, it had gone Mr. Bush's way -- tipped by a wave of Christian conservative voters larger than expected. Bush strategist Karl Rove calls him one of the party's "spark plugs."

Now, late in this year's campaigns, a new controversy over gay marriage is energizing conservative Christian voters. New Jersey's Supreme Court, in a closely watched case, on Wednesday declared the state has to give same-sex couples the same rights and benefits as those granted to married heterosexuals. Within an hour of the news, the ruling set off a series of conference calls among Christian conservative leaders, including Mr. Burress.

"In the Christian conservative movement, it's created a shock wave," says Harry Jackson Jr., a Pentecostal bishop in Lanham, Md. He, like Mr. Burress, is a board member of the Arlington Group, a national network of conservative religious leaders. "This is probably the best possible thing that could have happened to the moral values movement two weeks before the election," he says.

DOJ_NMG_0088515

Mr. Burress absorbs all this from behind his desk 500 miles from Washington, D.C. Like others on the religious right, Mr. Burress has had his faith in Republicans shaken by scandals and unfulfilled promises to push harder for a federal amendment against same-sex marriage. And that was before the recent shock over Florida Rep. Mark Foley's improper email messages to young male pages in the House, and reports that Republican leaders failed to heed warnings about them. Then came a book from a former White House aide, alleging that administration officials call evangelicals "nuts" and, with the president's acquiescence, stymie faith-based social initiatives he has long publicly espoused. The White House disputes those claims.

Yet Mr. Burress gets excited when talk turns to his get-out-the-vote efforts. He recently got a call from Pastor Martin, who operates ministries for the poor and homeless in central Cincinnati. The pastor was so vexed at Sen. DeWine that he confessed he might vote for the Democrat, Rep. Sherrod Brown.

"You're not going to vote against DeWine, are you?" Mr. Burress protested. "Let me tell you about Sherrod Brown!" He went on to dismiss the Democrat as a pro-abortion, pro-gay-marriage liberal. And he pointed out that re-electing Mr. DeWine is crucial to keeping a Republican-majority Senate to confirm the president's conservative court nominees. The pastor was converted.

Exit polls of 2004 voters underscored the importance of Christian conservatives to Republicans. Nearly a quarter of all voters were white evangelical born-again Christians. Eight out of ten voted for Mr. Bush. The rest of the electorate went to Democrat John Kerry, 56% to 43%. In a nonpresidential election, turnout falls for all groups. But Mr. Rove predicts evangelicals' turnout "will be substantial," on par with the 2002 midterm when Republicans made gains.

The latest Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll shows Republican voters overall are less interested in the election than Democrats are. But it also shows conservative Republicans far more engaged than nonconservatives. Moderate Republicans have been more disillusioned by spiraling spending, scandals, the war and a sense that the party panders to religious conservatives on social issues.

Recently Mr. Burress traveled to Grand Rapids, Mich., for a conference of nearly 2,000 of the country's leading social conservatives. Attendees were upbeat, he says, galvanized by the stakes in the election. With Bush appointees John Roberts and Samuel Alito on the Supreme Court, "the values voters understand that the next Supreme Court vote could be the one to outlaw abortion," he says.

James Dobson, one of Christian conservatives' foremost national leaders, has held rallies in several cities this fall. In St. Paul, Minn., just after the Foley news broke, he said it made for "a hard day" and he remained "very irritated and disappointed with the Republican Party" for failing to deliver on conservatives' issues. But he urged 2,000-plus listeners, "If you can find a politician who understands the institution of the family...it would be a sin not to vote for him."

His group, Focus on the Family, and another, the Family Research Council, recently released a "Vote Scorecard" for Congress, rating members based on their stances on abortion, judicial nominations, gay marriage and stem-cell research. Every embattled Senate Republican save one -- Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island -- is given a perfect score. So are many at-risk House Republicans.

Paul Weyrich, who founded the Christian conservative movement with the Rev. Jerry Falwell, says he recently had a conference call with Christian conservatives from Pennsylvania to rally support for Republican Sen. Rick Santorum. He says evangelicals there "are highly motivated for Santorum. Polls showing him way behind don't bother them."

Like evangelicals elsewhere, those in Pennsylvania are circulating voter guides, working phone banks and going door-to-door. The Santorum campaign sends regular emails to evangelical voters, with video links. While it may not be enough to save the senator, given his unpopularity with independents and moderate Republicans, party leaders say a healthy turnout of evangelicals could make the difference for several House members.

In Tennessee, by contrast, Christian conservatives are cool to Republican Senate nominee Bob Corker, skeptical of his claims to oppose abortion rights. Tennessee Right to Life declined to endorse him, even though Democrat Harold Ford favors abortion rights. Yet the antiabortion group's leader said in a statement, "We'll be very busy on other races."

What will bring many out in Tennessee and seven other states are amendments to ban same-sex marriage. In 2004, similar proposals in 11 states proved a magnet for evangelical voters.

DOJ_NMG_0088516

In Missouri, Christian conservatives are mobilized against a proposal favoring stem-cell research. Republicans are banking on these conservatives to also vote for embattled Sen. Jim Talent. He had alienated them by vacillating on the issue. Party leaders are rallying evangelicals with pleas to defeat the pro-abortion rights Democrat, Claire McCaskill, and keep the Senate in Republicans' control.

Here in Ohio, a pro-gambling initiative will draw evangelicals hoping to kill it. They are also excited about Republican gubernatorial candidate Ken Blackwell. In 2004, he was the only Republican leader to support Ohio's successful amendment banning same-sex marriage.

The alliance of religious conservatives and Republicans has come under strain in Ohio. Scandals have touched a number of officials including Republican Gov. Bob Taft. Congress's Jack Abramoff influence-peddling case recently claimed Ohio Republican Rep. Bob Ney, who pled guilty to corruption charges.

"This is what we worked for, to have this?" asks Mr. Burress.

He has other complaints. In Columbus, the Republican-led state Senate gutted a bill his group supported to restrict strip clubs, he says, while in Washington the president works hard on economic conservatives' priorities -- overhauling Social Security and cutting taxes -- but hardly at all against same-sex marriage. For that, Mr. Burress and other conservatives blame Mr. Rove, the president's strategist.

Tensions flared in a conference call several months ago between Christian conservative leaders and Mr. Rove. According to participants, Mr. Rove argued the marriage amendments weren't decisive in Mr. Bush's re-election. Provoked, Mr. Burress approached the speaker phone.

"Mr. Rove, this is Phil Burress. Are you trying to tell me that the president would have won Ohio if the marriage amendment had not been on the ballot?" Bishop Jackson, who is African-American, similarly upbraided Mr. Rove: "Sir, I am part of this group because I grew weary of the Democratic Party taking blacks for granted."

In an interview, Mr. Rove says his point was that Christian conservatives in all states -- not just those with marriage initiatives -- came out in greater numbers in 2004 than in 2000. That reflected general outrage about a Massachusetts court decision favoring same-sex marriage, he says, and conservatives' sense the president is on their side.

Next to Mr. Rove, only Mr. DeWine comes in for harsher criticism from Mr. Burress. "Sen. DeWine has been wrong on so many of the family issues," he says, dropping a two-inch-thick binder of research.

But then Mr. Burress says that Mr. DeWine, father of eight, is "a great family man, a pro-lifer to the bone. That's why we keep him." And with that, he is back again to the forces that keep him and other Christian conservatives politically active -- and voting Republican.

Write to Jackie Calmes at jackie.calmes@wsj.com1

'The Daily Show' Swinging Into Ohio (AP)

AP, October 28, 2006

COLUMBUS, Ohio (AP) -- Comedian Jon Stewart will make a special preview appearance Saturday as Comedy Central's "The Daily Show" gears up for a week of broadcasts from Ohio.

Stewart said the Saturday event will be at Value City Arena, an appearance added after spaces for the four nights of tapings at Ohio State University's more intimate Roy Bowen Theatre filled up.

The Ohio "Midwest Midterm Midtacular" excursion marks the popular news parody show's fifth trip outside New York in 10 years, but its first to "a random zone" outside a big city on the East or West Coast, Stewart said in an interview with The Associated Press.

"We wanted to go there because Ohio was so crucial last time. They were sort of the focal point, the swing state, if you will," he said. "We want to know what happened to all that loving attention that they were given in 2004, and if they feel lonely."

Asked if he would be laughing at Ohio or with Ohio, Stewart equivocated.

"First of all, I didn't realize Ohio was laughing. I was not aware of that," he said. "We will be laughing with parts of Ohio at other parts of Ohio. But I won't say which ones."

DOJ_NMG_0088517

Cleveland Cavaliers star LeBron James -- whom Stewart called "for all intents and purposes, the king of Ohio" -- will be the featured guest on opening night Monday.

Stewart said many of the big-name politicians the show approached -- including U.S. Sens. George Voinovich and Mike DeWine, Gov. Bob Taft and gubernatorial candidates Ted Strickland and Ken Blackwell -- declined.

As for Taft, he said, "We had a shot at him for a bit there. Then we realized that his approval ratings actually make Cheney seem likable."

Judge Approves Ohio Rules On Voter Surveys (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Oct. 27 (AP) — A federal judge who had struck down state rules on conducting surveys of voters leaving polling places ruled Friday that revised guidelines for the practice were legal, rejecting a call for clarification by the national news media.

ABC, CNN, CBS, Fox News, NBC and The Associated Press sued Monday, arguing that Secretary of State J. Kenneth Blackwell's latest directive, which stated that loitering and delaying voters were prohibited, was confusing. Later, and in smaller type, Mr. Blackwell's order noted that the polling practice was legal.

The judge, Michael H. Watson of Federal District Court, ordered the new rules last month when he struck down Mr. Blackwell's 2004 order against polling voters within 100 feet of a voting place.

The news outlets had asked Judge Watson to spell out the rules for county election boards and to force Mr. Blackwell to post them so members of the news media could interview voters leaving polling places on Nov. 7.

In his decision Friday, Judge Watson needled Mr. Blackwell's office for noting the judge's earlier decree in smaller type but said the posting was still legal.

The news media group has jointly conducted surveys of voters leaving polling places for numerous elections, using results to project winners and to analyze political and social trends.

A Candidate's Sister Steps In To Defend Him On Stem Cell Issue (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

This 30-second television advertisement for Michael Steele, the Republican candidate for Senate in Maryland, is running in Washington and Maryland. It features his sister, Dr. Monica Turner, a pediatrician. The spot is in response to an advertisement for his Democratic opponent, Representative Benjamin L. Cardin, in which the actor Michael J. Fox, who has Parkinson's disease, accuses Mr. Steele of wanting to "put limits on the most promising stem cell research."

PRODUCER — OnMessage Inc.

THE SCRIPT — Mr. Steele says: "I'm Michael Steele, and I approve this message." Dr. Turner says: "I'm Dr. Monica Turner. Congressman Ben Cardin is attacking Michael Steele with deceptive, tasteless ads. He is using the victim of a terrible disease to frighten people all for his own political gain. Mr. Cardin should be ashamed. There's something you should know about Michael Steele. He does support stem cell research, and he cares deeply for those who suffer from disease. How do I know? I'm Michael Steele's little sister. I have M.S., and I know he cares about me."

ON THE SCREEN — The spot opens with images of Mr. Steele, the lieutenant governor, wading through a crowd. It then moves on to his sister, sitting in a brightly lit and austere living room. Dr. Turner, who exhibits no signs of multiple sclerosis, is in a chair, speaking directly into the camera.

ACCURACY — Mr. Steele's campaign says he supports stem cell research that does not require the destruction of embryos. Mr. Fox has recently taken issue with people calling him "a victim," and has dismissed accusations that he has been used by politicians like Mr. Cardin who have featured him in their advertisements this year.

SCORECARD — The Cardin advertisement with Mr. Fox was a powerful repudiation of Mr. Steele, given by one of the nation's leading advocates for stem cell research. But Mr. Steele's sister would seem no less effective in this ad defending her brother, in calm but firm terms. These two campaigns should perhaps return to their earlier advertising duel, over puppies. Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0088518

Steele mockingly implied Mr. Cardin's ads made the Republican out to be such a monster that he hated puppies, and so Mr. Steele appeared in a commercial with one; Mr. Cardin's campaign responded with an ad saying Mr. Steele might like puppies, but he liked President Bush more. JIM RUTENBERG

Third-party Zeese Won't 'Be A Spoiler' (WT)

By S.a. Miller, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

Third-party candidate Kevin B. Zeese said yesterday his long-shot run for U.S. Senate in Maryland is gaining momentum because of gaffes by the Democratic nominee, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin.

Mr. Zeese, the nominee of the Green, Libertarian and Populist parties, said Mr. Cardin "committed political suicide" by skipping a debate Thursday in Charles County sponsored by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

"He chose to offend a key voting block," Mr. Zeese told The Washington Times.

Mr. Zeese, 51, said the pull-out will send ripples of disapproval through the statewide NAACP meeting today in Baltimore and compound resentment about the lack of black candidates at the top of the Democratic ticket.

"It shows a lack of confidence and a willingness to hide rather than confront issues," he said.

Mr. Zeese also said he benefited when Mr. Cardin stumbled and stammered through a televised debate Wednesday when confronted by the Republican nominee, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele.

Mr. Cardin declined to respond.

Recent polls show Mr. Cardin and Mr. Steele in a dead heat, with Mr. Zeese garnering about 6 percent of the respondents.

Mr. Zeese bristled at the suggestion that he could cost Mr. Cardin the election by fracturing the congressman's liberal voter base.

"I'm certainly not going to be a spoiler," he said. "It is a question of people hearing me. If they hear me, I'll win."

Mr. Zeese and Mr. Cardin are scheduled to debate at the NAACP's meeting today. Mr. Steele had not committed to attending.

Black voters could decide the election. They account for about 40 percent of Democratic voters in Maryland, where registered Democrats outnumber Republicans nearly 2-to-1.

Mr. Cardin, 63, has struggled to woo black voters amid criticism that the state Democratic Party blocked the candidacy of former NAACP leader Kweisi Mfume, who narrowly lost the primary despite Mr. Cardin outspending him by about $3 million.

"The black community knows that if it had not been for the Democratic leadership selecting Cardin, then Mfume would be the candidate," Mr. Zeese said.

Mr. Steele, 48, the first black elected to statewide office in Maryland, has the potential to break the Democratic lock on black voters and has helped make his party competitive in the state for the first time in a generation.

However, Mr. Zeese, who lives in Takoma Park and is the director of the District-based anti-war group DemocracyRising.US, said his anti-establishment message is more in tune with Maryland's political aesthetic.

"Both of the other candidates are, in my view, exactly what is wrong with politics in America," he said. "Both are special-interest funded and put corporate interests before the people's interests. My views are more consistent with the views of Maryland voters, [and] African Americans will get more from my agenda than from Steele's agenda."

Mr. Zeese proposes a complete withdraw of U.S. troops from Iraq within six months, the elimination of income tax on the first $100,000 earned, universal health care and government-paid college tuition for all citizens.

Mr. Zeese, who concedes that his limited funding and inability to air TV ads has hampered his run, said he will spread his message with grass-roots campaigning at grocery stores, Metro stations and house parties until the Nov. 7 election.

He will participate in an anti-war rally today in Annapolis.

Mr. Zeese frequently criticizes Mr. Cardin's record on the Iraq war, faulting the 10-term congressman for running as an anti-war candidate after repeatedly voting to fund the war and voting against a bill that would have required President Bush to offer an exit strategy.

DOJ_NMG_0088519

Mr. Cardin has made his vote against the Iraq invasion the cornerstone of his campaign and cites it as the chief example of how he "stood up to President Bush."

Mr. Cardin has declined to respond to Mr. Zeese and continues to focus on his run against Mr. Steele.

"Cardin is an insecure guy," Mr. Zeese said. "He is running away from his record [and] the inconsistencies between his rhetoric and his record. ... He is misleading the voters."

Bloomberg Sends Troops To Help Lieberman (NYT)

By Diane Cardwell

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

In his battle for re-election to the United States Senate without the backing of the Democratic Party, Joseph I. Lieberman is deploying a secret weapon in the race's closing days: a sophisticated operation to identify and turn out voters, courtesy of Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg.

The Bloomberg group includes several top-level operatives who played key roles in the mayor's decisive re-election last year or who are in the administration, and have taken leaves from their jobs to work on Mr. Lieberman's campaign.

Since Mr. Lieberman lost the Democratic primary in Connecticut to Ned Lamont, they have helped open campaign offices, devised a strategy to reach voters and are corralling enough volunteers to cover 2,800 shifts at more than 700 polling sites on Election Day, Nov. 7.

Given that Mr. Lieberman does not have a party apparatus to help build his field operation, the efforts of the Bloomberg team could prove critical in one of the most closely watched races in the nation.

"There is no independent network," said Stu Loeser, Mr. Bloomberg's chief spokesman, who played the same role in the re-election effort. "To a certain extent, we were the last independent campaign."

The workers on loan are the most vivid example yet of how Mr. Bloomberg, a Republican who often breaks with his party on issues, could build a permanent political apparatus to support like-minded independent candidates across the country — if not a national bid for himself.

With his 2005 re-election campaign behind him, Mr. Bloomberg has been relishing his role as kingmaker, endorsing Gov. Rod Blagojevich in Illinois and Gov. M. Jodi Rell in Connecticut, raising money for Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger in California and appearing in a television commercial for Representative Christopher Shays in Connecticut. (Mr. Blagojevich is a Democrat, and the others are Republicans.)

But his work for Mr. Lieberman, which includes substantial fund-raising and Mr. Bloomberg's first out-of-state stumping in addition to the gift of manpower, marks his most intense and direct engagement in someone else's political bid. It may not only broaden his image of nonpartisan, influence-free pragmatism, but it could also test how well his political machine can function in an independent campaign with national repercussions.

Just after losing the Democratic primary, Mr. Lieberman's campaign enlisted Josh Isay, who had worked on Mr. Bloomberg's re-election campaign, as the new media consultant. From his administration, the mayor dispatched Korinne Kubena, the chief of staff to Kevin Sheekey, a deputy mayor who oversaw Mr. Bloomberg's two mayoral campaigns, to direct the get-out-the-vote effort for Mr. Lieberman. Brian Honan, who was the deputy field director in the mayoral campaign and now works in the Bloomberg administration's state lobbying operation, is serving as Ms. Kubena's deputy.

Ariel Dvorkin, an administration aide, is helping compile a voter database for Mr. Lieberman; Josh Gold, who was on Mr. Bloomberg's campaign field staff, is now the deputy director of Mr. Lieberman's Stamford campaign office; and Neil Giacobbi, who became chief of staff to City Councilman David Yassky after running the volunteer effort for Mr. Bloomberg, is the director of the Lieberman office in Stamford.

"The mayor has obviously decided to try to make a difference in a few races in which he believes in the candidate," Mr. Sheekey said. "In some places you can help them by doing a fund-raiser in New York, others where you can help by showing up for a day, and others where you can help by putting folks on the ground."

Lieberman aides say that Mr. Bloomberg brings a certain gloss and legitimacy to Connecticut, where he appears to have a strong appeal.

DOJ_NMG_0088520

"He is an icon of independence and straight talk and putting the public interest over party consideration," said Dan Gerstein, Mr. Lieberman's communication director. "He's a great practitioner and advocate for the kind of politics Joe Lieberman practices."

Aides to both men say they have known each other since before Mr. Bloomberg became mayor and admire each other's accomplishments and independent streaks. Described as having a casual, friendly relationship, they have run into each other at events in Washington over the years and have worked together on various issues involving the city, including domestic security.

Capitalizing on all this, the Lieberman campaign plans for Mr. Bloomberg to greet commuters with the senator on Monday morning in Stamford, and to attend a fund-raiser there. Mr. Bloomberg headlined a fund-raiser in Chicago this week, which raised close to $230,000, according to the campaign. He plans to hold a third fund-raiser at his Upper East Side town house on Wednesday.

Lieberman aides say the money the mayor is raising is crucial, but it is the staff additions that represent an unusual degree of engagement for Mr. Bloomberg and show how he has developed his own potent political team to deploy as he wishes.

That team brings with it an approach that has been under development for some time and is similar to the one that President Bush used in his re-election bid in 2004. For Mr. Bloomberg's first bid in 2001, Mr. Sheekey said, the campaign engaged in a targeting operation that merged voter information with consumer data to identify potential supporters and tailor specific messages to them. That method allows campaigns to identify voters by tastes and habits whether or not they live in an area where support for a particular party is strong.

In that 2001 campaign, outreach was primarily through mail and telephone, since the campaign could not recruit a strong contingent of workers on behalf of a political unknown, Mr. Sheekey said.

By 2005, though, the Bloomberg team was able to bolster its voter identification effort with an aggressive operation involving 50,000 workers fanning out through the city to knock on doors and reinforce the mayor's message, Mr. Sheekey said.

With a version of that machine in Connecticut, Mr. Bloomberg's aides are coy about where it might go next, particularly whether to support other like-minded candidates or even the mayor himself.

"There are a lot of things the mayor had done in his campaign which the Lieberman campaign needed," Mr. Sheekey said. "You get involved in races where you want to make a difference and where you can make a difference, in that order."

Anti-war Chafee In Tight Race In R.I. To Keep His Senate Seat (WT)

By Amy Fagan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

Republicans may lose a key Senate seat they've fought fiercely to hang onto this year, as liberal Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee trails his Democratic opponent in Democrat-leaning Rhode Island.

This Senate race, perhaps ironically, has become a referendum on President Bush and the Iraq war, observers say. Though Mr. Chafee often bucks Republicans on issues from taxes to abortion and voted against the Iraq war, Democratic candidate Sheldon Whitehouse has tried to paint him as a boon to the Republican majority and Mr. Bush's agenda -- a theme that seems to have resonated. Mr. Chafee is four to ten percentage points behind in recent polls.

"It has become a referendum on Bush and Iraq and people are blaming Chafee even though he voted against the war. It's one of the most ironic elections," said Darrell West, Brown University political science professor.

According to SurveyUSA's October numbers, Mr. Bush's approval rating in this tiny state, where most voters register as "unaffiliated," is the lowest of all 50 states, at 23 percent.

But Republicans say don't count Mr. Chafee out yet. Earlier this year they gave major time and money to help him fend off a more conservative Republican primary challenger and they succeeded when many thought they wouldn't. They contend they'll repeat that on Nov. 7 because Mr. Chafee is an independent voice who matches well with Rhode Island voters and is within striking distance according to the polls, most of which show him within the margin of error.

"This race is neck and neck right now, but at the end of the day Mr. Chafee is going to meet with success and be re-elected," said Dan Ronayne of the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NSRC). "Our focus needs to be on the choice between the two candidates."

DOJ_NMG_0088521

For his part, Mr. Chafee has fought back against the accusation that he is just another Republican by touting his independence on issues such as Iraq, stem-cell research and taxes. He also is trying to steer the race back to local issues -- running recent ads criticizing Mr. Whitehouse for being soft on corruption as state attorney general.

Some say it is difficult to steer the race back to local issues this year. "In an election that has in many respects become nationalized, it's even harder for Chafee to win," said John Fortier of American Enterprise Institute. "It's not an election about primarily what you've done for Rhode Island."

But the fight will only get more intense in the final days. The NRSC has run an ad arguing Mr. Whitehouse will support higher taxes -- prompting Mr. Whitehouse's camp to fire back with an ad showing sharks and claiming national Republicans are back to help Mr. Chafee protect Mr. Bush and keep the party in power.

"A Republican-led Senate is not good for Rhode Island. ... That is the fundamental issue in the race," said Alex Swartsel, spokeswoman for Mr. Whitehouse.

Chafee campaign manager Ian Lang said "there's a reason why Sheldon Whitehouse has only tried to run against George Bush and that's because [Mr. Whitehouse] doesn't have a record. They know if they run against the senator's record they're not going to win."

Wal-Mart Dismisses Adviser Who Created G.O.P. Ad (NYT)

By Michael Barbaro

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

After infuriating Canada's ambassador to the United States and raising the ire of the N.A.A.C.P., a Republican television commercial mocking Representative Harold E. Ford Jr. of Tennessee has become a political liability for an unlikely third party: Wal-Mart Stores.

Under pressure from black leaders and union groups, Wal-Mart, the nation's largest retailer, said last night that it had cut ties with a prominent Republican strategist who helped create the provocative advertisement.

The strategist, Terry Nelson, was hired by Wal-Mart Stores Inc. in 2005 to help burnish its image after a wave of attacks from organized labor and liberal groups.

After Mr. Nelson's affiliation with the Republican commercial became public this week, the Rev. Jesse Jackson demanded that Wal-Mart fire Mr. Nelson and a union group threatened to run advertisements in Tennessee linking the retailer to it.

In the commercial, which was financed by the Republican National Committee, actors in mock interviews spoke sarcastically about Mr. Ford and his candidacy for the Senate seat in Tennessee.

In a scene that black leaders say has racist overtones, a white actress says she met Mr. Ford, who is black, at a "Playboy party."

"Harold, call me," she says coyly.

Canadian officials objected this week to a separate scene in which an actor says, "Canada can take care of North Korea. They're not busy."

The aside is a perceived slight to a country that has troops in Afghanistan as part of NATO forces, and on Wednesday, Michael Wilson, Canada's ambassador to the United States, contacted the White House to complain.

A statement from the Rev. Jesse Jackson, distributed by the group WakeUpWal-Mart.com, which is backed by unions, said, "Wal-Mart has the responsibility to dismiss Terry Nelson, with explanation, and apologize to Harold Ford Jr. Even though the Republican Party pulled the ad, if you throw ink on a suit, you leave a stain. They threw ink on Harold Ford Jr., and many people believed it to be true, resulting in a negative impact."

Wal-Mart said in a statement that Mr. Nelson's Washington consulting firm, Crosslink Strategy Group, "sent a letter to Wal-Mart ending its working relationship with our company."

"We believe this is the right course of action," Wal-Mart said.

A person familiar with the letter said it made clear that the decision to end the relationship was based on requests from Wal-Mart. The person, not authorized to speak publicly, did so on condition of anonymity.

Mr. Nelson did not respond to several telephone and e-mail messages.

DOJ_NMG_0088522

Wal-Mart's relationship with Mr. Nelson threatened to set back the retailer's extensive efforts to reach out to African-Americans, who account for a large number of its employees and customers.

Over the past year, H. Lee Scott Jr., the chief executive, has met with members of the Congressional Black Caucus and appeared on the Rev. Al Sharpton's radio show.

The commercial has created a public relations problem for Republicans less than two weeks before Election Day.

Mr. Nelson has worked for various Republican leaders, including President Bush and Senator John McCain of Arizona. As a founder of Crosslink Strategy Group, he also consults for corporations. Mr. Nelson has helped recruit Wal-Mart's suppliers to join an advocacy group that trumpets its accomplishments and has overseen a program to register Wal-Mart employees to vote in Nov. 7 elections in part as a reaction to Democratic attacks against the company.

In Indiana, Local Issues Take Toll (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

With Voters Riled by Road Fees, Time Zones, Republicans Focus on National Issues

MISHAWAKA, Ind. -- Preparing to take questions from Rotary Club members at Houlihan's Restaurant here for a weekly luncheon, Republican Rep. Chris Chocola jokes that he has just one rule: "I won't talk about time zones or the toll road."

It has been a dependable laugh line this fall in Mr. Chocola's northern Indiana district, but the issues are no joking matter for the 44-year-old lawmaker and two fellow Republican congressmen in Southern Indiana. According to public and internal polling, all three are in tight races and may lose in next month's election.

One reason: voter dissatisfaction with how the Republican-led state government has handled local issues. Democratic challengers are successfully tapping into that sentiment to sway voters, and turning local issues into a decisive factor here at a time when global issues such as terrorism and the Iraq war continue to dominate in races across the country.

Voter worries about the local economy had already damped support for Mr. Chocola and two other endangered Republican incumbents, Reps. Mike Sodrel and John Hostettler. Two local issues -- a fight over what time zone the state should be in and its leasing of a northern Indiana toll road to a foreign consortium -- have added to voter anger, creating a toxic atmosphere for all Republicans in the state, including the federal lawmakers who have had no direct decision-making authority in these matters. The bad feelings could make it difficult to coax Republicans to the polls on Nov. 7.

The local issues have proven a particular problem for Mr. Chocola, since they affect his constituents disproportionately. The district is split between Central and Eastern time zones and residents of one county -- St. Joseph -- are still miffed that their request to change to the Central time zone from the Eastern so they could be on the same time as nearby Chicago was denied. Residents of other counties, meanwhile, are unhappy with other changes to the state's time-zone policy.

The issue sprang up last year after Indiana decided to observe daylight savings time, which means Hoosiers will change their clocks this weekend along with much of the country. That decision reopened a debate that has festered for well over a hundred years. Indiana counties surrounding Chicago and Evansville traditionally have been on Central Standard Time, while much of the rest of the state is on Eastern Standard Time.

After Indiana adopted daylight savings time, each of its 92 counties was asked to decide which zone they wanted to be in: Central or Eastern. In the end, 17 counties asked to switch to the Central time zone. The federal Department of Transportation, which has the final say over such matters, let eight make the switch. Five months later, six of those counties asked to switch back. They said they were unhappy that neighboring counties weren't allowed to change, too.

"It's a mess," said Ray S. Winey, a native of Mishawaka.

The other local issue working against Mr. Chocola is the leasing of the Indiana Toll Road. Dubbed the "Main Street of the Midwest," the toll road stretches 157 miles between the Ohio and Illinois borders and serves as the main east-west artery in the northern part of the state.

Earlier this year, Gov. Mitch Daniels and state lawmakers agreed to lease the road to a foreign consortium for 75 years. The $3.85 billion deal provided a windfall to fund the state's effort to rebuild local roads and bridges. But the massive deal was a tough sell to some wary residents and remains a deeply divisive issue here.

DOJ_NMG_0088523

In the North, residents have complained that the consortium will almost certainly raise tolls and that too much of the money -- some $2.5 billion -- would be used to fix roads and bridges in other parts of the state. Others, especially in central and southern Indiana, fret about the highway being leased to foreign companies.

Mr. Chocola declined to take a public stand on either the time zones or toll road, saying it would be inappropriate to comment because they aren't before Congress.

State Democrats said he should have stood up for constituents, and have assailed Republicans statewide on both fronts.

The state's largest newspaper, the Indianapolis Star, recently endorsed Democrat Joe Donnelly, Mr. Chocola's opponent, partly because "a congressperson should at least have spoken up informally about the momentous deal involving an interstate highway, even if the federal government was not directly involved."

Mr. Donnelly had voiced opposition to leasing the toll road.

Along the farm fields that blanket Mr. Chocola's district and in small towns like Plymouth, population 9,840, neighbors are waging a battle of yard signs. Neither party has been able to hold the deeply divided district for long; when the two men ran against each other in 2004, Mr. Chocola won a second term with 54% of the vote to Mr. Donnelly's 45%.

Mr. Chocola complains that Republicans aren't getting enough credit for the improving economy, although he acknowledges his constituents have more reason to be concerned than most. His predominantly blue-collar district is home to several auto-parts makers, including Kokomo-based Delphi Corp., which is in bankruptcy protection, and AM General, which makes Hummer SUVs in South Bend.

"I think there's just more anxiety up there, period," said Murray Clark, the state's Republican Party chairman. "They're anxious about the toll road. He's been blamed for that."

Consequently, while other endangered Republicans are turning to local issues to direct voter attention away from the unpopular war in Iraq and other national issues, in Indiana, Mr. Chocola and his two Republican colleagues have sought to focus voters the opposite way. They are talking about tax cuts, immigration and why they think the country would be a much-worse place if Democrat Rep. Nancy Pelosi were to become House Speaker.

Write to Amy Schatz at Amy.Schatz@wsj.com2

A G.O.P. Redoubt Upstate Suddenly Seems Less Sturdy (NYT)

By Fernanda Santos

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

WATKINS GLEN, N.Y., Oct. 26 — This picturesque corner of southwestern New York, with its rugged terrain sheltered by mountains and dotted with lakes, is as red as the blue state of New York gets.

Republicans have outnumbered Democrats here since the Republican Party's founding in 1854. Two years ago, President Bush won 56 percent of the vote in this area's 29th Congressional District, the biggest share of any district in the state.

But as the midterm elections approach, 2004 increasingly seems like a long time ago. The region's freshman Republican congressman, John R. Kuhl Jr., 63, who goes by Randy, faces a spirited challenge from a Democratic newcomer, Eric Massa, 47, a retired Navy commander who disagrees with the incumbent on most issues, from the war to immigration to health care.

In recent weeks, the Republican Party has stepped up efforts to safeguard Mr. Kuhl's seat, which has long seemed comfortably secure. Last month, Vice President Dick Cheney flew to Rochester for a fund-raiser for Mr. Kuhl. Laura Bush is scheduled to campaign for him in the town of Greece, near Rochester, on Saturday, just 10 days before elections nationwide that have the potential to shift control of one or both houses of Congress to the Democrats.

Mr. Massa, meanwhile, has stepped up fund-raising efforts, with noteworthy success. He raised $171,000 from Sept. 30 to Oct. 18, or nearly three times as much as Mr. Kuhl, who collected $65,000, according to the Federal Election Commission. As of Oct. 18, Mr. Massa had about $341,000 left in the bank, about $108,000 more than Mr. Kuhl, according to the commission.

"Frankly, a lot of Republicans, especially the traditional ones, feel betrayed," said Bob Lonsberry, a conservative talk radio host on WHAM-AM (1180) in Rochester. "They don't feel the party is fighting for their values."

In Mr. Kuhl and Mr. Massa, voters here will have a clear choice.

DOJ_NMG_0088524

Mr. Kuhl is a low-key, affable lawyer-turned-politician who served for 24 years as a New York assemblyman and senator, running unopposed several times, before being elected to Congress in 2004.

Since then, he says, he has visited all of the district's 145 communities at least twice.

Mr. Kuhl often speaks of his close relationship with his constituents, and reminds voters of the state and federal dollars he has brought to their hometowns. He likes to say that he went to Washington to "change the system."

Mr. Massa is an energetic campaigner with an electrifying speaking style, taken to moving his hands and stomping his feet for emphasis. He served in Beirut, Bosnia and the Persian Gulf during his 24 years in the Navy and worked on the staff of the House Armed Services Committee. He left that job to work for Gen. Wesley K. Clark's presidential campaign in New Hampshire.

He is a cancer survivor who supports universal health care, while Mr. Kuhl wants reforms to reduce Medicare and Medicaid costs.

Mr. Kuhl says the United States must stay in Iraq to held build a democracy, while Mr. Massa favors dividing Iraq into Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish regions, followed by a gradual withdrawal of American troops.

"I'm not a politician. I'm an old sailor," Mr. Massa said on Wednesday, before he sat down to talk to a group of teachers and veterans at a local sports bar.

"At one point in my life, I was a Republican," he said. "Now, I'm a registered Democrat. I didn't leave the Republican Party; it ran away from me. And because I have experience on both sides of the aisle, I'm bilingual, and bringing that to Congress is what's going to be a major factor to allow me to work with all members."

The 29th district of New York is about as big as the state of Connecticut and is largely agricultural. A budding tourism industry caters to wine and racing fans alike. The track here plays host to a leg of the Nascar series.

"This is a district of small towns and rural counties tied together with a set of communities where people lead a more cosmopolitan lifestyle," said Gerald Gamm, chair of the political science department at the University of Rochester. "But for the most part, this is strong Republican territory, where people believe in balanced budgets, in a government that doesn't meddle in their affairs and uses force responsibly and only if necessary.

"These days," Professor Gamm added, "this is a place filled with discontent."

The economy of upstate New York, which crashed long ago and is still on its knees, is a leading concern, but also weighing heavily on voters' minds are immigration and health care reform, taxes and the war in Iraq, according to interviews with about a dozen farmers, teachers, veterans, firefighters and small-business owners this past week. All expressed disappointment with the Republican Party and President Bush.

Mr. Kuhl has run into this frustration on the campaign trail. In a meeting on Tuesday with about 60 farmers, who rely heavily on Mexican immigrants to harvest their crops, he heard an earful.

The farmers were upset at Congress — and disappointed in Mr. Kuhl — for approving an immigration bill that is heavy on enforcement, but does not provide for a guest-worker program that they say would solve their labor-shortage problems. President Bush signed the bill into law on Thursday.

"There's a big misunderstanding down in Washington that the immigrants we have here are taking jobs away, but these people, they're the only ones willing to do the work," thundered Jeff Morris, who grows wine grapes on 110 acres of land just outside this village in the Finger Lakes region.

"They're the best thing we've got going for us, and they're fundamental to our survival," he added.

Mr. Kuhl told the farmers that he had been convinced that a such a guest worker program might, indeed, make sense.

"The timing is right, from my perspective, to move on a legal, temporary work force for agriculture," Mr. Kuhl said in an interview after the meeting.

An analysis published on Wednesday in the Evans-Novak Political Report, a newsletter edited by Robert D. Novak, the conservative columnist, rated the race as leaning Democrat, while the nonpartisan Cook Political Report said on the same day that the district was leaning Republican.

"The big risk for Kuhl is, are traditional Republicans so ticked off that they're going to sit out this election?" said Mr. Lonsberry, the radio host, whose program has a solid, devoted audience throughout the district.

DOJ_NMG_0088525

"To me," he added, "this election is going to come down to whether a certain number of these Republicans will stay home and the Democrats, who are invigorated by the Massa campaign, will show up to vote en masse."

This Time, Ballot Issues Could Rally Liberal Base (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb And David S. Broder, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Wage Initiatives Seen As Favoring Democrats

CLEVELAND -- On a recent Saturday afternoon, a team of canvassers armed with handheld digital devices spread out across the city. Their aim was to urge residents to support a ballot initiative requiring an increase in Ohio's minimum wage.

But one beneficiary could be someone hoping for a new job that pays a good bit better than minimum wage: Rep. Sherrod Brown (D), who is running to unseat Sen. Mike DeWine (R), the two-term incumbent, on Nov. 7.

"Congress has raised its own pay 10 times while the minimum wage stayed the same," Brown told a crowd last weekend at East Cleveland Community Theater.

In 2004, Republicans in Ohio and elsewhere tended to benefit from ballot initiatives. Measures to ban same-sex marriage, for example, passed easily. In the process, some election analysts said, the measures revved the conservative base to help Republican candidates from President Bush on down.

In 2006, Democrats are hoping to prove that ballot politics can work in the other direction. Measures to increase the minimum wage are before voters in six states. Four of those, Arizona, Ohio, Missouri and Montana, feature close Senate races with a GOP incumbent. In Missouri, moreover, a measure backing stem cell research is ahead in the polls -- which Democrats say could lift their candidate.

In Ohio, recent polls show that at least 70 percent of voters support an initiative to raise the minimum wage from $5.15 an hour to $6.85 and index it to inflation. A coalition of labor unions, faith groups and liberal activists is working to pass it. If their efforts also pump up voter turnout for Democrats, Brown said, he is happy for the help.

"Some people will vote because of the minimum wage," Brown said in an interview. "I think it will help bring out voters. I'm guessing those voters will vote for Democrats. It's up to us to make sure they do."

Eight states have ballot measures to ban same-sex marriage, but their impact may be less than in previous years. Few of these states have competitive Senate or House races. And in those that do, such as Virginia and Tennessee, the issue is not as prominent as it was around the country in 2004.

In Virginia, for example, Sen. George Allen (R) supports a proposal against same-sex marriage while former Navy secretary James Webb (D) opposes such a ban. But only a slim majority of the electorate favored the initiative in a recent Washington Post poll, and the Senate race has been dominated by topics such as the war in Iraq and the character of the candidates.

The Missouri stem cell initiative, which the state's Senate candidates disagree on, would amend the state constitution to ensure that any form of research that is legal in the United States cannot be restricted in Missouri. State Auditor Claire Mc Caskill (D) supports the measure, and Sen. James M. Talent (R) opposes it. The initiative is being publicized with more than $15 million from Jim and Virginia Stowers, a Kansas City couple who are benefactors of a vast medical research center.

"There are many people in this state . . . [whose] politics might be different except for stem cell research," McCaskill said in an interview. A recent poll suggested sizable support for the initiative: 58 percent.

But mobilized against the proposal is Missouri's antiabortion movement, a key constituency for Talent, who is neck-and-neck with McCaskill in recent polling.

Advocates of increasing the minimum wage say the issue can be framed as more than economics, echoing as a values issue in the same way abortion and same-sex marriage do. Almost 2 million people make the minimum wage or less, according to the Labor Department. The Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, a left-leaning Washington think tank, estimates that the real buying power of $10,700 -- about what a full-time minimum-wage worker makes in a year, before taxes -- is the lowest in half a century.

"Rewarding hard work with a fair wage is not just an abstract pocketbook economic issue but a statement of values," said Kristina Wilfore, executive director of the Ballot Initiative Strategy Center, which promotes using ballot strategy for liberal causes.

DOJ_NMG_0088526

"While the left usually talks in dry economic terms, the right made a concerted effort to copyright values -- meaning a set of divisive, scapegoating issues. The popularity of the minimum-wage initiatives is a testament to how powerfully progressive values speak to Americans."

In many states, labor is taking the lead on the minimum-wage effort. The AFL-CIO's minimum-wage work is part of its $40 million operation to reach more than 12 million people in union households in 21 states.

Republicans are watching the minimum-wage strategy. The GOP took steps earlier this year to avoid a showdown when Congress tried to raise the minimum wage. Democrats balked when the GOP tried to tie the increase to a tax cut. Aware of emerging minimum-wage efforts, legislators in Arkansas and Michigan raised their states' minimums.

Republicans are banking that their turnout effort this cycle will overcome any enthusiasm among the Democratic base over the minimum wage and other issues.

Mike DuHaime, the Republican National Committee's political director, said he does not discount Democrats' turnout operation. "They have some very good allies like labor and 527 organizations who have a proven history of turning people out," he said. But he added that he is confident that races will hinge on the quality of candidates.

The minimum wage resonates in Ohio because thousands of factory jobs that paid well have been lost and replaced with low-paying service and retail jobs. Since 2000, Ohio's economy has lost more than 200,000 jobs, government statistics show. Policy Matters Ohio, a liberal think tank, estimates that increasing the state's minimum wage would benefit about 700,000 low-wage workers.

Cathy Madewall, 49, an administrative assistant in Cincinnati, said she heard about Let Justice Roll, a faith-based effort in Ohio to raise the minimum wage, at her church. She has not been active in politics in the past, but she has spent hours working for the minimum-wage campaign. And she will vote for a Democratic slate this fall.

"It's a huge issue for a lot of people who are affected by poverty," she said. "Sometimes they're busy working and they don't have time to vote. I think they'll make time to vote."

The idea of pursuing the minimum-wage strategy in Ohio was born after the 2004 election. Ohio Senate Minority Leader C.J. Prentiss, who had tried unsuccessfully to pass minimum-wage legislation, was taken aback by the support for the initiative against same-sex marriage from the GOP base and even African Americans who would ordinarily vote for Democrats.

"We looked at the minimum wage as something that would make sense -- not only energizing the base but also the right and just thing to do," said Prentiss, one of the leaders of the Ohio minimum-wage effort. "It has the same ring for me as for people who are passionate about defining marriage between a man and a woman."

Now, with 10 days till the election, things are looking rosy for Buckeye Democrats. The minimum-wage initiative is likely to pass. Rep. Ted Strickland (D) has a decisive lead in the gubernatorial race over Ohio Secretary of State J. Kenneth Blackwell (R), and Brown has been ahead of DeWine in recent polls.

But it is by no means a sealed deal for Democrats, especially in the Senate race. Some say the initiative might not be linked strongly with Democrats. The measure has widespread support, and DeWine voted for the minimum-wage increase in Congress this year.

In an interview, DeWine said that he supports the minimum-wage initiative and that "it's certainly possible" the Democratic strategy of using the issue to mobilize their base will work. But he cautioned that there are several initiatives on the ballot, "and it's hard to tell what's going to play out. . . . Turnout is a very complex thing. It's nuanced, and you never really know how things will turn out until it's over."

What's more, he said, the GOP base has been growing in intensity as the campaign enters its final stage. "I think it's kicked in pretty hard in the last 10 days or so," DeWine said this week, adding that terrorism and the prospect of Supreme Court appointments are major motivating factors.

Paul Hanrahan, a software programmer in the Cleveland suburb of Rocky River, will vote for the minimum-wage initiative next month. "It will get people off the welfare rolls," he said. "If you give them a minimum wage, maybe people will be able to take care of themselves."

But Hanrahan is no Democrat: He intends to vote down the Republican line on Nov. 7, mainly because, he said, the GOP is more sympathetic to religion and traditional family values.

DOJ_NMG_0088527

With just over a week left in the campaign, Brown strikes the minimum-wage chord hard at nearly every appearance. Recently, he addressed the Service Employees International Union Local 3, and his talk left no doubt in the mind of Anton Farmby, a Local 3 officer, about what the impact of the initiative will be on the Senate race.

"I think Sherrod Brown and all the members of the Democratic ticket will ride on the coattails of the minimum wage," he said.

As Campaign Days Dwindle, Marriage Issue Heats Up In Va. (WP)

By Chris L. Jenkins, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

N.J. Ruling Sparks Action on Amendment Question

The hundreds of Sunday congregants came to their feet as the Rev. Mark Becton, of Grove Avenue Baptist Church outside Richmond, finished his sermon.

"Believing that God ordained marriage as the institution between one woman and one man . . . I'm voting 'yes' for the marriage amendment," he exhorted, referring to the state constitutional amendment that will be on the Nov. 7 ballot. "I'm voting 'yes' to restate what I know God intended and what I believe our founding fathers understood: Marriage is the union of one man and one woman."

Five days later and across town, Dyana Mason, a gay-rights activist helping to lead the fight against the ballot question, was standing before her own kind of congregation, arguing the opposite: "This amendment is not about defining marriage," she said to a group of youth organizers at Virginia Commonwealth University, referring to the wording of the ballot question, which says that the state will not recognize a relationship between unwed couples that seeks to "approximate the . . . effects of marriage."

"It's important for us . . . to remind people . . . to read the amendment because it will do so much more than just ban gay marriage," she said.

Similar messages will go out from pulpits, by phone and on radio and television and will appear on front doorsteps over the next 10 days as organizers, religious leaders and volunteers for and against the amendment that would ban same-sex marriages, civil unions and domestic partnerships wage well-financed campaigns to win over Virginians.

Their efforts took on fresh urgency this week after the New Jersey Supreme Court directed legislators there to craft a bill offering same-sex couples the same rights as opposite-sex couples. Supporters of the amendment pounced on the decision, saying they will use the New Jersey action to rally conservative voters to the polls.

"It's definitely going to be part of our talking points," said Chris Freund, spokesman for the Family Foundation.

Opponents of the ballot measure recognized the decision's importance to their effort as well, almost immediately sending an e-mail to followers saying that "we can't let this issue get hijacked by those who seek cynically to provoke voters into unreasoned reflex reactions."

As campaign armies fan out, the two sides will try to appeal to different instincts. Supporters are trying to rally their legions by appealing to their strong-felt opposition to same-sex marriage, whereas opponents will try to get voters to set aside their emotions about gay marriage and think about the specific wording of the amendment.

"If this amendment focuses on gay marriage . . . if we get diverted to only an emotional argument, we lose," said Arlington County Board member Jay Fisette (D), who became the state's first openly gay elected official in 1997. "If we focus on what the amendment actually says, we can win."

Same-sex marriages and civil unions are illegal in Virginia, but supporters say the amendment is necessary to protect against judges who might deem the statute unconstitutional, which happened in Massachusetts in 2003.

Polls have shown that the idea has received consistent support, but opponents also see an opportunity for victory. A Washington Post poll released this month found that 53 percent of Virginia voters back the amendment and 43 percent oppose it but that the difference narrowed to a virtual tie when respondents were asked to consider arguments for and against the measure.

DOJ_NMG_0088528

"It's hard to know which side to believe on this thing," said Frederick Nelson, a Richmond office manager who said he has been paying close attention to the issue. "My mind is made up on gay marriage. I don't believe in it. But I just want to know what this thing's going to do. If I can't figure it out, I'll just vote no."

Lisa Trevor, a stay-at-home mother shopping in Alexandria last week, held a similar view. "I can't say that I've come around on the position that gays should be married," she said. "I've heard about what I guess people are saying about what [the amendment] would do. So I guess I'm open to that part. But nothing else."

Trying to bolster their argument that Virginians can change their minds, opponents have highlighted a handful of public officials who once supported the amendment but have switched their positions.

Three Democratic state delegates have renounced their support, saying they had thought more deeply about the amendment's full impact, and state Sen. R. Creigh Deeds (D-Bath), a former nominee for attorney general, said he now opposes the measure after supporting it earlier this year.

"Nothing has happened to change my belief that marriage is between one man and one woman, and nothing could," Deeds said in a statement. "It is clear to me now, however, that the language goes far beyond existing law."

Opponents said that during the next 10 days they will continue a statewide advertising campaign on cable television, pressing voters to think about the impact of the measure.

Supporters said they will focus much of their effort on church members, with messages similar to the one Becton delivered. A group of pastors held a news conference Thursday at Regent University in Alexandria to reaffirm their support for the amendment, citing their belief in "traditional marriage." They also said that the decision in New Jersey was further evidence that more protections are necessary in Virginia.

At the same time, backers of the amendment have started a media blitz. Ads that are airing on Christian and talk radio aim to rebut the notion that the amendment could affect wills and other contracts between all unmarried couples.

"All those rights will continue to be available to all unmarried people," says a fictional character in the ad named Linda. "The real issue is, how are we going to define marriage for our children?"

US Mid-terms: Ballot Propositions (BBC)

BBC.com, October 27, 2006

In elections which could hinge on turnout, both Republican and Democratic Parties will be doing all they can to get their voters to the polls in the US mid-term elections.

A key weapon in the fight for turnout is the ballot proposition: a local initiative attached to the vote which will galvanise electors on ideological or social grounds.

The strategy was used to effect in the 2004 presidential elections, when emotionally-charged issues like same-sex marriage helped sway voters.

This year's mid-term polls - where local issues play big - will see attempts once again to capitalise on the power of the proposition, especially in swing states.

STEM CELL RESEARCH

In Missouri - where the Democrats have identified one of the six potentially winnable seats they need to take control of the Senate - a ballot initiative to allow stem cell research has become a defining issue.

Fox has endorsed Democrats who back stem cell research

Polls put Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill, in the 'yes' camp, and the incumbent Republican Senator Jim Talent neck-and-neck.

Actor Michael J Fox, who has Parkinson's Disease and supports stem cell research, has stepped into the fray with a high-profile campaign advert in which he backs Ms McCaskill.

Sen Talent must keep the support of conservatives who are opposed to the research, without going so far that he alienates undecided moderate voters.

In Wisconsin and Maryland - where the battle is less close - Democratic candidates have based their campaigns around ballot measures on stem cell research. President George W Bush is against the research.

DOJ_NMG_0088529

Voting in shadow of stem cell debate

SAME-SEX MARRIAGE

Voters in eight states - Colorado, Idaho, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin - will be balloted on proposals to ban same-sex marriage.

A New Jersey ruling has reignited the debate over same-sex marriage

The Republicans will hope to bring religious conservatives, their traditional support base, flocking to the polls to back any ban. Democrats will seek to dynamise their supporters to oppose it.

A ruling in New Jersey giving gay couples the same rights as heterosexual couples has worked to reignite the debate - probably to the Republicans' advantage. President Bush was quick to make use of the issue in a stump speech in Iowa.

In Virginia, an increase in conservative turnout could help Republican Senator George Allen, whose re-election campaign was hit in the summer by controversy over an alleged racial slur.

In Wisconsin, Republican Mark Green - who supports a ban - may see the benefit as he seeks to beat Democratic Governor Jim Doyle at the polls.

Map: Gay marriage across the US

MINIMUM WAGE

Measures to raise the minimum wage may lend a hand to the Democrats in half-a-dozen tight races for Senate or governorships.

Voters in Arizona, Colorado, Missouri, Montana, Ohio and Nevada will be balloted on whether to raise wages from the federal minimum of $5.15 (£2.70) an hour.

While less emotive than some propositions, polls suggest minimum wage measures are popular and so will increase turnout, to the advantage of the Democrats.

The party is hoping to capitalise on concerns over the state of the American economy, which may be slowing down after a long period of growth. US voters also felt the pinch of higher gas prices earlier this year.

ABORTION

The abortion issue will be galvanising voters in South Dakota.

South Dakota will vote in a referendum on a strict abortion ban

Earlier this year, the state legislature passed a law under which all abortions are banned - including in cases of rape or incest - unless the mother's life is at risk.

However, pro-choice campaigners gathered enough signatures to put a referendum on the ballot, giving voters the option to repeal the ban - or back it.

Supporters of the law, one of the toughest in the US, hope the case could help challenge the 1973 Roe v Wade US Supreme Court decision that legalised abortions everywhere in the country.

However, the issue is creating divisions even within the state's anti-abortion camp, with some believing the measures - signed into law by Republican Governor Mike Rounds - are too restrictive.

ANTI-SMOKING MEASURES

Half-a-dozen states have anti-smoking measures on the ballot on 7 November.

In the key swing state of Ohio, voters will be presented with two options. The first - backed by tobacco-industry money - would impose a partial ban on smoking indoors. The second, backed by anti-smoking groups, would be a more sweeping ban.

Voters in Arizona and Nevada will also find two propositions on the ballot, one stricter than the other, banning smoking in most public places.

A proposition in California would quadruple state cigarette taxes, with the extra revenue going to fund health initiatives and anti-smoking campaigns.

Voters in Arizona, Missouri and South Dakota will also decide on measures to raise taxes on tobacco, though by a lesser degree.

ENERGY TAXATION

DOJ_NMG_0088530

The environmental debate has made it onto the ballot in California, with a proposal to fund alternative energy projects by levying a tax on oil production in the state.

The No on 87 campaign is partly funded by US oil producers

Reports suggest more than $100m (£52.7m) has been spent on the rival campaigns over Proposition 87.

The star-studded, Democrat-backed Yes on 87 camp includes former President Bill Clinton, actress Julia Roberts, tycoon Richard Branson and Google co-founder Larry Page, with the bulk of campaign funding coming from Hollywood producer Steve Bing.

The No on 87 camp is funded largely by "Big Oil", including Chevron and Exxon. Adverts warning voters the measure could hit them at the petrol pump seem to be proving effective.

In addition, Republican Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger - a No campaign supporter - is currently well ahead of Democratic challenger Phil Angelides in the polls.

California to vote on new oil tax

EMINENT DOMAIN

States including California, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Michigan and New Hampshire have ballot initiatives aimed at restricting eminent domain, or the government's power to seize private property.

The propositions are largely a response to a US Supreme Court ruling in 2005 that gave the government the right to seize homes for "public benefit", where previously they could only be taken for "public use".

Many fear the ruling means land can now be requisitioned for commercial ventures that benefit the local economy, not just public projects like road building.

Earlier this year, activists in New Hampshire tried to seize the home of Justice David Souter, who ruled with the majority in the Supreme Court decision, to highlight opposition to it.

Building Better Citizens (NYT)

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

Rhode Island voters will have a chance on Nov. 7 to do the right thing and amend their state Constitution to restore voting rights to felons who have completed their prison sentences. Allowing former convicts to vote strengthens democracy, and helps them to integrate into society and move beyond a life of crime.

Rhode Island, like many states, restores felons' voting rights only after they have completed not only their prison sentences, but parole and probation. This policy keeps thousands of citizens, many of whom were in for nonviolent crimes, from voting, sometimes for decades. Andres Idarraga, a Brown University student who served more than six years in prison on drug and gun charges, is disqualified from voting for the next 30 years.

Ex-felons go to school, work and pay taxes. Their views about who should represent them should be respected in a democracy. Restoring their right to vote will also help with the critical issue of "re-entry," helping them fit into society so they do not return to crime. The chief of the Providence police wrote in The Providence Journal that denying released prisoners the vote "weakens the long-term prospects for sustainable rehabilitation."

If the amendment passes, a new state statute would also take effect requiring the prison system to help former prisoners register when they are released. Across the country, far too little is done to inform ex-prisoners of when their right to vote is restored, and how to go about qualifying to vote. Election officials often do not know the intricacies of the law, and give out incorrect advice. The combination of the constitutional amendment and the statute would make Rhode Island a model for the nation.

Felon disenfranchisement is a relic of another America. It was often done to keep blacks from voting, or to stigmatize ex-offenders. Rhode Island, which was founded by religious dissenters, can strike an important blow for inclusion by allowing people who have paid their debt to society to participate in democracy.

Marriage Ruling Resonates (LAT)

By Stephanie Simon, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088531

The Grand Junction Daily Sentinel, a small newspaper in western Colorado, last week urged voters to reject a proposed state constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage. "The traditional concept of marriage is not endangered in this state," the paper wrote.

On Friday, the editorial page editor, Bob Silbernagel, said he had changed his mind.

He was jolted, he said, by the New Jersey Supreme Court decision this week that granted gay and lesbian couples in that state all the rights and benefits of marriage. The court left it up to legislators to decide whether to call such partnerships marriages or civil unions.

Before the New Jersey ruling, Silbernagel said, he had largely stopped worrying about this issue, lulled by a flurry of decisions rejecting same-sex marriage in New York, Washington state and elsewhere. The ruling in New Jersey was his wake-up call.

"We had thought it was adequate to have clear language in state law that marriage was only the union of one woman and one man," Silbernagel said. Now, he said, he realizes that's naive: If a court in New Jersey can grant same-sex couples equal rights, so can a court in Colorado.

So he dashed off a six-paragraph retraction of his earlier editorial. The new piece informed the Daily Sentinel's 30,000 readers that Amendment 43 was "a virtual necessity."

The change of opinion expressed in a small Colorado paper probably will not affect the outcome on election day: The ban on same-sex marriage is expected to pass handily; a poll in mid-September found 52% of voters in support, 42% against.

But the Daily Sentinel's reversal thrilled conservatives who are hoping the New Jersey ruling will help their cause in races across the country. Republicans in close Senate races in Virginia and Tennessee have moved to capitalize on the issue by proclaiming their opposition to same-sex marriage. President Bush raised the subject during campaign stops for Republicans in Iowa and Michigan.

"The New Jersey ruling could be the 'October surprise' that galvanizes social conservatives and sends values voters to the polls in record numbers," said Bill Maier, a vice president of the conservative ministry Focus on the Family.

Lisa Moreno, who's working to defeat the Colorado amendment, wasn't so sure: "I think most Coloradans see through that."

Meanwhile, Silbernagel said he had gotten very little response to his about-face — just one letter by late afternoon. On the paper's website, the editorial barely made it into the top-10 list of most viewed stories. More popular: an article about this week's local snowfall — all 0.18 inches.

stephanie.simon@latimes.com

A Rising Star From Illinois Makes Some Noise In L.A. (LAT)

By Carla Hall, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

Sen. Barack Obama addresses a rapt crowd at an African American museum and attends a Democratic rally at USC.

Barack Obama was telling a story about campaigning for the Senate in Illinois two years ago. He was on a road trip with Dick Durbin, the state's senior senator, he explained. They were traveling in downstate Illinois — far away from Obama's home base of Chicago.

Obama paused before a rapt crowd at the California African American Museum in Exposition Park to deliver an aside: "And southern Illinois is the South."

"HEL-lo!" history professor Wanda Powell rang out in agreement.

"One place we went to was a place called Cairo, Ill.," Obama continued.

"The reason why everybody remembers Cairo is because back in the late '60s and early '70s, Cairo was the site of some of the worst racial violence."

That story ended with Obama and Durbin spotting people in Cairo sporting Obama buttons and ready to fete the candidate with barbecue.

But everyone at the museum already knew how the bigger story unfolded: Democrat Barack Obama — the son of a black father from Kenya and a white mother from Kansas, as he fondly recited several times Friday — electrified the 2004 Democratic

DOJ_NMG_0088532

National Convention as a speaker, won his Senate race and in two short years catapulted from junior senator to fantasy presidential candidate and Time magazine cover guy.

"We brought students here," said Powell, a history professor at Los Angeles Southwest College. "This is a historic moment."

Obama swung through Los Angeles on Friday, speaking to a crowd of 825 at the museum. Then — with actor Ben Affleck — he promoted Proposition 87 at a news conference at USC's Topping Student Center. Later in the afternoon he delivered a 14-minute speech in shirt sleeves at a campus rally with Democratic gubernatorial candidate Phil Angelides, Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and just about every other California Democratic office holder who could find their way to USC.

People came to the day's events clutching copies of Obama's new book, their cameras and their hopes that he is the political force that can unify a divided country.

"We live in Orange County. We live behind the Orange Curtain," said Jona Knight, a human resources manager, as she waited in line to have her copy of Obama's "The Audacity of Hope" signed. "I'll get his signature on this book. I'll give this book to my grandchildren."

She came with her friend, Pamela Reeves, a paralegal and psychotherapist intern, who said: "It's not just blacks or African Americans — there are a lot of people that feel like they can have a connection with this guy."

Even members of the on-campus chapter of the College Republicans, standing at the back of the Democratic rally with their Schwarzenegger signs, were diplomatic: "I'm not really on point with his views, but he's definitely a popular man," said Cheyenne Steel, a 19-year-old sophomore.

At the museum speech and book signing, sponsored by Eso Won Books and the Urban Issues Forum, Obama signed every volume. As though on an assembly line, people walked by, proffered a book — and Obama, a left-hander who curls his fingers around the pen, flicked out his signature: a big B joined with a big O and a line shooting out from there.

Younger members of the museum crowd wanted him to go with the momentum and run for president in 2008. Older fans counseled caution. "He needs some more seasoning — then there'll be time to run for president," said Quincy Beaver, 84, president of the Martin Luther King Jr. Democratic Club.

Some fretted like worried mothers: "I don't trust the powers-that-be not to have other plans for him," said Valaria Lincoln, 72. "I'm afraid for him."

There were no fears among the students who besieged Obama at USC, wearing Democratic buttons and hoisting cellphone cameras aloft to click him and Affleck as they spoke on behalf of Proposition 87, the Clean Alternative Energy Act.

"He has already proven himself to be the most galvanizing leader to come out of either party, in my opinion, in at least a decade," said Affleck, wearing an untucked blue shirt and gray trousers as he introduced Obama, who was in a white shirt and dark suit jacket and went tie-less all day. "

Obama reminded the audience that the proposition is opposed by the "big boys," meaning the oil companies. And he spoke of the overdependence on foreign oil. "We're sending $800 million a day to some of the most hostile nations and effectively funding both sides in the war on terror."

"It was nice to have Ben Affleck there," said Alexander Shams, a 16-year-old freshman, "but Barack Obama was the star."

At the rally for the Democratic Party in front of a flag-draped Doheny Library, Obama spoke last, after Villaraigosa and Angelides. Under a cloudless sky and bright sun, before hundreds, Obama removed his suit jacket and rolled up his shirt sleeves — a stark contrast to the dark-suited, buttoned-up politicians around him.

"How you doing, USC?" he called out as the crowd roared in delight. "I'm fired up. I'm so fired up I had to take off my jacket."

Once more he went over his message: "We're all connected. We have a stake in each other," he said, "despite our much-vaunted individualism."

He continued: "There's just one ingredient it's going to take to make it happen on Nov. 7," he said. "That's all of you."

Then he managed to segue from Martin Luther King Jr.'s entreaty to his followers in the early days of the Selma marches — not to give up but to stand together — to Angelides (trailing the governor in double digits) and to how all Democrats standing with him would be a powerful force.

Then he was sent off with a crescendo of applause.

carla.hall@latimes.com

DOJ_NMG_0088533

Schwarzenegger, Angelides Both Profess To Lean Green (LAT)

By Tim Reiterman, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

With perspectives as different as a Hummer and a hybrid, the gubernatorial candidates court the environmental vote.

SAN FRANCISCO — With his popularity lagging, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger seized center stage at a United Nations conference in June 2005 by unfurling an ambitious plan for reducing greenhouse gas emissions in the most populous state.

"As of today," he said, "California is going to be the leader in the fight against global warming."

By standing against climate change, the Republican governor set himself apart from the Bush administration and laid claim to a central environmental issue in his reelection effort.

"It was a key symbolic step … that inoculated him against one of the major strategies [his opposition] had: linking him to President Bush and the skepticism the administration has about … whether global warming is real," said Bruce Cain, director of UC Berkeley's Institute of Governmental Studies.

Three days later, Schwarzenegger's Democratic would-be successor, state Treasurer Phil Angelides, told the same conference of his own efforts to protect the planet by steering billions of dollars in public pension money to clean technology, renewable energy projects and developments that would avert urban sprawl.

"California should own this industry," Angelides said, "so we can have a clean environment and the high-wage, high-skill jobs to power our economy."

The episode captures a basic distinction between the environmental records and styles of the leading gubernatorial candidates in the Nov. 7 election.

The pro-business Hummer aficionado and former movie star has used his office to undertake high-profile initiatives for air quality and the protection of ocean and forestland, while critics grumble that his less visible actions sometimes have belied his lofty words.

The state treasurer, a hybrid-driving former developer who has bumped heads with conservationists, has employed the financial clout of two of the nation's largest pension funds — with far less fanfare — to establish himself as a "green" investor.

"The environment is an issue which voters have told us consistently is very important in deciding [how] to vote for major public offices such as governor," said Mark Baldassare, research director at the Public Policy Institute of California.

While Schwarzenegger has been running on the record he fashioned since ousting Gov. Gray Davis in the recall three years ago, his campaign has portrayed Angelides as a scofflaw former developer.

Angelides was cited by federal officials in 1987 for illegally filling wetlands for a development. He eventually agreed to create other wetlands as mitigation.

When Angelides and his partners proposed two housing projects in Sacramento a decade later, the City Council approved a plan he pushed for providing alternative habitat for two endangered species. But environmental groups successfully sued the federal government to block permits for the developments.

After Angelides was elected treasurer in 1998, a compromise negotiated without his involvement set aside habitat, and the developments were built.

Angelides said he built innovative projects that minimized traffic, pollution and effects on wildlife. "Any time you're in business, there are going to be areas of disagreement, and any time you do new things, there always are going to be critics," he said.

As state treasurer, Angelides has headed boards overseeing state employee and teacher retirement funds.

"I began thinking about ways our pension funds could make investments that would … return solid yields at the same time we … advanced marketplace solutions to environmental challenges," he said.

In February 2004, he inaugurated his Green Wave initiative, calling on the two state retirement systems to put $1.5 billion into companies with sound environmental practices and into new technologies.

Angelides' action made California a leader in "green" investments, said Mindy Lubber, head of Ceres, a Boston-based coalition that promotes socially responsible institutional investment.

DOJ_NMG_0088534

During Schwarzenegger's first year in office, environmental groups told him he could build a powerful legacy. Warner Chabot, vice president of the Ocean Conservancy, presented the governor with a doctored photo of Mt. Rushmore that showed Schwarzenegger's face in place of President Theodore Roosevelt's.

Schwarzenegger later established a series of marine preserves between Santa Barbara and Half Moon Bay — about 18% of the ocean waters under state control. Chabot called his ocean policies "bold, visionary and substantial."

Other conservationists, however, have criticized many of the governor's appointments.

"Arnold Schwarzenegger is a master communicator," said Mary Nichols, head of the UCLA Institute of the Environment and former resources secretary under Davis. "But the action has not matched the rhetoric."

In 2005, the governor outraged environmentalists by naming former industry lobbyist Cindy Tuck as head of the Air Resources Board. The state Senate refused to confirm her.

Environmental activists also cried foul that year when, in what the governor's office described as a routine changing of the guard, Schwarzenegger replaced the entire state Reclamation Board, whose members had started taking tough stances against development near levees suspected of being weak.

Environmentalists also have said that only one of his four Coastal Commission appointees has a good voting record.

Terry Tamminen, a Democrat who ran the California Environmental Protection Agency for Schwarzenegger, said the governor appointed the best available people to the commission and chose as chairwoman Meg Caldwell, a Stanford University environmental law lecturer with high marks from conservationists.

By opposing offshore oil drilling, the governor bucked the Bush administration. But environmentalists, residents and Angelides criticize Schwarzenegger for indicating support for a proposed offshore liquid natural gas terminal between Malibu and Oxnard, which they fear would pollute the air, spoil views and encourage more similar development.

Tamminen, now with Schwarzenegger's reelection campaign, denied that the governor has endorsed the proposal. He said Schwarzenegger wants cleaner natural gas for the state but no terminals where they could do environmental harm or present terrorism risks.

The governor has balanced the demands of environmentalists and the business community, said Cain of UC Berkeley.

"What obviously is going on is Arnold is as publicly environmentalist and populist as possible, and as quietly pro-business as possible," he said.

The governor's recent signing of Assembly Bill 32 — setting targets for cutting greenhouse emissions — pleased environmentalists and the 200-member Silicon Valley Leadership Group. But some of Schwarzenegger's most ardent supporters, such as the California Chamber of Commerce, fought the bill, saying it would hurt the economy.

In early 2004, the governor launched the Hydrogen Highway, a system of stations for dispensing the clean-burning fuel as automakers produce vehicles that can run on it. So far, Tamminen said, there are more than 20 stations. The state's goal is about 100 by 2010.

But the governor did not make good on his promise to convert one of his four Hummers to hydrogen. Spokeswoman Julie Soderlund said that instead, he is switching one to bio-diesel, a fuel made with renewable resources such as vegetable oil.

Schwarzenegger opposes Proposition 87 on the November ballot, which would generate $4 billion for renewable energy by charging oil companies extraction fees.

"He supports the goal but does not think the way to do it is through taxes," Tamminen said.

Angelides supports Proposition 87. He also wants to add $1.5 billion in public pension money to the oil fees to create more clean technology and renewable energy.

tim.reiterman@latimes.com

For exclusive Web features, including the new Political Muscle blog, go to latimes.com/calpolitics.

Faso Plays Up The Woes Of A Spitzer Ally (NYT)

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

“Corrupt,” a 30-second commercial for John Faso, the Republican candidate for governor, begins running today on network affiliates and cable stations across the state.

DOJ_NMG_0088535

PRODUCER Greener and Hook.

THE SCRIPT Announcer: "Eliot Spitzer has one set of standards for his friends and another for everyone else. New York's Ethics Commission says Spitzer running mate and State Comptroller Alan Hevesi knowingly and intentionally broke the law, stealing tens of thousands of dollars from taxpayers. But when Sheriff of Wall Street had a chance to investigate and call for Hevesi's resignation, Spitzer said no."

Eliot Spitzer: "I know Alan. I know him to be an honest, stupendous public servant."

Announcer: "Eliot Spitzer. Stupendously protecting his cronies at our expense."

ON THE SCREEN Sepia-colored images of Mr. Spitzer, looking stern at times and cackling at others, appear as the announcer speaks. Similar images appear of Mr. Hevesi, including one unflattering close-up of him licking his lips. Newspaper headlines about the Hevesi scandal flash on the screen. The following sentence also appears: "Spitzer refused to investigate or ask for Hevesi to resign." A video clip of Mr. Spitzer's remarks at a Faso-Spitzer debate is used against him; the producer uses a sound effect to create an echo of "servant" from Mr. Spitzer's remarks. The ad ends with these words appearing: "Eliot Spitzer — Stupendously Protecting His Cronies."

ACCURACY Mr. Hevesi is not Mr. Spitzer's running mate; they have been allies and are on the same Democratic ballot on Nov. 7. Mr. Hevesi failed to reimburse the state for use of a public employee to ferry around his wife; after it was revealed, he wrote a check, but he may owe more. Mr. Spitzer did not initiate his own investigation when the Hevesi scandal surfaced; he waited for the Ethics Commission to release its report this week and then began an investigation, which his spokeswoman termed the proper process. Mr. Spitzer withdrew his endorsement of Mr. Hevesi on Thursday, but Mr. Faso is correct in saying that Mr. Spitzer has not called for his resignation.

SCORECARD This is only Mr. Faso's second commercial of the general election campaign; struggling to raise money, he has not been able to afford more, and many New Yorkers still do not know much about him. Hammering Mr. Spitzer with the Hevesi scandal could score points, and the ad does so effectively. Still, making hay over the comptroller may not lead many voters to support a candidate they do not know well (Mr. Faso) over one who has high favorability ratings (Mr. Spitzer). But the ad is a stark reminder of what a political headache Mr. Hevesi has become for his old ally, Mr. Spitzer.

PATRICK HEALY

Ethics -- Public And Private (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

Corporate ethics has been much in the news in recent years, and the margin for an executive slip-up these days is narrow. Backdate an option to attract a new employee, or fail to supervise a leak probe, and you can face 20 years in the slammer. Rather more lax standards seem to apply to our political class, however, and Exhibit A is Alan Hevesi.

The New York State Comptroller was recently found to have used a public employee at taxpayer expense to chauffeur his wife around for three years. Mr. Hevesi somehow failed to disclose this personal use of public assets, and he has since claimed he merely "forgot" to reimburse the state. The Ethics Commission that looked into the matter found that the $82,688 he did finally pay the state after the allegation came to light wasn't enough to cover the actual cost.

At a recent debate with his GOP opponent, Mr. Hevesi claimed his wife needed the limo service for her security. Alas, her driver had no security background and was unarmed. Mr. Hevesi has nonetheless dismissed the episode as an "aberration" and has refused to resign or drop out of his race for re-election to a second four-year term.

We'd normally ignore this kind of state government corruption. But Mr. Hevesi's spectacle is instructive because in recent years he has been one of America's loudest corporate scolds. As Comptroller, he supervises the state's pension money and he has used that post to slam corporate officials who played even tangential roles in corporate scandals.

Most prominently, he pursued the directors of WorldCom in a lawsuit, claiming they should be held personally liable for not discovering the fraud committed by CFO Scott Sullivan. These directors played no direct role in the accounting fraud at WorldCom and they were also victims of that fraud, losing a combined $250 million in stock when the company went bust.

DOJ_NMG_0088536

But Mr. Hevesi declared when a settlement was reached that "I felt personally that this would be unfair and not a deterrent for future failures on the part of directors if they weren't held personally liable." That use of "personally" is especially redolent now that Mr. Hevesi's taxpayer-paid family limousine service has been exposed.

All of which raises an issue of the difference between public and private standards of accountability. In the wake of this decade's scandals, business executives are subject to greater scrutiny and ever-higher ethics standards. Some of this has been useful, though much of it in our view has been needlessly costly and intrusive. But our public servants, especially those in such corrupt state capitals as Albany and Trenton, haven't been subject to the same degree of accountability.

Only last month and after the Hevesi scandal had first broke, New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer responded to criticism from his GOP opponent John Faso by saying, "I know Alan. I know him to be an honest, stupendous public servant." Stupendous at least was right. This week, as the public furor grew during an election season, Mr. Spitzer finally turned on Mr. Hevesi and withdrew his political endorsement. That's a long way from cleaning up Albany, but it's a start.

In Clean Politics, Flesh Is Pressed, Then Sanitized (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 27 — Campaigns are filthy. Not only in terms of last-minute smears and dirty tricks. But also as in germs, parasites and all the bacterial unpleasantness that is spread around through so much glad-handing and flesh-pressing.

“You can’t always get to a sink to wash your hands,” said Anne Ryun, wife of Representative Jim Ryun, Republican of Kansas.

Hands would be the untidy appendages that transmit infectious disease.

Like so many other people involved in politics these days, Mrs. Ryun has become obsessive about using hand sanitizer and ensuring that others do, too. She squirted Purell, the antiseptic goop of choice on the stump and self-proclaimed killer of “99.99 percent of most common germs that may cause illness,” on people lined up to meet Vice President Dick Cheney this month at a fund-raiser in Topeka.

When Mr. Cheney was done meeting and greeting, he, too, rubbed his hands vigorously with the stuff, dispensed in dollops by an aide when the vice president was out of public view.

That has become routine in this peak season of handshaking, practiced by everyone from the most powerful leaders to the lowliest hopefuls. Politics is personal at all levels, and germs do not discriminate. Like chicken dinners and lobbyists, they afflict Democrats and Republicans alike. It would be difficult to find an entourage that does not have at least one aide packing Purell.

Some people find that unseemly in itself.

“It’s condescending to the voters,” said Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico, a Democrat.

A fervent nonuser of hand sanitizer, Mr. Richardson holds the Guinness Book of World Records mark for shaking the most hands over an eight-hour period (13,392, at the New Mexico State Fair in 2002).

Indeed, what message does it send when politicians, the putative leaders in a government by the people, for the people, feel compelled to wipe off the residues of said people immediately after meeting them?

“The great part about politics is that you’re touching humanity,” Mr. Richardson said. “You’re going to collect bacteria just by existing.”

Still, politics can be an especially dirty place to exist.

“Every time you’re with big groups of people, you’re going to be exposed to rhinoviruses, adenoviruses and the viruses that cause gastroenteritis,” said Senator Tom Coburn, an Oklahoma Republican and physician.

Mr. Coburn said he washed his hands whenever possible but did not use any antigerm lotions. Being a doctor, he said, he has been exposed to more bugs and, thus, enjoys greater immunity than most other people.

For what it is worth, Howard Dean, also a doctor and the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, said he did not bother with the stuff, either.

“If you’ve had children, you’re immune to everything,” said Mr. Dean, a father of two.

As with most things, this places Mr. Dean at loggerheads with President Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0088537

"Good stuff, keeps you from getting colds," Mr. Bush raved about hand sanitizer to Senator Barack Obama, Democrat of Illinois, at a White House encounter early last year.

Mr. Obama, who recounts the episode in his new book, says that after rubbing a blob of it on his own hands, the president offered him some, which he accepted ("not wanting to appear unhygienic.")

Mr. Obama has since started carrying Purell in his traveling bag, a spokesman said.

It is not clear when politicians became so awash in the gel. In one semifamous cleanliness lapse in the 1992 presidential campaign, Bill Clinton, who had just shaken dozens of hands at a tavern in Boston, was handed a pie but no fork on his way to the car. The ravenous Mr. Clinton promptly devoured it using his unwashed hand. He eventually became a serious user of hand wipes and lotions at the urging of his doctor, an aide said.

Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, said he learned about hand sanitizer from observing Senator Bob Dole's abundant use of it in his 1996 presidential run. Mr. McCain remains vigilant today.

"I use it all the time," he said through a representative. "I carry it with me in my briefcase."

Purell, which is made by GOJO Industries of Akron, Ohio, came on the market as a consumer product in 1997 and became popular in campaign vans, holding rooms and traveling bags in the 2000 campaign. Donald Trump, the billionaire germophobe who contemplated running for president, even distributed little bottles of it to reporters.

"One of the curses of American society is the simple act of shaking hands," Mr. Trump wrote in his book "Comeback." "I happen to be a clean-hands freak."

Al Gore is, too. He turned his running mate, Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, onto sanitizer in 2000, and Mr. Lieberman became an evangelist.

"He said it was one thing he learned from Gore," said an aide to Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, Rebecca Kirszner, who became a popular dispenser of Purell on a senatorial trip to New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina.

Mr. Richardson said that if he ran for president, as he is considering, he had no intention of conforming to the norms of his antiseptic peers.

"I just won't use the sanitizer," he said. "I've been offered it, but I've turned it down."

This positions Mr. Richardson as the early hygienic maverick of 2008.

"I'm not afraid to get my hands dirty," he said.

Justices To Take Up Autism-Case Dispute (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 27 (AP) — The Supreme Court agreed Friday to consider an appeal by an autistic child and his parents, who want to sue over his school accommodations without hiring a lawyer.

The parents, Jeff and Sandee Winkelman, say they cannot afford a lawyer to argue their court case against the school district of Parma, Ohio, near Cleveland, over the education of their son, Jacob.

The federal appeals court in Cincinnati ruled that the Winkelmans, suing under the Individuals With Disabilities Education Act, had to find a lawyer to represent Jacob, although other federal courts have ruled differently in cases involving that law.

The Bush administration then urged the justices to take the case, saying that in adopting the measure, Congress clearly intended that parents be able to represent their children in such court proceedings.

The Winkelmans' suit contested Parma's plan to educate Jacob at a public school. They wanted the district to pay his yearly tuition of $56,000 at a private school that specializes in educating autistic children.

Whether Jacob should have private schooling at public expense is not before the justices, only the question of his parents' right to go into federal court without a lawyer.

The justices also agreed Friday to hear the case of a sheriff's deputy in Georgia who purposely bumped his car into a vehicle he was pursuing at high speed, causing an accident that left the suspect a quadriplegic.

The Sheriff's Office of Coweta County, Ga., had asked the court to consider whether an officer violates a fleeing suspect's constitutional rights by using deadly force to terminate a high-speed chase.

DOJ_NMG_0088538

Two lower federal courts ruled against the deputy, finding that his action was out of proportion to the risk that the suspect had posed to other drivers and pedestrians.

How To Socialize With An Ex-President? Finance His Good Deeds. (NYT)

By Patrick Healy And Eric Konigsberg

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

For New Yorkers thinking of dropping by Pastis this morning to experience the joys of long lines, attitudinal service and cramped tables, forget it — unless you're prepared to spend at least $100,000 for that croque-monsieur, monsieur.

Former President Bill Clinton is making another king-of-the-world swing through Manhattan this weekend, doing two of the things he does best: reveling in adulation and raising money.

Over three days of festivities to mark his 60th birthday — which include a golf tournament and a concert by the Rolling Stones at the Beacon Theater — Mr. Clinton expects to bring in more than $20 million for his foundation's array of philanthropic projects.

His birthday, incidentally, was more than two months ago, and this weekend is the climax of what has been quite a fall season for Mr. Clinton, who is proving once again that he is the hardest-working man in show business. He lined up $7.3 billion in pledges last month for the Clinton Global Initiative, a project of his Clinton Foundation that focuses on fighting poverty and promoting religious tolerance.

And in Toronto last month, at another birthday party in his honor, he raised a separate $21 million for the foundation. He has also raised tens of millions of dollars this year for Democratic candidates.

Some of this weekend's participants say that when it comes to Mr. Clinton, there is no such thing as too much.

"I only wish the weekend cost more, because the more money, the more good work the president can do," said Mark Weiner, a prominent Democratic fund-raiser who is serving as an honorary host of the events. His co-hosts are two other Clinton friends, Ronald W. Burkle, a financier, and Steve Bing, a producer.

Mr. Weiner added: "I consider President Clinton to be the most popular person on the planet, and perhaps the most popular American in the history of this country. And his foundation work is a wonderful thing."

But while there seems to be no shortage of fondness for Mr. Clinton in New York, his industriousness does put him at risk of driving supporters to wonder, what price love?

People contributing $60,000 were invited to a welcome reception at the Gramercy Park Hotel scheduled for last night, a reception and premium dinner seats tonight at the Museum of Natural History, and a reception and Rolling Stones concert tomorrow night, which is also being filmed for a planned Martin Scorsese movie.

In addition to those events, donors who have contributed $100,000 or raised $250,000 also received four tickets for brunch at Pastis with Chelsea Clinton and her parents; "gold" dinner seats tonight; and an invitation for one to play in a presidential golf tournament tomorrow with Mr. Clinton at the Bayonne Golf Club in New Jersey.

Those who have contributed $500,000 — the "birthday chair package" — got "platinum" dinner seating tonight, a backstage pass and dinner with Mr. Clinton before the Stones concert. They can also have their picture taken with him.

One Friend of Bill and a supporter of Hillary Rodham Clinton's senatorial campaigns said privately that he was skipping this weekend because he was "Clintoned out." He added that the Clintons' spate of fund-raisers, which date back to some this summer in the Hamptons, had been "absolutely endless."

James Thurber, director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at American University in Washington, said that some donors eventually tire of being asked for money. "It's pretty costly these days to be a Friend of Bill, especially since you have to be a Friend of Hillary, too," Mr. Thurber said.

Another Clinton ally, Sarah Kovner, said that she and her husband, the lawyer Victor Kovner, would not be attending. "I have my Vassar reunion this weekend," she said. "Also, I think this one is for really big-money donors. I was at the Clinton Global Initiative, which was my contribution to the foundation."

She said that she considered the relatively cheap "membership" fee of $15,000 to participate in that event money well spent.

"They spend two and a half days talking in a substantive way about the work they're doing," she said. "It's not for people who are interested in just showing up."

A spokesman for Mr. Clinton noted that people who did not support the former president as a candidate are now donating to the foundation's nonpartisan efforts. The activities of the foundation, which had a budget of $42 million last year, include a major H.I.V. initiative that has reduced drug prices from $1,000 a year to about $140 in roughly 60 countries.

Other programs focus on supporting health care and clean water projects and reducing greenhouse gas emissions in 24 major cities.

"If you can raise the money to support your programs, why wouldn't you?" said the president's spokesman, Jay Carson. "$100,000 is AIDS drugs for 500 kids."

The Clinton birthday bash got off to an unofficial start on Thursday night, as about 1,000 people gathered under a tent at Tavern on the Green in Manhattan to celebrate Mrs. Clinton's 59th birthday (which actually fell on the same day as the party). The event cost $1,000 a plate and netted about $1 million for her re-election campaign.

Mr. Clinton's high profile on the fund-raising circuit this year has fueled speculation that his efforts are simply a prelude to what he would provide should Senator Clinton run for president in 2008.

"I think with him standing next to her, she's definitely one of the front-runners," said John Catsimatidis, another high-level Clinton donor.

Terry McAuliffe, Mr. Clinton's longtime confidant and an official organizer of the parties, said that they were being held now, rather than closer to Mr. Clinton's birthday on Aug. 19, because "two months ago would've been right in the middle of the elections" — the thick of campaigning — "and we didn't want to be raising money for his foundation when people could be giving to other Democrats' campaigns."

Mr. McAuliffe said, chuckling, that by now any potential donors to the foundation have had earlier opportunities to give to candidates. "We've already hit everybody up pretty hard by now."

Unaired Ad Gets Dixie Chicks Flick A Whole Lot Of Ink (WP)

By Lisa De Moraes

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

NBC and CW networks became unwitting stealth-marketing partners with the Weinstein Co. when they refused to air ads for the film company's upcoming docu-flick about the storm that erupted when the Dixie Chicks' lead singer said in a 2003 concert she was ashamed President Bush was from her home state of Texas.

Or, as we like to say here at The TV Column, when refusing ads for a flick about Censorship and Freedom of Speech, it's always best not to tell the producer in writing that you "cannot accept these spots as they are disparaging to the President" or that your network "does not have appropriate programming in which to schedule this spot" -- because such statements are going to wind up in a news release about network censorship.

It all started earlier this week when Weinstein submitted ads for its new Barbara Kopple documentary "Shut Up & Sing" to the broadcast networks for review by their standards and practices departments.

NBC said it "cannot accept these spots as they are disparaging to President Bush."

CW said it "does not have appropriate programming in which to schedule this spot."

Weinstein said: "Eureka!"

And on Thursday evening, it sent out a news release headlined:

"In an Ironic Twist of Events, NBC and the CW Television Networks Refuse to Air Ads for Documentary Focusing on Freedom of Speech."

"It's a sad commentary about the level of fear in our society that a movie about a group of courageous entertainers who were blacklisted for exercising their right of free speech is now itself being blacklisted by corporate America," bemoaned Weinstein Co. co-chairman Harvey Weinstein.

"The idea that anyone should be penalized for criticizing the president is sad and profoundly un-American," he added.

DOJ_NMG_0088540

And, because Weinstein Co. didn't send out the announcement until too late for reporters in some areas of the country to get an "outside expert" on the phone to comment, it even provided them with one, throwing in a quote from "famed litigator David Boies."

(Boies, FYI, is one of the "legal eagles" who crafted the exit agreement from Disney of the former Miramax chiefs -- Bob and Harvey Weinstein, Variety reported back when.)

"It is disappointing and troubling that NBC and The CW would refuse to accept an otherwise appropriate ad merely because it is critical of President Bush," Boies said in the news release.

"Political criticism is at the heart of the First Amendment. The legal issues are complicated; the policy is not. The public deserves to hear more than the official point of view."

All good stuff. But the Weinstein Co. probably should not have thrown in at the end of the release that it is "exploring taking legal action." Way too Snidely Whiplash.

In case you haven't yet seen it, the 15-second version of the ad opens with President Bush saying in a televised speech, "The United States is ridding Iraq of weapons of mass destruction."

Then the words "Lies Exposed" appear on a black screen.

Cut to: Natalie Maines saying she's embarrassed about Bush, to thunderous applause.

Cut to: Clip of some local news chick saying to camera, "The radio station has set up these garbage cans for people to throw out their CDs."

Cut to: Much hooting and hollering at anti-Dixie Chicks protest, with crowd shouting "U.S.A.! U.S.A.! and waving signs suggesting the singers should be tried for treason. "Move to France, Dixie Chicks!" one guy suggests helpfully.

Cut to: The words "Conspiracy Uncovered" on a black screen.

Cut to: The lead singer reading a message that says "Natalie Maines will be shot dead in Dallas, Texas."

Cut to: News conference with someone official-sounding saying, "The FBI had some intelligence, but they didn't share it." (Which in and of itself is actually a very funny line.)

Cut to: Bush saying, presumably to reporters, while walking, "They shouldn't have their feelings hurt because some people don't want to buy their record."

Cut to: Maines on a couch, reading Bush's comment about their feelings being hurt. " 'Have their feelings hurt'?!" she says, incredulously. "What a dumb --"

Before she can get out the last word, the picture cuts away and Voiceover Guy says, "Rated R -- select theaters this Friday."

When a small movie like this one gets a very limited release -- just four theaters this weekend -- with the intention of going wide after that, word of mouth is critical and that's when you often see stealth marketing campaigns, such as whipping the media into a froth over some angle on the flick to generate millions in free publicity. (The movie opens nationwide Nov. 10.)

Yesterday both NBC and CW noted Weinstein Co. hadn't actually tried to make a national media buy for the ads. So, they seemed to be saying, their comments about the ads are a moot point.

"While a spot was submitted to our broadcast standards and practices department for review and was rejected because it violated our policy of not broadcasting ads that deal with issues of public controversy, the Weinstein Company did not make a national media buy for 'Shut Up & Sing,' nor did anyone from the company inquire about buying time on the network," NBC said.

CW, which values brevity, merely said for the record that the Weinstein news release is "flat-out inaccurate. The whole matter is a mystery to The CW."

"We have lots of issues with commercials all the time," Alan Wurtzel from NBC told The TV Column. Wurtzel oversees the standards department in his capacity as president of research and media development of NBC Universal.

"NBC got back to the film company explaining the ads violated NBC's policy against taking ads that dealt with issues of public controversy, and one of the ways they were doing that was being disparaging of Bush. . . . We never heard from them again," he said.

"These are guys who know what the procedure is with respect to ads clearances -- they've done this for 20 years. Normally they'd be on the phone in a second saying either 'how do I fix it to make it comply?' or 'let me talk to your boss.' In neither case did that happen. . . . This leads me to believe they might have had another objective."

DOJ_NMG_0088541

Asked whether he thought NBC had played into the film company's hand, Wurtzel said, "I will say there have been other instances in the past where [companies] get more publicity by having an ad rejected than run."

Los Angeles Abuse Cases Are Settled For $10 Million (NYT)

By Neela Banerjee

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 27 — The Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Los Angeles and a Catholic religious order have agreed to pay $10 million to settle claims made by seven victims of sexual abuse by clergy members, lawyers for the parties involved said Friday.

While the amount per victim is large relative to payments made to settle sexual abuse cases in other parts of the country, it is typical of the sums paid in California, which has a taken a strong stance toward the Catholic Church in abuse cases. In 2003, for example, the state extended its statute of limitations for child sexual abuse cases, and the Los Angeles District Attorney's Office has been conducting a criminal investigation into the archdiocese since 2002.

More than 95 percent of the $10 million settlement will be paid by the religious order, the Carmelites, Province of the Most Pure Heart of Mary, which is based in Darien, Ill. The archdiocese will pay less than 5 percent, lawyers for the plaintiffs and the order said.

The settlement for the most part is not covered by the Carmelites' insurance, said Jim Geoly, the order's lawyer, adding that the order might have to borrow money to pay the sum.

Mr. Geoly said the order wanted to avoid protracted litigation, which he said would have amounted to going to war with the plaintiffs, "because that's what litigation is."

"They are deeply sorry that this sexual abuse occurred and that the church didn't have more understanding of this kind of problem at the time," he said. "They want to do everything they can to make it right, even though money can't make the abuse go away."

The seven plaintiffs accused four Carmelite priests and one Carmelite brother of sexual abuse in a period from the early 1950s to the late 1970s.

Several of the claims focused on the Rev. Dominic Savino, who held several high-ranking faculty positions at Crespi Carmelite High School in the Encino section of the city before he was removed from the ministry in 2002. One plaintiff accused Father Savino and another priest of raping him at the school when he was 15 and continuing the abuse from 1978 to 1979, said John C. Manly, a lawyer for the plaintiff.

Mr. Manly and victims' rights groups welcomed the decision by the Carmelites, though they said that it had been hard-won.

"I'm glad Carmelites did the right thing," said Mr. Manly, himself a Catholic, "but I think that's what's ultimately wrong with the Catholic Church: you shouldn't have to sue your church to get them and the bishop to do the right thing."

Movement Reportedly Seen At N.Korea Site (AP)

By Bo-mi Lim, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 28, 2006

South Korean military officials have observed activities at the North's suspected nuclear test site that may be preparations for a second test, news reports said Saturday.

Yonhap news agency, citing several unidentified military officials, said Seoul is keeping a close watch on the movements of trucks and soldiers at the Punggye-ri site in the country's remote northeast.

"It is clear there are movements at Punggye-ri after the (previous) nuclear test," one military official was quoted as saying. "We are closely monitoring to see if these are preparations for a second nuclear test."

Another official confirmed activities at the site, but said another test "is not believed to be imminent," according to Yonhap.

It was not immediately clear how the military officials first spotted the activity at the site. However, the United States and South Korea generally share intelligence information from satellite images.

Meanwhile, more unidentified South Korean government officials said they are trying to confirm whether a new facility that has been built at the site could be part of preparations for a second nuclear test, the JoongAng Ilbo newspaper reported Saturday.

DOJ_NMG_0088542

South Korea's Defense Ministry said it could not confirm the reports, and the U.S. State Department refused to comment. A Pentagon spokesman, Air Force Maj. David Smith, said: "We don't discuss intelligence issues as a matter of policy."

This is not the first time that suspicious activity has been reported at the North Korean test site. But South Korean officials have said they have no intelligence suggesting another test is imminent.

The reports came a day after the incoming U.N. secretary-general, South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon, met with Chinese leaders to discuss sanctions against the North over its Oct. 9 underground nuclear test.

Ban met on Friday with China's President Hu Jintao, State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan and Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing. South Korea's Foreign Ministry said they would discuss sanctions, but details of their talks were not immediately released.

Ban is visiting the five permanent U.N. Security Council members following his election as secretary-general this month. He pledged to make resolving the North Korea nuclear issue a key priority on his agenda as head of the international body.

The United States has been trying muster greater support for a U.N. Security Council resolution that calls for sanctions in response to the North's nuclear test.

Seoul and Beijing have been reluctant to enforce sanctions over the test for fear they might aggravate their unpredictable neighbor and destabilize the region.

China and South Korea are the North's main aid providers and trade partners, and their participation is considered crucial for the success of the U.N. resolution, which bans the sale of major arms to the North and calls for the inspection of cargo entering and leaving the country.

Associated Press writers Meraiah Foley in Seoul and Audra Ang in Beijing contributed to this report.

Gingerly, South Korea Imposes First Sanction On North (NYT)

By Martin Fackler

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

SEOUL, South Korea, Oct. 27 — South Korea has taken a first step toward imposing United Nations sanctions against North Korea for conducting a nuclear test, banning visits by officials involved in the North's nuclear weapons program.

And in a sign of how Seoul has struggled to carry out the United Nations Security Council resolution without antagonizing the heavily armed North, a third top government official involved in North Korea offered to resign Friday over the test.

The travel ban, first reported by several news organizations on Thursday, is largely symbolic in a country that gets few North Korean visitors at all, much less officials engaged in the North's covert nuclear weapons efforts. It falls short of American requests that South Korea join a United States-led effort to inspect North Korean ships for nuclear and missile-related technology.

South Korean officials have expressed concern that such searches could lead to clashes between South and North Korean warships, something that has occurred in the past.

The resignation offer — by Kim Seung-gyu, head of the National Intelligence Service — came days after the defense minister and the unification minister, the point man on relations with the North, also tendered their resignations.

While President Roh Moo-hyun has not said whether he will accept the resignations, South Korean news media have reported that a cabinet reshuffle is imminent. With the foreign minister, Ban Ki-moon, about to become the new secretary general of the United Nations, Mr. Roh may have to replace all aides who oversee his policy on the North.

The cooperation of South Korea, a major source of trade and investment for the North, is seen as crucial for the success of the United Nations resolution, adopted after the North's test on Oct. 9. The resolution bans the sale of weapons to the North, and restricts sales of luxury goods and travel abroad by its officials.

In addition to not becoming involved in searching North Korean ships, Seoul also has so far balked at taking more punishing steps, like closing a South Korean-run industrial park and a tourist resort in North Korea, which are the North's largest economic contacts with the outside world. Many South Korean officials have said they fear that stronger sanctions could provoke the North into war, or push it toward China.

Using A 2nd Network, Iran Raises Enrichment Ability (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088543

TEHRAN, Oct. 27 — Iran has begun to enrich uranium in a second network of centrifuges, an Iranian local news agency reported Friday, in defiance of a United Nations Security Council demand that it halt its nuclear program.

ISNA Student News Agency quoted an "informed source" as saying that Iran installed a second cascade of 164 centrifuges two weeks ago and successfully injected gas into it last week, theoretically doubling its enrichment capacity.

"We now have the product of the second cascade," the unidentified speaker was quoted as saying.

International Atomic Energy Agency inspectors know of this activity, he said.

In Washington, President Bush said he was aware of "speculation" that Iran has started enriching uranium in a second network. "Whether they doubled it or not, the idea of Iran having a nuclear weapon is unacceptable," Mr. Bush said.

But Russia's defense minister, Sergei Ivanov, said it was too early to speak about Iran being able to produce weapons-grade uranium. "These are empty centrifuges," he told the Itar-Tass news agency. "You can't produce anything with them, so to speak about enriching uranium is premature."

The announcement was widely expected. On Monday, the head of the I.A.E.A., Mohamed ElBaradei, said that "based on our most recent inspections, the second centrifuge cascade is in place and ready to go."

As Iran was reporting the doubling of its enrichment capacity, the five permanent members of the Council — the United States, Britain, France, China and Russia — and Germany were discussing a draft resolution to impose sanctions on Iran for its refusal to comply with their earlier demand that it stop enrichment.

The draft resolution would reportedly bar Iranian students from studying nuclear physics at foreign universities, prohibit technical or financial assistance that could benefit the nuclear program and impose a visa ban on any Iranians involved in nuclear activities.

A senior Western diplomat in Tehran said Iran went ahead after seeing the limited sanctions imposed on North Korea after its nuclear test this month. "They were reasonably reassured that if North Korea can live with the sanctions, they can do better," said the diplomat, who refused to be identified. "They think if they give in now, it is a sign of weakness and the West will ask for more."

Iran insists that its program is for peaceful purposes, and that as a member of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty it has the legal right to enrich uranium to produce its own reactor fuel. The United States says Iran, a major oil exporter, has no need for a peaceful nuclear program and is merely using it as a cover for an effort to produce nuclear weapons.

Iran, which already had one cascade of 164 centrifuges in operation, has said repeatedly that it plans to increase the number of centrifuges in operation to 3,000 by the end of this year. In a separate interview, Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, said Tehran was still willing to resolve its nuclear issue through negotiations. But he also issued a veiled threat, saying Europeans "should pay the price" if they choose a different path, ISNA reported. He did not elaborate, but it seemed that he was referring to sanctions.

"If Europeans think they can pursue a radical approach toward Iran and negotiate with us on the side as well, they should know that Iranians are not naïve people," he added.

He also rejected comments made by the foreign minister, Manouchehr Mottaki, who said last week that Iran might consider suspending its program during negotiations. "I do not approve this view," he said. "I am in charge of nuclear issues and I do not think the news was accurate."

Members of the Security Council reacted to the announcement immediately, [a news agency] reported.

The Foreign Ministry spokesman in France, Jean-Baptiste Mattéi, said the report increased the international community's worries about the growth of Iran's capacity to produce fissile material.

"The priority is to move toward the negotiation of a Security Council resolution," Mr. Mattéi told reporters in Paris in response to the news.

A British Foreign Office spokesman said it was a matter for the I.A.E.A., the United Nations nuclear agency, to investigate.

Bush Says It's Unacceptable For Iran To Have Nuclear Weapon (WP)

By Colum Lynch, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088544

WASHINGTON - President Bush said on Friday he was aware of "speculation" that Iran has started enriching uranium in a second network of centrifuges and said it was unacceptable for Tehran to have a nuclear weapon.

"It says to me that we must double our effort to work with the international community to persuade the Iranians that there is only isolation from the world if they continue working forward on such a program," Bush told reporters during a meeting with NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer.

"I've read the speculation that that's what they may be doing. But whether they doubled it or not, the idea of Iran having a nuclear weapon is unacceptable," Bush added.

Iran Doubles Nuke Enrichment Capacity (AP)

By Nasser Karimi, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 28, 2006

Iran has doubled its capacity to enrich uranium by successfully executing the process with a second network of centrifuges, a semiofficial news agency reported Friday, sending a defiant new message to the U.N. Security Council.

Council members are working on a draft resolution that would impose limited sanctions on the Islamic republic because of its refusal to cease enrichment, a process that can produce fuel for a civilian nuclear reactor or fissile material for a warhead.

The Iranian Students News Agency quoted an anonymous official as saying Iran has successfully begun injecting gas into a second network of centrifuges.

"We are injecting gas into the second cascade, which we installed two weeks ago," the official said, according to ISNA.

The news agency said the second cascade had doubled Iran's capacity to enrich uranium.

"We have already exploited the product of the second cascade," the official was quoted as saying.

Iranian authorities are believed to leak ISNA information that they want published but consider too sensitive for release to official media.

The State Department said it was up to the International Atomic Energy Agency to assess the reports. "I cannot confirm those reports. We are not on the ground," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

President Bush said that regardless of the accuracy, it was "unacceptable" for Iran to have a nuclear weapon and the report underscored the need for the United States and its allies to redouble its effort to stop Iran from developing nuclear ambitions.

The U.N. Security Council has demanded that Tehran cease all enrichment-related activities amid fears by the U.S. and its allies that Iran is seeking to develop a program that can make weapons-grade uranium for nuclear warheads. The Iranians claim their nuclear program is peaceful.

France's Foreign Ministry called Iran's expansion of its nuclear program a "negative signal" that should be taken to account at U.N. talks over possible sanctions.

A spokesman for the ministry, Jean-Baptiste Mattei, said the Iranian announcement was not a great surprise because the IAEA, the U.N. nuclear watchdog, had said in August that Iran was developing new nuclear capacities.

"The door to negotiations is always open, but at the same time the priority goes to the negotiations for a U.N. Security Council resolution," Mattei said at a news conference.

French President Jacques Chirac, meanwhile, expressed support for sanctions against Iran but insisted that they be temporary and reversible.

Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov said he didn't "share concerns" about the launching of a second network of centrifuges, expressing confidence that the new centrifuges "are under the complete control of the International Atomic Energy Agency, for scientific research purposes."

He also said the centrifuges were "completely empty, so to talk about enriched uranium or uranium for military use, is at the very least premature."

The basis of his statement was unclear, however. The IAEA monitors both "cascades" of centrifuges, but they are not under its "complete control," as Ivanov asserted. And — unlike Ivanov — the Iranian official cited by ISNA said the second network was no longer empty but enriching small amounts of uranium.

DOJ_NMG_0088545

Other Russian officials also had shared previously shared the opinion of the United States and its western allies, Britain, France and Germany that even "dry testing" centrifuges was cause for concern.

Russia and China, which can veto Security Council resolutions and have close economic ties with Iran, are reportedly pushing for continued dialogue with Iran instead of punishment.

In a separate report on Friday, ISNA quoted Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, as saying his country's enrichment program should not hinder negotiations with the West.

"It is possible to review both nuclear and regional issues through negotiation," Larijani was quoted as saying.

Larijani called for an open negotiation on the enrichment issue, and blamed the West of being irrational in its opposition to an Iranian nuclear program, which Tehran says is geared toward purely civilian use.

Diplomats, who spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to divulge the information to media, told The Associated Press on Monday that even the decision to "dry test" the 164 centrifuges in the second Iranian pilot enrichment facility showed Iran's defiance of the Security Council. The council had set an Aug. 31 deadline for Tehran to cease all experiments linked to enrichment.

Iran produced a small batch of low-enriched uranium — suitable as nuclear fuel but not weapons grade — in February, using its initial cascade of 164 centrifuges at its pilot plant at Natanz.

The Iran official quoted by ISNA said the nuclear watchdog was fully aware that Tehran was injecting the gas in its new centrifuges, and that nuclear inspectors had already arrived in Iran.

The Vienna, Austria-based IAEA would not comment on the report.

Iran says it plans to install 3,000 centrifuges at Natanz by the end of this year. Some 54,000 centrifuges would be required to produce enough nuclear fuel for a reactor.

Although Iran is nowhere near that goal, its successful operation of more cascades of centrifuges indicates that the country is gradually mastering the complexities of producing enriched uranium.

The U.S. and its European allies are circulating a draft U.N. Security Council resolution that would ban the sale of missile and nuclear technology to Iran and deny the country certain assistance from the U.N. nuclear watchdog.

The enrichment process takes gas produced from raw uranium and aims to increase its proportion of the uranium-235 isotope, needed for nuclear fission.

The gas is pumped into a centrifuge, which spins, causing a small portion of the heavier, more prevalent uranium-238 isotope to drop away. The gas then proceeds to other centrifuges — thousands of them — where the process is repeated, increasing the proportion of uranium-235.

Enrichment Capacity Doubled, Source Says (WT/AP)

By Nasser Karimi, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

TEHRAN -- Iran has doubled its capacity to enrich uranium by successfully carrying out the process with a second network of centrifuges, a semiofficial news agency reported yesterday, sending a defiant new message to the U.N. Security Council.

Council members are working on a draft resolution that would impose limited sanctions on the Islamic republic because of its refusal to cease enrichment, a process that can produce fuel for a civilian nuclear reactor or fissile material for a warhead.

The Iranian Students News Agency (ISNA) quoted an anonymous official as saying Iran has successfully begun injecting gas into a second network of centrifuges.

"We are injecting gas into the second cascade, which we installed two weeks ago," the official said, according to ISNA.

The news agency said the second cascade had doubled Iran's capacity to enrich uranium. "We have already exploited the product of the second cascade," the official was quoted.

The State Department said it was up to the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) to assess the reports. "I cannot confirm those reports. We are not on the ground," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

President Bush said that regardless of the accuracy, it was "unacceptable" for Iran to have a nuclear weapon and the report underscored the need for the United States and its allies to redouble an effort to stop Iran from developing nuclear capability.

DOJ_NMG_0088546

The U.N. Security Council has demanded that Tehran cease all enrichment-related activities amid concern by the United States and its allies that Iran is seeking to develop a program that can make weapons-grade uranium for nuclear warheads. The Iranians have said their nuclear program is peaceful.

France's Foreign Ministry called Iran's expansion of its nuclear program a "negative signal" that should be taken to account at U.N. talks over possible sanctions.

French President Jacques Chirac expressed support for sanctions against Iran but insisted they be temporary and reversible.

Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov said he didn't "share concerns" about the starting of a second network of centrifuges, expressing confidence that the new centrifuges "are under the complete control of the [IAEA], for scientific research purposes."

Russia and China, which can veto Security Council resolutions and have close economic ties with Iran, are reportedly pushing for continued dialogue with Iran instead of punishment.

In a separate report yesterday, ISNA quoted Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, as saying his country's enrichment program should not hinder negotiations with the West.

Iran produced a small batch of low-enriched uranium in February, using its initial cascade of 164 centrifuges at its pilot plant at Natanz.

The U.S. and its European allies are circulating a draft U.N. Security Council resolution that would ban the sale of missile and nuclear technology to Iran and deny the country certain assistance from the U.N. nuclear watchdog.

Iranian Nuclear Effort Defies U.N. Council Again (WP)

By Colum Lynch, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 27 -- Iran has once again defied the U.N. Security Council's repeated demands to halt its nuclear activities, firing up a second line of centrifuges to increase its ability to enrich uranium, according to a report by a semi official Iranian news agency.

The report came as U.N. negotiations became bogged down in the face of Russia's and China's reluctance to slap tough sanctions on Tehran. U.S. and European officials say they anticipate a long, hard diplomatic struggle over the coming weeks to fashion a formal reaction to Iran's enrichment activities.

President Bush warned on Friday that it is "unacceptable" for Iran to produce nuclear weapons. But the United States has been stymied in its efforts to gain speedy passage of a sanctions resolution.

Bush said the Iranian report "says to me that we must double our effort to work with the international community to persuade the Iranians that there is only isolation from the world if they continue working forward on such a program."

"The idea of Iran having a nuclear weapon is unacceptable," Bush added after a meeting with NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer. "And it's unacceptable for the United States, and it's unacceptable to nations we're working with in the United Nations to send a common message."

The Security Council passed a resolution on July 31 threatening to consider sanctions against Iran if it did not suspend its enrichment of uranium and a package of incentives. Those incentives, which include greater access to Western markets and guarantees of foreign-supplied nuclear fuel, are backed by the council's five permanent members -- the United States, Russia, France, Britain and China -- plus Germany.

Iran says that it is willing to restart talks with the major powers to resolve the nuclear crisis but that it will not agree to suspend its enrichment activities as a precondition. It maintains that it has the right, under the 1970 Non-Proliferation Treaty, to enrich uranium for the production of nuclear power for what it describes as a purely civilian energy program.

With no breakthrough in sight, France, Britain and Germany presented the United States, Russia and China this week with a draft resolution that would ban trade related to Iran's nuclear and ballistic-missile programs but would allow Russia to continue to support the construction of an Iranian nuclear facility at Bushehr.

DOJ_NMG_0088547

French President Jacques Chirac told reporters during a visit to the city of Wuhan, China, that "appropriate, adapted, temporary and reversible sanctions will probably have to be found and imposed to show Iran that the whole of the international community does not understand its position," according to [a news agency].

The Bush administration declined to endorse the European draft because of concerns that it is too weak to constrain Iran from pursuing a clandestine nuclear weapons program. But Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov has suggested that the European draft is too tough and does not conform with the six nations' aim of eliminating "the risks of sensitive technology falling into Iran's hands" while maintaining "vital channels of communication with Iran."

Russia is furious that the United States in July sanctioned two Russian military contractors -- the state arms exporter Rosoboronexport and aircraft manufacturer Sukhoi -- under the 2000 Iran Nonproliferation Act.

Vitaly Churkin, Russia's ambassador to the United Nations, has hinted that the U.S. failure to lift those sanctions could complicate the Iran negotiations. "If we work collectively, we need to work collectively," Churkin said recently. "If they want to go it on their own, you know legislating unilateral sanctions, they are welcome to tackle the problem alone."

Iran is still years away from producing enough highly enriched uranium to build a nuclear bomb, according to analysts. It fired up its first 164-centrifuge line, called a cascade, earlier this year at the Natanz nuclear facility -- where Iran plans to operate up to 3,000 centrifuges. But it has been progressing at a slower rate than expected, producing only a tiny sample of enriched uranium.

David Albright, an expert on the Iran nuclear program and president of the Institute for Science and International Security, said the second cascade is too small to produce sufficient quantities of enriched uranium for a nuclear bomb. The concern, he said, is whether Tehran's nuclear scientists are close to mastering the full-scale enrichment of uranium at the facility. He said the Iranians are clearly "moving forward" in their understanding of the nuclear fuel cycle.

The Iranian Students' News Agency, which is close to the government, reported that Iran began injecting UF-6 gas into the new cascade earlier this week, a key step in producing enriched uranium.

An official at the International Atomic Energy Agency declined to confirm or deny the Iranian report. But the agency's director general, Mohamed ElBaradei, told The Washington Post on Monday that Iran was days away from using the cascade to enrich uranium.

Rice Says Hezbollah Must Disarm To Be Part Of Lebanon's Political Process (USAT/AP)

USA Today, October 28, 2006

BEIRUT (AP) — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice stepped up international pressure on Hezbollah to disarm, saying in a television interview aired Friday that the guerrilla group must surrender its weapons if it wants to remain part of Lebanon's political process.

Rice urged Hezbollah to lay down its arms according to the cease-fire that ended its 34-day war with Israel last summer, and choose between being a militant group and a legitimate political organization.

Hezbollah is under heavy international pressure to surrender its weapons, but the Iranian- and Syrian-backed group — which holds 11 seats in the Lebanese parliament and two spots in the Cabinet — has refused to disarm.

"If Hezbollah wants to be in politics... Hezbollah should be disarmed. You cannot have one foot in terror and the use of violence and the other foot in politics. It just doesn't work that way," Rice said in an interview with the privately-owned Lebanese Broadcasting Corp.

"Hezbollah has to decide whether it's going to maintain its terrorist wing and remain a terrorist organization or whether it's going to ... be part the political process," she said.

The interview was taped at Rice's office in Washington, and conducted by May Chidiac, a Lebanese journalist who lost an arm and a leg in car bombing in Lebanon in September 2005.

The U.S. government has labeled Hezbollah a terrorist organization and blames it for the deaths of 241 U.S. Marines in the bombing of their Beirut barracks in 1983, as well as for two attacks on the U.S. embassy in Beirut and the 1985 TWA hijacking that killed an American serviceman on board. Hezbollah has repeatedly denied such accusations and says it now opposes terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0088548

Rice also urged the Lebanese government to end what it called Hezbollah's "state within a state" and prevent weapons from reaching the militant group.

"I'm counting on Lebanon to live up to its obligations, and I'm counting on Lebanon to want to evolve to a normal state," Rice told the satellite channel. "And a normal state has an army and police that answer to the state, not to a state within a state."

The U.N. cease-fire resolution that ended the Hezbollah-Israel war on Aug. 14 called for the Lebanese army to deploy alongside international peacekeepers in Hezbollah strongholds across south Lebanon. Some 16,000 Lebanese troops have fanned out across the region, including along the border with Israel, for the first time in decades.

The two forces are tasked with establishing a Hezbollah-free buffer zone stretching some 30 kilometers (18 miles) north of the Israeli border.

Rice also warned that as Lebanon tries to rebuild, some people might try to destabilize its Western-backed government.

"We've heard that there are people who would like to intimidate or assassinate again," she said, referring to the 2005 assassinations of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri and other anti-Syrian politicians. She did not elaborate.

Asked if Syria was trying to destabilize Lebanon following its withdrawal last year, Rice said: "It's not any great secret that there are concerns about what Syria, which once occupied the country, might try and do through continuing contacts in the country. But I don't want accuse any one place. I just want to make very clear that the international community believes there should be no foreign intimidation of the Lebanese people."

(hd-aj-lf)

Goodwill Ambassador? Venezuela Is Leery Of U.S. Envoy (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

LECHERÍA, Venezuela

PRESIDENT HUGO CHÁVEZ does not bother to hide how he feels about William Brownfield, the United States ambassador to this country. “Start packing your bags, mister, if you keep on provoking us,” Mr. Chávez said on TV this year. “Because I’ll kick you out of here.”

Some of Mr. Chávez’s supporters feel the same way. Protesters on motorcycles chased Mr. Brownfield’s car in Caracas last April, beating on its doors and pelting it with tomatoes and eggs. When Mr. Brownfield visited Nueva Esparta last December to hand out baseball equipment, demonstrators threw rocks at his car.

With relations between Washington and Caracas at a low ebb, Mr. Brownfield, a loquacious Texan and career diplomat, has one of the most challenging jobs of any American ambassador. Though at a career stage when some would prefer a plush embassy in a friendly country, Mr. Brownfield seems to relish the opportunity to engage Venezuelans on a street level.

This is no easy undertaking in a country where President Bush is regularly pilloried (an exposition at the Foreign Ministry in Caracas this week depicted Mr. Bush in Nazi clothing).

While Mr. Brownfield is not always greeted with rocks and eggs, he does find himself fighting an uphill battle almost wherever he goes. That much was evident when he arrived here in eastern Venezuela recently, bodyguards in tow, to deliver one of his speeches that gently rankle Mr. Chávez.

Mr. Brownfield started by thanking Venezuela for offering subsidized heating oil to poor Americans this winter. Then he pointed out that Venezuela’s ambassador in Washington similarly travels around the United States speaking to groups interested in Mr. Chávez’s “Bolivarian Revolution.”

“Why, I think my friend Ambassador Bernardo Álvarez is in San Juan at this very moment,” Mr. Brownfield, 54, said in fluent but heavily accented Spanish. (Mr. Álvarez was there to show support for Puerto Rico’s independence movement.)

Finally, responding to questions from local journalists, Mr. Brownfield defended the Bush administration’s recent prohibition on arms sales to Venezuela, after the State Department listed Venezuela as uncooperative in counterterrorism efforts.

That ended his visit here to an American Corner, one of four he has recently opened in the country. These are essentially libraries and information centers run jointly by the State Department and a local group, where people can study English or read up on American history and culture.

DOJ_NMG_0088549

About 30 residents gathered to see him in the municipal building of Lechería, a city led by an anti-Chávez mayor. But even here, the reception was cool. Some tapped messages into their Blackberrys while he spoke. All applauded politely when he finished.

The rest of his trip did not go as smoothly. Tarek William Saab, an author and the governor of Anzoátegui State, described by Mr. Chávez as "the poet of the revolution," refused to meet with Mr. Brownfield. Executives from two American energy companies with operations here also declined because their partner, Venezuela's national oil company, denied Mr. Brownfield permission to enter their refining complex.

SO it goes in a country that, paradoxically, maintains resilient commercial ties with the United States. Anti-American sentiment is often directed personally at Mr. Brownfield, who grew up in a ranching family and sometimes sports a University of Texas baseball cap.

Newspapers have dubbed him el Tejano, the Texan, a nod to his straightforward if ironic style in pressing ahead with his street diplomacy. He grew up not far from Brownfield, a West Texas ranching town named for an ancestor.

After leaving Texas he entered the Foreign Service in the late 1970s, "starting life," as he puts it, in the heart of Venezuela's oil patch in Maracaibo, where there was once an American Consulate. Rising to become one of the most respected American diplomats in Latin America, he accepted assignments in Panama, as political adviser to the United States Southern Command, and as ambassador to Chile. His wife, Kristie A. Kenney, is the United States ambassador to the Philippines.

Since presenting his credentials to Mr. Chávez in August 2004, Mr. Brownfield has repeatedly had to deny claims that the Pentagon is preparing to send the Marines to invade Venezuela. Still, Mr. Chávez finds the United States a convenient boogeyman, using the idea of invasion to strengthen ties with Iran and cement domestic political support.

"We've been a partner with Venezuela for 200 years," Mr. Brownfield said in an interview. "This is a partnership that will endure times of stress."

A hardening of relations seems almost inevitable, with spats emerging almost monthly. The two countries are now clashing over Venezuela's bid to win a seat on the United Nations Security Council and a push by Mr. Brownfield to reopen the consulate in Maracaibo — a support base for Manuel Rosales, the leading opposition candidate in December presidential elections. Both efforts have stalled.

Mr. Brownfield, meanwhile, travels around Venezuela. Often his venues are at baseball diamonds, which he views as areas where the two countries have a history of cooperation. Even Mr. Chávez has been known to don a baseball uniform, evoking youthful dreams of pitching for the San Francisco Giants.

Mr. Brownfield's overtures, like those of American diplomats in Havana, are often regarded here as imperialist aggression. At first glance, the American Corner in Lechería seems benign. Its library has biographies of Bill Clinton, Katharine Graham and Theodore Roosevelt.

But pro-Chávez activists like Eva Golinger, an American lawyer who lives in Caracas, have denounced the American Corners, which are more common in former countries of the Soviet Union, as examples of "psychological and propaganda operations."

"Mr. Brownfield is sticking out his foot, in order to have it stepped on," José Vicente Rangel, Venezuela's vice president, said this year. "What he wants is for some hothead, or some provocateur that they invite themselves, to throw a stone at him."

THE challenges before Mr. Brownfield were evident in a visit to a dilapidated public hospital in Barcelona, a city next to Lechería. He went to publicize a program that brings American doctors to repair cleft palates in poor children.

Families of more than 90 children greeted Mr. Brownfield as he walked throughout the hospital, accompanied by aides and television cameras. Oneida López, the aunt of a 2-year-old boy who had undergone the surgery, said Mr. Brownfield was a "very generous man." But Ms. López said she admired Mr. Chávez more.

She traveled to Barcelona from her home city, Anaco, earlier this month to see the president when he opened a cancer unit at the same hospital. She said she recently started a job as a street sweeper at a cooperative, one of many social welfare programs created by Mr. Chávez. "I love my president," said Ms. López, 31.

Perhaps relations between the countries come into clearer focus when Mr. Brownfield shows his teeth. One story in diplomatic circles in Caracas describes his brief meeting last year with Mr. Chávez.

DOJ_NMG_0088550

"Mr. Brownfield recommended holding a friendly baseball game between the staffs of the presidential palace and the United States Embassy, on the condition that the marines played on the American side. "I have only seven of them here," he told Mr. Chávez, who reacted with a cool smile and ended the encounter.

A spokeswoman at Venezuela's communications ministry said she was unable to confirm details of the meeting. An embassy spokesman said only, "On matters as important as baseball, we don't comment."

Colombia City Makes A U-turn (LAT)

By Chris Kraul, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

Bogota, once a world capital of mayhem, is now held up as a model.

A decade ago, the Bosa slum was the black hole of Bogota. Its darkest corner was Laurel Park, a grassless, trash-strewn lot with open sewage and gun-toting gangs bent on muggings and murder.

Today, Bosa has paved streets, new schools, health clinics and cafeterias, and links to a new mass transit system. Laurel Park has been rechristened Park of the Arts and is alive with children at play and free theater, fashion shows and concerts.

Like much of this re-energized capital of more than 7 million inhabitants, the war zone that was Bosa has been transformed.

"The change has surprised everyone, not just visibly but socially," said Nubia Zuaza, a community activist who has lived in the area for 20 years. "From a focal point of delinquency, the park now embodies a sense of community that wasn't there before."

The same can be said for much of Bogota, which in the 1990s earned a well-deserved reputation as a world capital of mayhem. Car bombings, assassinations, killings and kidnappings sent thousands of Bogota's residents fleeing to the United States or had them hunkering down in their homes. Bogota was, in many urban experts' view, a failed city choked with traffic and pollution and victimized by a seemingly uncontrollable crime wave.

"When I took office, people told me: 'Nobody can fix this. Bogota is totally hopeless,' " said Enrique Peñalosa, the capital's mayor from 1997 to 2000.

Now, visionary leadership by Peñalosa and two other Bogota mayors is credited with helping turn the city around. Improved public finances, reduced crime and congestion, a slew of public works, and reduced and more orderly traffic have made Colombia's capital livable again.

Urban experts around the world are taking notice. At the architecture exhibition at last month's Venice Biennale, the organizers cited the city as an exemplar in mass transit. Highlighted were the continent's largest network of bike paths and Bogota's 300-mile Transmilenio bus system, which after six years of existence boasts a daily ridership of 1.4 million.

The United Nations, the World Bank and the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation have cited the 70% drop in Bogota's homicide rate, an even steeper decline in kidnappings, and the addition of a score of public libraries, most of them in poor areas.

But the proof of the turnaround is in the attitudes of the residents. Polls show that citizens who once overwhelmingly saw life here as a cross to bear are hopeful about the future and happier to be here.

"The quality of life has improved with all that's been done, like the schools and the community dining rooms. People see that the government is doing something," said seamstress Sonia Ruiz, 45, a 25-year resident of the Bosa barrio. She spoke as she walked near the Park of the Arts, which on a weekday afternoon was clogged with kids playing on swings and kicking soccer balls.

Another Bosa resident, 50-year-old electrician Manuel Penola, said that the barrio was "no utopia yet" and that break-ins still happen, potholes go months without fixing, and there is flooding after downpours. "But that's because the city is too big, and barrios like this arose illegally with no planning," Penola said. "Now, at least, we have cooking gas and, with the Transmilenio nearby, the streets are safer and a lot less jammed."

The city appears to have entered an era that author Armando Silva hopefully describes as a "culture of citizenship," a term that could never have been applied to Bogota a decade ago.

DOJ_NMG_0088551

"The self-image of crime, violence and no future was so strong in the '90s that no one could see a way out," said Silva, a philosophy professor at the National University of Colombia. "But there has been a change in the political direction of the city, and you have to credit the citizens themselves who demanded it."

Urban planning expert Juan Carlos del Castillo said the seeds of change were planted during the administration of Mayor Jaime Castro in the early 1990s. Castro initiated Bogota's first land-use plan and persuaded the federal legislature to grant him stronger powers, having found himself overshadowed by a city council dominated by corrupt real estate and transportation interests.

"At the time there was total chaos in the city," said Del Castillo, who teaches at the National University of Colombia. "The law of the jungle said that people did whatever they wanted, whether it was walling off a street, ignoring their taxes or gas bills, or parking their cars on sidewalks."

Castro's successor, Antanas Mockus, son of Lithuanian immigrants and a former university rector, tried to restore a sense of citizenship, employing a whimsical approach that included using mimes to shame motorists into heeding stoplights and crosswalks. But he also played fiscal hardball to improve tax collection and clean up the city's finances.

Mockus said in an interview that he also attacked Bogota's seemingly unsolvable crime problem by approaching it as an "epidemiologist would tuberculosis." He mapped out areas where crime was highest and targeted them by increasing patrols and halting liquor sales selectively after 1 a.m. on weekends.

"Crime is caused not only by professional criminals but by social aggression, arguments that get out of hand, often when alcohol is involved," Mockus said. "My approach was that all of us have a rude person inside of us and it's our job to regulate him."

Although crime has by no means disappeared, most Bogotanos you stop on the street tell you their city feels safer.

"Two or three years ago, I never walked downtown alone. Now I feel I'm taking no risk in going," 25-year-old domestic worker Mari Cordero said as she left her job in Bogota's wealthy Chico section.

By the end of Mockus' first term in December 1997 (he was reelected in late 2000 and began a second three-year term in 2001), crime rates had begun to fall and public finances were strengthening. Thanks to Castro's improved property-tax collection and Mockus' reorganization of the power company, Mockus left a budget surplus of about $700 million for incoming Mayor Peñalosa.

A part-time professor and business consultant with the U.S. firm Arthur D. Little before taking office, Peñalosa used the surplus to launch a public works program designed to dramatically reduce traffic, which he describes as Bogota's bane. "Cars are lethal weapons that dehumanize society," he said.

"I could have used the surplus to build seven elevated highways for more cars, but that would have left no money for public spaces or libraries," Peñalosa said. "Those highways would have been undemocratic since 70% of Bogotanos don't have cars."

Using a model set by the Brazilian city of Curitiba, he planned and began construction of the Transmilenio bus system and restricted each private automobile's circulation to five days a week.

The current mayor, Luis Eduardo Garzon, has taken on the poverty fight, guaranteeing free lunches to the poor and elderly in a program called "Bogota Without Hunger" and extending the city's free health clinic network.

The city's development trajectory is not without critics, including Venus Albeiro Silva Gomez, the federal deputy who represents the Bosa district. "Too much of the spending is directed to the north of the city where the rich people live," he said, "and not enough in the south where the poor are."

But few would dispute that Bogota has vastly improved since a decade ago.

"It's difficult to measure, but I think the city has recovered its self-respect," urban planner Del Castillo said. "If you asked people 10 years ago, they'd tell you the city is governed by thieves. Today it's the opposite."

chris.kraul@latimes.com

Times researcher Jenny Carolina Gonzalez contributed to this report.

Coca Growers Resist Bolivia Crackdown (WT)

By Martin Arostegui, The Washington Times

DOJ_NMG_0088552

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

SANTA CRUZ, Bolivia -- Indigenous coca farmers who helped put President Evo Morales in power are violently resisting even the token eradication efforts demanded by the United States to avoid Bolivia's decertification as a country cooperating against drug trafficking.

Dissatisfied with new laws permitting peasant farmers to grow up to half an acre of coca for traditional use, the farmers are backing demands for increased acreage with road blocks and gunfights that so far have killed two growers and wounded two police officers.

The government, which this week was maneuvering in New York to secure a two-year term on the U.N. Security Council, is divided on how to proceed.

It came to power in January with strong backing from Andean Indians who for centuries have used the coca leaf as a mild stimulant, and Mr. Morales, a former coca grower who heads Bolivia's largest coca-growing syndicate in the Chapare Valley, has repeatedly pledged to use "peaceful" means to limit cultivation of the leaf.

But police and elements in his own government are concerned that as much as half the current coca production is being diverted into the production of cocaine for the illicit international market.

The State Department publicly warned Mr. Morales during his visit to the United Nations in New York last month that Bolivia must eliminate 12,000 acres of coca cultivation or face decertification as a country cooperating against drug trafficking, which would mean a cutoff of aid.

The statement followed talks in Washington with Vice President Alvaro Garcia Linera, who agreed to eradicate roughly 15 percent of the country's estimated coca acreage.

But Felipe Caceres, the vice minister for social defense and a former coca grower himself, said in a recent interview with Bolivia's largest newspaper La Razon, that 50 percent of coca production currently goes to drug trafficking, an estimate supported by national police.

U.S. Ambassador Philip Goldberg also has called on Bolivia to renew joint operations with U.S. anti-drug agencies. But Mr. Morales has rejected U.S. calls to end his policy of permitting traditional coca farmers to cultivate up to 1 cato, or half an acre, of the crop.

"We won't accept impositions," the president said in a speech to the U.N. General Assembly, where he called for coca's legalization.

Instead, Mr. Morales has appealed to the coca syndicates to hold down production out of their own self-interest.

"We cannot allow the uncontrolled growth of coca, as it will reduce the price," Mr. Morales recently told a gathering of the Six Federations of Coca Growers of the Tropic of Cochabamba. He also admitted that "there exists an excess production of coca that generates a legal problem."

Even so, coca growers are now demanding to be allowed to double or triple the permitted acreage. More than 1,200 peasant farmers who have planted about 2,000 acres of new coca in national parklands outside the Chapare Valley have insisted that they need to grow more because of their distance from roads and markets.

Officials of Bolivia's U.S.-trained anti-narcotics unit, the Special Force to Fight Crime and Narcotraffic, have reported that the excess production is controlled by drug traffickers. But police and army teams were pulled off eradication missions after a gunfight two weeks ago in Carrasco National Park in eastern Cochabamba province.

Two coca growers were killed and two seriously wounded police officers had to be evacuated by helicopter during the heavy exchange of automatic weapons fire.

Eleven soldiers including an army major were taken hostage. The servicemen were released following negotiations with the government, but several hundred coca growers then used dynamite to cut the main road between Cochabamba and Santa Cruz.

Interior Minister Alicia Munoz has minimized the incidents. "These conflicts are small. The government's anti-drug policy is macro. It seeks to dignify the coca leaf and eliminate illegal cultivations which exist in protected areas," she said as coca farmers threw up more blockades in the Yungas Valley.

American Pilots Were At Correct Altitude Over Brazil, Lawyer Says (NYT)

By Paulo Prada And Matthew L. Wald

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

RIO DE JANEIRO, Oct. 27 — The lawyer representing the pilots of an American corporate jet that apparently collided with a Brazilian airliner on Sept. 29 said Friday that his clients were at their assigned altitude at the time of the crash, despite a flight plan that specified a different altitude.

The corporate plane was a Legacy, built by Embraer, a Brazilian manufacturer. It apparently clipped a Boeing 737 operated by Gol Linhas Aéreas Inteligentes, which crashed, killing all 154 people on board.

The collision apparently occurred at 37,000 feet. Brazilian prosecutors have noted that the flight plan, filed by the crew before departure, called for that altitude, and then a descent to 36,000 feet before the location where the collision occurred, and then climbing to 38,000.

The lawyer, Roberto A. Torricella Jr., who is based in Miami, said the two American pilots had confirmed those details. But he says they also told him that when they took off from the southeastern city of São José dos Campos, where their new plane had been made, they were given a clearance by Brazilian air traffic control that superseded the flight plan.

The takeoff clearance called for 37,000 feet for the entire route up to the point of the crash, Mr. Torricella said. As a result, he said, the plane was at the proper altitude.

It is unclear whether testimony by Brazilian air traffic controllers, who have been interviewed for the crash investigation, supports that a takeoff clearance of 37,000 feet was granted. Telephone calls to Brazil's civil aviation authority and air force, which are responsible for the investigation, were not returned Friday night. Investigators for state and federal police forces, who are conducting a criminal investigation, could not be reached for comment.

The American pilots, Joseph Lepore, 42, of Bay Shore, N.Y., and Jan Paladino, 34, of Westhampton, N.Y., flying for ExcelAire Service Inc. of Ronkonkoma, N.Y., remain in Brazil. They have not been charged with wrongdoing, but a judge ordered their passports seized to keep them in the country until a criminal investigation is complete.

Mr. Torricella said that the pilots were questioned immediately by investigators and the police, but had not yet been interviewed by the federal police. Aviation experts said the police might not be ready to do so. Searchers only recently found the 737's cockpit voice recorder, which is being sent to Canada for analysis. There may be other evidence that they have not finished analyzing.

In addition, Brazil is holding a presidential election on Sunday, and the crash has inflamed passions. A prosecutor once speculated that the American crew had turned off their transponder, a device that makes the plane more visible on radar and visible to other planes' anticollision warning system.

A Year After Suburban Riots, France Is Mostly Calm (WP)

By Molly Moore, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

PARIS, Oct. 27 -- French officials deployed 4,000 extra police officers in the country's poorest suburban areas Friday as the anniversary of last year's wave of arson attacks arrived with only scattered incidents of violence, according to early police and news media reports.

The security precautions followed several weeks of increasing tension in the suburban areas of Paris where residents -- most of whom are Arab and African immigrants and their French-born children -- have complained that the government had not lived up to promises it made, after last year's nationwide rampage, to improve living conditions and employment opportunities.

Small groups of men -- some of them armed -- attacked two public buses in the northern suburbs of Paris early in the evening. In one incident, two armed men boarded a bus in front of a train station in the town of Le Blanc-Mesnil, yanked the driver off the vehicle and ordered all the passengers off before throwing a gasoline bomb and burning the bus, French media reported. Authorities reduced bus service into the area and limited night bus service in many other suburbs.

In the past week, about half a dozen public buses have been attacked and set ablaze in suburbs of Paris and Lyon, and gangs wielding rocks and metal pipes have ambushed police in some Paris suburbs.

DOJ_NMG_0088554

Friday morning, in the northern Paris suburb of Clichy-sous-Bois, several hundred residents marched to memorialize the deaths of two local youths last Oct. 27 -- the incident that set off France's worst civil unrest since the student protests in 1968.

The two teenagers were electrocuted when they leapt into an electrical substation to escape police who witnesses said were chasing them. French officials denied that police had been pursuing the youths.

Marchers carried a banner declaring, "Died for nothing." The marchers stopped at the electrical substation where the youths perished and recited prayers in French and Arabic as their families laid plastic-wrapped flowers against the fence.

"Last year we crossed Clichy by weaving between the burnt-out wrecks of cars, creating an image of our city that we didn't want to see," Mayor Claude Dillain told the gathering during a solemn ceremony Friday morning. "Once again France, and even the world, is watching us and waiting to see what we do. So I appeal solemnly for calm and dignity to prevail here."

During last year's violence, gangs of boys and young men torched more than 10,000 cars and attacked nearly 500 schools and other public buildings, mostly government institutions.

Allegations that the government has failed to respond adequately to demands for improvements in the poor suburbs, along with parallel concerns over security and an increasing Muslim population, are among the most contentious issues in the French presidential campaign.

Speeches And Arson Recall Last Year's Unrest In France (NYT)

By Ariane Bernard

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

CLICHY-SOUS-BOIS, France, Oct. 27 — Hooded attackers burned two buses on Friday night in a city near this Paris suburb on the anniversary of the start of last year's suburban unrest.

Additional police officers had been put on duty for Friday night, as France braced for possible violence. In recent weeks, bands of youths had attacked police patrols and buses in the suburbs of Paris and Lyon.

In the Friday night arson, the two buses were attacked separately in Le Blanc-Mesnil, north of Paris. The passengers and drivers of both buses were able to escape unharmed, said the Paris-area transportation authority, the RATP.

In one of the attacks, assailants broke the bus's windows and threw firebombs into the vehicle. A spokeswoman for the RATP said that she was unsure if the bombs were thrown before or after the passengers left the bus. The spokeswoman, who could not be identified by name under the transportation authority's ground rules, said she did not have details of the other attack.

During the day on Friday, several hundred people in this poor suburb of Paris participated in a silent march in memory of two teenagers whose accidental deaths last year triggered three weeks of unrest that shook the country.

In speeches after the march, local officials and family members of the teenagers called for calm. The two teenagers, Bouna Traoré, 15, and Zyed Benna, 17, were electrocuted last Oct. 27 at a power substation where they and a friend were hiding. Some accounts at the time said they had been running from the police. The friend was severely wounded but survived.

"Once more, France, the world, are watching us," said the mayor, Claude Dilain, after dedicating an understated white stone monument in front of the teenagers' school.

"This is a solemn call for calm," said the mayor, who is a Socialist.

The marchers, many of them youths wearing white T-shirts bearing the words "Dead for Nothing," paused by the power substation where the teenagers died. Men and women cried as they passed the site, and an imam said prayers for the dead.

Many expressed not only sadness over the deaths, but also disappointment with how little things had changed in France's tough suburbs. The unrest last year, during which thousands of cars were set ablaze and businesses were trashed, shed light on the plight of the country's underprivileged populations, mainly Arabs and black Africans and their French-born children, who feel disenfranchised. In some immigrant neighborhoods, unemployment runs considerably above the national average.

After the march, Muhittin Altun, 18, the survivor of the accident that killed his friends, said, "You'll see, it's going to explode, it's going to explode everywhere, because for the past year, they have been trying to put us to sleep."

But Sylviane Dubuisson, 52, who runs a bakery here, said she disapproved of the march because she feared it could lead to new violence. Speaking of the two teenagers, she said, "They died, it's sad, but they have to rest in peace and we need to forget."

DOJ_NMG_0088555

French Muslims Mark Day Of Sadness To Honor Dead (LAT)

By Alissa J. Rubin And Achrene Sicakyuz, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

The anniversary of two youths' deaths finds that little has changed.

CLICHY-SOUS-BOIS, FRANCE — One word summed up the mood at the commemoration Friday of the deaths of two French youths whose electrocution set off a series of fiery riots a year ago.

"Triste," said one person after another in French. Sad.

"The atmosphere was sad," said Maamar Hamoude, who works for a local nonprofit organization, as he stood for a few minutes after the ceremony in this rundown suburb to dedicate a memorial. "It was a paying of respects to the young men who died, and in a certain way to all the young people here who have so little," he said.

Teenagers Bouna Traore and Zyed Benna, children of immigrants from Africa, were apparently fleeing from the police when they were electrocuted a year ago Friday after they took refuge in an electrical transforming station. Their deaths brought to the surface fury at France's failure to integrate minorities, primarily of African and Middle Eastern origins.

In the weeks of rioting that ensued, thousands of cars were set on fire and some shops looted. However, only one person died and a small number were injured.

Although there are 5 million Muslims in France, the majority from immigrant backgrounds, few have made their way into the country's elite. There are barely a handful of minorities in politics, just one junior minister from a minority background, and token numbers in France's top universities and its police force.

Most live in desolate concrete housing projects or dilapidated homes in suburbs an hour or more by bus or train from the large French cities where most jobs are. Unemployment is well above 20% and in some cases as high as 40%, according to French newspapers.

To prepare for the anniversary, the French Interior Ministry put 4,000 additional police on duty. A day earlier, Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy announced that police would also guard bus routes to ensure that drivers and passengers were safe.

Although the emotion often portrayed in the media has been anger, what was on display Friday at the memorial was communal mourning. Many people who came to the two-hour ceremony knew the boys who had died and said that the neighborhoods remained a tinderbox, with an underlying tone of hopelessness. Some of the suburbs' young people seem to believe that only through violence are they heard.

"I think last year's riots have helped us being seen by the rest of France," said Leyla, 18, a young woman who knew one of the boys who died. She did not give her last name.

By early evening Friday there were reports of two buses burned near here; in one case, armed men forced the driver and passengers off before setting it alight, according to witnesses.

"In the last year not a lot has changed," said Fariz, 17, who also did not give his last name. "We don't see much difference. Even if they say funds are being spent, the atmosphere is still tense."

Fariz, like many attending the memorial, wore a long white T-shirt with the names of the two boys who died and the words: "Dead For Nothing." Many refused to talk to reporters, simply shaking their heads.

The event began with a silent march from the border of Clichy-sous-Bois through the housing projects where the boys had lived and into the electrical station where they died and then to the college where the memorial was installed.

The mood was somber, the weather gray and damp. Though most of the marchers appeared young, there were older people as well — mothers wearing long African robes and elaborate head scarves; matrons in traditional Islamic hijab and ankle-length coats, their hair covered, speaking softly in Arabic; and older men in the skullcaps often worn by practicing Muslims.

Some speakers offered benedictions in French, some in Arabic — a signal of the divided identity of the community.

Julian, a 17-year-old who has hopes of becoming a film director, said that the government had to do more to improve the projects. "There are lots of promises about urban renovation, and I hope the government will keep its promises," he said. "There are buildings here where the elevators have not worked for years, and our parents pay taxes. The mood is the same as last year."

Clichy-sous-Bois Mayor Claude Dilain agreed. A strong defender of his town, he said that in the eyes of most residents, nothing had changed in the last year.

DOJ_NMG_0088556

At the same time, he added: "It would have been impossible to change things in a year…. I can explain to the Clichois that when the minister of Interior promises a local police station, he can't do it in a year. I can explain to the Clichois that when a tram is promised, it can't be done in a day.

"What I can't explain to them is the lack of political affirmation…. We expected the government to assert that it was no longer acceptable that 10% of the French population live in conditions that do not match Republican values," he said.

alissa.rubin@latimes.com

achrene.sicakyuz@latimes.com

Men Burn Buses In Paris Suburb (WT/AP)

By Elaine Ganley, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

CLICHY-SOUS-BOIS, France -- Two public buses were torched in a Paris suburb yesterday, the anniversary of the two deaths that ignited weeks of riots in largely immigrant housing projects across France a year ago.

Both buses were burned in Blanc Mesnil, a northern Paris suburb near Clichy-sous-Bois, where last year's violence began, police said.

In the first attack, two armed men forced passengers off the bus before setting it alight, police said. No one was injured.

The second bus was set on fire shortly after.

Witness Thierry Ange, 19, said four hooded men stood in front of the bus, forcing it to stop. He said they pulled the driver out by his tie. He said one of the attackers hit a passenger and kicked her down the bus' steps.

The incidents were the latest in a series of bus burnings over the past few days.

Flaming cars became a symbol of three weeks of rampages last year, which jolted the nation into recognizing discontent among many minorities -- especially those of Arab and black African origin, and France's 5 million-strong Muslim population.

The outburst of anger at the accidental deaths of the two teens -- who were electrocuted in a power substation in Clichy-sous-Bois while hiding from police on Oct. 27, 2005 -- grew into a broader challenge of the French state.

Several hundred people marched silently yesterday through Clichy-sous-Bois, northeast of Paris, in honor of Zyed Benna and Bouna Traore. Zyed, 17, was buried in his father's native Tunisia. Bouna, 15, was of Mauritanian descent.

Adolescent boys in hooded sweat shirts made up a large part of the mixed-race crowd, their heads bent as prayers were read in Arabic and French.

Zyed and Bouna "became a symbol in the projects," said one of Bouna's cousins, Coulibaly.

"I don't see why the violence should recur. That will not solve the problems," she said.

A memorial to the youths was erected yesterday near City Hall, though the site where they died is adorned only with the graffiti and rubble that are the signature of it and similar neighborhoods.

Clichy-sous-Bois has no police station. Officers patrolling here come from outside and have no connection to residents.

Unemployment among the city's 28,000 residents is 23.5 percent -- the national average is 9 percent -- and is 32 percent for those between the ages of 15 and 24, according to the newspaper La Croix.

The police presence was discreet at yesterday's march, but police fanned out elsewhere to brace for possible nighttime violence, with 500 extra riot police assigned to Paris' poor neighborhoods for the anniversary.

Some 100 cars were torched nationwide overnight, half of them in the Paris region, police said. The figure was higher than usual -- police say between 30 and 50 cars are set on fire during an average week, though some weekends the figure jumps to 100. On the most fiery night of last year's riots, more than 1,400 cars went up in flames.

Attackers forced passengers off four buses before torching them in recent days. In response, Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy pledged to assign police to protect buses serving some Paris neighborhoods.

France's trouble integrating minorities and the recent unrest are becoming political priorities in the campaign for next year's presidential and parliamentary elections.

Instead of France's vaunted "egalite," or equality, many immigrants and their French-born children suffer police harassment, struggle to find work and live in cinder-block public housing mired in crime and poverty.

DOJ_NMG_0088557

In First Month As Japan's Premier, Abe Veers To Center (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

TOKYO, Oct. 27 — Shinzo Abe rose to become postwar Japan's youngest prime minister by hewing to a conservative, nationalist agenda. He stood tough against China and North Korea, and championed the right's touchstone causes on history.

But in the month that he has been prime minister, Mr. Abe, 52, has made a beeline toward the center, reaching out to China and South Korea as this region confronted North Korea's recent nuclear test. He has made surprising, if grudging, admissions about Japan's militarist past, assuaging the regional tensions that emerged under his predecessor, Junichiro Koizumi.

It is too early to tell whether Mr. Abe's month in power is evidence of an innate pragmatism, or whether he is consolidating his power before pushing a more conservative agenda. But he has reassured voters in Japan and officials in Washington, won tentative praise from skeptics in China and South Korea and unsettled the Japanese right.

Mr. Abe has made back-to-back visits to China and South Korea. Both countries had refused to hold summit meetings with Japan because of Mr. Koizumi's annual pilgrimages to the Yasukuni Shrine, the Shinto memorial for Japan's war dead and war criminals, as well as a potent symbol of Japanese militarism in Asia.

Japan's deteriorating relations with China had government officials and policy makers in Asia and the United States worried. Both sides had reached an impasse, with Beijing saying it would not meet Mr. Koizumi unless he stopped visiting the shrine, and Mr. Koizumi insisting that he would not stop.

Mr. Abe, a longtime staunch defender of the visits, has now adopted a softer, ambiguous policy. Mr. Abe says he will neither confirm nor deny whether he has prayed at Yasukuni — while letting his aides inform the news media that he has, in fact, visited the shrine.

"His position on Yasukuni is a symbol of conceding to China and South Korea's demands," said Kim Ho-sup, an expert on Japanese-South Korean relations at Chung-Ang University in Seoul. "He seemed hawkish, but after he became prime minister, he handled relations with Asian neighbors and issues like Yasukuni more diplomatically than Koizumi."

"His visits to China and South Korea were very successful," Mr. Kim said.

Michael J. Green, who handled Asian affairs at the National Security Council until last December and is now at Georgetown University, said Mr. Abe has been "able to recast" Japan's relations with its neighbors away from Yasukuni.

"It was smart domestically because it reassured the center that he was able to deal with neighboring states," Mr. Green said. "It was smart internationally because it gave Japan leverage to deal with North Korea. It was smart with the United States because, even though the United States government wouldn't interfere on the history problem, the Japanese government could sense that there was growing unease in Washington about the state of relations between China and Japan."

Mr. Abe built a conservative base by leading efforts in Parliament to revise school textbooks, which the right argues dwell masochistically on Japan's militarist past, and by casting doubts on the validity of the postwar Tokyo trials that assigned guilt to Japan's wartime leaders. Starting in 2002, he rose to national stardom by being tough on North Korea and China.

But in the last month, Mr. Abe acknowledged that wartime leaders, including his grandfather, Nobusuke Kishi, had "great responsibility" for the war and its damages in Asia. Mr. Abe said he accepted two landmark statements made by Japanese governments in the 1990s, apologizing to the rest of Asia for Japan's imperialist past and recognizing the Japanese Army's role in drafting Asian women as wartime sex slaves, or "comfort women."

Hisahiko Okazaki, a former senior diplomat and a leading conservative commentator close to Mr. Abe, said the prime minister had not forsaken his conservative roots but was merely biding his time.

"Regarding policies toward the comfort women issue and other issues like that, he says they were established by previous governments, right?" Mr. Okazaki said. "Since previous governments set those policies, this government can naturally set its own policy. The current government hasn't done so yet. But I think he'll do it according to his convictions once he consolidates his power."

Mr. Abe's softening seems in keeping with a move to tamp down the nationalism of recent years. Last April, former Bush administration officials, including Mr. Green and James A. Kelley, a former assistant secretary of state for East Asian affairs, said at a conference in Tokyo that Yasukuni was giving Japan a black eye. Then J. Thomas Schieffer, the American ambassador to Japan, described as "very disturbing" the view of history presented at Yasukuni's museum — that Japan was tricked into war by the United States and occupied Asia to free it.

DOJ_NMG_0088558

Now, Yasukuni officials said that they planned to change an exhibit that states that President Franklin D. Roosevelt forced Japan into war so that the United States could recover from the Great Depression. Taro Nagae, an adviser to Yasukuni and a retired senior researcher at the Defense Agency's National Institute for Defense Studies, said that the museum had planned to review all its exhibits this year, but acknowledged the effects of American unease over the museum.

"I had been feeling it for a while, and when comments by Armitage and Schieffer started appearing on television and in newspapers, I advised in July that we needed to hurry," Mr. Nagae said, referring to Richard L. Armitage, a former deputy secretary of state.

Asked whether the exhibit change was tied to Mr. Abe's administration, Mr. Nagae said: "If I said there was no relationship, I would be lying. There were opinions that we should start the work after the start of the Abe administration."

Sri Lanka, Tamil Tigers Ready To Meet (LAT)

By Henry Chu, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

The stakes are high but expectations are low as the foes prepare to talk peace again at a time of escalating violence.

COLOMBO, SRI LANKA — In what could be the last, best hope for averting all-out war, the government of this island nation and the rebel Tamil Tigers are due to sit down today for their first face-to-face talks in months over one of Asia's most intractable conflicts.

Both sides have been stung by heavy losses and international criticism in recent weeks, following a surge in combat that has left hundreds dead and thousands more refugees in their own country, forced to flee homes and livelihoods to avoid the crossfire.

In the charged atmosphere, no one is predicting that substantive advances will be made at the negotiating table. But so fierce has been the fighting that even getting the two longtime adversaries to meet today and Sunday in Geneva is being trumpeted as an achievement, and welcomed by residents desperate for a reprieve from the bloodletting.

"For the first round, we are happy that they're going at all," said Jehan Perera of the National Peace Council of Sri Lanka. "The best thing we can hope for is that they commit themselves to stop the violence."

The violence threatens to engulf this teardrop-shaped island, spilling over from the north and east, where the fighting had, until recently, mostly been confined and where the highly armed rebels want to establish an independent homeland for Sri Lanka's ethnic-minority Tamils.

Military checkpoints now ring this capital, in the southwest, amid fears of further attacks like the mine explosion that nearly killed the Pakistani ambassador two months ago. Last week, Tamil Tiger suicide bombers aboard fishing boats shocked the Sri Lankan navy by mounting an assault on a naval base at Galle, a southern port city popular with tourists and far from the traditional theater of war.

Under pressure

Both sides, their casualty counts spiraling since July, are licking their wounds. They are also under intense diplomatic pressure, much of it from major donor countries, to go back to a 2002 cease-fire deal rendered defunct since late last year, when fighting broke wide open again.

"You're getting peace talks because both sides want to communicate to the international community their willingness to negotiate," said analyst Paikiasothy Saravanamuttu, adding: "I would put the bar of expectations fairly low."

This week, Sri Lankan officials unveiled seven areas of discussion they want to pursue with the rebels, including human rights violations and the recruitment of children as fighters, a tactic for which the Tamil Tigers are notorious.

Also on the agenda are issues of economic development and greater autonomy in the north and east — tacit admission by the government that it has failed to address some fundamental grievances underlying discontent in those regions. Sri Lanka's

DOJ_NMG_0088559

Tamil population has complained for decades of discrimination and persecution at the hands of the majority Sinhalese, who dominate politics and the armed forces.

"It's a new approach," Keheliya Rambukwella, the chief government spokesman, said in an interview here.

"Our interest is how to give benefit to the Tamil community. We are not interested in pacifying the LTTE or any terrorist groups," he said, referring to the rebels, formally known as the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam.

Bolstering the government's position is a new cooperation pact with the main Sinhalese opposition parties on resolving the conflict. The accord gives President Mahinda Rajapakse more flexibility by lessening his dependence on the hard-line right-wing parties that helped elevate him to power last year.

However, Rambukwella is modest about what measurable outcomes can emerge from the weekend talks, the first such tete-a-tete since February. Most likely, the government's seven points will have to wait for the future, he acknowledges; the best result to be expected in Switzerland is that both sides agree to talk again, and write down dates in their calendars.

"This time, you sit together and say hello," Rambukwella said.

The Tigers have not responded directly to the government's new plan. Their priority in Geneva, spokesman Daya Master said, will be on easing the growing humanitarian crisis on the Jaffna peninsula in the north, where choked-off roads have led to food shortages and other hardships.

A cessation of hostilities would be possible, he said, "if the Sri Lanka government is willing to stop the military operations." Most observers, however, blame the Tigers for breaching the 2002 truce and initiating the latest cycle of attack and counterattack.

Guerrilla leaders have warned that the Geneva talks represent the island's last chance for peace. Failure, they say, would mean a return to the full-throated civil war of old, in which about 65,000 people have been killed in the last 23 years.

It is difficult to gauge whether such comments are merely bluster or brinkmanship. Many analysts believe that both sides are exhausted from fighting and that the negotiations provide a breather, if nothing else.

Sending a message

Until a few weeks ago, it appeared that the Sri Lankan military had gained the upper hand, wresting territory from the Tigers and inflicting major losses, possibly killing hundreds of guerrillas. Government forces scored notable successes in the east, around the strategically important port city of Trincomalee.

But a campaign in the north met with stiff resistance, forcing a government retreat. Then the rebels struck back, on land and sea, with suicide bombings. On Oct. 16, cars piled with explosives rammed into a navy bus convoy in central Sri Lanka, killing about 100 sailors. Two days later came the raid on the naval base at Galle, in which at least one sailor and 15 rebels died.

"That seemed to be a message from the LTTE, that 'we're evening the score,' " said Saravanamuttu, the analyst.

The hope is that the losses on both sides will be instructive rather than purely destructive.

"They've once again learned that there is no military solution to this conflict," said Swedish Maj. Gen. Ulf Henricsson, the former head of the Scandinavian cease-fire monitoring team in Sri Lanka. "The last three months of more or less war fighting showed them that … the achievements on both sides are very limited and the number of killed on both sides is very high."

An estimated 1,000 people have lost their lives since July. All told, after clashes began erupting late last year, about 2,000 deaths have been reported, half of them civilian. Accusations of abuse by both sides abound.

Whether the respite provided by the peace talks turns out to be lasting or simply the lull before a bigger storm remains to be seen.

Nor is it clear how durable the political rapprochement between the government and opposition parties will prove. The Tigers have long contended that negotiating with a fractious, divided Sri Lankan political establishment was futile, an argument that Rambukwella, the government spokesman, admitted had "a validity" to it.

The newly united front now "needs to yield results. It will be judged on the ability to produce peace and a political negotiated settlement," Saravanamuttu said.

Optimism does not come easily here after countless attempts at a peace process and countless failures. What seemed like a historic chance after the cease-fire agreement four years ago has nearly drained away within a matter of months.

DOJ_NMG_0088560

"Both sides are hurting…. The military solution has not worked out as both of them thought," said Perera of the National Peace Council.

"Maybe there is enough pragmatism on both sides that they realize they have to do something — people are suffering," he said. "It's true, they don't trust each other. But they have to work something out."

henry.chu@latimes.com

Sri Lankan Government And Tamil Tigers To Meet (NYT)

By Shimali Senanayake

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka, Oct. 27 — The two sides in the long, bloody Sri Lankan conflict are due to meet in Geneva this weekend, for the first time since a suicide bombing killed 98 people two weeks ago, the deadliest incident in the conflict in more than four years.

In a crucial test of credibility, negotiators for the Sri Lankan government and the separatist Tamil rebels will try to salvage a frayed 2002 ceasefire and the fitful talks since then to end the bloodshed in this country.

Though both sides promised anew in February, when they last met, to abode by the 2002 truce, the violence has mounted since then, and the conflict has now claimed more than 2,500 lives this year alone. A meeting was to have been held in June in Oslo, and both sides sent representatives, but the Tamil Tigers ultimately decided not to take part.

No one expects major breakthroughs in the two days of talks scheduled in Geneva. “Expectations must not be exaggerated,” Erik Solheim, the international development minister of Norway, who is facilitating the talks, said today in a telephone interview from Geneva. “Most important is that the parties agree to meet again, and that talks have some calming effect on the violence.”

Diplomats and political analysts interviewed in Sri Lanka said that the best that can be expected is an agreement to hold more talks, and perhaps an agenda of what to talk about.

In private, some of them concede that the warring parties appear to have little or no interest in peace talks, and are attending them only as a sop to mounting international pressure.

The government has been criticized for a conducting chilling wave of abductions and extrajudicial killings and for making it hard for humanitarian agencies to gain access to some of the hardest hit parts of the country. For their part, the Tamil Tigers have been added to the European Union’s list of banned terrorist organizations, potentially crimping the group’s ability to raise funds among the Tamil diaspora in Europe.

As for what to discuss in Geneva, the two sides appear to have vastly different priorities. The government wants to discuss political solutions to the conflict, and plans to bring up issues like the rebels’ use of child soldiers. The rebels say the talks should focus on humanitarian issues, on the tattered cease-fire agreement and on opening a highway that links the Tamil-controlled north with the rest of the country.

“If the parties can exchange views, discuss the present situation and set dates for at least two more meetings, then these talks can be deemed a success,” said Jon Hanssen-Bauer, Norway’s special peace envoy.

The 2002 ceasefire hardly now exists, except on paper. In the incident two weeks ago, a suspected Tamil rebel rammed a truck packed with explosives into a convoy of Navy vehicles, killing scores of sailors as well as civilian bystanders. Two days later, using explosive-filled boats, rebels mounted a water-borne suicide attack on a naval base and harbor in a popular tourist area, extending the latest upsurge in violence into a previously calm part of the south that is dominated by the ethnic Sinhalese majority.

The Geneva talks follow a recent agreement between the ruling and opposition parties in Sri Lanka to negotiate a consensus policy on ending the ethnic conflict. That may remove one reason the Tamil Tigers have put forward for resisting a permanent peace deal: that political wrangling among the Sinhalese parties made it impossible for the government to implement one.

DOJ_NMG_0088561

But the talks are also overshadowed by a Supreme Court ruling blocking one of the Tamil rebels' chief demands, that the island's northern and eastern regions, which they consider the historic Tamil homeland, be administered as a single entity. The court ruled last week that a proposed merger of the two regions was unconstitutional.

Crucial Sri Lanka Peace Talks Due (BBC)

BBC.com, October 28, 2006

Violence has soared over recent months Sri Lanka's government and Tamil Tiger rebels start talks in Geneva on Saturday in an effort to avert a slide back into war.

Violence between the two sides has soared - since July 372 security force members, 128 civilians and many rebels have died, the government says.

Correspondents say expectations from the talks are close to zero.

The best scenario, many believe, is that the two sides agree on another date for another round of negotiations.

On the eve of the talks, the rebels said the road linking northern Jaffna peninsula with the rest of the country should be opened to facilitate further negotiations.

Spokesman Daya Master told the Associated Press news agency that the rebels would not agree to any future meetings with the government if the demand was not met.

The road leading to the government-controlled city of Jaffna was closed in early August after fierce fighting broke out between the two sides.

The BBC's Dumeetha Luthra in Colombo says if talks fail diplomats believe it is almost inevitable that Sri Lanka will return to all-out war.

Pressure

Seasoned observers say neither party is sincere in wanting to resume negotiations and that the Geneva meeting is essentially a result of intense international pressure.

The last round of discussions was in Geneva in February. Two subsequent attempts at talks failed, most recently in June.

Since then the international landscape has changed significantly for both sides, our correspondent says.

The rebels have been blacklisted as a terrorist organisation by the European Union and Canada.

The government, meanwhile, is concerned about losing its international credibility.

Both parties have been criticised for human rights abuses, while, on the military front, both have suffered reversals of fortune.

U.N. To Limit The Role Of Its Envoy Expelled By Sudan (NYT)

By Daniel B. Schneider

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 27 — Jan Pronk, a United Nations special envoy who was expelled from Sudan this week, will continue to hold his office until his contract expires at the end of the year, but his role is expected to be mainly symbolic.

The United Nations announced Friday that it planned to send Mr. Pronk back to Khartoum, but only to organize a transfer to Taye Zerihoun, the officer in charge of the United Nations mission in Sudan. He will then return to New York to finish out his term, according to Stéphane Dujarric, the spokesman for Secretary General Kofi Annan.

"The secretary general has made it clear that he alone can decide on the tenure of his special representatives," Mr. Dujarric said. "However, he also realizes that at a critical time in the Darfur negotiations, it is important that we preserve a good working relationship with the government of Sudan, and he is certain that the officer in charge, Taye Zerihoun, will be able to provide this."

Mr. Dujarric said the United Nations did not expect the Sudanese government to reject the compromise.

Only hours after the announcement, however, Abdalmahmood Abdalhaleem Mohamad, Sudan's representative at the United Nations, said his government would not sanction Mr. Pronk's return.

DOJ_NMG_0088562

Mr. Pronk, a former Dutch cabinet minister known for his candor, was ordered out of Sudan on Sunday after he reported on his personal blog that a demoralized Sudanese Army had suffered major defeats in fighting against rebels in the Darfur region of the country.

He also said the military had continued to arm Arab militias responsible for atrocities against civilians, despite commitments to end the practice.

Mr. Pronk, who has held his position for two years and had already announced that he would not seek an extension, returned here on Thursday for a meeting with Mr. Annan. As they met, Mr. Mohamad told reporters that Mr. Pronk "became part of the problem, not the solution."

Some United Nations representatives have been dismayed that a high-ranking representative would post sensitive information on the Web.

On Friday, Mr. Dujarric said United Nations staff guidelines on publications and speeches would be updated to address the issue of blogs.

"The fact that they do not include the word 'blog' does not mean we don't expect our senior officials to use proper judgment," he said.

Mr. Pronk has maintained that the information on his Web site was already available in newspapers published in Sudan.

Misery Churns In Eastern Sudan, Away From Spotlight (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

TOGLEY, Sudan — Ali Hamid Ahmed used to be the elder of a village full of green fields and thousands of goats.

But a little-known war between the government and a spreading rebel force drove his people from their homes to a camp at the far eastern edge of Sudan, where the horizon is paper-flat and the land is about as fertile as a sandbox.

The people here are battered by the sun, the wind and the sand; the tribal scars cut into Mr. Ahmed's face when he was a little boy are constantly creased with dust. Mr. Ahmed's people still call him "the chairman," but out here, Mr. Ahmed says, he is the chairman of nothing.

"We have no animals," he said. "All we have is dirt."

It is a scene of desolation and despair in a country with much of both. But what is different about the crisis in eastern Sudan is that few outside organizations are paying attention. While there are an estimated 25,000 aid workers in Darfur, the war-ravaged region on the other side of the country that has become the focus of a ceaseless flurry of diplomatic activity, here in Togley there are not even plastic tarps for the huts.

Eastern Sudan is forgotten Sudan, an intriguing, isolated, sun-blasted corner of the country where a conservative culture and a slow-burning war have conspired to keep the people mired in neglect despite the area's port and oil riches.

The war may finally be over — eastern rebels who had been fighting for a greater share of the country's resources reached an agreement with the government on Oct. 14 to lay down their weapons in exchange for political representation and a share of the nation's oil money.

But the neglect will take years to reverse. Eastern Sudan, which encompasses roughly 180,000 square miles and nearly four million people, is the poorest part of the country, with the highest infant mortality rate and a per capita income in some areas of 25 cents a day, a small fraction of the national average.

In remote villages, most women cannot even write their own names, partly because of a strict Muslim culture that forbids education for girls and confines them to their homes.

"These women have nothing to do but sit around and drink coffee and scar themselves," said Niyal Mohammed al-Haj, a teacher in Kasala, one of the biggest towns in the east. "Girls don't go to school; boys drop out, and nobody cares."

One of the reasons that the east has largely gone unnoticed is that the scale of fighting could never compete with the conflicts in Darfur or southern Sudan. The fighting here is thought to have claimed between 2,000 and 5,000 lives in the last 10 years, compared with hundreds of thousands in Darfur and the south.

DOJ_NMG_0088563

Yet, the east is increasingly vital to the nation, home to gold mines and the country's major oil pipeline and port. As the troubles intensified in Darfur, Sudan's leaders in Khartoum, the capital, could hardly afford to fight another escalating rebellion.

"Khartoum was facing so much pressure on other fronts, it had to put out this fire," said Ahmed el-Amin Terik, an adviser to the state governor here in Togley. "It wasn't like the eastern rebels were so much of a threat. But even a mosquito doesn't let you sleep."

The eastern rebels do not appreciate being likened to mosquitoes. Most are Beja herdsmen, a proud and traditional group, who strut around in white robes and dusty waistcoats with three-foot-long sabers tucked into their belts. They waged hit-and-run attacks against government soldiers from the backs of their camels. Some are already grumbling about getting a raw deal in the peace effort.

The Beja leadership wanted regional autonomy but instead was given nominal positions in the central government.

The Beja also pushed for a bigger cut of Sudan's growing wealth, which is driven by oil exports, and asked for one dollar for every barrel shipped from Port Sudan, which would amount to around $150 million each year. Instead, the Sudanese government set up a $600 million eastern development fund, a substantial commitment, but one that is guaranteed only for a few years.

These issues are similar to what set off the bloodshed in Darfur and the south, where long-marginalized regional ethnic groups have taken up arms against the ruling group of Arab Sudanese in Khartoum. Critics of the central government say the three separate peace deals that have been reached — for the south in 2005, for Darfur this spring and now for the east — are not only shaky, but may encourage wider unrest.

"The message seems to be, if you want more development, you need to pick up arms," said Abda Yahia el-Mahdi, a former finance minister now in private consulting.

When it came time to sign the eastern peace deal at a ceremony in Asmara, the capital of Eritrea, just east of Sudan, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, the Sudanese president, showed up in Beja dress.

"It was ridiculous," said Hashim Hangag, a spokesman for the Beja Congress political party. "Here was a guy who has never stood with the Beja, pretending to be one of us."

Beja political frustrations have been percolating since the 1950s. The central government dammed their rivers and took their grazing land, while delivering few schools, hospitals or roads. The Beja have always been among the poorest and least educated people in Sudan, marooned in an arid, thinly populated area rife with tuberculosis and malaria, and they hardly had the means to fight back.

In the 1990s, that changed. Sudan's government tried to undermine the Eritrean government by arming Islamic fighters who were waging a holy war against it. Eritrea, in return, began arming the Beja.

Rebels from other tribes and other parts of Sudan flooded into Beja territory and opened a new front against the government, an eastern front — and the alliance eventually took that name. One misimpression of Sudan's rebel movements is that they are isolated to one area and fighting to secede. Many, however, including Darfur's rebel groups, have national ambitions and dream not of carving out their own piece of territory but of overthrowing the Arab-led government.

The fighting displaced thousands of people, including 3,000 now in Togley, who drifted from village to village until all their animals died, and then settled on a chunk of land so dry and fruitless that nobody else wanted it.

A turning point came on Jan. 29, 2005, when government troops in Port Sudan killed 25 unarmed Beja men who were protesting what they called a legacy of exclusion. That drove hundreds more into the ranks of the Eastern Front, and the central government began to fear another Darfur.

Serious peace negotiations started this year, culminating in the October agreement.

Several Beja rebels said they had been pressed to accept a less than satisfying deal because the Eritrean government, which had allowed them to operate out of camps along its border, was eager to normalize relations with Sudan and gave them little choice.

The government and some Beja leaders say that peace will bring desperately needed investment, and with the area safe, more foreign aid will flow in. Right now, just a handful of aid organizations operate here, mostly distributing food.

Mr. Ahmed, the chairman of Togley, hopes to lead his people back to their village, but there are literally minefields between here and there. "I know Darfur has problems," Mr. Ahmed said. "But what about us?"

DOJ_NMG_0088564

Kidnapping And Turmoil Ahead Of Congo Vote (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

KINSHASA, Congo, Oct. 27 — United Nations forces plunged into Congo's election-related violence again on Friday, this time rescuing a politician who had been kidnapped by rivals.

The day before, several people were killed at a prison riot in Kinshasa, the capital, after a band of political prisoners escaped.

All across Kinshasa, United Nations troops are hunkered down behind sandbags or prowling the garbage-strewn streets in armored personnel carriers bristling with machine guns and water cannons.

This is the increasingly edgy atmosphere in the prelude to the runoff presidential election scheduled for Sunday. The United Nations has spent $500 million on the voting, saying that peace in Congo is crucial for peace in all of central Africa.

The incumbent president, Joseph Kabila, is favored to win, but his rival, Jean-Pierre Bemba, a businessman and rebel leader accused of war crimes, remains enormously popular in the capital. It is Mr. Bemba's supporters, legions of young, broke men, who are blamed for much of the violence.

In July, a few days before the first round of voting, Mr. Bemba's supporters burned a policeman to death at a rally. In August, Mr. Bemba's soldiers tangled with Mr. Kabila's troops in a downtown shootout that killed more than 20 people.

This week, Mr. Bemba's soldiers captured Nzanga Mobutu, the son of the former dictator Mobutu Sese Seko. On Thursday, Mr. Mobutu had been campaigning for Mr. Kabila in Gbadolite, a town in the west where support for Mr. Bemba is strong. When Mr. Mobutu and a contingent of armed guards showed up at a radio station owned by Mr. Bemba, a gun battle erupted, killing four people. Mr. Mobutu was not hurt, and after negotiations between the United Nations and Mr. Bemba's supporters on Friday morning, he was driven away in a United Nations tank.

Both camps accuse each other of intimidating voters. "Bemba's guys are determined to burn this country," said Kikaya bin Karubi, one of Mr. Kabila's top aides.

Mr. Bemba's supporters deny that.

"Don't believe anything Kabila's men tell you," said Oscar Kashala, an American-educated doctor who ran for president in July, lost and is now supporting Mr. Bemba. "Congolese politics have always had the color of deceit."

The country has had a dismal political history. King Leopold II of Belgium colonized it in the late 19th century to extract as much rubber and ivory as possible. His overseers were notorious for their use of the chicotte, a hippopotamus-hide whip that they cracked over Congolese backs.

That ended in 1960, when Belgium abruptly pulled out and granted Congo independence. A few years later, Mobutu Sese Seko, a young army colonel, seized power and soon metastasized into the caricature of an African dictator, building palaces and guzzling pink Champagne while his people starved. When Western support dried up, his power faded, and a former Marxist, Laurent D. Kabila, deposed Mr. Mobutu in 1997, leading to years of conflict. The fighting and chaos claimed countless lives — the International Rescue Committee estimated nearly four million.

It was only after Laurent Kabila was assassinated in 2001 and Joseph, his eldest son, took over, that the bloodshed lessened. Mr. Kabila forged a shaky peace with Congo's other warlords, including Mr. Bemba, who was named one of the country's four vice presidents.

Mr. Kabila, 35, spent much of his youth in Tanzania and trained as an army officer in China. Mr. Bemba, 44, is from one of the richest families in the country and was shipped off to Belgium for boarding school as a boy. He later went into business and then became a militia leader, and international human rights groups have accused him of encouraging his troops to brutalize civilians.

In the first round of voting, Mr. Kabila won overwhelmingly in the east, while Mr. Bemba did well in Kinshasa and the west. Mr. Kabila won 45 percent of the vote, compared with Mr. Bemba's 20 percent. International observers said the vote was mostly fair, though marred by logistical hiccups, standard fare in a country the size of western Europe with 60 million people and only 300 miles of paved roads.

DOJ_NMG_0088565

Mobutu's Abduction Heightens Congo Election Tension (AP)

AP, October 27, 2006

KINSHASA, Congo (AP) -- An ally of Congo's president was on Friday evacuated from a town where he was held captive overnight by forces loyal to the opposition.

Nzanga Mobutu, son of late dictator Mobutu Sese Seko, had traveled Thursday to the northern town of Gbadolite to campaign for President Joseph Kabila. Clashes broke out between Mobutu's bodyguards and troops loyal to challenger Jean-Pierre Bemba.

A U.N.-supported radio station reported four people died in the violence.

Bemba's forces captured Mobutu and kept him holed up overnight in a Bemba-owned radio station, U.N. spokesman Jean-Tobie Okala said.

"This morning they agreed to release him," Okala said Friday.

A U.N. tank picked Mobutu up from the radio station and took him to the airport, where he was flown back to the capital, Kinshasa, Okala said.

The incident increased tensions ahead of Sunday's runoff. Voters will choose the mineral-rich central African nation's first democratically elected leader in four decades.

Friday marked the last official day of campaigning, and caravans of Congolese shouting support for their candidates swept through Kinshasa.

Several demonstrators were injured in scuffles that broke out between rival marchers near the city's airport.

Bemba, an ex-rebel leader who is now one of the country's four vice presidents, canceled a rally planned for the day citing security concerns.

On Thursday at least two prisoners were killed in a riot in Kinshasa after authorities tightened restrictions following the escape of a dozen inmates convicted of involvement in the assassination of Kabila's father, President Laurent Kabila.

The runoff was required after no candidate won a simple majority during the first round July 30. Kabila finished with 45 percent, and Bemba was second with 20 percent.

In August, as first-round results trickled in showing Kabila with a firm lead, street battles erupted in Kinshasa between Kabila's troops and Bemba's guards that shook the city and lasted three days. The two sides battled with automatic weapons, heavy guns and tanks. At least 23 people died.

Bemba, 44, once ruled a vast patch of territory in northeastern Congo. He was backed by neighboring Uganda during Congo's 1998-2002 civil war, which drew in the armies of more than half a dozen African nations.

Kabila signed a peace deal with Bemba and other rebels that ended the fighting and reunited the country, and gave rebel leaders top jobs in a transitional government set up in 2003.

U.N. Study: Foreign Troops In Somalia Raise War Risk (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

NAIROBI, Oct. 27 -- Thousands of Ethiopian and Eritrean troops are in Somalia, backing opposing sides in the struggle for control of the country, according to a confidential U.N. paper. The involvement of the two rivals could set the stage for a regional war.

The U.N. report, dated Oct. 26, cites diplomatic sources in estimating that "between 6,000 and 8,000 Ethiopians and 2,000 fully equipped Eritrean troops are now inside Somalia supporting" the internationally recognized transitional government and the group known as the Council of Islamic Courts, respectively.

"Both sides in the Somali conflict are reported to have major outside backers -- the government supported by Ethiopia, Uganda and Yemen; the Islamic courts receiving aid from Iran, Libya, Saudi Arabia and Gulf States," the report added.

The transitional government and the Council of Islamic Courts have been girding for battle for weeks. Government forces have dug trenches near the western town of Baidoa, the only town the U.N.-backed government controls. The Islamic group has deployed forces at a strategic town between Baidoa and its headquarters in the Somali capital, Mogadishu.

Since taking Mogadishu in June, the Islamic fighters have extended their hold over much of southern Somalia.

DOJ_NMG_0088566

Ethiopian officials have said they have only a few hundred military advisers assisting the government. The Somali transitional government has accused Eritrea of arming and supporting the Islamic group, a charge Eritrean and Islamic officials have denied.

The paper was written to help U.N. officials map a strategy on aid to Somalia, a severely impoverished country that has not had an effective central government since 1991.

Ethiopia and Eritrea fought a two-year border war that left tens of thousands of people dead and remains unresolved.

Foreign Troops Set Stage For War (WT/AP)

By Chris Tomlinson, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya -- Thousands of Ethiopian and Eritrean troops are in Somalia backing opposing sides in the struggle for control of the strategic country, according to a confidential U.N. briefing paper. The involvement of the two Horn of Africa rivals could set the stage for a regional war.

Islamic radicals, said by the United Nations to be backed by Eritrea, held rallies in several Somali cities calling for a holy war on Ethiopia and the internationally backed Somali government it supports.

The U.N. report dated Oct. 26 and obtained yesterday, cites diplomatic sources in estimating that "between 6,000-8,000 Ethiopians and 2,000 fully equipped Eritrean troops are now inside Somalia supporting" the internationally recognized government and the Islamic group known as the Council of Islamic Courts, respectively.

"Both sides in the Somali conflict are reported to have major outside backers -- the government supported by Ethiopia, Uganda and Yemen; the Islamic courts receiving aid from Iran, Libya, Saudi Arabia and [Persian] Gulf states," the report added.

The transitional government and the Council of Islamic Courts have been girding for battle in recent weeks. Government forces, supported by Ethiopian military advisers, have been seen digging trenches near Baidoa, the only town the U.N.-backed government controls.

The Islamic courts have deployed forces at a strategic town between Baidoa and their headquarters in the Somali capital, Mogadishu, 150 miles to the southeast.

The military moves could be mere posturing ahead of peace talks scheduled for next week in Khartoum, Sudan, but most observers are pessimistic about the chances for an agreement and fear major fighting could follow if talks fail.

"Clearly the situation is rapidly deteriorating and an all-out war is possible," the report said.

Ethiopia and Eritrea fought a two-year border war that remains unresolved. The top U.S. diplomat to Africa, Jendayi Frazer, last week accused Eritrea of using Somalia to open a second front against Ethiopia.

In Washington on Thursday, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack called on Ethiopia and Eritrea not to further aggravate the situation.

"There are tensions between Ethiopia and Eritrea even removing Somalia from the equation. When you add Somalia into the equation, each of Ethiopia and Eritrea's various perceived equities with the various groups in Somalia, then it becomes very complex, a complex situation," he said.

The briefing paper was written to help senior U.N. officials map a strategy of how to provide aid to one of the most impoverished countries in the world, one that has not had an effective central government since 1991.

Geostrategy: China Strengthens Its Ties To Africa (WSJ)

By Shai Oster

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

Anyone wanting to find an African leader this coming week will need to book a ticket to Beijing.

The heads of all but five of the continent's 53 countries will descend on the Chinese capital for the biggest gathering of foreign leaders Beijing has ever hosted. The three-day summit will highlight a mushrooming trade relationship between the world's most populous country and its second-biggest continent that is stirring angst among some in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0088567

China's leadership is rolling out an enormous welcome for its African guests that hints at Beijing's grand ambitions for the relationship. The airport expressway flutters with hundreds of welcoming flags; billboards across the city have been covered with messages attesting to Sino-African friendship; and television stations are running specials on Africa tourism.

China's modern presence in Africa dates to the Cold War, when it sought to form "anti-imperialist" alliances there to block the U.S. and its allies. In recent years, the focus has changed to acquiring natural resources to fuel China's galloping economy. African oil currently accounts for a third of China's oil imports -- an amount that is likely to increase, as China is expected to become even more heavily reliant on foreign oil sources.

But China's trade relationship with Africa now goes well beyond oil and other natural resources. Africa also offers a largely untapped and underserved market for Chinese companies as they take steps toward becoming global players. Huawei Technologies Co., for example, China's leading telecommunications-equipment maker, has done a thriving business in Africa even as the company has struggled to penetrate more-developed markets.

China's total trade with Africa has ballooned to about $40 billion last year from $10 billion in 2000. Two-way trade rose 30% last year -- faster than China's overall foreign trade -- and Chinese officials expect it to increase at least 25% this year, to more than $50 billion. China now ranks as Africa's third-largest trading partner, behind the U.S. and France.

In Nigeria, Sudan, Angola and elsewhere, Beijing is seen as a more hands-off alternative to the West, which is increasingly imposing stringent environmental and social conditions on aid to African nations. World Bank President Paul Wolfowitz has publicly complained that Chinese banks ignore human-rights and environmental standards when lending in Africa.

But as the gala summit will demonstrate, China shows no sign of wanting to slow its burgeoning rapport with Africa. From Beijing's perspective, it can't afford to -- especially when it comes to oil. "China's options are limited," said Zhang Zhongxiang, a senior fellow at the East-West Center in Hawaii. "As a late entrant to the international oil game, China has little choice but to strike deals with what the U.S. and others call rogue states to secure oil supplies."

Lithuanians Are Given A Taste Of How Russia Plays The Oil Game (NYT)

By Andrew E. Kramer

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 27 — The Russian government has never been straightforward about its plans to take control of the oil and gas business.

So, Lithuanians were suspicious when Russia said it shut its pipeline — the only one supplying Russian crude oil — in late July because of a leak.

In fact, it was not so much the pipeline the Russians were concerned about, according to Lithuanian officials, analysts and company executives. It was what the pipeline was connected to: Lithuania's sole refinery.

And because Russia often gets what it wants, it may not matter that the Lithuanian government had signed an agreement in June to sell the refinery to a Polish company, PKN Orlen, for much more than Russia had offered.

"The goal was to force Lithuania to reconsider the sale," Tomas Janeliunas, deputy director of the Center for Strategic Studies who has followed the sale closely, said in an interview. "They wanted a Russian company to buy the refinery, but for cheaper than a market price."

Lithuania's brush with Kremlin oil politics, critics of Russian business practices say, is a case study of what Vice President Dick Cheney called Moscow's use of energy exports as "tools for intimidation and blackmail" in relations with its neighbors.

That characterization angered Russian officials, who say they are being discriminated against in the business world as many Russian companies expand their operations into Europe.

"What is all the hysteria about?" President Vladimir V. Putin asked at a meeting with German business executives recently, the Interfax news agency reported. "We cannot understand why the media is nervous about Russia's possible investments in Germany."

Russian companies, their accounts padded by high commodity prices, are on a buying spree overseas. A steel mill in Michigan, a pipeline in Germany and a mine in Australia have recently been sold to the Russian companies Severstal, Gazprom and Rusal, respectively.

DOJ_NMG_0088568

In Lithuania, the government and Yukos, a company very much out of favor with the Kremlin, were trying to sell the Mazeikiu Nafta refinery in Lithuania in a sale organized by Lehman Brothers of New York.

Four companies bid: two from Russia, one from Kazakhstan and one from Poland. The Russian companies, Lukoil and TNK-BP, lost after entering bids lower than the others. When asked to match the competing prices, the Russians declined, Nerijus Eidukevicius, chairman of the board of Mazeikiu refinery, said in an interview in Vilnius.

In June, PKN Orlen won the refinery with a bid of $1.49 billion for Yukos's 53.7 percent stake and $850 million for the 30.6 percent owned by the Lithuanian government.

"They weren't showing interest," Mr. Eidukevicius said of the Russian companies. "It was strange."

In fact, analysts say, the Russian government was pursuing strategies to win the refinery for a Russian company outside the sale process — and at a knockdown price.

At the time of the sale, Yukos was heading into a politically tinged bankruptcy proceeding in Russia. Rosneft, the state oil company, whose chairman, Igor I. Sechin, is a former KGB agent and Mr. Putin's chief of staff, had already acquired most of Yukos in a forced auction in 2004, and had its sights on the rest.

To get to the front of the line for Yukos assets, Rosneft signed a confidential agreement with Western creditor banks in December 2005 to assume Yukos's debt if the banks forced that company into liquidation, which happened in March. This made Rosneft a creditor in the bankruptcy filing.

The Russian bankruptcy receiver representing Rosneft's claim, Eduard Rebgun, then sued in the federal Bankruptcy Court in New York and in the Netherlands to block the refinery sale, but lost both cases. That ended the legal attempts to win title to the refinery outside the sale run by Lehman Brothers.

In what Yukos executives say was a sign of the deep displeasure of the Russian government at these rulings, Russian prosecutors opened criminal fraud investigations against four Yukos executives. The announcement of these investigations came less than an hour after the decision in Amsterdam on Aug. 17.

The former chief executive of Yukos, Steven M. Theede, an American, called the Russian criminal case against him a "vendetta" that reflected the depth of frustration of Russian authorities at the collapse of their six-month effort to buy the Lithuanian refinery and other smaller Yukos assets in Slovakia and Switzerland.

"When anybody stops them from doing anything it makes them angry," Mr. Theede said.

Russia, meanwhile, suffered a setback of a different nature inside Lithuania, political analysts in that country say.

In the midst of the sale process, a pro-Russian politician in the Lithuanian government whose ministry was responsible for overseeing the refinery sale was ousted in a campaign finance scandal. The minister, Viktor Uspaskich, fled to Moscow and is now wanted by Interpol.

The Russian government invited his replacement, Kestutis Dauksys, to a Kremlin meeting on May 23 with Dmitri A. Medvedev, a Russian deputy prime minister, according to Mr. Dauksys. The message, he said, was that the Russians truly wanted the refinery.

"He said the Russian government was interested in who buys Mazeikiu Nafta," Mr. Dauksys recalled in a telephone interview. "He said Russian companies are interested in buying it."

"They thought they could buy it at low cost, but that is not possible today," Mr. Dauksys said of the Russians. He returned to Vilnius.

Aleksandr Temerko, a former vice president of Yukos, said the company interpreted Mr. Dauksys's account of the meeting as a threat to Mazeikiu's Russian-controlled oil supply through the Druzhba pipeline.

The refinery immediately retooled for tanker oil, a decision that proved prescient; the first shipment arrived a week before the pipeline was shut.

The sales contract with PKN Orlen had an escape clause if the market value of the refinery dropped significantly before the sale closed. Lithuanian analysts and politicians said that forcing PKN Orlen to exercise this escape clause, thus reopening the sale for Russian companies, was one motive for the pipeline shutdown.

Then, on Oct. 12, a fire at the Mazeikiu refinery caused about $75 million in damage and lost profit for 2006, according to the Lithuanian government and the Fitch credit rating agency. The fire is expected to reduce output by 50 percent until early next year. While arson has not been ruled out, the Lithuanian news media have reported that the likely cause was a petroleum leak. A formal ruling is expected in November.

DOJ_NMG_0088569

PKN Orlen, in a statement shortly after the fire, said it would discuss with its lenders whether the sale could go forward.

With his country's largest asset tied up in business negotiations, Russian style, Lithuania's president has hinted at possible reciprocation in kind.

President Valdas Adamkus suggested on Aug. 19 that the only Russian railroad supplying the Kaliningrad region, which passes through Lithuania, could be shut for what the Lithuanian news media called "political repairs."

"We should guarantee the safety of trains and passengers," Mr. Adamkus said, according to the Baltic News Service. "Should repairs be needed in order to increase the safety of railway services, I see no reason to heat up political tensions."

Backsliding In Europe (WP)

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Democracies take time to mature, even inside the European Union.

HUNGARY'S commemoration of the 50th anniversary of a failed revolution against communist rule this week degenerated into rioting -- another signal that the democracy that now governs that Central European country is far from healthy. The Socialist prime minister has been under siege from the streets since he was caught admitting that his party lied "morning, noon and night" to win reelection in June. His right-wing opposition has been soft on the racists and extreme nationalists who are at the forefront of the disturbances.

The worse news is that Hungarian politics look pretty good compared with most of the other formerly communist countries of Central Europe. Slovakia, which a year ago was being lionized for its cutting-edge free-market policies, now is governed by a coalition of populists, authoritarians and racists who promise to dismantle the reforms. Poland's government is dominated by twin brothers serving as president and prime minister; their most notable acts have been insults to neighboring Germany and an assault on the independence of the country's central bank. The Czech Republic has had no real government at all since a deadlocked election five months ago. Bulgaria's president finds himself in a runoff election for a new term this weekend with a challenger known for insulting Muslims and Gypsies.

This dismal political picture is creating considerable unease in the European Union, which opened its doors to Poland, Hungary, Slovakia, the Czech Republic and four other former Communist states in 2004 and is due to admit Bulgaria and Romania in January. Some are wondering whether the nationalists and racists now on the fringes of several Central European governments could end up leading them in the future, rupturing the European Union's fundamental commitments to human rights. Others fret that repairing the union's frayed institutions after the rejection of a proposed constitution last year will be impossible with such unattractive and unstable partners -- and that any hope of further E.U. expansion will be lost.

In fact, the gloom seems overstated. Despite the political malaise, Central European countries are flourishingly economically, and their abundant workers and hungry entrepreneurs promise to revive Europe as a whole. The rise of populist and nationalist parties is in part a reaction to years of enforced consensus under previous governments that were trying to meet the European Union's myriad entry criteria. Once the finish line was crossed, a backlash against blending into a single transnational superstate was inevitable. The pendulum will swing back as the populists stumble.

As Russia grows ever more aggressive toward its neighbors, the former Soviet satellites will probably respond by burrowing more deeply into the European Union and NATO. It may be satisfying for Polish nationalists to pretend that Germany is an antagonist or for Hungarians to try equating their current Socialist leaders with the Stalinists of 1956. Yet after 45 years of bitter experience under despotism, Central Europeans won't quickly abandon Western-style democracy or its alliances.

Africa Over A Barrel (WP)

By Abdoulaye Wade

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

DAKAR, Senegal -- Although gasoline prices have dropped recently in the United States, many Americans continue to worry about the toll of oil dependence at the gas pump and on the U.S. economy. As an African, I feel their pain -- and then some. While the price of a barrel of crude has recently dipped below $60, oil still costs twice as much as it did three years ago -- and experts fully expect the price to climb higher.

DOJ_NMG_0088570

President Bush, a one-time oilman, has warned Americans about the danger of a country's being "addicted to oil." Yet the toll of oil dependence in the United States pales beside the pain that soaring oil prices cause in Africa.

In sub-Saharan Africa, in particular, the oil crisis is not a vexing "cost crunch"; it is an unfolding catastrophe that could set back efforts to reduce poverty and promote economic development for years.

In the United States, working men and women fretted when gas prices topped $3 a gallon this year. Here in the capital of Senegal, gasoline costs $5.62 a gallon. Unlike the United States, we are not a rich nation. Imagine having to pay such an exorbitant price to fill up your tank -- but in a country where per capita income is $849 a year. Senegal's electrical utility has been forced to turn off the lights throughout the nation for long periods every day, a crippling problem that could be eased if energy cost less.

The math is not hard to do. Everywhere in West Africa, governments are being forced to reallocate lifeline budget subsidies to counterbalance unprecedented oil and electricity prices. Senegal's direct oil subsidies to domestic consumers have increased fivefold since 2002. Niger's fuel costs have quadrupled. Even in Africa's oil-producing nations, windfall profits from oil have failed to reduce poverty. Per capita income in Nigeria is still $1,400 a year.

If the price of crude oil reaches $100 a barrel within the next year -- as some analysts predict -- a pan-African disaster will be upon us. Richer, oil-producing countries in Africa risk being inundated with mass migrations of people seeking survival.

By draining government treasuries, the soaring price of oil in West African nations has made it all but impossible to proceed with antipoverty efforts, and it is hindering work to increase access to public health services and to reduce the spread of AIDS. It is true that man does not live by bread alone. But being freed from the daily necessities of survival is a prerequisite to educating the workforce and building an economy.

The oil shock wave is undermining American aims on the continent, too. As oil prices go into orbit, America's efforts to promote liberal democratic economies and combat terrorism in Africa are sabotaged. I write this as the head of state of a tolerant, pro-Western -- and predominantly Muslim -- nation.

What can be done? Part of the solution must come from Africa itself. This past summer in Dakar, I convened the first meeting of energy ministers from 13 nations to form the Pan-African Non-Petroleum Producers Association (PANPP), with the intention that it serve as a green version of OPEC. The members of PANPP aspire to become leaders in the field of biofuels and alternative energy strategies, following in Brazil's footsteps. But the development of a biofuel industry, particularly cellulosic biofuels made from agricultural wastes and prairie grasses (which President Bush touted in his State of the Union address) could take a decade or more to come to fruition. Africa needs help today.

As a stopgap measure, I propose that our organization ask African oil-producing nations, as well as the international community and major oil companies, to chip in from recent windfall profits to reduce the increase in oil prices that has taken place since 2003.

If ever there were a time when major oil companies such as ExxonMobil, Shell, Chevron, Total and BP could contribute to stabilizing West Africa by reducing the oil surcharge, it is today. As a champion of market economies, I can appreciate that companies do not easily part with profits. But the continued cost of the oil crisis in Africa could easily destabilize oil-producing nations and shrivel downstream markets for the oil companies elsewhere in the continent. It's in the interest not only of America but also the petroleum industry not to have an Africa in ruins.

The writer is president of the Republic of Senegal.

Stuck In The Canal (NYT)

By David Fromkin

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

FIFTY years ago tomorrow — on Oct. 29, 1956 — Israeli paratroops were dropped deep behind Egyptian lines in the Sinai peninsula, opening the way for the ground troops that followed. In a lightning campaign lasting less than five days, the Israelis took control of the entire peninsula. The Israelis had a rendezvous at the Suez Canal with the armed forces of Britain and France.

DOJ_NMG_0088571

But the British and French stopped short of their goal. Like out of shape ex-champions attempting a comeback, the Europeans were unable to get past the first round in their effort to return to the Middle East.

The Suez crisis was a divide in the history of the Middle East. It was the moment when America pushed out the Europeans and then tried to take their place — and the reverberations are still felt today. The road that led to Suez began in 1947, when the British Foreign Office notified the American Department of State that Britain could no longer afford to hold its positions in Greece and Turkey against pressure from Russia. Soon the United States was engaged in an effort to hold the line against Russia — there, but also all around the world.

The Middle East was essential to this policy of containment. The Arabic-speaking Muslim world had been taken in hand by Britain and France after the First World War, and though they had since achieved independence, the countries of the Middle East remained predominantly Western-influenced. European and American oil companies played an important role in Middle Eastern affairs. Britain retained a presence at the strategically vital Suez Canal in the form of a major military base and a garrison of more than 80,000 men. Not until the autumn of 1954 did Britain agree to withdraw from this installation.

The United States had always deplored European — especially British — imperialism. In the First World War, President Woodrow Wilson seemingly hesitated as to which side to join (or whether to at all), and in the end joined Britain and France only as an "associated power" rather than as an ally, thus making clear that our country did not share the goals of the other belligerents — goals that Wilson claimed were imperialistic.

As the United States accepted the responsibility, therefore, of defending the Middle East against possible Soviet aggression, its government was conflicted. In the interest of cold war containment, the United States should have wanted to shore up whatever remained of British and French presence and power in the Middle East, but at the same time the worry was that any association with the Europeans would drag America down.

As early as 1952, the C.I.A. was searching for an Arab leader to support, someone who would make hard, unpopular decisions. Recognizing that such a leader could be expected to have an agenda of his own, the agency needed him to take the lead in defending against Soviet expansionism.

Initially Allen Dulles, director of central intelligence, proposed Gamal Abdel Nasser, the emerging Egyptian dictator. John Foster Dulles, Allen's brother and the secretary of state, agreed. But it soon became evident that Nasser had little or no interest in fighting communism or the Soviet Union. A charismatic figure, he aimed to unite the Arab peoples, and he exploited resentment of Western imperialism to win support. Secretary Dulles then turned to create an alternative anti-Soviet force: the Baghdad Pact, a northern-tier alliance of Turkey, Iran, Iraq and Pakistan. The only Arab state in the lot was Iraq, led by its pro-British prime minister, Nuri as-Said, who was widely perceived as the Anglo-American candidate for leadership of the Arab world, and as such the rival of Nasser.

In putting Nuri as-Said up, Secretary Dulles had in effect challenged Nasser to a duel. Nasser, a military man whose objective was to build his army, showed his independence of the West by ordering arms in large quantity from the Soviet bloc. Dulles took this at first as a bluff; then, when he could not stop it, he took it as a mortal insult — but he floundered, unable to find the right reply.

He offered to finance the Egyptian leader's favorite project: the Aswan High Dam. Then, puzzlingly, he canceled the offer, apparently intending to humiliate Nasser publicly. The Egyptian trumped that. He nationalized the Suez Canal, transferring to Egypt the shares of the company that owned it. Nasser announced that Egypt would finance the dam itself, using the income from the canal. This bold move was a public challenge to Britain, the canal's biggest user and shareholder, and to France, which had created the canal in the 19th century.

President Dwight D. Eisenhower and Secretary Dulles believed that Nasser should be overthrown — some day. Repeatedly they told the British and French that it would be a mistake to use force, at least at the moment. But Britain and France were already planning how they might use force. Frenchmen imagined that Algeria's revolt against them, launched in 1954, was inspired by Nasser, and that without him it would collapse. Britons found themselves losing control of Jordan because of Nasser, and believed that without him they could regain control.

There was more to it. The Western leaders had irrationally come to regard Nasser as dangerous, a Hitler or a Mussolini. Prime Minister Anthony Eden of Britain was typical: a Foreign Office Arabist by background who moved in circles where it was felt that Arabs loved Englishmen, Eden believed that Nasser had somehow stolen that love. It was Nasser, he thought, who had taken away Jordan's famed Arab Legion from its British officers. "I want him killed," Eden said. So for months the allies had been conspiring. They would return to the Middle East, and they would invade Egypt. The confiscation of the canal company spurred them into action.

DOJ_NMG_0088572

Eden, Prime Minister Guy Mollet of France and his foreign secretary, Christian Pineau, joined by a number of colleagues, hatched a plot based on an earlier plan for France and Israel to act together, and in which Britain now joined. In October 1956, Israel attacked Egypt through Sinai and drove to Suez. Britain and France then invaded, occupying the canal and claiming to be separating the Egyptian and Israeli Armies. The British, French and Israelis stuck to their prefabricated story, but their collusion was evident; soon they had to admit the truth.

The Americans had been kept in the dark, and they took it personally. Eisenhower in particular was angered by British wartime colleagues who had lied and deceived him. "What does Anthony think he is doing?" Eisenhower demanded. "Why is he doing this to me?" He refused to listen to excuses, claiming that "nothing justified double-crossing the United States."

The Soviet leader, Nikita Khrushchev, grandstanded, threatening the Western imperialists. That enabled him to take credit for stopping the Europeans — even though it really was America that did it. The United States acted quietly but effectively. The Treasury Department threatened to withdraw support of the British currency unless the British Army left Egypt. Within 10 days, England would have collapsed financially. The British — and the invasion — stopped. To keep from being thought imperialists, the Eisenhower administration saved Nasser. The Suez crisis was over.

Britain and France had gone to war in order to keep their empires; instead, they lost them. The United States had aimed to keep Russia out of the Middle East, but the Suez crisis, and Khrushchev's rhetoric, brought the Russians in. Eisenhower and Dulles believed that by their actions at Suez they were showing the nonaligned nations that, unlike the British and French, Americans were not imperialists — but the third world remained unconvinced. And in Europe, skeptics claimed the episode showed that the Americans intended to steal the empires of Britain and France.

Britain and France drew opposite conclusions from the Suez experience. Britain noted that it was dependent on the United States and would, for the most part, have to act accordingly and follow wherever America led. France decided that the United States would not protect France's interests, and immediately, under Guy Mollet, began to build the atomic bomb — the result of American policy.

Israel compromised itself through its partnership with European imperialism — providing evidence to enemies who had asserted all along that Israel was no more than a European imperialist itself. And its victory in the Sinai campaign — one of many dazzling triumphs — illustrated the paradox that the more Israel won on the battlefield, the further it got from achieving the peace that it sought.

THE undoing of the British-French-Israeli alliance was that it rested on a lie. It is difficult to re-create the shock felt around the world when it became apparent that these supposedly honorable countries, and the principled statesmen who led them, would stoop to such a ridiculous fabrication. It was disgraceful: that they lied, and that the lie was so childish.

Scenarios had been prepared at various levels of the American government in the event that the Europeans acted against the Nasser regime. So far as I know, none of them envisaged the United States intervening to stop them. Had the allies fully and honestly informed Washington of their intentions, either the Eisenhower administration would have persuaded them to adopt an alternative strategy, or the allies would have convinced Washington to let them go ahead, or the United States would have explained to London how America's control of the British currency gave it a veto power over British policy. One way or another, America's angry reaction would have been avoided.

Though it cannot be proved, the lies of the allies weakened their cause in another important way. It outraged public opinion in France and, especially, Britain. A message was delivered: decision-makers in European governments were on notice that they no longer were free to initiate colonial wars.

The Europeans, to their credit, understood the message. Within years of the Suez crisis, Britain and France began decolonization programs in which they released territories they had held around the world. The winds of change had begun to blow — and they had come from Suez.

DOJ_NMG_0088573

DOJ_NMG_0088574

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 28, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Judge Sets Schedule On Detainee Lawsuits (AP) 3
Cheney Defends 'Dunk In The Water' Remark (WP) 3
Furor Over Cheney Remark On Tactics For Terror Suspects (NYT) 5
Cheney Calls Dunking Of Terror Suspects A 'No-brainer' (LAT)... 5
White House Denies Cheney Hailed "Water Boarding" (AP) 6
Bush Enters Cheney "Torture Row" (BBC)..... 6
Informant For FBI Is Freed (ALBANYTU)..... 7
Lodi Man Seeks New Trial In Terrorism Case (MERCN)..... 8
Taking Terror Fight To N. Africa Leads U.S. To Unlikely Alliances (WP) 9

Patriot Act:

ACLU Drops Patriot Act Challenge (AP)..... 11
ACLU Drops Patriot Act Suit (DEN)..... 12

Homeland Response:

Chertoff Lays Out Plan To Police Chiefs (GCN)..... 12
Airlines Delay In Checking Workers (LAT) 13
Suspicious Letter Shuts Clinton's Harlem Office (NYT) 14
Substance At Clinton's Office Not Toxic (USAT/AP)..... 14
Training Gets Under Way At UCO Forensics Center (OKLA)..... 14
IU Student Set Up Website For Fake Boarding Passes (WISH). 15
Mayor Expands Search For 9/11 Remains (NYT)..... 16
Follow The Money (WSJ)..... 17

War News:

Iraqi Prime Minister Criticizes U.S. Policy (LAT)..... 18
Fighting Split, U.S. And Iraq Renew Vow To Work For Peace (NYT) 19
Search For U.S. Soldier Spurs Sadr City Battles (WP) 20
U.S., Iraq Affirm 'Good, Strong' Ties (WT/AP)..... 21
In Baghdad, A Sudden Chance To Play (WP)..... 22
U.S. Citizen Won't Be Handed To Iraq, Federal Court Says (WP/AP)..... 24
U.S. Finds Too Many KBR Reports 'Proprietary' (WP)..... 24
Report Says Iraq Contractor Is Hiding Data From U.S. (NYT).... 24
Halliburton Arm Accused Of 'abuse' In Iraq (FT)..... 26
Massoud Barzani Kurdistan (WSJ)..... 27
The Grand Ayatollah Behind The Curtain (WP) 29
NATO Boss, Bush Condemn Taliban Atrocities (WT/AP)..... 30
Blast In South Afghan Suburb Kills 14 And Wounds 3 (NYT)..... 31
Photo Scandal Raises Doubts In Germany About Deployments (WP)..... 31

Corporate Scandals:

Orbital Finds Misdated Options (WP) 32
Legal Aid In Options Probes, Private Law Firms Play Crucial Role (WSJ)..... 33
J.P. Morgan Receives SEC Inquiry Related To Bisys (WSJ)..... 36
Corporate Crime Sanjay Kumar Awaits His Sentence (WSJ) 36
Sinking Big Fish In Fraud Aids Small Fry (AP-YBIZ)..... 37

Criminal Law:

Official In Abramoff Case Sentenced To 18 Months (WP)..... 38
Safavian Given 18 Months (WT/AP)..... 39
Jail Time For Ex-official In Influence-peddling Case (LAT/AP).... 39
Ex-procurement Chief Gets 18 Months In Prison (GOVEXEC) .. 40
Man Linked To Abramoff Is Sentenced To 18 Months (NYT) 41
Ethics Report On Foley Not Expected Before Elections (WP) 41
Levine Enters Guilty Plea (CHIT)..... 43
Governor's Campaign Donor Pleads Guilty In Kickback Case (CHIT/AP) 44
4 Men Found Guilty In Airport Fraud (HSB)..... 45
Proposed Religion-Based Program For Federal Inmates Is Canceled (NYT) 46
The Disillusionment Of A Young White House Evangelical (NYT)46
High Court To Rule On Deadly Force In Police Chases (WP) 48
Justices To Rule On Police Ramming Car To End Chase (LAT) 48
Convicted Killers See New Trial Over Court Chaos (NYT)..... 50
Baby Girl's Death In Brooklyn Is Ruled A Homicide By Officials (NYT) 51
Police Say Malvo Confessed To Killing Arizona Golfer (USAT/AP) 52
Professor Accused Of Spying For Cuba Won't Be Released Before Trial (MH) 52
Feds In Wyo. Take Over Colorado Ad Probe (WP/AP)..... 53
Pataki Picks Ex-Prosecutor To Weigh In On Hevesi Case (NYT)53
New York's Pataki Calls For Review Of Hevesi Findings (Update2) (BLOOM) 54
Doolittle Legal Fate Uncertain (SACBEE) 55
BX. PIMP COPS A PLEA (AP) 57
Mailman Pimp Awaits Delivery To Jail (NSL) 57
Seminole Man Charged In Online Hacking Plot (TAMPTRIB) 58

Jury Spares Convicted Murderer From Death Penalty In Puerto Rico (FINDLAW/AP) ... 59
Porter Releases Phone Records, Schedules (LVS) ... 59
Rolling Admitted Shreveport Murders Before Execution (AP) ... 60
Mafia Figure Is Sentenced To Life Term In 2 Murders (NYT) ... 61
MAFIA MURDERER GETS LIFE (NYPOST) ... 61

Civil Law:

Ruling Upholds Air Force On Religious Issue (NYT/AP) ... 62
Suit Against Air Force Academy Dismissed (WT/AP) ... 62

Civil Rights:

Drifter Sought Over Hate Graffiti (WT) ... 63
11 In O.C. Charged With Voter Registration Fraud (LAT) ... 63
Justice Department Official Meets With Residents Regarding Shooting (LCAP) ... 65
Union Claims Police-recruit Bias (INDYSTAR) ... 65
New Voters Likely Out Of City Elections (BSH) ... 66
For Gay Couples, Ruling Has A Cash Value (NYT) ... 67
Civil Union Or Marriage? A Long Wait In New Jersey (NYT) ... 68
Conserving That Compassion (NYT) ... 69
Thought Police In The Lecture Hall (WP) ... 70

Antitrust:

Tribune Is Said To Get Bids From Private Equity Firms (NYT) ... 71
Local Support Boosts Baltimore Sun Bidder (WT) ... 71
A New Advertising Engine (WP) ... 72
Arcelor Mittal Takes Stake In Mich. Auto Supplier Noble (AP) ... 73
FCC Sets Vote On AT&T Purchase Of BellSouth To Nov. 3 (Update1) (BLOOM) ... 74
Smithfield Foods Gambling On Merger; Foes Fighting Expansion (DPHR) ... 74
BD Wins Federal Antitrust Approval For TriPath Deal (BERGCR) 75

Environment:

Appeals Court Halts Stryker Activity Here (HSB) ... 75
Fireman Fights To Live, Comrades Fight Blaze (LAT) ... 76
Sheriff's Office 'Taking Lots Of Calls' With Arson Tips (LAT) ... 79
Calif. Blaze Spreads After Firefighters' Deaths (WP) ... 79
Burst Of Wind-Driven Flames Engulfed Firefighters (NYT) ... 80
Taking On A Coal Mining Practice As A Matter Of Faith (NYT) ... 82
Preparations For A Flu Pandemic (NYT) ... 83

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Man Gets Probation For Owning Firearms (HIR) ... 83
Feds Were Planning Raid On Vroman's Home (SRPD) ... 84
Guilty Plea In Plot To Bomb Abortion Clinic (WP) ... 85

Tax:

No Taxes Until After The Election (NYT) ... 86

Congress-Administration:

Tax-Cut Rollback Not On Table, Rangel Says (WP) ... 86
Waxman Plans Tougher Oversight Of Companies (WSJ) ... 87
This Chairmanship Fight May Not Have Been Anticipated By Democrats (CQ) ... 89
The Non-Contract With America (WSJ) ... 89
White House Is Trimming Army Budget For Next Year, Officials Say (NYT) ... 90
Rice's Counselor Gives Advice Others May Not Want To Hear (NYT) ... 91

Other News:

Housing Slump Slows Economy (WP) ... 93
U.S. Economic Growth Cools Down (WSJ) ... 94
Oil And Housing Put Brake On US Growth (FT) ... 94
Growth Slackened In Summer (NYT) ... 95
Housing Slows Economic Growth (WT) ... 96
After A Strong Week, A Whimper (NYT/AP) ... 97
Dow Steps Back On Concerns About Economy (WSJ) ... 98
Dollar Declines Against Rivals After A Sign Of Slowing Growth (WSJ) ... 99
Wholesale Gasoline Prices Rise, Cost At Pump Could Follow Suit (WSJ) ... 99
Oil Prices, Now Likely At Bottom, Are Poised To Rise, But Moderately By MATT CHAMBERS (WSJ) ... 100
Campaigns Go Negative For A Reason (LAT) ... 101
Swinging Along (NATJOUR) ... 102
Polls And Pundits: How Reliable Are Forecasts? (WSJ) ... 104
GOP Retains Cash Edge Over Resurgent Democrats (WP) ... 104
Politics Campaign Cash Clues (WSJ) ... 105
Democrats Get Late Donations From Business (NYT) ... 106
Moderate Republicans Feeling Like Endangered Species (NYT) 107
DNC Wooing Black Voters (WT) ... 109
Hollywood Director Targets Democrats In Ads (WT) ... 109
Allen Blasts Webb Novels For Sex Scenes (WP) ... 110
Virginia Senate Candidate Attacked Over His Novels (NYT) ... 112
Webb Hit For Novels' Sex-laced Language (WT) ... 113
'Brothels, Sex Kittens, Pedophilia?' (NYT) ... 114
Hot-Button Social Issues Dim In Ohio Senate Race (WP) ... 115
Evangelicals Fire Up The Faithful (WSJ) ... 116
'The Daily Show' Swinging Into Ohio (AP) ... 118
Judge Approves Ohio Rules On Voter Surveys (NYT/AP) ... 118
A Candidate's Sister Steps In To Defend Him On Stem Cell Issue (NYT) ... 119
Third-party Zeese Won't 'Be A Spoiler' (WT) ... 119
Bloomberg Sends Troops To Help Lieberman (NYT) ... 120
Anti-war Chafee In Tight Race In R.I. To Keep His Senate Seat (WT) ... 121
Wal-Mart Dismisses Adviser Who Created G.O.P. Ad (NYT) ... 122
In Indiana, Local Issues Take Toll (WSJ) ... 123
A G.O.P. Redoubt Upstate Suddenly Seems Less Sturdy (NYT) 124
This Time, Ballot Issues Could Rally Liberal Base (WP) ... 125
As Campaign Days Dwindle, Marriage Issue Heats Up In Va. (WP) ... 127
US Mid-terms: Ballot Propositions (BBC) ... 128
Building Better Citizens (NYT) ... 130
Marriage Ruling Resonates (LAT) ... 130
A Rising Star From Illinois Makes Some Noise In L.A. (LAT) ... 131
Schwarzenegger, Angelides Both Profess To Lean Green (LAT) 132
Faso Plays Up The Woes Of A Spitzer Ally (NYT) ... 134
Ethics -- Public And Private (WSJ) ... 134

DOJ_NMG_0088576

In Clean Politics, Flesh Is Pressed, Then Sanitized (NYT) 135
Justices To Take Up Autism-Case Dispute (NYT/AP) 136
How To Socialize With An Ex-President? Finance His Good Deeds. (NYT) 137
Unaired Ad Gets Dixie Chicks Flick A Whole Lot Of Ink (WP) .. 138
Los Angeles Abuse Cases Are Settled For $10 Million (NYT) .. 139
Movement Reportedly Seen At N.Korea Site (AP) 140
Gingerly, South Korea Imposes First Sanction On North (NYT) 141
Using A 2nd Network, Iran Raises Enrichment Ability (NYT) 141
Bush Says It's Unacceptable For Iran To Have Nuclear Weapon (WP) 142
Iran Doubles Nuke Enrichment Capacity (AP) 142
Enrichment Capacity Doubled, Source Says (WT/AP) 143
Iranian Nuclear Effort Defies U.N. Council Again (WP) 144
Rice Says Hezbollah Must Disarm To Be Part Of Lebanon's Political Process (USAT/AP) 145
Goodwill Ambassador? Venezuela Is Leery Of U.S. Envoy (NYT) 146
Colombia City Makes A U-turn (LAT) 147
Coca Growers Resist Bolivia Crackdown (WT) 149
American Pilots Were At Correct Altitude Over Brazil, Lawyer Says (NYT) 150
A Year After Suburban Riots, France Is Mostly Calm (WP) 150
Speeches And Arson Recall Last Year's Unrest In France (NYT) 151
French Muslims Mark Day Of Sadness To Honor Dead (LAT) . 152
Men Burn Buses In Paris Suburb (WT/AP) 153
In First Month As Japan's Premier, Abe Veers To Center (NYT) 153
Sri Lanka, Tamil Tigers Ready To Meet (LAT) 155
Sri Lankan Government And Tamil Tigers To Meet (NYT) 156
Crucial Sri Lanka Peace Talks Due (BBC) 157
U.N. To Limit The Role Of Its Envoy Expelled By Sudan (NYT) 157
Misery Churns In Eastern Sudan, Away From Spotlight (NYT). 158
Kidnapping And Turmoil Ahead Of Congo Vote (NYT) 159
Mobutu's Abduction Heightens Congo Election Tension (AP) .. 160
U.N. Study: Foreign Troops In Somalia Raise War Risk (WP/AP) 161
Foreign Troops Set Stage For War (WT/AP) 161
Geostrategy: China Strengthens Its Ties To Africa (WSJ) 162
Lithuanians Are Given A Taste Of How Russia Plays The Oil Game (NYT) 162
Backsliding In Europe (WP) 164
Africa Over A Barrel (WP) 165
Stuck In The Canal (NYT) 165

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge Sets Schedule On Detainee Lawsuits (AP)

AP, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - A federal judge Friday set the stage for the next push by the Bush administration to get all the lawsuits by detainees at Guantanamo Bay thrown out of U.S. courts.

U.S. District Judge James Robertson laid out a five-week schedule for the Justice Department and lawyers for Salim Ahmed Hamdan to file written arguments in the detainee's challenge to his confinement.

Hundreds of other detainees also are challenging their detentions in lawsuits.

It was a challenge by lawyers for Hamdan, Osama bin-Laden's former driver, that led to the Supreme Court ruling in June striking down the Bush administration's plan for military commission trials.

The new Military Commissions Act, which President Bush signed on Oct. 17, strips U.S. courts of jurisdiction to hear the detainees' challenges to their indefinite detentions. Hamdan's lawyers say the new provision is "of doubtful constitutionality."

Ten days ago, the Justice Department filed a copy of the new law with the court in Hamdan's case. Robertson said in a one-page order the Justice Department filing "is deemed to be a motion to dismiss" Hamdan's case.

Patrick Leahy, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee, has said the provision to strip detainees of access to U.S. courts would "take our civilized society back some 900 years to King John at Runnymede which led to the adoption of the Magna Carta."

Cheney Defends 'Dunk In The Water' Remark (WP)

By Dan Eggen, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Addressing Alarm Over the Comment, Vice President Says He Was Not Referring to Waterboarding

Vice President Cheney said yesterday that he was not referring to an interrogation technique known as "waterboarding" when he told an interviewer this week that dunking terrorism suspects in water was a "no-brainer."

Cheney told reporters aboard Air Force Two last night that he did not talk about any specific interrogation technique during his interview Tuesday with a conservative radio host.

"I didn't say anything about waterboarding. . . . He didn't even use that phrase," Cheney said on a flight to Washington from South Carolina.

DOJ_NMG_0088577

Earlier in the day, White House press secretary Tony Snow told reporters that the vice president was talking literally about "a dunk in the water," though neither Snow nor Cheney explained what that meant or whether such a tactic had been used against U.S. detainees.

"A dunk in the water is a dunk in the water," Snow said.

The comments were aimed at calming a growing furor over Cheney's comments, which were taken by many human rights advocates and legal experts as an endorsement of waterboarding as a method of questioning.

Coming shortly before the midterm elections, the remarks prompted a wide range of political figures -- from Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) to Cheney's wife, Lynne -- to weigh in on the issue, providing another unexpected controversy for Republicans as they fight to keep control of Congress. Reporters peppered Snow with questions about the interview during Snow's two daily news briefings.

Waterboarding, in which a prisoner is secured with his feet above his head and has water poured on a cloth over his face, is one of several methods of simulating drowning that date at least to the Spanish Inquisition. It has been specifically prohibited by the U.S. Army and widely condemned as torture by human rights groups and international courts.

"Would you agree a dunk in water is a no-brainer if it can save lives?" Scott Hennen of WDAY in Fargo, N.D., asked Cheney on Tuesday. "Well, it's a no-brainer for me," Cheney responded.

Cheney also said he agreed with Hennen that the debate over interrogation techniques was "a little silly," and he praised the information obtained from U.S. terrorism suspects during questioning.

Hennen said in an interview yesterday that he did not know precisely which technique Cheney was referring to and was only passing along a question he had heard from a listener.

"It's impossible for me to say 'Did the listener mean waterboarding?' and 'Is waterboarding torture?' and that sort of thing," Hennen said. "I can't get in the vice president's head, and I can't get in the listener's head."

Many legal experts said it was reasonable to conclude that Cheney was referring to waterboarding, since it has been a widely debated U.S. interrogation technique that uses water to subject a suspect to the fear of drowning.

U.S. interrogation methods have been the focus of fierce debate since revelations of detainee abuse in Iraq and Afghanistan and the disclosure that the CIA ran a network of secret prisons outside the United States. Numerous sources have confirmed that the CIA used waterboarding in its interrogation of alleged Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Sheik Mohammed and other "high-value" prisoners.

Some lawmakers have said that they believe waterboarding is illegal under detainee legislation approved last month, but the Bush administration has declined to say what techniques it considers off-limits.

Asked yesterday about Cheney's Tuesday remarks, President Bush did not specifically address them. But he said: "This country doesn't torture. We're not going to torture. We will interrogate people we pick up off the battlefield to determine whether or not they've got information that will be helpful to protect the country."

Human rights and legal experts said yesterday that even if Snow's version of Cheney's remarks is correct, Cheney's comments are troubling because dunking a terrorism suspect in water as part of an interrogation would actually be more physically dangerous than waterboarding. The tactic also would be illegal under U.S. and international laws, they said.

Tom Malinowski, Washington advocacy director for Human Rights Watch, noted that in the 1980s, Chadian forces led by military ruler Hissene Habre allegedly hung people upside down and dunked them in water during questioning. Habre was indicted by a Belgian court for torture and crimes against humanity and faces prosecution in Senegal.

Former CIA general counsel Jeffrey H. Smith said Cheney's comments were "irresponsible" and send a signal to U.S. interrogators that "the people at the top want you to get rough."

"It's clear that the vice president didn't mean a friendly swim at the country club," Smith said. "It would be designed to somehow frighten a prisoner and elicit information from them. Whatever it means, a dunk in the water is not harmless or innocent."

Kerry, the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee, issued a statement saying the comments provided another reason that voters should "change course" by voting for Democrats. "This administration's determination to assert the right to torture has undermined our moral authority, put our troops at greater risk and made our country less safe," Kerry said.

Snow and other Republicans pushed back strongly, arguing that Cheney's remarks had been misinterpreted and that the vice president had been talking about the value of interrogations in preventing terrorist attacks.

"That is a mighty house you are building on top of that molehill," Lynne Cheney said during an appearance on CNN's "The Situation Room." "A mighty mountain. This is complete distortion. He didn't say anything of the kind."

The ambiguities in the waterboarding debate were most evident during two contentious news briefings yesterday as Snow was repeatedly questioned by reporters who did not accept his explanations of Cheney's remarks. Snow repeatedly insisted that

DOJ_NMG_0088578

Cheney was not referring to waterboarding or any other technique, although he was at a loss to explain how being dunked in water would not also qualify as a method of interrogation.

Snow joked at several points about needing to avoid water-related metaphors in his comments, as when he accused reporters of "fishing" for answers. He declined to say what Cheney meant by dunking terrorism suspects in water but said he would get back to reporters with a fuller explanation, which did not materialize yesterday.

At one point during the first briefing, a frustrated reporter asked: "So the detainees go swimming?"

"I don't know," Snow responded. "We'll have to find out."

Staff writer Peter Baker and staff researcher Julie Tate contributed to this report.

Furor Over Cheney Remark On Tactics For Terror Suspects (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 27 — The White House found itself fending off questions on Friday about what Vice President Dick Cheney meant when he agreed with a talk-radio host that there was nothing wrong with dunking a terrorism suspect in water if it saved lives.

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said Mr. Cheney was not endorsing water-boarding, a coercive interrogation technique that simulates drowning and that many have said qualifies as torture. Mr. Snow said Mr. Cheney was not, in fact, referring to any technique, whether it was torture or not, because administration officials do not discuss interrogation methods.

President Bush was also confronted by reporters about Mr. Cheney's comments as he made a joint appearance with Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, the secretary general of NATO. "This country does not torture; we're not going to torture," Mr. Bush said, without referring directly to Mr. Cheney or his comments.

The questioning was set off when Mr. Cheney was interviewed Tuesday by Scott Hennen, a conservative radio talk show host in Fargo, N.D. "Would you agree that a dunk in water is a no-brainer if it can save lives?" Mr. Hennen asked.

"Well, it's a no-brainer for me," Mr. Cheney replied. "But for a while there I was criticized as being the vice president for torture. We don't torture. That's not what we're involved in."

Mr. Snow, who spent much of his day dealing with questions about the comments, told reporters that none of them related to interrogation techniques, which are classified. "I'm telling you what the vice president's view is, which is it wasn't about waterboarding. Period," he said.

The exchanges grew testy at times, especially when Mr. Snow said Mr. Cheney is not someone who slips up. One reporter noted that the vice president had once used a profanity on the Senate floor, and also shot a friend in the face during a hunting accident last February.

"That's a great line," Mr. Snow said, "but it's not germane."

Waterboarding is actually not a dunk in the water, but rather, covering a subject's face with a constantly soaked cloth to make breathing difficult. It has been reported as having been used on some suspected members of Al Qaeda who were secretly held by the Central Intelligence Agency until their transfer last month to the United States detention center at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

Tom Malinowski, the Washington director of Human Rights Watch, said, "If Iran or Syria detained an American, Cheney is saying that it would be perfectly fine for them to hold that American's head under water until he nearly drowns, if that's what they need to do to save Iranian or Syrian lives."

When Mr. Cheney's wife, Lynne, was asked on CNN about the comments, she told Wolf Blitzer: "That is a mighty house you're building on top of that mole hill there, a mighty mountain. This is complete distortion. He didn't say anything of the kind."

Cheney Calls Dunking Of Terror Suspects A 'No-brainer' (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

Vice president later says: 'I didn't say anything about water-boarding.'

Comments by Vice President Dick Cheney to a radio interviewer prompted questions Friday about whether he advocated torturing terrorism detainees to obtain information. Cheney denied endorsing torture, and President Bush said that the United States does not practice torture.

Cheney's remarks, in an interview Tuesday with conservative talk-radio host Scott Hennen from Fargo, N.D., stirred up fresh controversy over the interrogation technique known as "water-boarding," which experts say simulates drowning.

Human rights groups sharply criticized Cheney, who said later that he was not specifically talking about water-boarding.

DOJ_NMG_0088579

The flap began when the interviewer told Cheney that some of his listeners had asked him to tell the vice president that "if it takes dunking a terrorist in water, we're all for it if it saves American lives." He continued: "This debate seems a little silly given the threat we face, would you agree?"

Cheney replied: "I do agree. And I think the terrorist threat, for example, with respect to our ability to interrogate high-value detainees like Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, that's been a very important tool that we've had to be able to secure the nation…. We need to be able to continue that."

He was referring to the man captured in Pakistan who officials widely believe masterminded the Sept. 11 attacks.

Cheney was then asked: "Would you agree a dunk in water is a no-brainer if it can save lives?"

The vice president responded: "It's a no-brainer for me, but for a while there, I was criticized as being the vice president 'for torture.' We don't torture. That's not what we're involved in."

Larry Cox, executive director of Amnesty International USA, took issue with Cheney's remarks, issuing a statement saying: "What's really a no-brainer is that no U.S. official, much less a vice president, should champion torture. Vice President Cheney's advocacy of water-boarding sets a new human rights low at a time when human rights is already scraping the bottom of the Bush administration barrel."

Late Friday, Cheney told reporters aboard Air Force Two: "I have said that the interrogation program for a selected number of detainees is … one of the most valuable intelligence programs we have. I believe it has allowed us to prevent terrorist attacks against the United States. I did not talk about specific techniques and won't. I didn't say anything about water-boarding. [The interviewer] didn't even use that phrase."

Asked what "dunk in water" was referring to if not water-boarding, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said, "I will let you draw your own conclusions, because you clearly have."

Bush, asked Friday about Cheney's comments, told reporters: "This country doesn't torture. We're not going to torture. We will interrogate people we pick up off the battlefield to determine whether or not they've got information that will be helpful to protect the country."

james.gerstenzang@ latimes.com

White House Denies Cheney Hailed "Water Boarding" (AP)

AP, October 27, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The White House said Friday that Vice President Dick Cheney was not talking about a torture technique known as "water boarding" when he said dunking terrorism suspects in water during questioning was a "no-brainer."

Human rights groups complained that Cheney's comments amounted to an endorsement of water boarding, in which the victim believes he is about to drown.

President Bush, asked about Cheney's comments, said, "This country doesn't torture. We're not going to torture." He spoke at an Oval Office meeting Friday with NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer.

Earlier, White House press secretary Tony Snow denied that Cheney had endorsed water boarding.

"You know as a matter of common sense that the vice president of the United States is not going to be talking about water boarding. Never would, never does, never will," Snow said. "You think Dick Cheney's going to slip up on something like this? No, come on."

In an interview Tuesday with WDAY of Fargo, North Dakota, Cheney was asked if "a dunk in water is a no-brainer if it can save lives."

The vice president replied, "Well, it's a no-brainer for me, but for a while there I was criticized as being the vice president for torture. We don't torture. That's not what we're involved in."

Peppered with questions about the remarks, Snow said Cheney did not interpret the question as referring to water boarding and the vice president did not make any comments about water boarding. He said the question put to Cheney was loosely worded.

The administration has repeatedly refused to say which techniques they believe are permitted under the new law. Asked to define a dunk in water, Snow said, "It's a dunk in the water."

Larry Cox, executive director of Amnesty International USA, said in a statement, "What's really a no-brainer is that no U.S. official, much less a vice president, should champion torture. Vice President Cheney's advocacy of water boarding sets a new human rights low at a time when human rights is already scraping the bottom of the Bush administration barrel."

Human Rights Watch said Cheney's remarks were "the Bush administration's first clear endorsement" of water boarding.

Bush Enters Cheney "Torture Row" (BBC)

BBC.com, October 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088580

Mr Bush has repeatedly refused to specify which techniques are used US President George Bush has reiterated his position that the US administration does not condone torture, following comments by Vice President Dick Cheney.

In a radio interview, Mr Cheney said the simulated drowning of terrorism suspects during questioning in order to save American lives was a "no-brainer".

His comments have provoked outrage from anti-torture and human rights groups.

When asked about the remark, President Bush said that the United States does not use torture and was not going to.

The BBC's Matt Wells in Washington says Mr Cheney's comment was made on Tuesday but only came to light on Friday, exacerbated by a stormy and confrontational White House press briefing.

The conservative radio host, Scott Hennen, asked Mr Cheney if he agreed that "a dunk in water is a no-brainer" if it would unearth information of pending attacks and save lives.

Mr Cheney replied: "Well, it's a no-brainer for me." He went on to say that he was not condoning torture but said you can have a robust interrogation programme without torture.

'Off limits'

Evidence has emerged of the existence of secret CIA prisons

Mr Cheney is assumed by human rights groups to have been referring to "water boarding" - a technique in which suspects are made to think that they are drowning.

When asked about the vice-president's comments, Mr Bush said the administration had no intention of torturing suspects, but he has repeatedly refused to specify which techniques are being used.

The White House gave the impression that water boarding would be off limits in pushing through a controversial terror bill just a few weeks ago, our correspondent says.

The US executive director of Amnesty International said Mr Cheney's gaffe revealed the US administration's true intentions for prisoner interrogation in the future.

"What's really a no-brainer is that no US official, much less a vice president, should champion torture," said Larry Cox.

US interrogation techniques have been under the spotlight since evidence emerged of detainee abuse in Iraq and Afghanistan, and the existence of secret CIA prisons.

Informant For FBI Is Freed (ALBANYTU)

By Brendan J. Lyons, Senior Writer

Albany Times Union, October 28, 2006

Pakistani immigrant worked on terrorism sting case in Albany

ALBANY -- A Pakistani immigrant whose own crimes led him to serve as an FBI informant in an Albany-based counterterrorism sting walked out of federal court a free man Friday after a judge sentenced him to time served in consideration for his years of undercover work.

Shahed "Malik" Hussain, 50, emerged as the federal government's star witness last month at the trial of Yassin M. Aref and Mohammed M. Hossain, who were convicted of charges that include money laundering and conspiracy to support terrorism.

"Everything was fair and reasonable under the circumstances," said Hussain's attorney, F. Stanton Ackerman, declining further comment.

Hussain, dressed in a suit, said nothing during the brief proceeding before U.S. District Judge David N. Hurd. Hussain talked briefly outside court with his longtime FBI handler, Special Agent Timothy Coll, then quickly left the courthouse without commenting to reporters.

Hussain's own legal problems began about five years ago when he was arrested in an FBI fraud investigation that was launched shortly after the 9/11 attacks.

The investigation targeted a ring of corrupt translators, state motor vehicle workers and nearly 100 immigrants who had illegally obtained driver's licenses with help from Hussain. At the time, Hussain owned and operated a Getty gas station on South Pearl Street, near Albany's motor vehicle office. He also worked as a translator for the state Department of Motor Vehicles, and had routinely accepted bribes of several hundred dollars each to help immigrants, who in some cases couldn't drive well, pass written exams they couldn't understand.

Following his arrest in December 2001, and while facing the prospect of a long prison term and eventual deportation to his native Pakistan, Hussain agreed to become an informant for the FBI.

Hussain, who emigrated here in 1993 and still holds a green card, has since been credited with helping the FBI arrest more than a dozen people, including the people involved in the DMV scandal and a member of an Afghani-based heroin trafficking ring.

DOJ_NMG_0088581

At the time of his arrest, Hussain was about two weeks away from being sworn in as a naturalized U.S. citizen. He ran gas stations, a beverage center and a retail distribution business in Latham, and shared a modest home in Loudonville with his wife and children.

Shortly after his Loudon Road home burned in 2003, Hussain declared bankruptcy. He has left a wake of debt and disgruntled creditors, including some who have described him as an unscrupulous businessman.

That summer, Hussain was still on the hook as an FBI informant when Coll, a member of the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force in Albany, enlisted him to help infiltrate a Central Avenue mosque that had drawn the attention of the FBI after 9/11.

The FBI's primary target was Aref, a Kurdish refugee who had been the mosque's spiritual leader and whom the FBI believes was associated with terrorist figures overseas. Aref has vehemently denied any connection to terrorists and there was no evidence presented at his trial that he'd made anti-American statements while heading the mosque for several years.

Hussain, who speaks five languages, testified last month that Coll ordered him to befriend Hossain, a Bangladeshi immigrant and pizza shop owner who was Aref's friend and a co-founder of the mosque.

Over the next year, Hossain wore a wire to dozens of meetings he had with Aref and Hossain as they discussed Islamic ideology, terrorism and a loan the informant had promised Hossain that turned out to be the foundation of the money laundering charges.

Before the trial began, Hossain's attorney, Kevin A. Luibrand, filed a motion asking the government to turn over "any evidence or information that the government has that the informant has caused another's death ... including acts alleged that he committed overseas."

Federal prosecutors did not turn over any records to defense attorneys related to that request. A federal law enforcement officials close to the case on Friday declined comment on allegations that Hussain may have been tied to a homicide in Lahore, Pakistan.

Shamshad Ahmad, president of the Central Avenue mosque, Masjid Al-Salam, where Aref and Hossain prayed, said rumors have swirled for several years in the area's Pakistani community about the mysterious slaying in Lahore.

"The murdered person belongs to a powerful family there," Ahmad said. "There are people from Pakistan in this region and they know the murder situation over there ..., but they don't want to talk and open up because they think this guy is the FBI's darling and they might be in trouble if they open their mouths."

Assistant U.S. Attorney William Pericak said Hussain may still face immigration problems because of his felony conviction, but that U.S. authorities would try to help him with that situation if needed. Hussain pleaded guilty in April 2003 to a single felony count to settle the charges pending against him. It was that fraud count on which he was sentenced Friday, effectively terminating his debt as an informant.

Pericak contends Hussain only faced a maximum of six months in jail under federal sentencing guidelines. However, attorneys in the case said Hussain could have faced up to 15 years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000 if he had been convicted on felony counts for each of the estimated 80 fraudulent licenses that he has admitted helping immigrants obtain.

Lyons can be reached at 454-5547 or by e-mail at blyons@timesunion.com.

Lodi Man Seeks New Trial In Terrorism Case (MERCN)

The San Jose Mercury News, October 28, 2006

SACRAMENTO - Attorneys for a Lodi man convicted this spring by a federal jury of supporting terrorists have asked a judge to grant a new trail after reports of juror misconduct.

In a 106-page motion filed Friday, Hamid Hayat's lawyers said reports of "extensive misconduct" by jury foreman Joseph Cote demand court review.

"Given the reports of extensive misconduct involved here, the seriousness of such misconduct, and the credibility of the sources, only (an evidentiary) hearing will suffice to resolve the present claim," wrote Wazhma Mojaddidi and Dennis Riordan.

Hayat, 23, was convicted in April of one count of providing material support to terrorists by attending an al-Qaida training camp in Pakistan, and three counts of lying about it to FBI agents.

In court papers, Hayat's attorneys cited reports by juror Alicia Lopez and Theresa Berkeley-Simmons that Cote used racial slurs during the trail, including saying that Pakistanis or Muslims all "look alike" if dressed the same. They also pointed to an Atlantic magazine interview that Cote gave after the trial where he said he likened Hayat to young Pakistani men responsible for the London subway bombings.

This indicates that Cote "flatly disregarded his assurance that he harbored no prejudices against Pakistanis or Muslims, as well as his promise to disregard whatever he had read in the media," the lawyers wrote in the motion.

DOJ_NMG_0088582

In addition to complaints about jury bias, Hayat's attorneys said U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr., should have allowed a retired FBI agent to testify about the bureau's interview procedures. They said James Wedick, a 34-year veteran of the FBI, would have revealed the inappropriateness of Hayat's confession.

Hayat's attorneys said their client was worn down by the agents' interrogation and confessed to crimes he did not commit.

Hayat is a U.S. citizen of Pakistani descent. He faces up to 39 years in prison.

Prosecutors have until Dec. 15 to file a response, and a hearing is scheduled for Jan. 19.

"We will respond in court at the appropriate time," U.S. attorney McGregor Scott said Saturday.

At trial, prosecutors said Hayat returned from a two-year visit to Pakistan in May 2005 intent on attacking targets that may have included hospitals, banks and grocery stores. His videotaped confession was the heart of the government's case.

Taking Terror Fight To N. Africa Leads U.S. To Unlikely Alliances (WP)

By Craig Whitlock, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

ALGIERS -- Locked in a prison here, for now, is a desert bandit dubbed the "Bin Laden of the Sahara," whose capture was secretly orchestrated by U.S. forces after a long chase across some of the most forbidding terrain on Earth.

Amari Saifi, 37, a former Algerian army paratrooper, was caught in 2004 after he and a band of rebel fighters kidnapped 32 European tourists in the Algerian Sahara and ransomed them for about $6 million.

Since then, the U.S. government has cited his case as a model for terrorist-hunting operations and a justification for expanding U.S. military, diplomatic and intelligence programs in North Africa.

A close examination of how Saifi was apprehended, however, highlights the quandaries facing the United States as it extends its fight against Islamic terrorism to remote parts of the globe. In its search for allies in an unstable region, the U.S. government reached out to Libya -- then still officially designated a state sponsor of terrorism -- and to other countries it has condemned for abusing human rights.

Some security analysts and European counterterrorism officials question the U.S. strategy. They contend the Pentagon may be inflating the importance of Saifi and the terrorist threat in both the Sahara and an equally large and desolate region to the south known as the Sahel.

By sending troops and partnering with repressive governments, U.S. tactics could backfire, said Hugh Roberts, North Africa project director for the Brussels-based International Crisis Group.

"The idea that you could have major jihadi units holing up there always struck me as implausible," Roberts said. "The quickest way to generate a jihadi movement is to send some U.S. soldiers in there to swagger around. The more visible the U.S. military presence, the bigger the target."

The hunt for Saifi lasted more than a year and nearly unraveled at the end, despite a joint operation among the U.S. military and seven countries, according to counterterrorism officials in North Africa and Europe. He was caught by happenstance, by a ragtag rebel army in Chad, as he fled his pursuers across the desert.

Although Saifi was finally transferred to Algerian custody, there are signs that he may not be in prison much longer. After giving him a life sentence last year, the Algerian government said this spring it might release him under an amnesty program, reflecting doubts as to how big a threat he posed in the first place.

Regardless of Saifi's fate, U.S. officials say they consider North Africa an increasingly strategic front. With weak governments and poorly patrolled borders, the region has already attracted Islamic radicals looking for a place to set up training camps and spread their ideology, officials say.

Together, the Defense and State departments are devoting $500 million to new counterterrorism programs in the region. Last year, the Pentagon sponsored Operation Flintlock, the largest U.S. joint military exercise in North Africa since World War II. About 700 U.S. Special Forces personnel trained troops from nine African nations, leading a war game that mirrored the effort to hunt down Saifi a year earlier.

"The threat is evolving," said Rear Adm. Richard K. Gallagher, a top commander at the U.S. European Command in Stuttgart, Germany, which is responsible for most of Africa. "Africa, for a lot of reasons, is a place that we've got to care hugely about. We ignore Africa at our peril."The Kidnappings

In February 2003, a band of Islamic extremists began scouring the desert expanse of southern Algeria for kidnap victims. The sparsely populated region's colored sand dunes and craggy mountains were a magnet for European tourists.

Soon, foreigners began to vanish, two or three at a time. Within a month, 32 Europeans -- mostly Germans, but also Austrian, Swedish, Swiss and Dutch citizens -- had been rounded up.

DOJ_NMG_0088583

The kidnappers belonged to the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, a movement dedicated to overthrowing the Algerian government. Despite its local origins, the group has recently reached out to al-Qaeda and other networks in an attempt to broaden its scope.

The leader of the cell, Saifi, was a tall, bearded man who dressed in shabby robes and worn-out sneakers; often he wore black eye makeup to ward off the sun's glare. Known as Abderrazak al-Para, or "the paratrooper," he had deserted from the Algerian army in 1991.

"In the beginning, the entire group was very convinced of the plan: 'Europeans -- that'll bring us money and weapons,' " said Rainer Bracht, a German construction worker who was among the hostages. "In the beginning, they always told us, 'You will be free soon, it'll be just a couple of weeks.' But then it took longer and longer."

On May 13, 2003, Algerian troops surrounded some of the fighters on a mountain range. After a gun battle, 17 hostages were rescued and nine kidnappers were killed, according to the Algerian government. But the soldiers were unable to capture Saifi, who escaped with half of his men and 15 tourists.

As the group trekked south, they hid under rock formations to avoid detection from the skies. The trip was arduous, with temperatures climbing to 110 degrees. One German died of heat exhaustion, but Saifi otherwise took care to keep his captives alive.

"His men held him in high esteem and showed respect," recalled Martin Hainz, a Bavarian painter who was taken hostage. "He emanated a lot of authority, but his behavior was not authoritarian. He did not give orders; he listened and made remarks."

In July 2003, Saifi and his crew crossed into Mali, an impoverished and landlocked country. Hiding among desert nomads, the kidnappers negotiated through intermediaries with the German and Libyan governments, seeking cash. A month later, the rest of the hostages were released near the Algeria-Mali border. Although Germany and Libya have denied paying a ransom, other European officials said the two countries provided funds.

Flush with money, Saifi bought protection from local tribes, European counterterrorism officials said. He shopped on the black market for automatic rifles, missile launchers and 4x4 trucks. He expanded his militia to include fresh recruits from Mali, Chad and Niger.

"At this point, he starts to become an important threat," said Louis Caprioli, former director of international counterterrorism for the DST, the French counterintelligence service, which was working with the U.S. military to track Saifi. "And the armies of Niger and Mali couldn't do anything about him."Warnings Heeded

At the time of the kidnappings, the U.S. government was starting a counterterrorism program in North Africa called the Pan-Sahel Initiative.

The program represented a response to worries that remote areas of North Africa could serve as a base for al-Qaeda or other Islamic extremists seeking to relocate after the U.S. invasion of Afghanistan in 2001. The initiative, led by the U.S. European Command, was designed to share intelligence and train ill-equipped militaries in the region.

The program had its critics, inside and outside the U.S. government, who questioned whether North African radicals had the potential to pose an external threat. They also wondered whether it made sense for the U.S. military to increase its presence in yet another predominantly Muslim part of the world.

The Sahara hostage-takings, however, gave a boost to military leaders who had been warning about the potential for trouble in North Africa. Since then, Congress has listened, budgeting $500 million over the next six years for an expanded version of the original program called the Trans-Saharan Counterterrorism Initiative.

Gallagher, of the U.S. European Command, said the military wanted to keep a light footprint in North Africa. "We want to get out in front of these problems and train these nations to deal with it," he said.

In a visit to Algiers in February to promote the program, Henry A. Crumpton, the State Department's counterterrorism coordinator, warned leaders from across North Africa that Saifi "underscored the real threat posed to the region." The Algerian Salafist group, he added, "has become a regional terrorist organization, recruiting and operating in all of your countries -- and beyond."Coordinated Pursuit

After the last hostages were freed, the U.S. military took effective control of the international hunt for Saifi, according to U.S. and European counterterrorism officials. Saifi had avoided the Algerian army by slipping past unguarded borders and vanishing into the desert. Now U.S. forces began tracking him with spy satellites and reconnaissance aircraft.

Overcoming regional hostilities, the U.S. military persuaded Mali, Niger, Algeria and Chad to cooperate on a plan to corral Saifi. U.S. Special Forces gave crash training to local soldiers. Under pressure, Saifi and his militia moved out of Mali in January 2004, crossed through Niger and entered Chad, covering about 1,000 miles of harsh terrain.

On March 9, 2004, troops from Niger and Chad caught up to Saifi in northwestern Chad. Bolstered by U.S. supplies, they killed 43 of Saifi's fighters. But once again, the desert bandit escaped.

DOJ_NMG_0088584

A week later, Saifi and 16 followers were wandering through the Tibesti Mountains, short of water and food and unaware they had encroached on turf controlled by a Chadian rebel group. The rebels, known as the Movement for Democracy and Justice in Chad, were enemies of the Chadian army. But they also didn't like the looks of the interlopers from Algeria and took them captive.

"We were astonished to see these people," Ousmane Hissein, a Chadian rebel leader in exile, said in an interview in Paris. "We tried to figure out who they were and where they were coming from." News reports on shortwave radio eventually revealed Saifi's identity.

Hissein said the rebels offered to turn Saifi over to Algeria, Germany, France and the United States, but all said no. Each country had been involved in chasing Saifi across the desert but did not want to risk a diplomatic rupture with the government of Chad by dealing with the rebels.

Once again, Libya agreed to serve as an intermediary. Relations between the governments in Tripoli and Washington had warmed since Moammar Gaddafi had ended his program to develop weapons of mass destruction four months earlier. But the alliance was still awkward; Libya had been branded a terrorist sponsor by the State Department since 1979, a label that would persist until June 2006.

The Chadian rebels, however, did not trust Gaddafi. They had accused him of assassinating one of their leaders years before. Negotiations stalled for months.

Losing patience, Gaddafi threatened to send his troops into Chad to attack the rebels, Hissein said. But U.S. diplomats, worried about the risk of a regional war, intervened, persuading Gaddafi to pull back and work a deal. "The Americans played a huge role in all of this," Hissein added.

Seven months after he was captured by the rebels, Saifi was handed over at a border crossing to Libyan authorities, who extradited him to Algeria. The rebels are vague about whether they received any money in return.Eligible for Amnesty

In June 2005, Saifi was scheduled to go on trial in Algiers. For unexplained reasons, Algerian security services did not bring him to the courtroom, and he was sentenced in absentia to life in prison. Rumors spread that he was dead.

Not so, according to Abdelhaq Layada, founder of the Armed Islamic Group, which fought the Algerian government during the 1990s in a horrific civil war that killed an estimated 200,000 people. Layada, who was recently released from prison as part of an amnesty for convicted terrorists, said he hoped Saifi would soon win his freedom.

"Yes, he's still alive," Layada said during an interview outside Algiers. "He's a Muslim, and he loves Muhammad our prophet, and he loves Allah. He was doing what he thought was right."

Algerian justice officials declined requests for an interview. In March, however, Justice Minister Tayeb Belaiz said Saifi would be eligible for consideration under the amnesty. Interior Minister Noureddine Yazid Zerhouni called it "a sensitive case" but wouldn't rule out his release.

Saifi has been indicted in Germany, but Algeria generally doesn't extradite its citizens to Europe. He is not wanted on criminal charges in the United States.

A U.S. counterterrorism official said the Bush administration would be unlikely to protest publicly if Saifi is released.

"We would support the Algerians," the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity. The Algerian government, the official added, has made "political overtures to leaders and individuals who are willing to lay down their arms. We encourage that."

Staff writer Karen DeYoung in Washington and special correspondent Silke Lode in Berlin contributed to this report.

PATRIOT ACT:

ACLU Drops Patriot Act Challenge (AP)

By Jim Irwin, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 28, 2006

DETROIT — The American Civil Liberties Union on Friday dropped a lawsuit challenging the constitutionality of the USA Patriot Act.

The ACLU said it was withdrawing the lawsuit filed more than three years ago because of "improvements to the law." The Justice Department argued last month that amendments approved by Congress in March 2006 had corrected any constitutional flaws in the Patriot Act.

"While the reauthorized Patriot Act is far from perfect, we succeeded in stemming the damage from some of the Bush administration's most reckless policies," Ann Beeson, associate legal director of the ACLU in New York, said in a written statement.

DOJ_NMG_0088585

The lawsuit, filed in July 2003 on behalf of the Muslim Community Association of Ann Arbor and five other nonprofit groups, was the first legal challenge to Section 215, the part of the Patriot Act that lets federal agents obtain such things as library records and medical information.

The ACLU said the revisions allow people receiving demands for records to consult with a lawyer and challenge the demands in court.

The Justice Department, which first asked that the lawsuit be dismissed in December 2003, said it was pleased by the ACLU's action, which was contained in a one-paragraph notice filed with U.S. District Judge Denise Page Hood in Detroit.

"We ... reiterate that the Patriot Act is a legitimate and important tool that has better helped law enforcement fight terrorism while simultaneously protecting our valued civil liberties," Justice spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said.

The ACLU argued that Section 215, which allows the FBI access to any "tangible things" such as books and documents through an order from a secret court, does not require investigators to show probable cause. It asked that the Justice Department be barred from using the provision.

Hood ruled on Oct. 3 that the ACLU's clients had shown they were harmed by the anti-terrorism law adopted after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and that the lawsuit could proceed. But the ruling came after the law had been amended, prompting the ACLU to drop its case.

The ACLU said it would continue to monitor how the government applied Section 215 and would remain ready to defend any individual, business or organization receiving demands for information under the provision.

The group also said it is continuing its legal fight against a more frequently used provision of the Patriot Act that authorizes national security letters. Such letters allow the executive branch of government to obtain records about people in terrorism and espionage investigations without a judge's approval or a grand jury subpoena.

ACLU Drops Patriot Act Suit (DEN)

By Edward L. Cardenas

Detroit News, October 28, 2006

Civil liberties organization says Congress' move to check federal investigative powers prompted action.

DETROIT -- The American Civil Liberties Union on Friday withdrew a lawsuit filed three years ago in U.S. District Court in Detroit that challenged a provision in the Patriot Act.

The ACLU originally filed the suit against the government on behalf of a coalition of groups that argued that Section 215 of the Patriot Act passed in October 2001 was unconstitutional because it gave wide and secret investigative powers to federal agents to obtain books, records, papers, documents, e-mails and even a DNA sample without notifying the targeted person or group.

The suit was withdrawn on Friday after Congress revised the Patriot Act in March to allow those who receive a demand for records to consult with a lawyer and challenge the demand in court.

"While the reauthorized Patriot Act is far from perfect, we succeeded in stemming the damage from some of the Bush administration's most reckless policies," said Ann Beeson, ACLU's associate legal director, in a statement.

"The ACLU will continue to monitor how the government applies the broad Section 215 power and we will challenge unconstitutional demands on a case-by-case basis," Beeson said.

The Justice Department said it was pleased by the ACLU's action.

"We ... reiterate that the Patriot Act is a legitimate and important tool that has better helped law enforcement fight terrorism while simultaneously protecting our valued civil liberties," Justice spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos told The Associated Press.

Imad Hamad, director of the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, which was one of the organizations that was included in the suit, said the "withdrawal does not mean total approval of the act or total approval of the provisions.

"We are to keep our eyes wide open as we move forward," he said.

Earlier last month U.S. District Court Judge Denise Page Hood rejected a motion by the government to dismiss the case.

In the 15-page decision issued Sept. 29 that allowed the ACLU to continue its suit, Hood said the civil liberties groups had 30 days to amend its original complaint to address the amendments made by Congress.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Lays Out Plan To Police Chiefs (GCN)

By Kerri Hostetler, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, October 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088586

As the United States faces threats from weapons of mass destruction—radiological, chemical, biological or nuclear—as well as high-consequence international and homegrown plots, the Homeland Security Department is working with state, local, federal and international law enforcement to defend the country from terrorism.

Homeland Security secretary Michael Chertoff said stopping domestic terrorism threats is best done through shared intelligence, starting at the local level. To ensure that this coordination and collaboration happens, DHS will establish fusion centers, stocked with experts, and will work to grant clearance of classified information more quickly.

Both initiatives are part of the department's effort to take its relationships with major city police chiefs and information sharing to the next level, Chertoff said at the annual International Association of Chiefs of Police conference in Boston last week.

The nation saw how important information sharing is two weeks ago. Chertoff cited the recent incident involving the small airplane crashing into the New York City high rise as a great example of agencies working together. It was not immediately known if the crash was a terrorist attack, but first responders were able to inform officials within DHS of what was happening on site, allowing the department to respond to the situation.

Fusion centers are a step in making this a reality around the country.

"First of all, we are going to build upon some of our early initial effort to establish fusion centers by creating a national network of intelligence fusion centers to support state and local decision-makers, chiefs of police, and state and local intelligence officials," Chertoff said.

The fusion centers will be made up of intelligence personnel from the federal intelligence community, subject matter experts and intelligence analysts and operators of local police departments, DHS officials said.

The goal is to "become more deeply embedded in one another's day-to-day intelligence analysis and operational activity," Chertoff said.

Chertoff said of the fusion centers, " it's important to recognize that these are going to be critical pathways for the sharing of information and expertise across the whole spectrum of concerns we gave in dealing with the possibility of terrorism."

DHS plans to have 20 fusion centers by the end of the fiscal year and up to 35 fusion centers by the end of the next fiscal year. They have already invested $380 million in state-run fusion centers. Some states that have fusion centers include Colorado, Illinois, Maryland and New York.

The Justice Department has issued regulations for the fusion centers.

The agency will also work toward speeding up and broadening the clearance process.

Chertoff also said, "As necessary, we're going to work to be more nimble and quicker in granting top secret and SCI [sensitive compartmented information] clearance for those who do not require that level of classified access."

Also, real-time and strategic information sharing is the thrust behind DHS encouraging state and local law enforcement agencies to provide a list of important officials and institutions in their cities that need access to critical information as quickly as federal officials do.

Chertoff assured the chiefs of police that DHS is here to help.

"We will share information. We will share training. We will share tools. And, we will work as a team to make sure that whether terrorism comes in the airplanes, from across the ocean, or whether it's born in apartment buildings in or cities and towns, we will detect it. We will prevent it. And, we will respond to it effectively in the interest of protecting our families, our friends, our loved ones, and our fellow citizens," Chertoff said.

Airlines Delay In Checking Workers (LAT)

From Newsday

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

An estimated 50,000 cargo handlers were to be screened by Dec. 1. A federal agency has extended the deadline.

The Transportation Security Administration has rolled back the deadlines for criminal-background checks for tens of thousands of airline workers who handle cargo loaded onto passenger airplanes, saying the industry cannot meet the timetables.

"TSA has concluded that the regulated community will be unable to meet some deadlines in the air cargo final rule because of the large number of employees and agents subject to the requirements," the agency said in a notice published this week.

The rules were originally slated to go into effect from Oct . 23 to Dec. 1. They require background checks and security training for an estimated 50,000 workers employed by the airlines or by airline contractors handling cargo, said TSA spokesman Darrin Kayser.

Under the new timetables, several deadlines have been pushed back as far as mid-2007. The agency also will open the regulation to a new round of public comment, which could lead to more changes.

DOJ_NMG_0088587

Air cargo has long been described as the weak underbelly of aviation security since the packages loaded into planes undergo far less scrutiny than passengers or their luggage. This week, a report card by the Council on Foreign Relations gave cargo security a D-plus.

Several security experts blasted the delays as inexcusable at a time when aviation threats remain high.

"How is it possible that we check everyone in the passenger terminal, but we don't check the people loading cargo on the plane itself?" asked Isaac Yeffet, a former security chief for El Al Israel Airlines and now a private consultant.

Yeffet criticized the TSA for what he called its lack of urgency, citing the recent leaked report that undercover agents were able to smuggle prohibited items past the agency's screeners at Newark International Airport in 20 out of 22 attempts.

"This is not the security that the American people need or deserve," he said.

But TSA officials said they were implementing other programs to beef up air cargo security, including a known-shipper program to distinguish higher-risk cargo, and canine units to sniff for explosives. They defended the changes as "a more realistic timetable" based on the 4,500 responses they received from the industry — a view seconded by air carriers.

John Meenan, executive vice president of the Air Transport Assn., said the new timetable would allow the process "to be completed in an orderly fashion with the full support of the airline industry."

Suspicious Letter Shuts Clinton's Harlem Office (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

Former President Bill Clinton's Harlem office was shut down yesterday afternoon after a woman in the office opened a letter and a suspicious white powder spilled out, the police said.

The substance was later found to be nontoxic, but its discovery led the authorities to evacuate two floors of the building, at 55 West 125th Street, and to decontaminate several workers in the office. Mr. Clinton was not there at the time the substance was found. The police said the letter included a "rambling diatribe."

It was the third time since 2001 that a letter containing a mysterious but nontoxic substance had been sent to Mr. Clinton's office, the police said. The previous substance was determined to be flour, but it was unclear last night what the latest substance was and whether the incident was connected to the previous two.

"Clinton is aware of the situation, but will continue his normal activities," Richard Staropoli, the assistant special agent in charge of the Secret Service in New York, said. "This has not affected the former president or Mrs. Clinton in any way."

Mr. Clinton attended a large birthday party last night at the Gramercy Park Hotel as part of a three-day celebration to raise money for charity. Police and emergency crews were called to the building about 3:45 pm. According to officials, a member of Mr. Clinton's staff called the authorities moments after she opened a package addressed to Mr. Clinton that contained a letter.

At least three people in the office came in direct contact with the powder, though no one was injured.

Substance At Clinton's Office Not Toxic (USAT/AP)

USA Today, October 28, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) — Police and Secret Service agents determined Friday that a suspicious substance found at former President Clinton's office in Manhattan was not toxic.

A staff member opened package delivered to the president's office that contained a white powdery substance and a letter, and called authorities, said Secret Service spokesman Richard Staropoli. He described the letter as a "rambling diatribe."

Clinton was not at the office at the time because he was attending events for his three-day birthday bash, a fundraising event for his foundation. His birthday was in August.

"The situation has not affected the president or Mrs. Clinton in any way whatsoever," Staropoli said.

Police and emergency crews were called to the Harlem office building around 3:45 p.m. Yellow police tape blocked off the sidewalk in front of the building, but traffic was not disrupted.

Clinton spokesman Jay Carson said the building was not evacuated. He had no other details.

Secret Service spokesman Eric Zahren said a field test on the substance found it to be inert.

Clinton signed a 10-year lease for the 8,300-square-foot penthouse floor of the 14-story building in 2001.

The city's Administration for Children's Services has a field office on four lower floors of the building.

Training Gets Under Way At UCO Forensics Center (OKLA)

By Diana Baldwin, Staff Writer

The Oklahoman, October 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088588

EDMOND — Five dozen emergency first responders and bomb technicians throughout the state should be a little safer after learning about homemade bomb factories this week.

The course was one of the first professional continuing education classes offered by the University of Central Oklahoma's newly created Institute for Forensic Science.

Kirk Yeager, an FBI bomb expert, said, "We want to give them an understanding about what they could run across so they can assess the situation and say that something isn't right."

Homemade bombs or improvised explosives are devices made from materials available in the home or that can be easily purchased. Bomb factories are found in garages, trunks of vehicles and motel rooms.

Improvised explosives vary in size and design. They can range from the estimated 4,800-pound fertilizer bomb that resulted in the deaths of 168 people in the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing to the single chemical bomb in the backpack of a University of Oklahoma student that exploded and killed him outside a packed football stadium last fall.

Yeager, a supervisory bomb specialist and forensic examiner at FBI headquarters in Quantico, Va., was one of the instructors for the class held on the Edmond campus. He has been involved in bombing investigations as far away as in Israel, Peru and Turkey. One of his latest assignments was in Great Britain when authorities said they foiled a plot to bomb a U.S.-bound flight. Discovery of the plot caused officials to ban liquids and gels in airline passengers' carry-on bags. He also worked on the case in which three Americans were killed in the Gaza Strip.

Yeager said he shared his worldwide experiences because whatever trends are seen abroad could end up here in the United States.

Ten bomb technicians were among those attending the class also taught by Oklahoma City FBI Special Agent Barry Black. Yeager said the interaction between the first responders and bomb technicians makes for a good situation in the classroom.

"It really enriches the whole experience," Yeager said.

In the field, first responders in instances such as drug raids need to recognize the types of chemicals used to make the explosives, said Black, a bomb technician and training coordinator.

"They need to know enough to take a step back and call the bomb squad," Black said.

With today's violent drug laboratories, Yeager said, many officers are taking a bomb tech with them to the scene.

The goals of the class were to teach recognition of the bombs or chemicals and safe handling.

Training professionals, students Dwight E. Adams, retired director of the FBI lab in Quantico, became the head of the newly created Institute for Forensic Science in July.

The institute provides continuing education for professionals and enhances student education opportunities on campus. Yeager also spoke to student forensic classes this week.

The institute's first class for professionals was held earlier this month for the Oklahoma State Bureau of Investigation on human hair identification.

A recording of this week's class on bomb factories will be available on a DVD to professionals, Adams said. It also will be posted on a law enforcement Internet site. The information will not be distributed publicly because of the sensitive material used by law enforcement officers.

Other professional training sessions for law enforcement officers, forensic scientists and attorneys are planned.

IU Student Set Up Website For Fake Boarding Passes (WISH)

By Tony Perkins

WISH-TV, October 26, 2006

An IU student's research on airport security has landed him in hot water with federal investigators. He found a way to forge boarding passes, and then put the instructions online.

The student researcher says he wanted to show the Transportation Security Agency that anyone could find their way past a key line of defense.

IU doctoral candidate Christopher Soghoian wanted to prove terrorists can get past security workers on the way to airport gates. He even manufactured a 10-step process that he says makes it "insanely easy" to board a plane.

Soghoian thought that the flaw was significant. Significant enough that he put the information on the Internet. He displayed a fake Northwest Airlines pass that features Osama Bin Laden's name.

He created a ticket in which the most-wanted terrorist suspect flies coach.

Soghoian said anyone could make up a name. He insists airport workers will simply check for ID, scan the barcode at the gate, and let the ticket holder board the plane without any questions.

Indiana Homeland Security chief Eric Dietz disagrees, "Well, I think you can find a number of small loopholes, but you have to look at what it does to the overall system. It takes a piece approach as opposed to a system approach."

DOJ_NMG_0088589

Dietz says someone who actually tries to use a fake boarding pass won't get past additional levels of airport security.

"We can have college kids forging drivers licenses, we can certainly can forge a boarding pass. That's why we have defense in depth," Dietz said.

Airline passengers appreciated Soghoian's research but they wished he didn't try to made it public.

"Well, I think anytime you are talking about security, you need to take it to somebody right way. Take it to some police department or something. Never publicize it, never put it out there. If I were to see it on the Internet, that's putting somebody's life in jeopardy, and so forth," Jesus Trujillo from Hagerman, New Mexico said.

"I think they should use their abilities and work with the airlines to make sure things like this don't happen." Jeff Bruns of Hagerstown said.

24 Hour News 8 contacted Soghoian by e-mail, and he responded that he won't talk to reporters about his research until he hires a lawyer.

He says he's received at least one visit from the FBI and a congressman has called for his arrest.

In the meantime, Soghoian's research on forging an airline boarding pass has been taken off-line.

Mayor Expands Search For 9/11 Remains (NYT)

By David W. Dunlap

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

The Bloomberg administration said yesterday that it would cast a net well beyond ground zero, from Broadway to the Hudson River, from the bottom of manholes to the top of nearby skyscrapers, in its search for human remains from Sept. 11, 2001.

The chief medical examiner is to inspect the roofs of the Millenium Hotel and 1 Liberty Plaza, opposite the World Trade Center site. Tiny bone fragments may be found there, mixed in with the stone ballast, as they were atop the former Deutsche Bank building, according to a report prepared for Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg.

Key downtown redevelopment agencies have headquarters in the 53-story Liberty Plaza tower. It is also where victims' family members can visit privately in a room set aside for them on the 20th floor.

The largest potential search site is the four-block-long, 60-foot-wide service road between the trade center pit and West Street. Dozens of bones and bone fragments have been found in the last week and a half in an abandoned, damaged manhole that had been buried under several feet of fill.

A layer of trade center debris may still exist between the original roadway and the current service road, said the report by David J. Burney, the commissioner of the Department of Design and Construction, and Charles J. Maikish, the executive director of the Lower Manhattan Construction Command Center.

An expanded search may take a year or longer, Deputy Mayor Edward Skyler said. At times, it will require the overnight closing of some lanes of West Street. He said he could not estimate the cost.

"We are going to search high and low for anything we can find," Mr. Skyler said, "and if the result of all this work is only one more remain or one more piece of personal property, it will still have been worth it."

Family members said the proposed measures did not go far enough. For instance, they said workers ought to dig up the whole service road rather than conduct exploratory excavations as recommended. And they called again for the city to relinquish its role to the federal Joint P.O.W.-M.I.A. Accounting Command, which recovers and identifies service members who have been killed in action.

"Doing more of the same wrong thing in a larger area cannot serve any useful purpose," said Sally Regenhard. She has yet to recover her son, Christian, who was killed in the 2001 terrorist attack.

But Mr. Skyler said the city had the experience and the forensic anthropologists needed to do the job, including two veterans of the accounting command. "The same expertise that JPAC would bring to the table, the city has," he said.

Another site where trade center debris may be found, the report said, is the small block between Liberty and Cedar Streets. St. Nicholas Greek Orthodox Church stood there until 9/11, when it was destroyed by the collapse of 2 World Trade Center. No buildings are there now.

Inspection is also warranted, the report said, at Fiterman Hall, a badly damaged building north of ground zero that is to be demolished, and 130 Cedar Street, south of ground zero, which is to be renovated.

The report called for the visual inspection of as many as 500 subterranean structures — manholes, service boxes, valve chambers and cable-splicing chambers — between Broadway and the Hudson River and Barclay and Albany Streets. If trade center debris is found, the report said, the chief medical examiner should be called in to sift it.

Mayor Bloomberg went further and said that any extraneous material, like silt, should be removed and sifted by the medical examiner. He accepted the rest of the report.

DOJ_NMG_0088590

Follow The Money (WSJ)

By Ted Frank

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

The trial lawyers have now enlisted themselves in the war against terror. One can imagine a parody -- a team of wing-tipped attorneys parachuting into the wilds of Afghanistan, armed with subpoenas forcing Osama bin Laden to produce all relevant documents and secure his attendance at a 20-day videotaped deposition (damn the Geneva Conventions against torture). The legal and photocopying bills alone crush al Qaeda.

The reality is more prosaic, and less amusing. For just as Willie Sutton legendarily said he robbed banks "because that's where the money is," plaintiffs' attorneys are weaving creative legal theories to hold legitimate third parties liable for the intentional acts of terrorists. This friendly fire could end up doing almost as much financial damage as the terrorists themselves, with the lawyers getting rich in the process.

The roots of this folly are in the 1970s, when many state courts began to decide that the intentional acts of criminals shouldn't bar plaintiffs from collecting money from others with deeper pockets. So if you are carjacked -- sue the parking- lot owner. Most legislatures have yet to reverse this radical legal change.

Thus trial lawyers, thanks to New York Supreme Court Justice Nicholas Figueroa's generous rulings and jury instructions, persuaded a jury in October last year that the terrorists who planted a truck bomb in the World Trade Center garage in 1993 were only 32% responsible, while the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey was 68% responsible -- and therefore, under New York law, wholly on the hook for $1.8 billion in damages.

After 9/11, lawsuits would have bankrupted several corporate victims of the attacks were it not for a $7 billion, taxpayer-funded bailout of potential plaintiffs. Even so, several dozen claimants opted for litigation. Naturally, their lawyers have sued everyone from the airlines to Boeing to Motorola to New York City. Many of these cases are still in pre-trial proceedings. Attorneys are asking for billions of dollars in damages.

Banks are not immune from terrorist-related lawsuits, either. They're getting hauled into court because of who has accounts at their institutions.

Federal laws permit parties injured by an act of terrorism to recover treble damages and attorneys' fees in civil suits against terrorists. Fair enough. But an act of terrorism may also include "knowingly providing material support or resources to a foreign terrorist organization." The vagueness and breadth of this language is the source of the mischief: Following the 9/11 attacks, the U.S. started cracking down on front organizations for Islamic terror groups that posed as charities; and some of these faux-charities had accounts at international banks. Bingo. Lawsuits are pending now that claim, in effect, that the banks should have known then what the U.S. government did not decide until years later.

For example, on Aug. 22, 2003, the U.S. designated Interpal and Comité de Bienfaisance pour la Solidarité avec la Palestine (CBSP), among others, as international terrorist organizations. These two outfits channeled funds to the Orwellian-named "Union of the Good" militant group, which in turn supported Hamas. Three days before the designation, on Aug. 19, 2003, a Hamas suicide bomber, Raed Abdul Hamid Misk, blew himself up on the Egged No. 2 bus in Jerusalem, killing and wounding dozens.

The American victims and their families have sued over this and other attacks; but they have not sued Misk -- who, now beyond earthly jurisdiction, will have to answer to a higher authority -- nor Hamas, nor "Union of the Good," nor even Interpal or CBSP. Rather, the families are suing NatWest Bank,where Interpal happened to hold some of their bank accounts, and Credit Lyonnais, which once held CBSP money.

The complaint against Credit Lyonnais filed earlier this year spends most of its 79 pages listing heinous acts of Hamas and their consequences. So what does this have to do with Crédit Lyonnais? A small section of the complaint claims that Credit Lyonnais was supposed to be monitoring Al Jazeera in case an official for one of its customers, such as CBSP, said something incriminating. Perversely, the fact that Credit Lyonnais reported suspicious banking activity to regulators is supposed to be evidence that the banks "knew" that the two charities were supporting terrorism.

The plaintiffs make much of the fact that Israel designated CBSP and Interpal unlawful organizations in the late 1990s. But the U.S. did not until 2003 -- and France and Britain have yet to do so, despite extensive investigation. The banking system will grind to a halt if a bank must scrutinize every customer to the degree plaintiffs argue should have been done for CBSP and Interpal -- a degree of scrutiny greater than their own home countries have established.

France and Britain may well be wrong to assess these Hamas-affiliated organizations as "humanitarian": Money is fungible, and Hamas can readily shift its own funds from feeding constituents to making bombs. But criminal prosecutors, not contingency-fee-hunting trial lawyers, should chase terrorist financing. The latter are more interested in wealth than guilt: Trial lawyers have every motivation to attempt to attach blame to the deepest and most readily available pocket instead of the actual culpable parties. Nor do they bear the diplomatic consequences for the U.S. when they baselessly tread upon the wrong toes.

DOJ_NMG_0088591

Both NatWest Bank and Credit Lyonnais filed motions before Judge Charles Sifton of the Eastern District of New York to dismiss the cases against them. In vain: The lawsuits go forward and are in the pre-trial discovery stage.

If courts are not going to apply the antiterrorism laws sensibly, Congress should amend them to make clear that civil liability is limited to those who commit criminal acts of international terrorism, and those who aid and abet with specific intent to commit terror. Otherwise, terrorists can damage the global economy simply by inducing fratricidal litigation.

Mr. Frank is a resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute and director of the AEI Liability Project. He blogs at PointOfLaw.com1.

WAR NEWS:

Iraqi Prime Minister Criticizes U.S. Policy (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

Baghdad, Iraq — The Iraqi prime minister sharply criticized U.S. policy Friday during a private meeting with the U.S. ambassador, pointing to America's failure to either reduce violence or give his government authority over security matters.

The criticism in private was the latest example of tension between the two governments and stood in stark contrast with a joint public statement issued after the meeting.

In the statement, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and the U.S. Embassy said they had agreed to unspecified "timelines" to make tough political and security decisions on the country's future.

Privately, however, al-Maliki criticized what he called the patronizing U.S. tone toward the Iraqi government and warned U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad to respect Iraq's sovereignty, according to two of the prime minister's advisers.

"I'm a friend to the United States, but not America's man in Iraq," al-Maliki told Khalilzad, according to Hassan al-Senaid, one of the prime minister's closest advisers.

Previously, al-Maliki had vehemently rejected the notion of deadlines for his government to achieve key goals, but the statement said "the Iraqi government has made clear the issues that must be resolved with timelines for them to take positive steps forward on behalf of the Iraqi people."

The statement said "Iraq and the United States are committed to working together to respond to the needs of the people." It affirmed that America "will continue to stand by the Iraqi government" amid rumors Washington may be seeking alternatives to Baghdad's current Shiite-led administration.

Al-Maliki's supporters downplayed the reference to timelines as insignificant, saying they were meant as rough guidelines to hand security over to Iraqis.

U.S. officials in Baghdad could not be reached for comment.

Following days of back-and-forth recriminations, the contrast between private criticism and the public statement brought into sharper focus a dispute that may have already undermined the Shiite-led government and increased friction between America and the country's majority sect.

Khalilzad is at odds with al-Maliki on how to address the Shiite militias wreaking havoc on large parts of the country. Khalilzad last year convinced Sunni Arabs now victimized by the militias to enter the government. The ambassador has insisted that the Shiite armed groups and Sunni Arab insurgents be treated similarly.

Al-Maliki draws political support from the groups backing militias. He says they should be drawn into the political process and disarmed peacefully. U.S. military and political officials have grown frustrated over perceived Iraqi government inaction on militias, now deemed by Americans as the No. 1 impetus of sectarian violence.

Khalilzad told reporters Tuesday that Iraqis must "achieve key political and security milestones" by certain deadlines, or face unspecified consequences. But he was rebuffed by both al-Maliki and U.S. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who told critics to "back off" making unreasonable demands of the five-month-old Iraqi government.

Al-Maliki's inner circle, huddled in a late-night briefing, said the prime minister would call President Bush on Saturday to clear the air about what the government views as unproductive interference on the part of U.S. officials in Baghdad.

"Khalilzad's demand for a timetable was clear interference with the sovereignty of the Iraqi government," said Nada Sudani, a member of parliament who belongs to al-Maliki's Dawa Party. "Maliki rejects any exterior body giving a timeline for the performance of the Iraqi government."

DOJ_NMG_0088592

Prickly truths underlie the squabbling and confusion: Al-Maliki's government has lost public backers over five months of car bombs, death squad slayings and economic misery, and increasingly relies for support on narrow cliques of Islamist political parties, including the radical movement of cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

The U.S. government, undertaking a massive nation-building project while fighting off a ferocious insurgency, has little choice but to back al-Maliki's Iranian-influenced Shiite government. Any U.S. move against al-Maliki could spark even greater violence and anti-American animosity.

Al-Maliki has demanded that Americans let him try to politically co-opt al-Sadr, who has gone from a rabble-rousing street firebrand in the early days after the U.S. invasion to one of the most powerful figures in the country with 30 seats in parliament and control over several key ministries.

There have been numerous signs that al-Sadr himself has tired of the most troublesome of his self-styled loyalists. During prayers Friday in the southern city of Kufa, al-Sadr's principal pulpit, his deputy denounced recent violence in Iraq caused by "people who violated and stood against the wise and honorable leadership" of the young cleric.

"If you would ever fail to comply with (his orders), then I frankly tell you that you will regret it, and you'd rather die," warned Sheik Jabir Khafaji, one of Sadr's chief advisers.

Among his followers' alleged misdeeds was the Monday night abduction of a U.S. soldier of Iraqi descent. The Iraqi family of the missing army translator issued an appeal for his release as U.S. soldiers continued a days-long crackdown on the volatile Sadr City where they suspect he's being held, according to Iraq's Al-Sharqiya television.

Witnesses said U.S. forces raided schools, mosques and homes over the last few days in search of the missing soldier.

Al-Sharqiya television said the missing soldier's name is Ahmad Qusai Tai. He was taken from a home in central Baghdad on Monday night after he left the Green Zone to spend Muslim holidays with relatives in the capital.

Tai's mother, according to an Al-Sharqiya interview, has pleaded for his captors to treat him with mercy and return him to his family.

Sadr City is a stronghold of bands of al-Sadr's self-described followers, who call themselves the al-Mahdi army. Al-Sadr launched the organization as a tool to mobilize and organize Shiites who are poor, young and pious.

But U.S. and Iraqi officials suspect splinter groups under no central authority have begun using the al-Mahdi army as a cover for various forms of criminal activity, including wanton targeting of Sunni Arab men.

Al-Sadr has ordered followers to refrain from violence during the latest U.S. raids, and for the most part Friday, the command held. "The Mahdi army members are restraining themselves," said Qahtan Sudani, a 28-year-old Sadr City resident and follower of the movement. "It's Muqtada's' orders that confrontation with the occupier will be through peaceful methods."

At least one U.S. soldier was reported killed Friday, bringing the number of American troops killed in Iraq so far this month to 97, the highest number for any single month since January 2005. The soldier, assigned to the 3rd Brigade of the 1st Cavalry Division, died of wounds sustained in combat in Diyala province Thursday.

A special correspondent in Baghdad contributed to this report.

Fighting Split, U.S. And Iraq Renew Vow To Work For Peace (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 27 — With recent events in Iraq causing growing strains between the Bush administration and the Iraqi government, the two governments issued a tautly worded statement through the American Embassy in Baghdad on Friday renewing their commitment to work together for peace and security in Iraq.

The statement, remarkable for the fact that the two governments found it necessary, followed a meeting between Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki and Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador. The three-paragraph joint statement issued afterward appeared aimed at tamping down frictions between the governments while countering a growing perception in Baghdad and Washington that the increasingly grim situation here is driving a wedge between them.

The statement said Mr. Maliki and Mr. Khalilzad — who have meet regularly during Mr. Maliki's six months in office — "were pleased to meet today to discuss our ongoing efforts to bring peace and security to Iraq and create a better future for all Iraqis." Usually, meetings between the two men, with offices close to each other in Baghdad's Green Zone government compound, are not the subject of official announcements.

"While we recognize the difficulties, we know that our continued partnership and strategic alliance will allow us to meet the challenges facing Iraq," the statement said. "The United States will continue to stand by the Iraqi government, and the Iraqi government welcomes the support of the United States as it moves forward with plans for national reconciliation, economic progress and the strengthening of the Iraqi security forces."

DOJ_NMG_0088593

The statement concluded: "The government of Iraq is committed to a good and strong relationship with the U.S. government to work together toward a democratic, stable Iraq, and to confront the terrorist challenges in light of the strategic alliance between the two countries."

The statement followed an outburst on Wednesday in which Mr. Maliki spoke out forcefully against the idea of American-imposed benchmarks or timelines for action on the most critical issues dividing the Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish populations. The benchmarks have been pushed by the Bush administration as a means of pulling the country back from the brink of civil war.

But Mr. Maliki astonished American officials here by saying Wednesday that "this is an elected government and no one has the right to set a timetable for it." He spoke 24 hours after Mr. Khalilzad and Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top American commander in Iraq, had spoken of a timeline for action on the toughest issues as a centerpiece of a joint Iraqi and American strategy for winning the war.

In Washington, President Bush and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld have both sought to calm the political storm in Baghdad. At his news conference on Wednesday, Mr. Bush said American officials were "working with the Iraqi government to have certain benchmarks to meet as a way to determine whether or not they are making the hard decisions necessary to achieve peace."

But he said Mr. Maliki was right in his insistence on Iraq's right to make its own decisions. "This is a sovereign government," he said. At a Pentagon news conference on Thursday, Mr. Rumsfeld said the idea of benchmarks did not involve fixed deadlines or penalties for the Iraqis.

The issues outlined by Mr. Khalilzad and General Casey defined the struggle for political and economic power that is tearing at the fragile coalition of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds that make up the Maliki government. They include the role of the Shiite militias, which have played a widening role in the bloodshed across the country, the division of oil revenues and the balance to be struck between holding officials of Saddam Hussein's government accountable and opening the door to rehabilitation.

Days before Mr. Maliki's outburst, American officials handed out what they described as a "notional political timetable" setting out a series of deadlines for legislative and executive actions. The timetable ran from September this year through March 2007, and Mr. Khalilzad said it had been drawn up in consultation with the Maliki government.

High on the list was the passage of laws governing the disarming of militias, an amnesty for certain fighters and a program for reintegrating militia members into civilian life.

The dispute over benchmarks reflects a deeper divide between the religious Shiite parties and the Americans, who were once seen by the Shiites as a partner in wresting power from the Sunni minority through elections. But the Americans have become increasingly unpopular with the Shiites as they have pushed plans for a reconciliation with the Sunnis, which the Americans hope would dampen the Sunni insurgency.

But Shiites have chafed at the American push for reconciliation, in particular with the role played by Mr. Khalilzad, who is a Sunni Muslim. In recent weeks, Mr. Maliki and other high-ranking Shiites have begun to chafe at American military control of the new Iraqi Army, and have grown increasingly bitter over American statements identifying Shiite militias as equally responsible with the Sunni insurgents for the violence here.

One of the most senior Shiite government officials, Adel Abdul-Mahdi, a vice president, told reporters in the southern city of Najaf on Friday that the American focus on disbanding the militias was misplaced.

"There are some attempts to advance the fight against the militias and delay the fight against terrorism and the insurgency," he said after meeting with Iraq's most revered Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani. "We warn of the dangers of these attempts."

For the second time this week, American troops rolled in force into the stronghold of radical Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army on Friday in search of a missing American soldier, but this time withdrew without clashing with fighters there, authorities said.

Search For U.S. Soldier Spurs Sadr City Battles (WP)

By John Ward Anderson, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Translator's Brother Was Freed, Premier Says

BAGHDAD, Oct. 27 -- U.S. and Iraqi forces returned to Sadr City on Friday to search the Shiite Muslim slum for a missing U.S. soldier, occasionally engaging in gun battles with members of local militias during their hunt.

The soldier, an Iraqi-born translator whose name has not been released, was abducted by gunmen in Karrada, a middle-class Shiite neighborhood in central Baghdad, while visiting relatives on Monday, the start of the Muslim holiday of Eid al-Fitr, according to the U.S. military. U.S. soldiers rarely, if ever, are allowed to wander alone on the streets of Baghdad, and the visit had not been approved, military officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0088594

U.S. and Iraqi forces have conducted an intense hunt across Baghdad, searching cars at checkpoints, going door to door and raiding areas where they think he might be held.

In an interview with [a] news service Thursday, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said the soldier's brother was kidnapped with him but had been released.

"The brother who was released said he had been abducted by the Mahdi Army," Maliki said, referring to the militia headed by Moqtada al-Sadr, an anti-U.S. cleric. "But we don't know what the Mahdi Army means anymore."

The militia, which has clashed with U.S. troops on several occasions, is accused of being behind death squads that have slaughtered thousands of Sunni Arabs. Many analysts say they believe that rogue units of the militia may no longer be under Sadr's control, and Maliki said in the interview that some Sunnis now operate in the name of the Mahdi Army.

Sadr's political movement is a key member of Maliki's governing Shiite coalition, and U.S. officials have expressed frustration that he has not done more to disarm the group.

"We asked the Sadr movement to look" for the missing soldier, Maliki said, "and they swear they know nothing."

On Wednesday, U.S. troops launched two raids in Sadr City, a teeming Baghdad slum and home to 2.5 million Shiites, many of whom are Sadr loyalists.

Maliki said in the ... interview that the target of Wednesday's U.S. operation was Abu Deraa, who is considered a death squad leader responsible for killing scores of Sunnis. It was unclear whether Abu Deraa is a suspect in the kidnapping of the U.S. soldier, and U.S. officials declined to comment.

"We are conducting operations in search of the soldier, but there are many other operations as well, and we don't want to identify any people as targets" because it could tip them off, said Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman.

On Thursday, U.S. soldiers blocked entrances to Sadr City with armored vehicles, sandbags and concertina wire. Traffic backed up in both directions for hours as soldiers waved cars through one at a time for searches.

"They turned Sadr City to hell these last three days," said Abdul Hameed Swadi, waiting in the jam of cars outside one of the bridges into Sadr City.

"Why are we waiting like this?" a woman cloaked in a black robe yelled to an Iraqi soldier standing with the Americans.

"It's an order from the Americans," the Iraqi soldier said.

"You are in the Iraqi army," she yelled back. "What kind of army are you?"

An Iraqi Interior Ministry spokesman said the Friday incursion into Sadr City targeted the Zahraa mosque and Hakim High School. He said gunfights erupted between members of the Mahdi Army and U.S. troops, and that U.S. planes targeted the two buildings and destroyed them. He said it was unclear whether there were casualties. The account could not be independently verified.

Meanwhile, in an apparent effort to tamp down reports of disagreement between the United States and Iraq over timelines and benchmarks for progress in Iraq, Maliki and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad issued a rare joint news release late Friday, saying they were "committed to working together to respond to the needs of the people."

"The Iraqi government has made clear the issues that must be resolved with timelines for them to take positive steps forward on behalf of the Iraqi people," the statement said, without elaborating on what issues would be subject to timelines. Maliki had previously said he did not want timelines imposed on his government by the United States.

Also Friday, the U.S. military announced that a soldier who was killed in Diyala province on Thursday was the 97th U.S. fatality of the month, making October the deadliest month for U.S. forces in Iraq since January 2005, when 106 service members died.

Correspondent Ellen Knickmeyer and Washington Post staff in Kirkuk and Baghdad contributed to this report.

U.S., Iraq Affirm 'Good, Strong' Ties (WT/AP)

By Steven R. Hurst, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The American ambassador and Iraqi prime minister issued a rare joint statement yesterday in which Iraq reaffirmed its commitment to a "good and strong" relationship with Washington -- a bid to dampen speculation about souring ties less than two weeks before U.S. midterm elections.

The statement followed a tense week in U.S.-Iraqi relations, as Washington has stepped up pressure on Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to crack down on Shi'ite militias and death squads behind a wave of sectarian killings. Mr. al-Maliki, whose political standing is beholden to the two main militias, has repeatedly said he would disband "illegal armed groups" but so far has taken little action.

DOJ_NMG_0088595

On Tuesday, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad announced the centerpiece of the Bush administration's new strategy: The establishment of a timeline to curb violence and solve other Iraqi problems. He said Mr. al-Maliki had agreed to the plan.

But over the next two days, Mr. al-Maliki publicly and heatedly said that he saw imposition of timelines as an infringement on Iraqi sovereignty. Then he said that the timeline program was a product of U.S. electoral politics.

The White House on Thursday said Mr. al-Maliki's comments were taken out of context. But hours later, the Iraqi leader reissued the same complaint, unambiguously in an interview with British journalists.

Yesterday's joint statement was issued in English on a U.S. Embassy letterhead and in Arabic by the prime minister's office after Mr. Khalilzad and Mr. al-Maliki held an unannounced meeting earlier in the day.

It said the "Iraqi government has made clear the issues that must be resolved with timelines."

Language in the statement suggested a clear attempt to dampen further speculation about a fraying of ties between the two governments.

"The government of Iraq is committed to a good and strong relationship with the U.S. government to work together toward a democratic, stable Iraq, and to confront the terrorist challenges in light of the strategic alliance between the two countries," it said.

Baghdad has been awash with speculation that the Bush administration was preparing to dump Mr. al-Maliki, who was the compromise candidate for prime minister from among the dominant Shi'ite Muslims in parliament. His government has been in power five months.

In an apparent bid to squelch such talk, the statement said, "The United States will continue to stand by the Iraqi government."

The U.S. military yesterday announced the death of a soldier in combat in Diyala province northeast of Baghdad, raising to 97 the number of American troops killed in Iraq during October, now the fourth-deadliest month since the war began in 2003.

The soldier, assigned to the 3rd Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division, was wounded in combat Thursday "and later died of wounds," the military said.

Baghdad's post-Ramadan calm held into a fifth day, as a flood of U.S. troops continued combing dangerous neighborhoods for a kidnapped American soldier, whose Iraqi family yesterday issued a plea for mercy.

There were only two reported violent deaths in the capital and eight elsewhere in the country. But authorities in Suwayrah and Kut, south of Baghdad, reported pulling nine more bodies from the Tigris River, tortured and fatally shot.

The U.S. military refused to confirm the identity of the kidnapped U.S. soldier, after the independent Sharqiyah TV channel said he was Ahmed Qusai al-Taayie, a naturalized American born in Iraq. The television station said his mother asked his captors to show him mercy as a fellow Muslim.

The quiet in Baghdad, which has proven illusive over the longer term, followed a day of bloody house-to-house fighting that killed 43 persons outside a chaotic city to the north.

The battle between Sunni insurgents and Iraqi police near Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, killed one civilian and 24 police. U.S. troops later joined the fight, aiding in a counterattack in which 18 insurgents died, eight were wounded and 27 captured, the military said.

In Baghdad, A Sudden Chance To Play (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Lull in Violence During Holiday Frees Families Long Confined by Fear

BAGHDAD, Oct. 27 -- Maybe it was because this week was the Islamic holiday Eid al-Fitr, and even killers have to stay home with their families once a year. Maybe it was because a massive American operation had shut down some of Baghdad's most dangerous neighborhoods, and U.S. soldiers with M-16 rifles were opening car trunks, favorite places for killers to stash their guns, bombs and struggling kidnap victims.

For the people of Baghdad, death took something of a holiday this week. By Thursday, U.S. and Iraqi military commanders were staring at murder rates that had fallen by half since Monday. On Thursday, Baghdad logged only one man killed by one bomb, the government said. It made for marveling.

"Quietest day in months," said Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, a spokesman for the Interior Ministry. "Still quiet," Khalaf said Friday.

On Monday, as the week-long holiday began, Ali Rahad and his co-workers pushed open the rusty gates of the Tofaha amusement park, gingerly, as an experiment. Tofaha -- the name means "apple" -- last opened for business almost exactly a year ago, on the previous Eid holiday.

DOJ_NMG_0088596

Tofaha has only aged swings, slides with the shine long worn off and heavy merry-go-rounds, on a city lot with the grass worn to dirt by children's feet. But it's one of the few places where families might conceivably go -- Baghdad has few public parks, and many of the riverbanks where people used to picnic have been blocked off by the concrete blast walls of Iraqi and U.S. military bases.

So people at the park were hopeful. On Monday, Rahad, who runs a shooting gallery at Tofaha, waited. And waited. "Nobody came," the gangly 20-year-old said. Unsure if the quiet would last, Baghdad's people were still afraid, he said.

Eid marks the end of a demanding month of dawn-to-dusk fasting for Muslims. Families normally pass the holiday boisterously, traveling to see relatives and taking to the streets to parade in newly received finery.

But since last year's holiday, the streets have been rendered largely deserted by a surge of Shiite and Sunni gunmen. The street outside the amusement park is pitted from bombs, and shops are shuttered. The neighborhood, Radill, is just outside Sadr City, a Shiite enclave where death squads hide.

"All the families are suffering," Rahad said. "The kids are small, they forget what's going on. They don't understand why there are explosions and killing, and why they have to be jailed in their houses."

By Wednesday, people were venturing out. On Thursday morning, in a neighborhood near the amusement park, shop owner Allah Abdul Hussein consulted with his wife as he looked at their cooped-up 2-year-old daughter, Nour.

Hussein and his wife considered: Tofaha traditionally had drawn both Sunni and Shiite families; maybe that would protect it from bombs by either side. By midday, Hussein and his wife dared. They put Nour in the car and went to the park.

"Because nothing happened today, I brought them here, to have fun," Hussein said. A solemn Nour, in a new dress with a ruffled heart spread across the bodice, held his hand. Cowed, she looked up at the green helium balloon tied to her other hand and looming over her, bigger than her body.

In Hilla, a city about 60 miles south of Baghdad, Mohammed Salman, a 32-year-old former government employee laid off when the war began, got word that Tofaha was open for Eid. Hilla has had so many bombs, Salman said, that there was no place left for his children to play. "They were crying in the house, begging me to take them out," he said. "It's Eid, it's Eid, we must go," his son told him. So Salman drove them to Tofaha.

At Tofaha, younger children sat stiffly on swings and on the saddles of merry-go-rounds. Play was something that had grown unfamiliar to them.

Twelve-year-old Maisa Mohammed moved among them in a holiday ensemble of heels and a blue chiffon gown, with purple sunglasses and, in her hair, an orange ostrich plume. She had come here Tuesday and Wednesday as well.

Older children like Maisa helped younger ones climb ladders to slides and taught them to pump their legs on swings. "I was dreaming to come here, to play," Maisa said. Except for school, she said, she hadn't been out since last Eid.

Five-year-old Mutaz clung, unsmiling and unmoving, to his grandmother each time she put him on a piece of playground equipment. His mother, Dunya Abdul Rahman, 34, scrunched her face when asked the last time she had taken Mutaz outside the house. "Phoooh!" Rahman exclaimed, trying to think. "Six months."

"I am afraid someone will kidnap him, kill him," Rahman said. "He is the only son I have. I cannot even send him to school."

"Tell them in America about the children in Iraq," Rahman said, her hair awry, her eyes haunted. "Tell them about the children in prison."

The park would be open only another day, through the end of Eid on Friday. No one was counting on the decline in killing to continue. The American operation that shut down normal traffic in Shiite neighborhoods was temporary, part of a search for a kidnapped American soldier.

U.S. military officers played down the notion that their troops' increased operations and the sealing off of Sadr City had contributed to the drop in violence, saying it was a normal calm for Eid. "We can't cordon off Iraq," said Col. Nelson McCouch, a public affairs officer in Baghdad.

At Tofaha, younger children started smiling, yelling, shouting one another's names across the playground as the afternoon wore on. Rahad oversaw a line of boys at his shooting gallery, clustering for a shot at the bull's-eye with wooden-stock rifles, real military weapons stripped of their ammunition clips.

"We are having fun!" shouted Mariam and Batool, two next-door neighbors, answering questions as they soared on swings, their hair flying. "We are not afraid!"

Hussein was. He pulled Nour out of the park. "We're leaving fast, while it's still safe," he said.

At the slide, the children who remained broke into smiles each time their feet landed in the dirt at the bottom. They huddled there for a second before running off, overcome by excitement. Maisa, her orange ostrich plume still high, slid again and again. She stored up the exhilaration that would take her through to next Eid, if war didn't overtake her.

"One time, in a year," Maisa said. "Every year."

Special correspondent Naseer Nouri contributed to this report.

DOJ_NMG_0088597

U.S. Citizen Won't Be Handed To Iraq, Federal Court Says (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

A U.S. citizen who was sentenced to death by an Iraqi court this month will not be handed over by the U.S. military until the Supreme Court hears his case, a federal appeals court ruled yesterday.

An Iraqi judge found Mohammad Munaf guilty of helping in the 2005 kidnapping of three Romanian journalists in Baghdad. Munaf, who was born in Iraq and became a U.S. citizen in 2000, said his trial was flawed and his confession coerced.

Since his arrest in May 2005 near Baghdad, Munaf has been held at Camp Cropper, where the U.S. military keeps high-value detainees, on behalf of Multinational Force-Iraq.

In Washington, U.S. District Judge Royce Lamberth ruled that he has no authority to intervene because Munaf, 53, was being held by coalition military forces.

Yesterday, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit also declined to step in. The court said that the military must give Munaf 10 days to appeal to the Supreme Court and wait for it to rule before transferring him to Iraqi officials.

U.S. Finds Too Many KBR Reports 'Proprietary' (WP)

By Griff Witte, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

A Halliburton Co. subsidiary is abusing federal regulations by marking nearly all information it gives to the government about its operations in Iraq "proprietary," a practice that promotes unnecessary secrecy and could hurt competition, according to a report released yesterday by U.S. auditors.

Under federal law, contractors are allowed to mark some documents proprietary, especially when they are bidding on a deal. But auditors for the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction found Halliburton subsidiary KBR Inc. was using that stamp even with such basic records as daily head counts of how many people ate at the company's dining facilities. KBR is the Pentagon's largest contractor in Iraq, providing logistics support for the Army including meals, fuel, laundry service and base construction.

Auditors concluded that the company's actions represent "an abuse" of the Federal Acquisition Regulation, the set of rules for government contracts.

In effect, the report said, KBR has turned contracting rules "designed to protect truly proprietary information and to enhance procurement competition . . . into a mechanism to prevent the government from releasing normally transparent information, thus potentially hindering competition and oversight."

In a written response, Halliburton spokeswoman Cathy Mann said that using the proprietary stamp was "not only encouraged, but required" by the Army.

"KBR has included proprietary markings on the majority of its data and property in support of its government contracts for the U.S. Army for at least the last decade," Mann said.

According to the report, Army officials are working on ways to get KBR to cut down on the practice.

KBR and the Defense Department were both criticized last year after it came to light that the company had advised Pentagon officials to heavily redact a series of unfavorable audits before they were delivered to United Nations monitors. The Pentagon complied.

Sen. Byron L. Dorgan (D-N.D.), who has conducted a series of hearings on contractor abuses as chair of the Democratic Policy Committee, said yesterday that he had been denied information about KBR's operations in Iraq because it had been deemed proprietary.

"The American people don't have access to information that should be made available," Dorgan said.

But Stan Soloway, who leads a contractor trade group called the Professional Services Council, said it was not unusual for a company to want to protect information that could give it an edge over other firms. That's particularly true for KBR, which Soloway said has had proprietary information leak out. "This is a company that's been once burned and is going to be twice shy," he said. "To say this is abuse is an overreach."

Report Says Iraq Contractor Is Hiding Data From U.S. (NYT)

By James Glanz And Floyd Norris

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

A Halliburton subsidiary that has been subjected to numerous investigations for billions of dollars of contracts it has received for work in Iraq has systematically misused federal rules to withhold basic information on its practices from American officials, a federal oversight agency said yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0088598

The contracts awarded to the company, KBR, formerly named Kellogg Brown & Root, are for housing, food, fuel and other necessities to American troops and government officials in Iraq, and for restoring that country's crucial oil infrastructure. The contracts total about $20 billion.

The oversight agency, the Office of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction, said KBR refused to disclose information as basic as how many people are fed each day in its dining facilities and how many gallons of fuel are delivered to foreign embassies in Iraq, claiming that the data was proprietary, meaning it would unfairly help its business competitors.

Although KBR has been subjected to a growing number of specific investigations and paid substantial fines, this marks the first time the federal government has weighed in and accused it of systematically engaging in a practice aimed at veiling its business practices in Iraq.

The allegations come at a critical time for the company, as Halliburton is attempting to spin off the subsidiary. And in July, the Army announced that it would terminate KBR's largest contract with the government, and the company says that it will compete to regain some of that business when the government calls for new bids.

Proprietary information is protected by the so-called federal acquisition regulations, known as FAR. But the agency said KBR routinely stamped nearly all of the data it collects on its work as proprietary, impeding not only the investigations into the company's activities but also things as simple as managerial oversight of the work.

"The use of proprietary data markings on reports and information submitted by KBR to the government is an abuse of the FAR and the procurement system," says a memo released yesterday by the special inspector general.

As a result, the memo said, "KBR is not protecting its own data, but is in many instances inappropriately restricting the government's use of information that KBR is required to gather for the government."

The specific examples cited by the inspector general are taken from an $18 billion contract called the Logistics Civil Augmentation Program, informally known as Logcap, under which KBR provides food, fuel, housing, recreational facilities and laundry and other services to American troops, government officials and other contractors in Iraq.

A spokeswoman for Halliburton, Cathy Mann, did not dispute the company's extensive use of the proprietary label but said, "KBR has included proprietary markings on the majority of its data and property in support of its government contracts for the U.S. Army for at least the last decade."

That assertion could not immediately be confirmed with the Army. But in its memo, the inspector general's office said that during the course of its investigation, both Pentagon auditors and Army contracting officers shared serious concerns about the practice.

And a statement released late yesterday by the Army Sustainment Command in Rock Island, Ill., said that it had "implemented corrective actions relative to the concerns raised" in the memo.

Ms. Mann added that KBR believed that the use of proprietary markings in work for the United States government "is not only encouraged, but required" by federal laws restricting the diffusion of American trade secrets abroad.

With the release of the new memo, that argument is unlikely to gain much traction with members of Congress, federal investigators and the numerous critics who have been calling for access to information on KBR's work in Iraq almost since the invasion ended.

"The arrogance is astounding on the part of KBR," said William L. Nash, a retired Army major general who is a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations and an expert on post-conflict zones. "It's time for Congress to step in, because this has just gone too far."

Reaction to the memo on Capitol Hill also revealed that the issue of KBR's performance and investigations of its work are increasingly causing concern on both sides of the political aisle.

Henry A. Waxman, a California Democrat who is the ranking minority member of the House Committee on Government Reform and one of the earliest critics of KBR's use of the proprietary label, said the new memo showed how the company had tried to conceal "corporate profiteering during wartime."

Senator Susan Collins, the Maine Republican who is chairwoman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, said, "I am concerned that the special inspector general has not always had full cooperation and access to the corporate documents that his office needs to carry out its critical mission."

Access to that information, Senator Collins said, "helps to ensure that government contractors fulfill their contractual obligations and that government gets the best value for taxpayer dollars. The improper use of proprietary claims impedes critical transparency and makes it more difficult for the inspector general's office to complete essential audits."

The Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction is Stuart W. Bowen Jr., a Republican whose investigative zeal has surprised some political analysts who believed that he would be reluctant to expose flaws in the administration's reconstruction program and companies like Halliburton. Dick Cheney was that company's chief executive until he left to run for vice president.

DOJ_NMG_0088599

Halliburton has blamed KBR for holding down the company's stock performance, and is planning to sell a 20 percent stake in KBR to the public by the end of the year, and then spin off the rest of the shares in the company to Halliburton shareholders in early 2007, thus severing the corporate ties.

Halliburton, though, would retain some responsibility for dealing with continuing federal investigations of KBR's work in Iraq. Documents filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission as part of the public offering have revealed a wide range of investigations into KBR's work in Iraq, raising the possibilities that investors and the parent company could foot the bill for settlements against KBR.

Those documents, which must reveal potential risks to investors, indicate that continuing Justice Department investigations into KBR's work in Iraq have produced grand jury subpoenas for current and former employees.

The company could have other liabilities. Outside Iraq, the papers say, there is a Justice Department investigation into possible overcharges in its work in the Balkans from 1996 to 2000. And the securities commission and the Justice Department are investigating payments in Nigeria that may have violated the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, which bars the bribing of foreign officials.

There is also an antitrust investigation, and the company says investigations into the Nigerian project found information that "former employees may have engaged in coordinated bidding with one or more competitors on certain foreign construction projects and that such coordination possibly began as early as the mid-1980s."

The memo by the inspector general said that KBR would sometimes provide data to one part of the United States government, like Pentagon auditors, but with the proprietary label that would prevent its release to the public or even to other parts of the government.

In other cases that clearly irritated the inspector general's auditors, KBR would hobble their work by releasing data in the form of gigantic but indigestible tables rather than within the kind of software — like Excel spreadsheets — that would let the auditors do their calculations.

Those findings have raised suspicions that if KBR is going to such lengths to keep the data out of the hands of auditors, then the company must have something to hide, said Frederick D. Barton, a director of the Postconflict Reconstruction Project at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

"There's been smoke for some time," Mr. Barton said. "This seems to indicate that there was fire as well."

Halliburton stock was weak early in the Bush administration, in part because oil prices fell as the world economy weakened in 2001. But the stock bottomed out at $4.30 in early 2002 and rose sharply thereafter, eventually peaking at $41.98 this April as the oil services industry benefited from increased oil exploration and as the Iraq war got under way.

It dropped as low as $26.33 earlier this month, as oil prices fell. It closed yesterday at $32.15.

Halliburton Arm Accused Of 'abuse' In Iraq (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, October 28, 2006

A Halliburton subsidiary that has been awarded billions of dollars in federal contracts in Iraq has been accused by an independent watchdog of "abuse" of government regulations that protect US taxpayers.

Stuart Bowen, the special inspector-general for Iraq reconstruction, said in an interim audit released on Thursday that Halliburton subsidiary Kellogg, Brown and Root (KBR) had, in effect, routinely inappropriately hidden data about one of its contracts from public scrutiny by marking the information as "proprietary".

As a result of the investigation, army officials said they would prepare a modification to a multi-billion dollar Halliburton contract – known as Logcap – to "provide guidance" to KBR on the marking of proprietary data.

It is unclear how much the US military has paid for the contract, but one estimate put the figure at $7bn (€5.5bn, £3.7bn) last year. The contract gives the company the exclusive right to provide logistics support to the US military.

KBR said on Thursday it had used proprietary marking on the majority of its data in support of US army contracts for "at least the last decade" and that the practice was required under the US Trade Secrets Act. The company said the use of proprietary markings were appropriate because, as announced earlier this year, the Logcap contract is expected to be resubmitted for a competitive bid and divided among several contractors.

Questions about the transparency of data KBR provides the government were raised in July, after Mr Bowen announced his office would investigate whether services the US government was receiving under one KBR contract were "reasonable, efficient, and cost-effective".

In his probe of a KBR contract that provides support to the US embassy in Iraq – a contract that falls under the larger Logcap contract – Mr Bowen found that the company wrongly shielded from public consumption data including: daily dining facility headcount; and the number of litres of fuel issued to generators maintained by foreign embassies in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0088600

The company also initially refused to provide Mr Bowen, a former attorney for President George W. Bush who has emerged as a tough critic of the reconstruction effort, with cost data in a format that was acceptable to his office.

By illegitimately using privacy provisions, which are in place to protect companies competing for federal contract work by allowing them to keep some data secret, the special inspector-general said KBR had prevented the government from releasing "normally transparent information, thus potentially hindering competition and oversight".

The critical audit comes on the heels of a separate report released this week that found that overhead costs had consumed between 11 per cent and 55 per cent of the cost of a handful of reconstruction projects.

Massoud Barzani Kurdistan (WSJ)

By Judith Miller

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

ERBIL, Iraq -- Unlike Baghdad, 200 miles away, the air here does not echo with the sound of gunfire, car bombs and helicopters. Residents of this city of a million people picnic by day in pristine new parks and sip tea with friends and relatives at night. American forces are not "occupiers" or the "enemy," but "liberators." Mentioning President Bush evokes smiles -- and not of derision.

American forces were "most welcome" when stationed here at the start of the invasion of Iraq, says Massoud Barzani, the president of Kurdistan in the north. Not a single U.S. soldier was killed in his region, he adds proudly, "not even in a traffic accident." Would U.S. forces be welcome back now? "Most certainly," he declared this week in an interview in his newly minted marble (and heavily chandeliered) palace. The more American soldiers the better, a top aide confirms.

The secret of Kurdistan's relative success so far -- and of America's enduring popularity here -- is the officially unacknowledged fact that the three provinces of the Kurdish north are already quasi-independent. On Oct. 11, Iraq's parliament approved a law that would allow the Sunni and Shiite provinces also to form semi-autonomous regions with the same powers that the constitution has confirmed in Kurdistan. And while Kurdish leaders pay lip-service to President Bush's stubborn insistence on the need for a unified Iraq with a strong centralized government, Kurdistan is staunchly resisting efforts to concentrate economic control in Baghdad.

The U.S., Mr. Barzani believes, should leave it to the Iraqis to decide if they want "one or two or three regions." Then, he adds: "But it already exists. The division is there as a practical matter. People are being killed on the basis of identity." As for Baghdad, "it should have a special status as the federal capital. But the rest should be regions that run their own affairs. Or they should be separate. Only a voluntary union can work. Either you have federalism with Baghdad as a federal capital with a special status, or you have separation. Those are the facts." * * *

Even the most fleeting visitor cannot but notice that Kurdistan is almost a full-fledged state. The Kurds have been running their own affairs -- badly at times -- ever since Washington created a safe area after Saddam Hussein crushed their U.S.-encouraged uprising after the 1991 Gulf war, sending much of the traumatized population into the rugged mountains separating Kurdish Iraq from Turkey. After CNN filmed Kurds dying of cold and starvation, President George H.W. Bush declared a "no fly" zone north of the 36th parallel from which Saddam's planes were barred, enabling the Kurds, at long last, to begin governing themselves. And so they have, with a determination born of historic vengeance.

Kurds no longer speak Arabic, but various dialects of Kurdish, in offices and schools throughout the 74,000 square miles that comprise their provinces. They fly their own flag, provide their own services, raise their own army -- the legendarily disciplined Pesh Merga, or "Those Who Face Death" -- and have gradually consolidated their de facto state. Divided between two parties -- Mr. Barzani's Kurdistan Democratic Party, his clan's power base in north Kurdistan, and the southern-based Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, headed by Jalal Talabani, now president of Iraq (or "President of the Green Zone" as Kurds here call the post) -- Kurdistan is booming with construction, new businesses and ambitious dreams of self-rule.

Washington's refusal to accept this self-evident political reality does not trouble Mr. Barzani. On the contrary, he insists Kurdistan will remain part of Iraq -- as long as Iraq remains federal, secular and democratic, and officially blesses the autonomy the Kurds managed to enshrine in the new Iraqi constitution. Besides, the fig-leaf of Iraq is useful: Declaring independence would risk provoking Turkey, for whom an independent Kurdish state is anathema given its own 18-million strong Kurdish population and the continued existence of the terrorist Kurdistan Workers Party -- the PKK -- on the Iraqi-Kurdish side of the border. Yet Mr. Barzani adamantly denies that his fidelity to Iraq is born of fear. "Having an independent state is the natural legitimate right of our people," he insisted. "We are not ready to say that because we fear displeasing our neighbors or because we are frightened that they may attack. That's not the case," he said. "We say that because at this stage, the parliament of Kurdistan has decided to remain within a federal, democratic Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0088601

Kurdish aspirations for autonomy, however, clearly require Turkish and Iranian acquiescence, or a persuasive reason for Turkey not to attack. Hence the desire for the redeployment of some American forces to Kurdistan. "The presence of American forces here would be a deterrent to intervention by the neighboring countries," Mr. Barzani says, with characteristic bluntness.

That is unlikely any time soon, say officials in Washington. How would the presence of American forces in what one official called a "land-locked aircraft carrier" help prevent the emergence of an Islamist entity in Iraq's Sunni-dominated center or deter Iranian control of the Shiite south? Moreover, as President Bush noted last week, dismissing proposals to carve Iraq into three virtually autonomous regions as destabilizing, such a division of Iraq would exacerbate Sunni-on-Sunni and Sunni-on-Shiite tensions. "The Kurds will then create problems for Turkey and Syria," President Bush said.

On the contrary, Mr. Barzani insists, Kurdistan seeks good relations "with all its neighbors." Indeed, Turkish-Kurdish and Kurdish-Iranian talks have been ongoing, diplomats say. As for Baghdad, Mr. Barzani adds, no one has tried harder to keep Iraq from splitting apart than the Kurds. "We worked hard with the Sunni community to bring them into the process," he says, "and also to establish Iraq's governing council, the interim and transitional government, and the drafting of the constitution. We played a leading role in the success of the process." But he was clearly annoyed by a slight: The fact that the congressionally created Iraq Study Group, headed by former Republican Secretary of State James Baker and Democratic co-chair Lee Hamilton, which is weighing policy alternatives for Iraq, has not traveled to Kurdistan -- the only successful region of postwar Iraq -- to consult with him. "It's a huge failing in their deliberations," he says. "We remain willing and ready to help whenever our assistance is needed."

Mr. Barzani is not shy about offering advice to Washington. The U.S. needs to revise its policies because "the existing strategy is not effective," he says. American forces could be reduced -- perhaps by half -- he said, but only when Iraqi forces are ready to restore order. But that will not happen, he warns, until the U.S. permits the Iraqi government to rid itself of the "terrorists, chauvinists and extremists" in its ranks who condone and "openly incite the violence on TV" that is destroying what remains of the capital and the country. He refuses to name names. But other Kurds point to such figures as Salah Mutlaq, an extremist Sunni leader, and aides to Moqtada al-Sadr, who heads a radical Shia militia.

"You have a different culture; you're a different people," Mr. Barzani said. "With America's mentality and approach and regulations, we cannot win like this. There must be decisive action so the government can enforce the law and restore its prestige." This Barzani, confident and candid, is different from the reticent figure I first interviewed 15 years ago in his mountain fastness of Barzan. Although plainspoken, "Kak Massoud" -- a respectful but affectionate "Mister" in Kurdish -- was reluctant then to offer an American journalist a frank assessment of his frustrations and aspirations. Not so the man who has evolved into "President Barzani" of Kurdistan, who, based on an informal power-sharing agreement with his rival, President Talibani of Iraq, is determined to seize this historic opportunity to advance his people's interests.

Just as "Kak" has become "president," the Kurds have gone from resistance to nation-building, with all the challenges such a transformation implies. Mr. Barzani has complained that while he and his Pesh Merga knew how to fight, it was "easier to destroy two dams than to build one power plant." Kurdistan is changing, in substance as well as style. The capital is no longer called Erbil (the Arabic), but "Howler," its Kurdish name. While Mr. Barzani, age 60, still wears the pantaloon, cummerbund, tight jacket and twirled turban favored by traditional Kurds, Western-style business suits -- expensive labels, at that -- are favored by Nechervan Barzani, his nephew and the energetic 40-year-old prime minister of the Kurdistan Regional Government.

Gone are the refugee tents -- except for the thousands of Sunni Arab refugees from Baghdad, who, along with some 7,000 Christian families, have migrated here for safety. Temporary structures are being replaced by new brick and cement houses and apartment buildings -- among them many lavish "castles," as the Kurds call these houses nestled in the hills surrounding Erbil. Expensive glass office buildings are springing up throughout the region. Apartments are priced at between $100,000 and $200,000 -- prohibitively expensive; and yet several of these are sold out.

"Kurds have money," Prime Minister Nechervan Barzani told me. "But until recently, they lacked the confidence to invest." If the junior Mr. Barzani is correct, Kurdistan is literally exploding with confidence and new projects befitting its ambitions: Almost $2 billion in Turkish trade and investment -- the result, partly, of his outreach to Ankara -- is financing the construction the Middle East's largest new conference center, a new international airport, hotels, parks, bridges, tunnels, overpasses, a refinery and an electrical plant. The Kurdistan Development Council is even advertising Kurdistan as a tourist destination. There are over 70 direct flights a week to the region's two airports from the Middle East and Europe. But Kurdistan's infrastructure is still woefully antiquated, a legacy of Saddam's privation and the ruinous civil war between the clans of Mr. Barzani and Mr. Talabani from 1994 to 1998. Most cities still provide only two-to-three hours of electricity a day. The rest comes from private generators, which the poor can ill afford.

Last spring, public resentment at the lack of services erupted among the frustrated residents of half a dozen Kurdish towns. Consider Halabja, which became instantly infamous in 1988 when Saddam's forces dropped nerve gas there, killing 5,000. In March, its residents trashed the expensive monument erected to commemorate their annihilation, setting the structure on fire and stripping the black marble slabs on which the names of gas attack victims had been etched in gold. On my visit last week, two Pesh Merga were playing "dama," a Kurdish version of chess, with pieces of the marble that had been torn off the wall.

DOJ_NMG_0088602

Kurds are now restless after so many years of deprivation, and their expectations are high, Mr. Barzani agreed: "My main objective is to build constitutional institutions in this country, to see a Kurdistan 10 years from now in which each person is safe and free to have his own ideas." He and other government officials were determined to "put the Kurdish house in order," which means continuing to encourage the effort by Nechervan Barzani to join supporters from his and Mr. Talibani's group into one efficient administration. Although grumbling about corruption and nepotism disturbs him, security and political solidarity at home must come first. * * *

There is, of course, the explosive question of oil. While Mr. Barzani is willing to share revenues with Baghdad, the principle of control is vital to Kurdistan if it is to have an independent revenue stream. This issue, and a referendum next year on who should control the oil-rich city of Kirkuk -- which the Kurds claim as their historic capital and whose residents approved a list of Kurdish candidates for Iraq's parliament last year -- are red lines for the Kurdish government. Mr. Barzani is confident that these questions can be resolved through negotiations with Baghdad. But if they cannot, or if the fighting that has gripped much of Iraq escalates beyond the control of American and Iraqi forces, at least the Kurds will not be blamed for the dissolution or partition of Iraq. "Other people will be responsible, not us," he says. "We will never become the cause of the partition of Iraq."

As Mr. Barzani carefully stresses his devotion to Iraqiness -- all the while promoting a political and economic agenda that would reinforce Kurdish exceptionalism -- Americans struggle for an elusive solution to the violence and ethnic strife that abounds. Mr. Barzani wishes the U.S. success, he says, because so much depends on George Bush's determination not to "cut and run." His "courageous decision to liberate Iraq will not be undermined by the mistakes made after that liberation," Mr. Barzani says, although he does resort to an American cliché: "If there are people who think the solution lies in leaving this unfinished, just like Vietnam, that would be a major disaster."

But having been both saved and betrayed by previous American governments, he knows the risks of tying Kurdish fortunes too closely to an administration facing public disenchantment with its Iraq policies. "In building our new federal democratic country, our interests have not contradicted each other," he says cautiously. "They are aligned. But before I trust the United States or other people, I trust my own people."

Ms. Miller, a former New York Times reporter, is a writer in New York.

The Grand Ayatollah Behind The Curtain (WP)

By Colbert I. King

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

The question directed this week to the National Security Council press office was straightforward: "Has the Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani met with any American official, either military or civilian, since the U.S. invasion in 2003?" The answer reveals the extent to which the Bush administration is now, and always has been, out of its depth in Iraq.

Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani is Iraq's most powerful figure. Under the reign of Saddam Hussein, Sistani was forced to keep a low profile, since he was part of the Shiite majority that Hussein's ruling Baath Party controlled with a heavy hand. Sistani was on the receiving end of assassination attempts by Hussein's thugs. But all that changed in the spring of 2003, when the United States toppled the Iraqi regime.

Today, Sistani's Shiites are the major political force in Iraq. They are leaders in the new government; they run the key Interior Ministry; and one of their own, Nouri al-Maliki, serves as prime minister. Were it not for Iraq's liberation from Hussein's tyranny by U.S. troops, Sistani and his followers would still be under the thumb of Sunnis.

The average Iraqi may not be happy to see the country occupied by foreigners. But if any Iraqi should feel even a tad kindly toward his American liberators, it ought to be the grand ayatollah. After all, he is the chief beneficiary of Hussein's defeat. It's not too much to think that if the president of the United States visits Iraq, Sistani would at least meet him face to face to say thank you. Think again.

Back to the question that started this column: Has Sistani met with any American official in the past 3 1/2 years? Frederick Jones, the NSC's communications director, said yesterday that no American official has ever met Sistani.

But how, you might ask, can that be? After all, since Hussein's statue was pulled down in 2003, Iraq has been visited twice by President Bush. Vice President Cheney has been there, too. Two different secretaries of state -- Colin Powell and Condoleezza Rice -- have dropped in. So have Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, countless high-ranking Pentagon brass and enough U.S. senators and members of the House of Representatives to warrant a congressional annex in the Green Zone.

How is it possible that leaders of the world's most powerful nation -- a country that has generously sent 140,000 of its finest sons and daughters to fight, suffer and die to free Iraq from the Baathist grip -- have not met the Iraqi leader with the most to gain from Hussein's defeat?

DOJ_NMG_0088603

It's because the Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani has designated himself off-limits to Americans. He will not let Bush, Cheney, Rice and company in to see him because they are non-Muslims and thus he considers them to be kafir, or infidels. Sistani regards himself as too good to meet with those who freed him.

What's weird is to hear folks in Washington speak about Sistani's views as if they just got off the phone with him. "Sistani doesn't want clerics to have a role in government," one Washington foreign policy expert told me. "Sistani believes Islam should be the national religion," said another. "Sistani is a pragmatist," said a third. All this is asserted with confidence, when in reality these people know only what they have heard from someone else -- a Muslim go-between or a Sistani envoy.

Bush and his high command have never set eyes on the man. Yet Sistani controls them as if they were puppets on a string. It's like something out of "The Wizard of Oz."

Consider what happened in 2004: Barricaded in a Najaf slum miles from Baghdad, the unseen Sistani was able single-handedly to block the United States from staging a handover of power without elections. He did so by issuing a fatwa that sent thousands into the streets. The Bush people were forced to give ground. A law was drafted that led to elections in 2005.

Sistani's chief competition is not the United States but an anti-American Shiite cleric, Moqtada al-Sadr, and his Badr Organization, which has infiltrated Iraqi military and police units. The Iraqi parliament, truth be told, responds to the calls of the firebrand cleric.

What have we come to? In addition to al-Sadr, today's Iraq is under the influence of a Muslim cleric, Sistani, who, according to Newsweek, forbids music for entertainment, dancing and playing chess, and forbids women from shaking the hands of any men other than their fathers, brothers or husbands. His whole purpose is to promote Shiite theology and keep Iraq as a democratic, but decidedly Islamic, state.

Billions spent, thousands of Americans dead or maimed, U.S. armed forces exhausted, stretched thin and working around the clock -- for that? Is this what George W. Bush had in mind?

NATO Boss, Bush Condemn Taliban Atrocities (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

ASSOCIATED PRESS

President Bush and NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer yesterday discussed how the Taliban has begun using Afghan civilians as human shields.

In a meeting at the White House, Mr. de Hoop Scheffer said that he was saddened by recent deaths of Afghans and that the alliance is committed to defending democracy in the nation once ruled by the repressive Taliban regime.

The White House said the two leaders did not discuss NATO troop levels or the suspension of two German soldiers in connection with photographs of troops posing with human skulls.

"What they did talk about is that fact that the Taliban have begun using innocent civilians as human shields," White House spokesman Tony Snow said about the Oval Office meeting, which lasted about an hour.

"Secretary-General de Hoop Scheffer was really adamant about the kind of atrocities that are now being practiced by the Taliban and the importance of continued pressure on them," Mr. Snow said.

NATO expanded its mission this year from the relatively stable northern and western parts of the country to far more dangerous areas in the south, where Taliban militia have been most active since a U.S.-led coalition drove them from the seat of power, Kabul, in 2001. Some 32,000 NATO-led troops are serving in the most dangerous areas of the insurgency-wracked nation.

Yesterday, a roadside blast ripped through a pickup truck in southern Afghanistan, killing 14 villagers who were traveling to a provincial capital for holiday celebrations. Meanwhile, in the southern city of Kandahar, mourners attended a prayer ceremony in memory of civilians killed during NATO operations Tuesday in the nearby Panjwayi district.

NATO said its initial reports found that 12 civilians were killed, but Afghan officials estimated the number of civilians killed at between 30 and 80, including many women and children.

"That's a tragedy, but let me convince you to look at the broader picture," Mr. de Hoop Scheffer said. "[Members of the Taliban] are against democracy. Girls did not go to school when the Taliban was running Afghanistan. Now they go to school. Now there is a precedent. Now there is a government.

"NATO is delivering security," Mr. de Hoop Scheffer said.

Mr. Bush thanked the NATO secretary-general for leading 26 nations of NATO into Afghanistan, and for reaching out to other nations that share its values but have not been considered a part of NATO.

"You know what I know: That the real challenge for the future is to help people of moderation and young democracies succeed in the face of threats and attacks by radicals and extremists who do not share our ideology, have kind of a dark vision of the world," Mr. Bush said.

DOJ_NMG_0088604

Mr. de Hoop Scheffer, fresh from a visit with Russian President Vladimir Putin in Moscow, is in Washington for talks about matters including the NATO chief's wish for closer relations between the alliance and Russia.

Russia signed a partnership agreement with NATO in 2002, outlining cooperation in counterterrorism, nonproliferation, peacekeeping and other fields. At the same time, Mr. Putin's government has continued to make public his opposition to the alliance's eastward expansion.

That expansion has included absorption of countries that were part of the former Soviet Union -- the Baltic states of Latvia, Lithuania and Estonia and former members of NATO's Cold War nemesis, the Warsaw Pact: Bulgaria, the Czech Republic and Slovakia, Hungary, Poland and Romania.

Blast In South Afghan Suburb Kills 14 And Wounds 3 (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Oct. 27 — An explosion from a mine in a road on Friday killed 14 civilians and wounded three others in a suburb of the capital city in the southern province of Uruzgan, Afghan officials said.

The victims were a group of elderly people, youths and children who were riding in a pickup truck toward the provincial capital, Trinkot, for the celebration of Id al-Fitr, the festival at the end of Ramadan.

A spokesman for the provincial governor said that the government was investigating whether the mine had been laid recently by suspected Taliban fighters or was left over from the Soviet invasion.

Afghan officials also said Friday that they were trying to determine the death toll for civilians from an airstrike late Tuesday by NATO forces in the southern province of Kandahar.

On Thursday, President Hamid Karzai said he would ask a committee of tribal elders and governmental officials for a thorough investigation of the episode. The initial estimates of the death toll ranged from about 40 to 50.

Mr. Karzai said Friday at a news conference that he had spoken on the phone with a 75-year-old man who lost 19 members of his extended family in the NATO bombing, late on Tuesday.

“Yesterday afternoon I talked with an elder, Haji Abdullah Shah, who lost all his family members,” Mr. Karzai said, adding that just one of his sons survived.

“Three other families also lost most members on the bombardment,” he said.

As the violence worsens in southern Afghanistan, Mr. Karzai again urged other countries interested in the region to “go to the root of terrorism,” a phrase that Afghan officials frequently use to signal their belief that Pakistan is supporting the insurgents, who are believed to be tied to the Taliban, Afghanistan’s former rulers.

Mr. Karzai said that there was a need for a “firm coordination between NATO and Afghan troops” to avoid killing civilians during operations.

Photo Scandal Raises Doubts In Germany About Deployments (WP)

By Craig Whitlock, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Troops in Afghanistan Played With Skulls

BERLIN, Oct. 27 -- A scandal over soldiers caught playing with human skulls has rattled the German military and prompted a reexamination of the country's growing role in global peacekeeping missions.

German military officials said Friday that they had suspended two soldiers and were investigating several others suspected of desecrating skulls while serving in Afghanistan as part of a NATO-led force in 2003 and 2004. Photos of troops mocking the freshly unearthed skulls -- including one of a uniformed soldier standing next to a human head with his genitals exposed -- have shocked many Germans since they were first published Wednesday in the tabloid newspaper Bild.

The controversy, one of several to surface recently from overseas military missions, has led officials here to question whether Germany has fully digested the political and security risks involved in such assignments. Currently, more than 9,000 German troops are posted in six hot spots around the world, a sharp reversal of the country's decades-long policy of staying out of war zones.

"The German politicians tried to sell this international cooperation and posting of German troops abroad as something good that we were doing for people, that we were bringing help to the starving masses," said Christoph Grams, a military and security analyst for the German Council on Foreign Relations in Berlin. "This shows that what we're doing is perhaps not completely clean. Now, people are paying more attention to the dangers of what we're doing."

DOJ_NMG_0088605

Sensitive to its past under Nazi rule, Germany largely avoided international peacekeeping operations until 1999, when it sent troops to the Balkans to help quell the war in Kosovo. Since then, it has gradually expanded its participation in such missions and now also has forces in Afghanistan, Congo, Sudan and Djibouti.

This month, the German navy joined the U.N. peacekeeping force in Lebanon, but only after lawmakers held a long debate over whether the German military should be involved in the same theater of operations as Israeli forces, because of lingering sensitivities from the Holocaust.

The potential for conflict became reality on Tuesday, when six Israeli fighter jets fired warning shots over a German intelligence-gathering vessel off the coast of Lebanon, according to German military officials. Israeli officials denied opening fire but confirmed that Israeli jets approached a helicopter that had taken off from the ship -- carrying a German admiral -- because it was not authorized to fly in the area.

Both governments have played down the seriousness of the incident, but it has underlined the challenges facing the German military as it tries to avoid bloodshed even as it becomes engaged in more overseas missions.

The risks facing the 2,750 German troops in Afghanistan have grown in recent months along with the resurgence in attacks by Taliban forces. Although the Germans are assigned primarily to noncombat duties in northern Afghanistan, their actions have attracted more scrutiny of late.

This month, a Turkish citizen born and raised in Germany who was recently released from the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, said he was physically abused by a German special forces unit in Afghanistan after he was captured there in 2002. The German Defense Ministry acknowledged that the prisoner, Murat Kurnaz, had been interrogated by German soldiers and said it would open an inquiry into whether he was mistreated.

Since then, the photos of the skulls have caused an even bigger stir. After an initial batch of pictures was published Wednesday, more have surfaced daily, including one showing a soldier smiling like a pirate at a skull perched on his shoulder.

It was unclear where, exactly, the skulls came from or how old they were. But the images of German soldiers playing with human remains has led to public revulsion and inevitable comparisons to the horrors perpetrated under Nazi rule.

So far, however, there have been few calls for Germany to curtail its participation in Afghanistan or in other missions. And on Wednesday, the German federal cabinet adopted a long-term national security policy that calls for an increased role in such missions in the future.

"It's very healthy for Germany to have an internal discussion about this," said Grams, the military analyst. "If Germany still says yes at the end of the day, it could make German participation even firmer in the future."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Orbital Finds Misdated Options (WP)

By Kim Hart, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Dulles Company Plans to Restate Past Earnings

Orbital Sciences Corp., a Dulles maker of booster rockets and space systems for the government and military, yesterday joined the parade of companies that have disclosed problems in their compensation practices, saying an internal review found some misdated stock options.

The company said the review found no fraud or intentional misconduct in connection with the errors and that it would revise past financial statements. Most of the options in question were granted more than five years ago, said David W. Thompson, Orbital's chairman and chief executive.

"Financial impacts are not material to the results for this year or for any prior period over the past five years," he told investors in a conference call yesterday.

Orbital expects to record pretax costs of about $300,000 in 2006, $2.5 million between 2001 and 2005 and $11.5 million between 1990, when the company went public, and 2001.

Orbital joins more than 100 companies nationwide that have been investigated for the practice of backdating stock options, in which options are dated to a time when the stock price is lower so the profit is higher after the options are exercised.

Last week, SafeNet Inc., a Maryland information security firm, said certain options over the past six years were accounted for using incorrect dates. Minnesota-based UnitedHealth Group Inc., one of the largest managed health-care companies, is under investigation for backdating stock options. In both cases, the inquiries prompted executives to step down.

DOJ_NMG_0088606

Orbital released preliminary third-quarter financial figures yesterday that did not take into account adjustments required by the option findings. Orbital reported revenue of $197.7 million, a 24 percent increase over the comparable period a year ago. Income rose 27 percent, to $8.6 million.

The company said it plans to file its final quarterly statement by Nov. 14.

This is not the first time Orbital has revised financial statements because of accounting problems. In 2000, the firm paid $22.5 million to shareholders who accused it of using fraudulent accounting practices to artificially inflate its stock price. The suit was filed after Orbital restated three quarters of past earnings.

The company has profited from the growth in funding for the U.S. missile-defense program during the past three years. In addition to designing and launching satellites and small space systems, Orbital is working with Boeing Co. to develop systems to propel warheads that intercept hostile missiles. It also has worked with Northrop Grumman Corp. to develop target missiles.

This year, Orbital entered a project with Lockheed Martin Corp. to produce the next generation of manned spacecraft vehicles to replace the current shuttles, which will be taken out of service in 2010. Orbital is charged with developing the crew rescue vehicle.

During the three months ended Sept. 30, Orbital carried out two space missions, including a missile defense interceptor in September and the launch of a communications satellite this month. The company plans to launch vehicles for the Air Force, the Missile Defense Agency and the Navy before the end of the year.

Legal Aid In Options Probes, Private Law Firms Play Crucial Role (WSJ)

By James Bandler And Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

As More Than 130 Companies Come Under Scrutiny, Government Relies on Help Questions About Fairness

With more than 130 companies under federal scrutiny, the investigation into stock-option backdating has rapidly become one of the broadest corporate scandals in decades. It is so broad, in fact, that federal authorities can't possibly do thorough examinations of every company.

Instead, they outsource a big chunk of the job.

Regulators and prosecutors are relying on suspect companies to investigate themselves by hiring outside law firms. The firms are supposed to hand over their findings to the Securities and Exchange Commission or federal prosecutors, who then use them to help decide which cases to pursue further. The feds often ask for any especially incriminating documents to be delivered in a handy folder they call a "hot binder."

That has long been a common practice for companies in potential legal trouble, partly because it can lead to leniency as reward for a self-examination well done. But not since the overseas bribery scandal of the 1970s have so many public corporations been in trouble at the same time. The federal investigation has enveloped icons of success like Apple Computer Inc., Home Depot Inc., giant insurer UnitedHealth Group Inc., and dozens of Silicon Valley companies.

"The sheer magnitude of the numbers of companies, executives and corporate boards that have disclosed options-related investigations is mind-boggling -- unequaled in recent years," says Lynn Turner, a former chief accountant for the SEC.

The mass exercise in self-policing already has produced some dramatic results. More than 40 executives or directors have resigned or been pushed out in the wake of internal probes that found options backdating problems. The most prominent is William McGuire, chief executive of UnitedHealth, who is leaving his post by Dec. 1. Outside lawyers hired by the company found evidence of rampant backdating of options that enriched him and other insiders. Dr. McGuire, who has said he did nothing improper, stands to lose more than $100 million alone after agreeing to reprice his options.

Nearly 70 companies already have said they will need to restate or otherwise reduce profits after acknowledging that faulty accounting of options had inflated the numbers, according to a tally by shareholder advisers Glass Lewis & Co. The firm put the total shaved off at $5.3 billion.

Still, the deputizing approach raises questions about how evenly justice will be applied. Such investigations are typically overseen by outside directors who may have close ties to the company's management -- and who may themselves have been involved in making the option grants at issue. The government risks focusing not on the worst offenders, critics say, but on those companies honest or frightened enough to perform scrupulous self-examinations.

In at least one case, federal officials have stepped in when they felt an internal probe wasn't getting to the bottom of the matter, according to a person familiar with the circumstances. At Affiliated Computer Services Inc., a Dallas-based technology outsourcing company, executives benefited from a tremendously unlikely pattern of timing grants. A Wall Street Journal analysis last March put the odds at 300 billion to one that the dates on which grants purportedly had been awarded to the company's former CEO were chosen randomly. The company used its longtime outside counsel to conduct the probe.

PERFECT PAYDAY

DOJ_NMG_0088607

· Options Scorecard1
· Complete coverage2

In May the company announced a preliminary finding that there was no intentional backdating to enrich executives. Government officials prodded ACS to look harder, and the company hired a new team of lawyers with no connection to the firm. "From day one ACS has expected its legal counsel to leave no stone unturned and conduct a thorough, objective, and complete investigation of all the facts, and that is exactly what is occurring," said spokesman Michael Buckley.

In some cases, the outsourcing approach has allowed the government to move unusually swiftly. In August, prosecutors filed criminal charges against three former executives of Comverse Technology Inc., only five months after private lawyers had begun an internal options probe at the New York maker of telecommunications software. The outside lawyers found a key witness, obtained dramatic confessions from the three executives, unearthed a secret options "slush fund" -- and kept government officials informed every step of the way.

Federal officials say it is too early to predict how many cases they will bring. But the government has made it clear it won't pursue every backdater. With so many potential defendants, the government has decided to zero in on the most egregious, those involving self-enrichment by top executives, big sums of money, or brazen efforts to deceive directors, auditors and shareholders.

While the government has long had internal policies that permit it to reward companies for their cooperation, the expectations have been ratcheted up in recent years. Under controversial Justice Department policies in place since 2003, companies are more susceptible to criminal charges unless they are viewed as doing a good job on "cooperation and voluntary disclosure."

The threat of criminal prosecution "is a lot like the guillotine - it tends to focus the mind," says Joseph Grundfest, a former SEC commissioner and a professor of law at Stanford University. "Here you have over 140 companies spending millions each doing the equivalent of Maoist self-criticisms and turning the results over to the authorities."

Critics of the approach say using private lawyers to investigate on behalf of the government can place employees in an unfair position: talk, or you'll lose your job. When speaking to private lawyers hired by the company, employees don't have the legal protections -- against self-incrimination, for instance -- that apply in some government proceedings. The government has relied on internal probes at least since the 1970s bribery scandal, which resulted in hundreds of companies stepping forward, and led to enactment of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act.

The current investigations are focusing on whether executives improperly enriched themselves through surreptitious backdating of stock options. Options give their recipient the right to buy a stock at a fixed price, and typically allow the recipient to profit if the market value of the stock rises from the day the option was granted. But it turns out many companies cheated by pretending that their options were granted on earlier dates, when the stock price was much lower, a practice that gives an instant paper profit for the grant recipients.

Backdating is illegal if not properly disclosed to shareholders. It also can cause serious accounting and tax problems for companies and executives. To date, five former executives have been charged with criminal fraud violations in connection with the practice, including the three at Comverse.

The government began to cast its eye on the timing of option grants more than three years ago, when the SEC's then-enforcement director, Stephen Cutler, read a news account suggesting that executives had issued grants just prior to the release of favorable news that caused a jump in their company's share prices.

SEC officials gradually began to suspect that something more nefarious was going on. A small number of academic researchers also were suggesting that backdating might explain the happy timing of many grants. An SEC unit in Washington began a limited probe, focusing on fewer than a dozen companies. Federal prosecutors in San Francisco also started examining one case, Brocade Communications Systems Inc., assigning a single prosecutor and one FBI agent.

Last March, The Wall Street Journal reported that statistical evidence strongly suggested backdating had taken place at six companies. Among them: UnitedHealth, ACS and Comverse. The Journal article sent the federal probe into high gear, officials say. All the companies got subpoenas. It also sparked unusual territorial skirmishes between rival U.S. Attorney's offices eager to show they were cracking down on the latest corporate scandal.

An initial volley came from federal prosecutors in Brooklyn, N.Y., who moved quickly to subpoena Comverse, which until recently was headquartered in its district. That prompted the office's crosstown rival in Manhattan to follow suit. Some companies ended up receiving subpoenas from more than one U.S. Attorney looking for the same information about options. Eventually, senior Justice Department officials ruled that cases generally would be handled along geographic lines.

Prosecutors in San Francisco were initially miffed that prosecutors in New York were reaching across the country to subpoena Silicon Valley companies. "Our preference here generally is to try and create a cooperative environment with the firm and entity we're looking at so we don't have to start the relationship with grand jury subpoenas," says Kevin Ryan, U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of California, who e didn't directly criticize his counterparts.

DOJ_NMG_0088608

Last spring as waves of companies began to step forward to admit options troubles, Mr. Ryan contemplated his office's response. His thinking crystallized while on a family vacation this summer in southern France. There, he sounded out his father-in-law, James Klingbeil, a prominent San Francisco real-estate investor. While the pair sipped wine under an oak tree, Mr. Klingbeil told his prosecutor son-in-law that the arguments by some companies that backdating was acceptable "didn't pass the smell test," both men recall.

While in France, Mr. Ryan fired off a series of urgent emails to his deputy, Eumi Choi, saying that the office needed to jump on the matter. Soon after, the office formed a special task force of prosecutors and agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, an idea Mr. Ryan says he'd been weighing before the France trip.

Of more than two dozen cases his office is investigating, Mr. Ryan says "15% to 20% have raised serious issues. We're going to really drill down on those." An FBI agents on his task force, Brian Wickham, says that in the case of one company he declined to identify, an executive's calendar showed him to be out of the country when other documents claimed he was at a board meeting.

Nationally, at least nine U.S. Attorneys offices are probing backdating, assisted by agents with the FBI, Internal Revenue Service and the U.S. Postal Service. The SEC, which is taking the lead on most of the investigations, has assigned more than 150 lawyers and accountants to the task.

The scandal also has been a bonanza for law firms and forensic accountants. UnitedHealth's internal probe looked at almost four million documents and included more than 80 interviews of employees and other witnesses. Another company -- Mercury Interactive Corp. -- said the cost of its internal probe amounted to about $70 million.

The internal probes appear to run the gamut from exhaustive efforts to ferret out wrongdoing to more minimal examinations aimed mostly at correcting the mess backdating makes of a company's financial statements, say lawyers involved. Federal officials say they're well aware of the varying levels of depth of the in-house probes. "We critically evaluate the quality of the investigation. We don't just take their word for it," says Walter Ricciardi, a deputy director of enforcement at the SEC.

The SEC launched a computer-tracking system this week to help it keep tabs on lawyers conducting the probes. The idea is to let government investigators share information with each other about how responsive, independent and thorough they believe private lawyers have been, so the government can judge their credibility of their findings.

At Comverse, confessions elicited by outside lawyers from three senior executives sealed their fates. The company had for many years granted options to senior executives that bore unusually beneficial dates, just ahead of sharp increases in the company's stock price. The Journal story in March said the odds of that happening randomly were one in six billion. In March, a special board committee hired Howard Schiffman, a securities lawyer with the Washington, D.C., law firm of Dickstein Shapiro LLP, to head an internal investigation.

Dickstein put eight senior lawyers on the case and brought in AlixPartners, a forensic-accounting firm. Dozens of Dickstein associates were detailed to perform electronic searches through e-mails and other records.

Within days the Dickstein lawyers began summoning senior Comverse executives to the law firm's midtown Manhattan offices for sometimes grueling interviews. The lawyers spent hours with the company's then-chief executive, Kobi Alexander. At one of these sessions, he admitted to having backdated options grants, according to the government's later criminal case against him.

The private lawyers also found a key witness in Fran Rail, a stock-option administrator, who described efforts by the chief financial officer to hide a secret slush fund from the company's outside auditor. Under sharp questioning from the Dickstein lawyers, the executive, David Kreinberg, said he'd been instructed by Mr. Alexander to keep the account secret, according to a person familiar with Mr. Kreinberg's statements. Earlier this week, he pleaded guilty to fraud charges. Ms. Rail couldn't be reached for comment.

The Dickstein lawyers held regular meetings with the SEC to keep the government briefed on their findings. There was a "daily feeding of information -- millions of documents," says one person involved in the probe. This person said that after the Dickstein lawyers interviewed a key witness, the government had the information in "real-time."

The Dickstein probe was still going on in late July, when government investigators grew concerned that Mr. Alexander -- an Israeli citizen and U.S. resident -- would flee the country. Federal prosecutors rushed to file criminal charges before several important witnesses were called for interviews. The criminal charges rested on information from the Dickstein lawyers, including purported confessions from all three senior executives who were charged. The government hadn't yet interviewed any of them.

Mr. Alexander later was arrested in the African country of Namibia, where he is facing extradition proceedings.

--Charles Forelle contributed to this article.

Write to James Bandler at james.bandler@wsj.com3 and Kara Scannell at kara.scannell@wsj.com4

J.P. Morgan Receives SEC Inquiry Related To Bisys (WSJ)

By Tom Lauricella

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. says it received an inquiry from the Securities and Exchange Commission relating to the relationship between Bisys Fund Services Inc. and One Group Funds, which the bank acquired as part of its 2004 purchase of Bank One Corp.

The SEC is investigating a total of 27 mutual funds1 that it says may have accepted kickbacks totaling hundreds of millions of dollars in recent years, according to people familiar with the matter. AmSouth Bancorp of Birmingham, Ala., was the first to acknowledge possible charges last summer. The other 25 firms aren't known. J.P. Morgan acknowledged the inquiry in an interview, but declined to comment further.

The probe stems from a $21.4 million settlement the SEC reached last month with Bisys Fund Services Inc., a unit of Bisys Group Inc., which provides back-office support to financial companies.

In the wake of the settlement, the SEC sent letters to some of the funds in question, asking for details about their relationships with Bisys, as well as asking whether the funds have undertaken internal reviews of the relationship and what sorts of information had been provided to fund board of directors about the Bisys relationship, according to people with knowledge of the letters.

"The SEC has sent a letter to Banc One Investment Advisors Corporation requesting information concerning the provision of administrative services by The One Group Services Company, an affiliate of BISYS Fund Services, Inc.," the firm said in a statement. "We are moving quickly to thoroughly review the historical records in order to respond to the SEC inquiry."

At the heart of the investigation is whether fund companies accepted kickbacks from Bisys in exchange for recommending the extension of Bisys' contracts to do routine back-office work for the funds. According to the SEC settlement, Bisys and other service providers would bill fund shareholders for doing administrative work, such as preparing shareholder reports or filing prospectuses. But unbeknownst to fund investors or even independent board members, the service providers agreed to rebate a portion of that money to fund advisers, the SEC says.

The advisers then used the shareholder money to cover their marketing expenses, instead of covering the costs out of their own pockets. The SEC didn't name the 27 companies it is investigating. However, AmSouth Bancorp said last summer that the SEC had informed the bank it intended to bring civil charges against it related to its relationship with Bisys. AmSouth says it has been cooperating with the agency.

One Group Services Co., served as the administrator for One Group Funds from December 1995 through October 2000, J.P. Morgan said. At that point Bank One assumed the role of administrator for One Group Funds. J.P. Morgan mutual funds currently have $230 billion under management.

Write to Tom Lauricella at tom.lauricella@wsj.com2

Corporate Crime Sanjay Kumar Awaits His Sentence (WSJ)

By William M. Bulkeley

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

As one of the last chief executives to face sentencing for crimes committed in the stock-market-bubble era, Sanjay Kumar, who orchestrated a $2.2 billion accounting fraud as CEO of Computer Associates International Inc., goes before a federal judge in Brooklyn on Thursday -- the same day his former company reports second-quarter earnings.

Mr. Kumar, 44 years old, who resigned his job in 2004, pleaded guilty to eight counts of securities fraud and obstruction of justice in April. At the end of many quarterly financial periods in the 1990s and 2000, Mr. Kumar helped sign and backdate contracts for big sales of corporate software in order to book the revenue and meet quarterly earnings projections in what prosecutors called "35-day months." Once the Securities and Exchange Commission started investigating, Mr. Kumar lied to government agents and sent the corporate general counsel to Hawaii to bribe a potentially hostile witness, according to evidence filed in the case.

U.S. District Judge I. Leo Glasser has broad discretion in sentencing. Two lawyers who have followed the case, but declined to be identified, said they think the most likely term would be eight to 12 years. However, if Judge Glasser orders sequential sentencing on each charge the term could be 90 years. Eric Komitee, deputy chief of business and securities fraud in the U.S. attorney's office in Brooklyn, declined to comment on what sentence the government recommended. Mr. Kumar's lawyer, Jack Cooney, declined to comment.

The likely jail sentence puts a sad end to the meteoric career of Mr. Kumar, who grew up in poverty after his family emigrated from Sri Lanka, and worked his way up to the lofty position and a $300 million stock award in 1999.

DOJ_NMG_0088610

But the sentencing hasn't been the end of CA's problems. Since Mr. Kumar resigned in 2004, a few months before he was indicted, the company has changed its name to CA Inc., paid the SEC $225 million in fines and replaced most of its top executives, while operating under the oversight of a government-appointed examiner.

CA has yet to prove it was the money-spinner the company purported to be when it was inflating its earnings. Even with new management, led by John Swainson, a longtime software executive at International Business Machines Corp., it has continued to announce new restatements of financial results and weaknesses in internal controls.

When it reports earnings for the second quarter ended Sept. 30, investors will be watching for signs of revenue growth from CA's older products, since most recent growth has come from acquisitions. Last summer, the stock fell below $20 a share for the first time in three years as investors fretted about slow growth and continuing management turnover and accounting problems. The stock has bounced back to more than $24 recently following an August announcement of a $2 billion stock buyback funded by debt, and the company plans to cut its 16,000-person work force by 11%.

Sinking Big Fish In Fraud Aids Small Fry (AP-YBIZ)

By Marcy Gordon, Ap Business Writer

AP, October 28, 2006

The Week's Business: Helping Government Land Biggest Corporate Fish Pays Off for Smaller Fry

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Helping the government land the biggest fish has been paying off for the slightly smaller fry in the prosecution of high-profile corporate fraud by way of a yawning gap in their prison sentences.

Jeffrey Skilling, Enron Corp.'s former chief executive who became an embodiment of corporate corruption, was handed a 24-year-plus sentence on Monday. That was the toughest penalty by far in the catastrophic collapse of the energy giant. Skilling's one-time protege at the company, finance chief Andrew Fastow -- architect of the complex web of off-the-books partnerships that hid some $1 billion in debt -- received a six-year jail term in September after cooperating with the prosecutors and helping them secure Skilling's conviction.

The judge said Fastow deserved leniency because of his "exceptional" cooperation with the government.

"The lesson that comes out of the Enron sentences is that if ultimately you're facing criminal charges, it's fine to be high up in the company. Just don't be at the very top," said Robert Mintz, a former federal prosecutor who heads the white-collar defense practice at McCarter & English in Newark, N.J.

Prosecutors like to work from the bottom up, so for CEOs caught up in scandals, he said, "There's nowhere to turn in the event of an indictment."

Washed ashore by the wave of corporate scandals in recent years have been executive flippers who have cut deals, turning against and talking about their bosses who have taken their chances at trial. Chief executives are far more likely to go to trial, partly because of ego, the conviction they did nothing wrong, or because prosecutors are far less willing to cut a deal.

Another prominent pair, fallen WorldCom Inc. chief executive Bernard Ebbers and Scott Sullivan, the former chief financial officer, present a clear parallel. Ebbers got a 25-year sentence for orchestrating the audacious $11 billion accounting fraud that toppled the company he built from a tiny long-distance phone company into an industry titan. Sullivan, who admitted to providing investors unduly optimistic financial reports and agreed to testify against Ebbers, got five years.

It hasn't always worked out that way, though. A stunning exception came in June 2005, when Richard Scrushy, the flamboyant founder and former chief executive of HealthSouth Corp., was acquitted of all charges -- after five of his former CFOs took the stand and implicated him. It was a stinging setback for the Justice Department prosecutors, whose case against Scrushy had widely been considered among the strongest in the pack of indictments arising from the 2002 corporate scandals.

Scrushy faced what amounted to a life sentence and could have been ordered to forfeit some $278 million in assets if convicted. Seven other HealthSouth defendants -- including four of the former finance chiefs -- got prison terms.

What lessons executives take from the last round of corporate scandals may soon come into view as prosecutors sort out the financial scandal du jour: the suspicious timing of stock options grants to executives at companies around the nation. The former finance chief of Comverse Technology Inc. pleaded guilty Tuesday to conspiring with ex-chief executive Jacob "Kobi" Alexander to backdate stock options and falsify financial statements of the voicemail software maker to pocket millions of dollars and conceal the fraud from shareholders.

David Kreinberg agreed to cooperate in the case against Alexander, who has been the target of an international manhunt. After allegedly transferring $57 million overseas, Alexander was located last month in Namibia in southwest Africa, where he was briefly detained before being freed on bail pending a ruling on an extradition request by U.S. authorities.

Kreinberg faces up to 15 years in prison and could be ordered to pay tens of millions of dollars in restitution. It was not clear what penalties could be imposed on Alexander if he were convicted, though he faces similar charges.

DOJ_NMG_0088611

To date in the options granting scandal, at least 149 public companies have disclosed Justice Department, Securities and Exchange Commission or internal investigations of their option awards, according to an Associated Press review.

Rolling the dice on a trial can be risky for CEOs in cases where underlings have turned against them.

"There's no alibi defense" in white-collar cases, notes Peter Henning, a professor at Wayne State University Law School in Detroit. "They're cases about intent."

That means executive defendants can be convinced that they did nothing wrong -- potentially fueling a lack of contrition that can hurt them at trial. Company employees a few rungs down can provide some clues into what was in the CEO's mind, Henning said. And, without an alibi or DNA evidence as you would have in a trial of a violent crime, if jurors believe an executive is involved he may well be found guilty and sent to jail.

Besides the "cooperation discount" for executives who help the government convict a former colleague, there's also a "lack-of-contrition multiplier" that can increase a defendant's sentence, said Henning.

At his sentencing this week, Skilling stood before the judge and said that in terms of contrition and remorse, "... I can't imagine more remorse."

But he stuck to his story. He didn't commit fraud and conspiracy, he said, didn't use shady deals and accounting tricks that contributed to Enron's collapse into bankruptcy, and wasn't responsible for the loss of thousands of jobs, more than $60 billion in the value of Enron stock and over $2 billion in employee pension plans.

"I'm innocent of every one of these charges," Skilling declared.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Official In Abramoff Case Sentenced To 18 Months (WP)

By Susan Schmidt, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

A federal judge yesterday sentenced David H. Safavian, a former top Bush administration official, to 18 months in prison for lying and concealing unethical dealings with lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

During an unusual hearing that lasted much of the day, U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman wrestled with how to mete out justice to Safavian. He said Safavian was a man who had "pulled himself up by his bootstraps" and had been "a very good person to a lot of people." But, the judge said, Safavian also committed "an abuse of the public trust" in his relationship with the lobbyist.

"Did he believe in public service? I guess he did," Friedman said. "But he also wanted someday to join Mr. Abramoff in that lucrative lobbying business."

Friedman lamented that Washington has become "more and more corrupt," increasingly a home to greedy lobbyists and politicians on the take.

Safavian, 39, a former chief of staff for the General Services Administration, wept as he told Friedman that he knows now he never should have given Abramoff inside information about government-owned real estate that the lobbyist wanted to acquire. At the time, Safavian said, he thought what he was doing was innocuous. "I didn't see anything wrong in helping Jack," he said.

The 18-month jail sentence was about halfway between the 30 to 36 months sought by government prosecutors and the defense's proposal for alternative sentencing that would avoid any prison time at all.

Barbara Van Gelder, Safavian's attorney, urged leniency, telling Friedman that Safavian exhibited an ethical "blind spot" in his dealings with the brazen and flashy Abramoff. "He may have been blinded, dazzled," she said, but his wrongdoing with Abramoff was "isolated, not a man beginning a life of crime."

But prosecutor Peter Zeidenberg asked the judge to add a perjury conviction to Safavian's crimes for his testimony at trial. "For the two days he spent on the witness stand, Mr. Safavian lied about virtually everything," Zeidenberg said. "He testified under oath that he never lied, never concealed. . . . He even went on to say, 'I never gave Jack Abramoff favorable treatment,' " statements the jury rejected in its verdict.

Friedman said he did find some of Safavian's statements from the witness stand "incredible," including the defendant's claim that he believed his payment of $3,100 would cover the cost of a week-long luxury golfing excursion to Scotland with Abramoff. But in the end, the judge decided against the prosecutor's request for a perjury conviction.

Safavian was a lobbyist and congressional aide until 2002, when he joined the GSA, the agency that oversees the purchase and leasing of billions of dollars in federal property around the country. He later became the government's top procurement officer at the Office of Management and Budget.

DOJ_NMG_0088612

He was convicted in June of concealing facts about the 2002 golf trip as well as the help he gave to Abramoff, a longtime friend, in trying to acquire two GSA-controlled properties -- one of them the Old Post Office building on Pennsylvania Avenue.

The jury found him guilty of lying to the GSA inspector general and obstructing an inquiry by that office, as well as lying to the Senate Indian Affairs Committee and to a GSA ethics officer.

Trial evidence included stacks of e-mails showing that Safavian secretly maneuvered within the GSA to obtain information for Abramoff about properties he wanted to buy or lease. The two schemed to get members of Congress to pressure the agency for the information.

Friedman said he had received 50 to 60 letters from people attesting to Safavian's good qualities, including one from his former boss Clay Johnson, the OMB's deputy director for management, from friends on Capitol Hill and from his pastor. A letter also came from his sister, who testified tearfully on his behalf yesterday. Her brother, she said, "didn't tell anyone" he was in trouble until his arrest. "He called me at work, sobbing and sobbing. He said, 'I'm so sorry for embarrassing you,' " Mehnaz Safavian said.

Safavian's lawyers said their client will appeal the conviction. Safavian is one of eight people convicted so far in the wide-ranging influence-peddling investigation into Abramoff's lobbying activities on Capitol Hill and in executive branch agencies. Earlier this month, Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) became the first lawmaker to plead guilty in the probe. Abramoff and several former congressional aides have pleaded guilty and are cooperating.

One of them, Neil G. Volz, a former Ney aide, went to work with Abramoff, went on the Scotland golf trip and was a central witness in the Safavian trial. Friedman said he was revolted by Volz's testimony that government officials prepared sworn declarations about lobbyist-paid trips based on what "would pass the smell test" -- not what was true. "I wanted to go home and take a shower," the judge said.

Safavian Given 18 Months (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Former Bush administration official David Safavian was sentenced to 18 months in federal prison yesterday for concealing his relationship with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Safavian wept as he asked for leniency in his obstruction of justice case, telling a judge that Abramoff manipulated him and drew him into the scandal.

Safavian was convicted in June of lying to investigators about his relationship with the lobbyist while Safavian was chief of staff in the General Services Administration. He helped provide Abramoff with details about GSA projects and offered advice on dealing with the agency.

During his sentencing, Safavian apologized for giving the appearance of impropriety but said it was not fraudulent.

"Yes, Jack Abramoff was a friend, but he wasn't my co-conspirator and I wasn't his," Safavian said. "There was no conspiracy to defraud anyone, least of all the taxpayers."

Early in the hearing, U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman told defense attorneys he was leaning toward a sentence of 15 to 21 months in prison and was not convinced Safavian had accepted responsibility for his crimes.

"Get up here and tell me, 'I agree I concealed. I agree I obstructed justice,' " Judge Friedman said. "I don't believe he's done that."

Abramoff is cooperating with an FBI corruption investigation into Congress and the White House. He has admitted using gifts to influence lawmakers.

The investigation snared its first congressman this month when Rep. Bob Ney, Ohio Republican, pleaded guilty to covering up expensive gifts and trips from Abramoff. He admitted taking trips, tickets, meals and campaign donations from Abramoff in return for official actions on behalf of his clients.

Two former aides to Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader, have also pleaded guilty, as has Ney's former chief of staff.

Additionally, Roger Stillwell, a former Interior Department official, pleaded guilty in August to a misdemeanor charge for not reporting tickets he received from Abramoff.

Jail Time For Ex-official In Influence-peddling Case (LAT/AP)

From Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

Former Bush administration official David H. Safavian was sentenced to 18 months in prison Friday for lying and obstructing justice in connection with the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling scandal.

DOJ_NMG_0088613

Safavian, the former chief of staff for the General Services Administration, was sentenced on obstruction and concealment charges for lying to investigators about his relationship with Abramoff, the once-powerful Republican lobbyist.

"There was a time when people came to Washington because they thought government could be helpful to people," said U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman. "People came to Washington asking not what government could do for them and their friends but what they could do for the public."

Safavian wept in court as he asked for leniency, but Friedman said the ex-bureaucrat had become part of Washington's culture of corruption, where congressmen listen to campaign donors and lobbyists while farming out to staff members the job of writing laws.

Abramoff shook Pennsylvania Avenue from the Capitol to the White House when he pleaded guilty to corruption in January and began cooperating with an FBI investigation.

The case has become an election-year liability for Republicans. Last month, Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) pleaded guilty to taking gifts and trips from Abramoff in return for official favors.

Friedman said he believed Safavian was a good person and could not understand why he got involved with Abramoff.

"Maybe it's hard to resist. Maybe it's hanging out with the big boys," Friedman said. "I'm not sure."

Safavian, who also worked in the White House budget office, gave Abramoff details about GSA projects and offered advice on dealing with the agency. He also accepted a cut-rate golf trip to Scotland aboard a private jet.

"Rather than putting the interest of the public first, he put the interest of Jack Abramoff first," prosecutor Peter R. Zeidenberg said.

Safavian apologized Friday for giving the appearance of impropriety but said it was not fraudulent. He said the lobbyist used and manipulated him and he never meant to hurt anyone.

Safavian argued for no jail time but prosecutors asked for a three-year sentence, saying Safavian lied on the stand. Friedman called Safavian's testimony that he didn't know the value of the Scotland trip and barely read an ethics opinion "incredible" and "hard to believe" but said it wasn't perjury.

Ex-procurement Chief Gets 18 Months In Prison (GOVEXEC)

By Jenny Mandel

Government Executive, October 28, 2006

Former federal procurement chief David Safavian was sentenced on Friday to 18 months in prison for lying and obstructing investigations into his dealings with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Safavian was convicted in June on four of five charges of lying to General Services Administration and Senate officials about his interactions with Abramoff while serving as the chief of staff at GSA, and obstructing a GSA inspector general investigation.

The 18-month sentence fell halfway between the defense's recommendation that he serve between zero and 12 months, and a Justice Department recommendation for 30 to 37 months. D.C. District Judge Paul Friedman also declined to impose a fine along with prison time, based on a pre-sentencing report that found Safavian's finances ruined by legal fees.

"I think since Mr. Safavian is going to serve some time in prison, to impose a fine is punishing Mrs. Safavian and perhaps other relatives," Friedman said.

The sentencing was complicated by questions of what guidelines should apply to each of the counts and potential adjustments to the term. Peter Zeidenberg, the lead prosecuting attorney, argued that the sentence should be extended because Safavian perjured himself while testifying during his trial. Defense attorney Barbara Van Gelder argued that the sentence should be shortened because her client accepted responsibility for his actions.

Friedman rejected the government's argument for a longer sentence. He conceded that "it was hard to believe some of what Mr. Safavian said" during the trial, such as his statement that he had not stopped to question the inordinately low costs that Abramoff quoted to him for a lavish trip to play golf in Scotland. But Friedman said there was gray area in the subjectivity of testimony centering on what Safavian believed, which separated the case from ones in which defendants had clearly lied about basic, objective facts of the case.

Friedman also rejected Van Gelder's argument for a lighter sentence, saying Safavian showed no sign of accepting responsibility for his crimes.

"My words cannot express how sorry I am for the actions at trial here," Safavian told the judge in an appeal for leniency. "I now see that there were appearance [of conflict of interest] issues with some of those actions...I brought notoriety to a good agency, and that makes me sad."

But Friedman said Safavian's statement, his trial testimony and his defense lawyer's briefings all reflected that he continued to consider his conduct itself innocent, viewing the problem as one of others' interpretation of his actions.

Friedman showed the most sympathy at the many appeals made by Safavian's friends and family, and he condemned attacks on Safavian's wife, Jennifer, who works as an aide to Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va.

The judge said he read each of the 50 to 60 letters submitted as character references by Safavian's friends, former colleagues, former subordinates, a fellow police department volunteer, and his grandmother, among others, and he found the universally positive accounts compelling. Safavian's sister also stood before the judge to plead for leniency on her brother's behalf; he cried as she said the convictions did not reflect who her brother really was.

But Friedman ultimately concluded that despite the many accounts of Safavian's upstanding morals, the facts did not merit a lighter sentence. "Mr. Safavian wasn't duped, he isn't naïve, he's smart," Friedman said during a lengthy discussion of his reasoning. "Did he believe in public service? I guess he did. But he also talked about one day wanting to join Mr. Abramoff -- join that lucrative lobbying business."

Linking Safavian's case to the corruption cases that have recently swamped Washington, Friedman said the city has become increasingly corrupt over the years.

"There was a time when people came to Washington asking not what they could do for themselves and their friends, but what they could do for the public," he said.

Safavian plans to request assignment to a prison in Cumberland, Maryland. He also intends to appeal his conviction, and his lawyer said she will argue that he be allowed to remain free on bond until the appeal is decided.

Man Linked To Abramoff Is Sentenced To 18 Months (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 27 — A former White House budget official who became entangled in the criminal investigation of the lobbyist Jack Abramoff was sentenced on Friday to 18 months in prison for lying about his relationship to Mr. Abramoff.

The former official, David H. Safavian, wept as he pleaded for leniency from Judge Paul L. Friedman in Federal District Court here. The judge used the sentencing hearing to speak out against what he said was a growing culture of corruption in Washington encouraged by high-priced lobbyists.

“He came to work in an environment that has become, frankly, more and more corrupt,” Judge Friedman said in announcing Mr. Safavian’s sentence, which was half of the three-year prison term sought by the Justice Department.

“It’s become corrupted by money,” Judge Friedman added. “You’ve literally got lobbyists sitting in Congressional offices writing legislation. That’s what’s going on.”

Mr. Safavian’s crimes, he said, were a “classic case of abuse of the public’s trust.”

Mr. Safavian was convicted in June of lying to federal investigators about Mr. Abramoff and the circumstances of his decision to join the lobbyist on a golfing trip to Scotland by private jet in 2002.

Mr. Safavian, a lobbying partner of Mr. Abramoff before joining the Bush administration, accepted an invitation for the trip after telling government ethics officers — falsely, the trial determined — that he faced no conflict of interest because Mr. Abramoff did no business with the executive branch.

In fact, the trial showed, Mr. Safavian had offered his services to Mr. Abramoff at the time as a middleman in acquiring government lands that were controlled by the General Services Administration, where Mr. Safavian had been chief of staff.

Mr. Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to charges of conspiring to corrupt public officials, including Mr. Safavian and Representative Bob Ney, Republican of Ohio, who became the first member of Congress to confess to crimes in the influence-peddling inquiry. Mr. Ney pleaded guilty this month to accepting a long list of illegal gifts from the lobbyist in exchange for official acts.

Mr. Safavian, who resigned in December as head of federal procurement policies at the White House budget office, was the first person to go to trial in the investigation and, even Friday, did not concede that he had lied to investigators or obstructed justice, the crimes for which he was convicted.

Choking back tears, he stood before Judge Friedman and insisted that while his actions might have created the appearance of impropriety, “there was no conspiracy to defraud anybody, least of all taxpayers.” He said that while “Jack Abramoff was my friend, he wasn’t my co-conspirator and I wasn’t his.”

“My words cannot express how sorry I am,” Mr. Safavian said.

“I brought notoriety to a good agency, and that makes me sick,” he said, referring to the General Services Administration, which acts as the federal government’s property manager. “I shouldn’t have given Jack Abramoff any information about the agency, no matter how innocuous it seemed.”

Ethics Report On Foley Not Expected Before Elections (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0088615

By Jonathan Weisman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

The House ethics committee has all but wrapped up the investigative phase of its probe into the actions of former representative Mark Foley, informing key witnesses that they will not be summoned back for more questioning, lawyers in the case said yesterday.

But those lawyers indicated that the committee is unlikely to release its report on the Florida Republican -- or even an interim memo -- before the Nov. 7 elections.

The quick pace of the investigation had raised hopes among some Democrats that the committee could release its findings in the coming days, fulfilling a pledge from the committee's top Democrat, Rep. Howard L. Berman (Calif.), that the probe would be wrapped up in "weeks, not months."

The political shock of Foley's sexually explicit instant-message exchanges with former House pages has faded, but questions remain about what senior House GOP leaders knew of Foley's behavior and when they knew it. A committee report could have resurrected Democratic charges of a coverup, some Democrats hoped.

But with many hours of testimony to transcribe into thousands of pages of evidence, it is unrealistic to expect that even an interim memo can be released next week, said Timothy J. Heaphy, the attorney for Foley's former chief of staff, Kirk Fordham.

The task of sifting through evidence and reaching conclusions appears to be at hand. Aides for the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, as the ethics committee is formally known, told Heaphy that Fordham was free to leave the country yesterday on vacation. Lawyers close to the probe said another pivotal witness, former House clerk Jeff Trandahl, will not be called back for follow-up questions.

The committee has also taken testimony from House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and his top staff; House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio); National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.); Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.), whose former page apparently first brought Foley's e-mails to the attention of the House leadership; Rep. John M. Shimkus (R-Ill.), who chairs the page board; and several other Republican aides.

The most glaring hole in the testimony is the apparent decision not to call Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.), who was aware of inappropriate e-mails from Foley to a page as far back as 2000 and whose conduct with former pages has also drawn scrutiny. Korenna Cline, a Kolbe spokeswoman, said the ethics committee has had no contact with the congressman or his staff. Ethics committee staff members would not comment on the course of the investigation but gave no indication that all investigative matters were closed.

Still, the committee has generally garnered praise for the diligence its members have shown. This week's appearance by Hastert was expected to be short and perfunctory. Instead, Hastert remained behind closed doors for nearly three hours with the committee's staff and the four members conducting the Foley probe. Questioning of Hastert's chief counsel, Ted Van Der Meid, stretched on for more than six hours and ended past midnight. Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, spent a similarly grueling stretch with the committee.

One witness said questions dwelled on meetings between Republican leadership aides, Foley and Foley's staff, and Trandahl.

Outside the committee room, House Republicans, including Hastert, have repeatedly suggested that Democrats should also be scrutinized to determine whether they were aware of Foley's sexually explicit instant messages and leaked them to the news media. But those messages were revealed by former pages only after ABC News published inappropriate but not sexual e-mails, and the committee has not pursued the matter, the witness said.

The Republican members of the investigative panel -- committee Chairman Doc Hastings (Wash.) and Rep. Judy Biggert (Ill.) -- did not dwell on the origins of the e-mails or on the leaks. Likewise, the Democratic members, Berman and Rep. Stephanie Tubbs Jones (Ohio), did not press their party's charges that the Republicans covered up Foley's actions to protect his House seat.

"I did not get the sense that anyone was acting in a partisan way," Heaphy said, stressing that he could not divulge the specific questions asked. "They were pretty much acting as investigators. I was impressed at the level of preparation and insight they showed."

That is a far cry from the dysfunctional committee that has done virtually nothing since February 2005, when GOP leaders ousted the panel's independent-minded chairman, Rep. Joel Hefley (R-Colo.), and replaced him with Hastings, who is considered closer to the Republican leadership.

James Dyer, a former senior House Republican aide now with the lobbying firm Clark & Weinstock, said the Foley matter has shown Republican leaders that they need a strong, credible ethics committee that can take up internal scandals and show the public that House members take such matters seriously.

"If there is a silver lining in all this, it's the re-emergence of a strong ethics committee," Dyer said.

DOJ_NMG_0088616

When the page scandal broke Sept. 29, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) called for the committee to deliver a preliminary report to the House within 10 days. That goal is long past, but Pelosi has not publicly pressured the committee to move faster.

"The ethics committee seems to be conducting its investigation rapidly," said Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider. "We'll see how the next phase goes."

Levine Enters Guilty Plea (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen, Matt O'connor And Ray Long, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, October 28, 2006

2 governor allies aided scheme, U.S. says

Political insider Stuart Levine pleaded guilty Friday to scheming to squeeze millions of dollars from firms seeking state business, and authorities alleged in the clearest detail yet that he had the help of Gov. Rod Blagojevich's top campaign supporters.

The new allegations in the plea agreement of Levine, a longtime Republican fundraiser reappointed to state boards by the Democratic governor, only increased the questions about corruption swirling around the race for governor with little more than a week until the Nov. 7 election.

In the 58-page plea agreement, federal authorities spell out allegations that Blagojevich's two top fundraisers schemed almost from the beginning of the governor's administration to use their newfound influence for corrupt purposes.

The plea agreement identifies Antoin "Tony" Rezko, who has already been indicted on federal corruption charges, as one of those close advisers. The other fundraiser, who is not charged, is identified only as "Individual B." Sources identify him as Christopher Kelly, a south suburban roofing contractor who became a loyal Blagojevich confidant.

Following a fundraiser Friday night, Blagojevich said Levine's plea shows he began his misdeeds before Blagojevich became governor.

"It's my understanding the guilty pleas extend back to acts of wrongdoing that began as early as 2000 or 2001, and my sense of the guilty pleas is that it was a continuation of all of that that spilled over from one administration to the next," he said.

The campaign of Blagojevich's Republican challenger, Judy Baar Topinka, tried Friday to use Levine's guilty plea to tarnish the governor.

Topinka's running mate, Joe Birkett, noted that the plea agreement by Levine--who was a member of the state teachers pension board and state hospital construction board--tied Blagojevich's top two fundraisers to the alleged corruption scheme.

"Rod Blagojevich needs to explain to the voters why his top two fundraisers were knee-deep in corruption in this massive corruption scheme," Birkett said. "It's crystal clear that `Individual B,' Chris Kelly, was in fact part of the shakedown scheme."

Jon Bauman, executive director of the Teachers' Retirement System, confirmed that Kelly is "Individual B," based on his conversations with Levine and subsequent interviews with federal officials. Sources close to the investigation have corroborated the identification.

Kelly's attorney, Michael Monico, said his client denies any wrongdoing. Kelly has not been charged.

"To the extent the plea agreement by inference or innuendo accuses Chris of any wrongdoing, we categorically deny that," Monico said Friday evening.

The plea agreement alleges that Rezko and Kelly used Levine to play politics at the state pension board, along with two stalwarts of the old-guard Republican establishment in Springfield. Although neither was directly named, they are businessman William Cellini and lobbyist Robert Kjellander, now the treasurer of the Republican National Committee. Neither Cellini nor Kjellander is charged with a crime.

In his agreement, Levine places himself at the center of a plan to enrich himself, Rezko and their associates, and raise campaign cash through a series of secret, crooked deals involving firms trying to do business with the state's Teachers' Retirement System.

Prosecutors detailed Levine's efforts to solicit kickbacks of millions of dollars from nine investment firms seeking contracts with TRS, and in one case, a $1.5 million political contribution for a public official identified as Blagojevich by sources close to the investigation.

Levine pleaded guilty to one count each of mail fraud and money laundering in exchange for a sentence of about 5 1/2 years in prison and his continued cooperation in ongoing investigations of state government. If not for his cooperation, Levine faced life imprisonment, his lawyer said.

Levine's lawyer, Jeffrey Steinback, said the scope of the corruption was extensive, estimating that Levine and others schemed to steal as much as $20 million to $50 million in government and private funds.

Steinback said he expects Levine's cooperation to extend to testifying at trials and could take two years to complete.

"He is cooperating fully with the government in some very sensitive, ongoing investigations," Steinback said. "I know the government regards him as very important."

The plea agreement disclosed that Levine was reappointed to the Health Facilities Planning Board with the intervention of "Individual A"--previously identified by the Tribune as William Cellini, the Springfield power broker and Blagojevich supporter.

Neither Cellini, who has not been charged, nor his lawyer returned calls Friday seeking comment on the case.

The agreement lays out webs of connections between Levine and other power brokers.

In one key attempted deal in 2004, prosecutors allege Levine learned that the TRS staff was going to recommend that the board approve a $220 million investment with Capri Capital Advisers.

In April 2004, the agreement states, Rezko and Levine arranged to hold up the deal unless real estate investor and Capri co-chairman Thomas Rosenberg, also a Hollywood producer, paid about $2 million in fees to a consultant they chose. In lieu of that, Rosenberg--identified as "Individual J" in the agreement--could make a $1.5 million political contribution "to a certain public official."

Sources have said the money was to go to Blagojevich's campaign fund.

Rosenberg, however, refused to participate in the scheme. Days later, according to the plea agreement, Levine, Rezko, Cellini and Kelly agreed it was too risky to continue demanding money from Rosenberg's firm. The four agreed that while Rosenberg's firm would receive the $220 million allocation from TRS, it would not receive any more business from the state, the plea said.

Kelly, who once headed the governor's campaign fund, is one of Blagojevich's closest confidants, fundraisers and advisers. Kelly befriended Blagojevich years ago and the two remain close, with Kelly playing a significant role in the governor's re-election campaign.

The plea agreement demonstrates the influence the men had over the boards in question when it describes 2003 discussions surrounding the possible merging of TRS with two other state funds. Cellini approached Rezko and Kelly about defeating that plan, the agreement states, though the names of Cellini and Kelly are not used.

With Cellini's intervention, Rezko and Kelly used their influence with senior state officials to oppose a proposed consolidation of state pension funds to halt any chance of Levine losing his pivotal board post, the plea agreement said.

In return, Levine alleged, he agreed to help ensure the Teachers' Retirement System selected investment firms and lawyers favored by Rezko and Kelly.

The plea agreement also referenced Kjellander, though he is not named.

Based on matching the federal records with minutes of the Teachers' Retirement System, Bauman confirmed that Kjellander was "Individual K."

The agreement says that in early 2002, before Blagojevich was elected, Kjellander asked for help from Levine in getting business for an investment firm. The agreement alleges Levine knew Kjellander would receive a finder's fee in the deal.

Kjellander has maintained in prior interviews that all of his dealings were aboveboard. Kjellander has not been charged with wrongdoing. He could not be reached for comment.

Governor's Campaign Donor Pleads Guilty In Kickback Case (CHIT/AP)

By Mike Robinson, Ap Legal Affairs Writer

Chicago Tribune, October 28, 2006

CHICAGO -- A businessman who funneled thousands of dollars into Gov. Rod Blagojevich's campaign pleaded guilty Friday to using his seats on two state boards in a bid to collect millions of dollars in kickbacks.

Disappointing Republicans, though, Stuart Levine's 58-page plea agreement with federal prosecutors contained no allegations of wrongdoing on the part of the Democratic governor, who is waging a re-election campaign while coping with a federal corruption investigation.

All the same, the massive document was crammed with details of corruption in state government and guaranteed to fuel campaign fireworks.

Levine told how he worked closely with Blagojevich fundraiser Antoin "Tony" Rezko, now also facing federal charges, and that Rezko and others close to the governor provided him with a high degree of political clout.

Levine admitted that he and Rezko planned to demand a $2 million payoff or $1.5 million in campaign contributions to "a certain state official" from a firm that wanted to invest $220 million in pension funds.

The official was Blagojevich, according to an individual familiar with the case who spoke only on condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing. But the money never was paid.

Blagojevich issued a statement saying the plea agreement "reveals a pattern of wrongdoing by Stuart Levine that betrayed the trust of Gov. (Jim) Edgar who first appointed him and to all of us here in Illinois."

DOJ_NMG_0088618

Levine, 60, a suburban Highland Park millionaire, has been cooperating with federal investigators for more than six months in hopes of getting a break that would whittle down the time he will have to spend behind bars.

Under a deal worked out by defense attorney Jeffrey B. Steinback, Levine pleaded guilty to one count of mail fraud and one of money laundering. He is facing a sentence of five years and seven months, about half of the bottom end of the sentencing range under federal guidelines.

Prosecutors were expected to drop 22 other counts that could have sent Levine to prison for life had he been convicted on all of them.

"Stuart was a very legitimate, hardworking and successful businessman before he got involved with all these boards and illegal business, but you can become intoxicated with the ether of power, the ether of money and the opportunity for more," Steinback told reporters.

In his plea agreement, Levine acknowledged participating in a scheme to defraud the beneficiaries of the Teachers Retirement System, which pays the pensions of downstate and suburban Chicago teachers.

Prosecutors maintain that Levine, Rezko and others schemed to get at least $20 million and perhaps as much a $50 million in assorted kickbacks.

U.S. District Judge Amy J. St. Eve agreed to postpone the sentencing until the investigation is closed and Levine has testified, if need be, against any other defendants.

Levine admitted that the plotters sought to force nine investment firms seeking business from the state Teachers Retirement System to pay millions of dollars in kickbacks through consultants. In two cases, the scheme was hatched before Blagojevich became governor, the document said.

Levine was appointed to his seat on the Teachers Retirement System board in October 2000 by then Gov. George Ryan, now preparing to start his own 6{-year racketeering sentence.

Blagojevich in 2003 named him to a fresh term on the board that places billions of dollars in pension money with investment companies.

The fees that such firms charge can be highly lucrative.

Levine said in his plea agreement that he found out he would be reappointed to the Teachers Retirement System board at a meeting in Rezko's office with another of the governor's fundraisers also on hand.

Rezko is facing wire fraud, mail fraud and other charges as part of the alleged scheme to pressure investment companies and others to pay kickbacks in exchange for getting money to invest for the pension fund.

When named to the pension board, Levine already had been named by former Gov. Jim Edgar to the Illinois Health Facilities Planning Board, whose decisions also involve big money. Hospitals are unable to raise the money they need for expansion projects without approval from the board.

Levine admitted that he used his position as a member of that board to pressure hospitals in a kickback plot. He admitted pressuring Edward Hospital in Naperville and Mercy Hospital when it sought to build an expansion project in Crystal Lake.

He also confirmed charges in the indictment that as a member of the board of Chicago Medical College, now known as Rosalind Franklin University of Medicine and Science, he awarded two contracts to construction magnate Jacob Kiferbaum in exchange for kickbacks of nearly $1 million on each project, paid through inflated bills from Kiferbaum.

Levine has been one of the most prolific campaign contributors in state politics, reserving most of his generosity for Republican candidates. But he switched allegiances and backed Blagojevich.

State records show he gave some $65,000, much in in-kind contributions such as airplane tickets, to the governor's 2002 campaign.

Supporters of Republican Judy Baar Topinka for governor had hoped for weeks that Levine's plea agreement when it finally came would hand Blagojevich such a black eye that Topinka would take over as frontrunner.

But many of the details had been aired in earlier court papers.

AP Writer Sophia Tareen contributed reporting for this story.

4 Men Found Guilty In Airport Fraud (HSB)

By Debra Barayuga

Honolulu Star-Bulletin, October 26, 2006

Two airport officials and two contractors defrauded the state of millions of dollars

A federal jury convicted two former airport officials and two contractors of conspiracy and mail fraud yesterday in a bid-rigging scheme at Honolulu Airport.

DOJ_NMG_0088619

The jury deliberated for just more than six hours to unanimously find Dennis Hirokawa, 64, former superintendent of airport maintenance; Richard Okada, 65, former director of the Visitor Information Program; and contractors Michael Furukawa, 60, and Wes Uemura, 61, guilty of conspiracy.

In addition, Hirokawa was found guilty of 17 counts of mail fraud; Furukawa, 19 counts; and Uemura, 15 counts.

All four defendants were stoic as the court clerk read the guilty verdicts. Relatives in the audience dabbed at their eyes and wept in the courtroom.

Each of the defendants faces five years' imprisonment on the conspiracy count and five years on each of the mail fraud counts when sentenced Jan. 15. U.S. District Judge David Ezra agreed to allow the men to remain free on bail.

U.S. attorney Larry Tong and state Deputy Attorney General Larry Goya prosecuted the case. The four men were "engaged in an elaborate scheme to abuse the public contracting process and caused economic damage to taxpayers," Tong said.

The environment of "pay to play" that the defendants subscribed to "caused a loss of faith in the integrity of state government that can't be measured in dollars and cents," he said.

Dana Ishibashi, attorney for Okada, said only that they were disappointed and will be exploring their options, including whether to appeal.

Defense attorney Howard Luke declined comment.

The verdict brings to an end a joint federal-state investigation that began more than six years ago by the state Attorney General after airport auditors learned the state was billed $14,000 for constructing four 6-foot-long plywood planter boxes to hold poinsettias during the holidays.

Prosecutors alleged that the four conspired from 1997 to 2002 to obtain $4.8 million in small-purchase contracts under $25,000, a less formal process that requires that three bids be submitted and the work awarded to the lowest bid.

The contracts were mostly awarded to six companies owned by Furukawa and Uemura, prosecutors said. A government expert who reviewed 171 of the jobs that paid contractors $1.4 million valued the work as worth only $380,000.

Tong said he is expects to ask the court to order the defendants to repay $2.5 million.

A civil proceeding is also under way in state court seeking to forfeit property owned by the defendants.

Charles Goodwin, special agent in charge of the FBI here, said he hopes the convictions serve as a deterrent. "And as time goes by and we pursue more and more corruption, more and more people will step forward because they see the government serious about taking it on at the state and federal level," he said.

Proposed Religion-Based Program For Federal Inmates Is Canceled (NYT)

By Neela Banerjee

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 27 — The Justice Department has canceled its proposal for a religion-based prison rehabilitation program that critics and constitutional law experts contended would have violated the separation of church and state.

On March 31, the department announced that it was seeking proposals for a “single-faith, residential re-entry program” that would be adopted initially in as many as six federal prisons and run in each by an organization of a particular denomination. The proposed program, among others, was challenged in a lawsuit filed on May 4 in the Federal District Court in Madison, Wis., by the Freedom From Religion Foundation, a watchdog group.

By May 26, the department had suspended its request for proposals for the program, and on Thursday it canceled the program “in its entirety,” according to the Web site for the Office of Justice Programs of the federal Bureau of Prisons, a branch of the Justice Department.

A spokeswoman for the office did not return calls seeking comment.

Religion-based rehabilitation programs in prisons have faced several legal challenges. Civil liberties groups say federal money is being used to proselytize inmates, many of whom do not have secular alternatives for rehabilitation.

Proponents of such programs maintain that religion gives inmates a strong moral foundation to help them re-enter society.

In June, a federal judge in Iowa ruled that a state-financed evangelical Christian prison program was unconstitutional because it was “pervasively sectarian.” That case is under appeal.

Robert W. Tuttle, a professor of law at George Washington University, said the proposed single-faith program “was dead in the water” upon introduction. It clearly breached the separation of church and state by financing indoctrination in a particular faith, he said.

The Disillusionment Of A Young White House Evangelical (NYT)

By Samuel G. Freedman

DOJ_NMG_0088620

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

In an election season, how could an "inside story of political seduction," to quote the subtitle of David Kuo's "Tempting Faith," not be mined for every politically explosive example it offers?

And Mr. Kuo, who once wrote speeches for William J. Bennett, Pat Robertson, John Ashcroft, Bob Dole and George W. Bush and who served more than two years as second in command at the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives, offers plenty.

In his tenure at that office, warm words about compassion, he argues, were belied by meager financing and bureaucratic indifference. Federally financed conferences for religious leaders, he says, were adroitly arranged to benefit threatened Republican incumbents. The conservative Christian leadership that was publicly stroked, he reports, was being privately derided by members of the White House staff.

Naturally, those skeptical of the faith-based initiative are saying, "I told you so," and stalwart defenders of the Bush administration are issuing emphatic denials or even suggesting that Mr. Kuo is either Judas or a fresh candidate for the axis of evil.

But though "Tempting Faith" (Free Press) is a story about the Bush presidency, it is even more a story about Mr. Kuo. As much as it is a story about politics, it is also a story about faith.

"I set out to write a spiritual book," Mr. Kuo insists, and "Tempting Faith" turns out to be an engrossing piece of religious autobiography and a revealing, sometimes unnerving window into evangelical Christian culture.

There are painful remembrances, like the half-understood decision he and a girlfriend made to seek an abortion, which permanently bumped him off the path of becoming a standard-issue young liberal; and there are painfully comic ones, like the time he felt compelled by Christian faith to blurt out an apology to Hillary Rodham Clinton for all the ugly anti-Hillary jokes he had been slipping into the speeches he wrote.

There is never any suspense about whether the young Christian, lured to Washington to do good, will resist the corrupting temptation to manipulate his faith for political ends. The book's plot, after all, is a time-honored one: fall and redemption, and then fall and redemption again. It is classic testimony, and even ends with a kind of altar call summoning "we Christians" (he means evangelical Christians) to a two-year fast from all political activities besides voting.

For many readers, the real tension will arise from the question of why this obviously intelligent, alert and devoted young man did not see the train wreck coming. The political shenanigans he chronicles are hardly unprecedented, and he had repeatedly witnessed something less than enthusiasm among Republicans (in fact, among Democrats, too) for helping the needy. If the title were not in use, Mr. Kuo might well have called his book "State of Denial."

In elaborating on his case that conservative Christians, himself included, sold their birthright for a mess of pottage, Mr. Kuo mentions perks like presidential attention and conference calls with Karl Rove, symbolic gestures and promises, mostly unfulfilled, of government financing to do good works and combat evil as one sees it.

Those, of course, are the tools put to work with other groups and by every administration. But in Mr. Kuo's story, are there also not elements specific to evangelical culture at work? Is it too much to see the roots there of Mr. Kuo's startling switch from voting for Michael S. Dukakis and interning in the office of Senator Edward M. Kennedy to opposing gay rights, favoring every manner of tax cut and considering liberals the children of darkness?

"I made a seamless transition to embrace all of these positions," Mr. Kuo writes.

Such quick makeovers are not unknown on the secular left or right. But Mr. Kuo gives a strong impression that his was related to the very idea of rapid conversion, a total turning around of one's life, combined with the effect of the ideologically monolithic character of the evangelical congregation he joined in Washington.

And what of the surprisingly uncritical trust that the author, like many other conservative Christians, put in George W. Bush? "Christians trust their Christian president," Mr. Kuo writes; for many of them "George W. Bush can really do no wrong." He "loves Jesus" and is, therefore, "a good man."

In the book and in conversations on the phone and in person, Mr. Kuo is forthright about his own love of Jesus, and he never questions the president's. But he does recognize the temptation this poses for evangelicals like himself — of substituting for Jesus, whom "you can't see," someone else identified with him and ready at hand.

Mr. Kuo's religious forthrightness itself raises another intriguing question about evangelical culture. Evangelicals frequently demonstrate a verbal facility and emotional warmth in articulating their faith — in spontaneous prayer, for example, or in personal testimonies — that other believers envy. But does that put a premium on words and feelings rather than on actions and results?

In 1998, after talking at length with Mr. Bush, then governor of Texas, Mr. Kuo was overwhelmed. "Bush was the real deal," he told himself. "He loved Jesus. He wanted to help the poor." Six years and many disappointments later, Mr. Kuo listened to a speech by the president and concluded: "That same passion for the poor I first heard in Austin was in his voice and in his eyes. But the passion was a passion for talking about compassion, not fighting for compassion."

Ultimately the lesson Mr. Kuo hopes his fellow evangelicals learn goes far beyond this president and his policies. “At the end of the day,” he said, “politics is easy; God is hard.” Politics, by setting up very tangible enemies to be defeated, “gives the illusion of a solution,” he said, while God demands personal transformation. “What,” he asked, “is harder than to be transformed by unconditional love?”

This very contrast between political change and personal transformation has deep evangelical roots, of course. Secular progressives might counter with the mirror image of his formulation: God is easy; politics is hard.

And then there is another possibility: God is hard, and so is politics — at least the politics practiced with a good deal of skepticism, with an anticipation of compromises and setbacks, and with a recognition of the pride and egoism, as the theologian Reinhold Niebuhr pointed out, that infects even (or perhaps especially) humanity’s most faith-based initiatives.

High Court To Rule On Deadly Force In Police Chases (WP)

By Charles Lane, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

The Supreme Court stepped into the national debate on the risks of high-speed police car chases yesterday, announcing that it will decide whether the Constitution permits police to use deadly force against a fleeing motorist whose only suspected offense is speeding or reckless driving.

The court's decision was a victory for a Georgia police officer appealing a ruling earlier this year by the Atlanta-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit. That court had concluded that the officer acted unreasonably by ramming a fleeing speeder, causing a crash that left the driver, Victor Harris, paralyzed.

The 11th Circuit, like a Georgia federal district judge before it, ruled that the officer, Timothy Scott, had violated a clearly established constitutional rule and could personally be sued.

But Scott's appeal said that the 11th Circuit's decision clashed with rulings by other appeals courts and "will have a chilling effect on seizures of all fleeing suspects across the nation" if the Supreme Court does not reverse it.

At least four members of the court -- the minimum needed to accept a case -- found this argument persuasive enough to grant Scott a hearing.

When the court hears arguments in Scott v. Harris , No. 05-1631, early in 2007, it will be the first time the justices have reexamined the constitutional prerequisites for employing deadly force against unarmed fleeing suspects since 1985.

In that case, which involved not a speeder but a suspected burglar, the court ruled that police may use deadly force only when they have good reason to believe someone will be killed or injured if they do not.

"It is not better that all felony suspects die than that they escape," the court ruled. "A police officer may not seize an unarmed, nondangerous suspect by shooting him dead."

The 11th Circuit cited that ruling to support its decision against Scott, noting that Harris was not suspected of any offense more serious than speeding, a misdemeanor, and posed little risk to the public because the streets were empty at the time.

Scott replied in his brief that the 11th Circuit's ruling puts police in "the untenable position of waiting until a fleeing suspect engaged in reckless and dangerous driving . . . actually maims or kills an innocent bystander before initiating a seizure."

Pursuits -- even of armed and dangerous suspects -- have become controversial in recent years, because of the risk they can pose to third parties and police officers themselves.

A 2004 University of Washington study found that, from 1994 to 2002, 260 to 325 people were killed annually as a result of high-speed chases.

The chase prompting the court's new case began on the night of March 29, 2001, when police tried to pull Harris over for going 73 in a 55-mph zone. Harris fled, accelerating to more than 90 mph and driving against traffic.

Harris later said he was frightened and wanted to avoid an impound fee for his car.

Scott joined the pursuit and radioed his supervisor for permission to attempt a "precision intervention technique," a maneuver in which a police car deliberately bumps a fleeing car at an angle, forcing it to spin out and stop.

Scott's supervisor authorized the maneuver. But Scott instead rammed Harris's car directly from behind, forcing it to career off the road and crash.

Now a quadriplegic, Harris sued Scott, alleging that the officer had violated the Fourth Amendment, which prohibits unreasonable seizures.

A federal district judge in Georgia upheld the suit against Scott in 2003, prompting Scott's appeal to the 11th Circuit.

A decision in the case is expected by July.

Justices To Rule On Police Ramming Car To End Chase (LAT)

By David G. Savage, Times Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0088622

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

The Supreme Court agreed Friday to decide whether police officers can be sued for intentionally ramming a fleeing car during a high-speed chase, causing the death or injury of the driver.

Eight years ago, the justices shielded police officers from being sued in federal court for deaths and injuries resulting from high-speed chases. The only exception, the court said, is when police act out of "an improper or malicious motive," such as "to terrorize, cause harm or kill" a suspect.

In the 1998 case, the parents of a teenager from Sacramento sued after their son was killed when he fell from a motorcycle being pursued by a police cruiser at 100 mph. Because the officer did not intend to harm the cyclist, he could not be held liable, the high court ruled.

In the new case, from Georgia, the justices will consider whether an officer who deliberately hits a fleeing car can be held liable for an accident that follows.

The case began on a March night in 2001 when an officer in Coweta County, Ga., saw a Cadillac going 20 miles above the speed limit. When he gave chase, it sped up, ran through a red light and reached 100 mph on a highway.

A second officer, Timothy Scott, rammed the rear of the speeding vehicle, sending it out of control and over an embankment. The driver, 19-year-old Victor Harris, survived but was rendered a quadriplegic.

He sued, and both a federal judge and the U.S. appeals court in Atlanta agreed that an officer who used "deadly force" by ramming his car into another vehicle could be held liable for the damage he caused.

Under most states' laws, including California's, police officers cannot be sued by someone injured while fleeing from law enforcement. However, police can be sued in federal court if they violate a person's constitutional rights, even if the person is a fleeing felon.

In the Georgia case, lawyers for the injured driver argued that ramming his car amounted to an "unreasonable seizure," a violation of the 4th Amendment. The courts agreed, clearing the way for the suit to go before a jury.

Lawyers for the police officer appealed directly to the Supreme Court, arguing that such a decision, if allowed to stand, endangered the public as well as police. Officers would be forced to allow speeding vehicles to escape if they could be sued for forcibly stopping them, they said.

When trying to stop a fleeing car, police officers try to drive alongside and then nudge the rear to the right so that the car spins out. This is known as PIT, for Pursuit Intervention Technique.

"When it's done right, it's a controlled maneuver, and it stops the car," said Lt. Paul Vernon of the Los Angeles Police Department.

The high court announced late Friday that it would hear the case of Scott vs. Harris.

Also Friday, the court agreed to hear an appeal from the parents of an autistic boy seeking the right to sue for a better learning program for their son. A federal judge in Ohio threw their case out because they did not have a lawyer.

Now, the Supreme Court will decide whether parents, acting without a lawyer, may appeal in court on behalf of their children to seek their rights under the federal Individuals With Disabilities Education Act. That law gives disabled children a right to a "free appropriate public education."

The law also says the school must develop an "individualized education program" for each child with a disability, and the parents are entitled to be part of the team that develops this plan. If the parents are dissatisfied with the plan, they can file a complaint and have a hearing before a local and state administrator. If they are still dissatisfied, they can go to court.

At issue is whether they can do so on their own and without a lawyer.

Jeff and Sandee Winkelman believed their 8-year-old son, Jacob, would benefit from attending a private school that specialized in autism. However, school officials in Parma, Ohio, placed him in a public elementary school, and an administrative hearing officer upheld the school district's decision.

The Winkelmans sent their son to the private school for one year, at a tuition cost of $56,000, and went to federal court to seek reimbursement from the school district.

A federal judge and the U.S. appeals court in Cincinnati ruled the parents could not sue in court without a lawyer.

Jean-Claude Andre, a Los Angeles lawyer, petitioned the Supreme Court to hear their case. He cited an Education Department study that said the nation had nearly 7 million children with a disability, and of these, about a third came from families with annual incomes of $25,000 or less.

"For the overwhelming majority of these families, like the Winkelmans, the cost of retaining a lawyer is prohibitive," he said. U.S. Solicitor General Paul D. Clement also urged the justices to take up the case of Winkelman vs. Parma City School District and to rule for the family.

Both cases will be argued before the high court early next year and decided by June.

david.savage@latimes.com

Convicted Killers See New Trial Over Court Chaos (NYT)

By Michael Brick

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

The crime scene was the courthouse, and the witnesses were lawyers, court officers, a court reporter and a judge. The indictment described the momentary chaos of an afternoon last winter.

"It happened right here," said the prosecutor, Robert J. Walsh, addressing the jury and motioning toward the defendants. "They tried to escape."

But when testimony began this week, witnesses offered all the complexity of the world outside the courthouse.

Had one of the men signaled to start the attack? Had the other said his intent was suicide? Were the makeshift knives found in their clothing or on the floor? Where had the armed court sergeant and the unarmed judge been standing?

The men at the defense table in State Supreme Court in Brooklyn last January, Kayson Pearson, 24, and Troy Hendrix, 22, had been on trial for kidnapping, raping and killing Romona Moore, a third-year psychology student at Hunter College. She was savagely tortured. The maximum penalty was life. On Jan. 19, the trial ended abruptly.

Courthouse disturbances do not make for predictable cases. Some defendants who live to tell about them are acquitted, like Angela Davis in California in 1972 and Jose Dominguez in the Bronx in 1991. In Missouri, a man convicted in the courthouse where he had killed his wife in 1992 awaits a new trial on account of the venue. In Atlanta, defense lawyers have asked to move the trial of a man who escaped the courthouse in March 2005.

Mr. Pearson and Mr. Hendrix never did stand much of a chance to escape. The court clerk behind his desk could push a button to summon backup. His hand gripped the holster of a handgun. The holster he had unclipped.

The court sergeant's holster was made to lock if you fought him for the 9-millimeter Glock loaded with 16 hollow point bullets. The sergeant was 58 years old and 5 feet 10 inches tall, and he would swear that he still had it in him to body slam a young man with his off hand. Next door, a trial for the killing of two police detectives had attracted idle, displeased police detectives.

But timing for a getaway did not look to improve. For three years, hearings had convened high up in the 32-story courthouse, where the elevators were the only way out.

On the second day of the trial, proceedings moved to a room equipped to seat two juries, beside an escalator and a wide staircase. By 4 p.m. the building was clearing. Mr. Pearson was dressed in white from jacket to shoes. Romona Moore's mother gave her testimony, the last of the day. Justice Albert Tomei dismissed the jury. Then everybody moved.

"It was the scariest thing I've ever experienced," said Anna-Sigga Nicolazzi, the prosecutor on the case, speaking from the witness stand this week. "There were so many people screaming and saying different things."

In minutes, Mr. Hendrix was lying on the floor, court officers on him. His eyes were red, and mucus ran from his face. His footprint was on the defense table. The sergeant, James A. Gorra, was cut in three places. A court officer had banged his knee, another was wounded in the neck. Somebody was handcuffing Mr. Pearson. A defense lawyer, Mitchell Dinnerstein, was cut in the face and his shirt was full of blood. Around the room, officers found two sharpened ends of plexiglass and a strange weapon that looked like a pair of eyeglass frames with a masonry nail attached.

A mistrial was declared, new lawyers were appointed and the men watched their trial by video from Rikers Island. When it was done, Justice Tomei gave them life sentences. Mr. Pearson was sent to the Upstate Correctional Facility in Malone, and Mr. Hendrix to the Downstate Correctional Facility in Fishkill, 230 miles away. Prison records list their parole eligibility dates as 99/99/9999.

But the Brooklyn district attorney, Charles J. Hynes, who had instructed Ms. Nicolazzi at Brooklyn Law School, did not wait to hear the sentences. On April 4, prosecutors filed a 39-count indictment addressing that January afternoon.

"The courts have to be secured," Mr. Hynes said in an interview. "It's an important thing for the morale of the staff that we don't trivialize the kind of behavior that we allege these guys committed."

The case was assigned to Mr. Walsh, a colleague of Ms. Nicolazzi in the Homicide Bureau. At a plea bargain hearing in June, the defense lawyers, John B. Stella and Philip J. Smallman, requested a trial.

Last week, court officers draped a defense table with black bunting to conceal leg shackles and fitted a prosecution table the same way. Sweatshirts were obtained to replace prison jumpsuits.

The judge, James G. Starkey, betrayed little patience. He ordered jury selection to begin despite his own minor surgery and a funeral Mr. Smallman wanted to attend.

The defendants entered in their new sweatshirts and leather restraining belts. They sat side by side. Mr. Pearson seemed alert and reacted to the proceedings, sometimes whispering to Mr. Hendrix.

Jury selection took three days. The lawyers described the nature of the murder trial, but not its outcome.

"Is this case to try whether they're guilty of trying to escape?" asked one woman, who was eliminated. "If they tried to escape in front of everybody, it's there for everybody to see."

Other candidates made the opposite assumption. One man said: "I would figure the rape and the murder would be more of an issue than them trying to run. I feel like they don't have enough evidence on that case, so you're trying to get them on this."

With 11 jurors sworn in, Justice Starkey asked whether the defense would challenge the next candidate, a woman who appeared fit from summers as a lifeguard. The defendants were giggling. Mr. Stella stood in front of his client and put his hands on the table. "This is the 12th juror," he said. Then he turned and told the judge Mr. Pearson had overruled his legal advice. The prosecutor consented without hesitation, and the woman became Juror No. 12. She looked to be about Ms. Moore's age.

As the trial began, Mr. Walsh told jurors the facts were simple. "This is not a case," he said, "where a crime was committed on the street, the defendants were arrested two weeks later and the jury is left to wonder whether they got the right guy."

Several witnesses said Mr. Hendrix had jumped the table and wrestled Sergeant Gorra for his gun. Sergeant Gorra testified to stiff-arming him airborne and slamming him down. But Court Officer Dennis Cherry recounted applying a neckhold while Court Officer Joseph Dentici swept his legs.

The defense lawyer who had been stabbed, Mr. Dinnerstein, said he had received no stitches, though others said his shirt was soaked with blood. The law defines injury, and serious injury, too. Mr. Walsh submitted hospital records, photographs and weapons as evidence.

And the defense lawyers tested memories. Mr. Stella, who paces the gallery during cross-examination, and Mr. Smallman, who wears an American flag lapel pin, asked each witness about positioning and timing.

Ms. Nicolazzi, the prosecutor from the murder case, gave lawyerly yeses and noes, then described her observations. During her testimony, a public-address system announced the lights would flicker for generator tests. Some jurors shifted in their seats.

From the courtroom next door, Justice Tomei came and gave his account.

"I heard gun, gun, gun, that's all I heard," he testified. "As soon as I heard that, I said, 'I'm out of here.' "

A police detective demonstrated efforts to handcuff Mr. Pearson but said finding the weapon was a blur.

"It was all kind of like one motion," said the detective, Timothy O'Brien. "It's kind of hard to pinpoint A and B and C happened."

Then the prosecutor rested his case. Mr. Pearson and Mr. Hendrix were taken to the Manhattan Detention Complex, where they have the weekend to decide whether they want to testify. It promises to be among the last free choices anybody asks them to make. The year 9999 is not coming soon.

Baby Girl's Death In Brooklyn Is Ruled A Homicide By Officials (NYT)

By Cara Buckley And Daryl Khan

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

A 13-month-old girl died early yesterday after being found unconscious in her Brooklyn home, and her death has been declared a homicide by the medical examiner's office. The police have not identified any suspects.

A spokeswoman for the medical examiner's office said the baby had skull fractures and other injuries, and the police said her body was bruised.

The police said that the baby's mother, whom they identified as Antigua Lucas, 19, told them that she had found the baby, Teira Lewis, not breathing around 2:15 a.m. Ms. Lucas said that Teira had been sick at 11:30 p.m., but that she managed to soothe the baby to sleep, according to the police.

After finding the baby unresponsive, Ms. Lucas said, she rushed out of her second-floor apartment at 270 Glenmore Avenue in East New York, the police said, frantic and looking for help. She flagged down a private sanitation company worker, who called 911, the authorities said.

The baby was taken to Brookdale University Hospital and Medical Center and declared dead at 3 a.m., the police said. The Administration for Children's Services was investigating the death.

Neighbors at Ms. Lucas's building, which sits on a desolate stretch of road lined with industrial warehouses and boarded-up homes, said a worker from the child welfare agency had inquired about the baby's well being about four months ago. The agency would not confirm that claim. But, according to neighbors and the building's landlord, Teira had always appeared to be well kept and happy.

The landlord, who would not give his name, said Ms. Lucas and Teira were the only people listed on the apartment's lease, though one neighbor said she saw Ms. Lucas's male companion with the baby around 6 p.m. Thursday. But, according to the police, Ms. Lucas said she was alone in the apartment when she discovered that Teira could not be woken.

DOJ_NMG_0088625

Police Say Malvo Confessed To Killing Arizona Golfer (USAT/AP)

USA Today, October 28, 2006

TUCSON (AP) — Convicted Washington-area sniper Lee Boyd Malvo confessed to police that he and cohort John Allen Muhammad were responsible for the 2002 killing of a 60-year-old man on a Tucson golf course, Tucson authorities said Friday.

Malvo said he was sorry for the family of Jerry Taylor, said Detective Benjamin Jimenez of the Tucson Police Department.

"He welled up a few times in tears during the interview," Jimenez said.

Malvo spoke to police in Maryland for two hours Thursday after he received immunity from prosecution, Tucson Capt. Bill Richards said. Malvo said the shooting took place while he and Muhammad were in the area visiting Muhammad's older sister, Richards said.

Tucson police had long sought to speak with Malvo about the March 19, 2002, death of Taylor, 60, who died from a single gunshot fired from long range as he practiced chip shots at the golf course. The case had never been conclusively tied to Muhammad and Malvo.

Jimenez said Malvo lay in the bushes and shot Taylor as he was retrieving a golf ball. According to Malvo, the two decided to shoot someone on the golf course after conducting surveillance in the desert, Jimenez said.

Taylor's daughter, Cheryll Witz, said Malvo's confession brings closure for her and will allow her to move forward. She said she wrote Malvo a five-page letter in June imploring him to talk to Tucson detectives.

"I needed to know. I really need to forgive him. I do believe that he was brainwashed and I do truly believe that he was made to kill my father," she said.

Tucson police Chief Richard Miranda said Tucson detectives were participating in the Washington-area sniper investigation and noticed similarities between those cases and Taylor's.

Richards said Malvo agreed to testify against Muhammad if Arizona authorities bring charges. He said police are still investigating and have not submitted the case to prosecutors.

Muhammad and Malvo were arrested for 10 killings and three woundings in the Washington, D.C., area during three weeks in October 2002. They were accused of roaming the area with a Bushmaster .223-caliber rifle that they fired from the trunk of a Chevrolet Caprice at random victims.

Malvo is serving a life term in Virginia for sniper shootings. He is in Maryland awaiting sentencing for six sniper killings in Montgomery County.

The two are suspects in earlier shootings that year in Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Maryland and Washington state, and news reports have linked them to shootings in Florida, Texas and California.

Both were convicted of separate Virginia killings in 2003. Muhammad was sentenced to death while Malvo was given a life term.

They were sent to Maryland last year to stand trial for six killings in Montgomery County. Muhammad was convicted in May. Malvo, who pleaded guilty, is to be sentenced Nov. 9.

Professor Accused Of Spying For Cuba Won't Be Released Before Trial (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, October 28, 2006

A Florida International University professor charged with being an unregistered agent of Cuba's communist government won't be released before trial, a Miami federal judge ruled Friday.

Carlos Alvarez, 61, who is accused of informing on the exile community for Cuban leader Fidel Castro's intelligence arm, could flee to Cuba if he's freed before the January trial, U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore said. He denied Alvarez's bid for bond.

The father of five has been detained at the Federal Detention Center in downtown Miami since January, when he was arrested along with his wife, who faces the same charge but is free on bond.

"The evidence has shown that the government of the Republic of Cuba appreciates the work that [Alvarez] has performed for it and has acknowledged his efforts with commendations," Moore wrote. ``It is, therefore, a substantial likelihood that defendant would choose to flee."

Alvarez's lawyer, Steve Chaykin, said he could not comment because he was out of town and had not read the ruling.

In the decision, Moore takes a harsh view of Alvarez, a longtime FIU psychology professor, who was charged along with his wife, Elsa, an FIU counselor. After her initial detention, she was released in June.

Moore noted then that the ``weight of the evidence against defendant Elsa Alvarez was substantially different than that against Defendant Carlos Alvarez."

DOJ_NMG_0088626

He gave self-incriminating statements to FBI agents in the summer of 2005 because he believed they would not charge him if he cooperated with them. His lawyer has asked the judge to suppress that evidence, the core of the U.S. attorney's case against him.

Prosecutors say Carlos Alvarez allegedly operated as an agent of Cuba from 1978 to July 2005, traveled to Cuba at least 12 times during that period, and met with Castro agents in New York and Mexico. In 2002-04, he also "persisted in maintaining contact with the Cuban Intelligence Service over the objections of his wife," according to court records.

In the 14-page ruling, Moore said Alvarez ``was willing to divulge private information about persons in the community and conceal his efforts to do so by using encryption [on computer disks] and other evasive strategies."

Moore stopped short of saying Alvarez was a danger to the community, another factor considered for bond.

The judge said Alvarez might pose a ``hypothetical danger."

The Alvarez couple, if convicted, face up to 10 years in prison.

Feds In Wyo. Take Over Colorado Ad Probe (WP/AP)

By Steven K. Paulson, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

DENVER -- The FBI said Friday that Wyoming officials would take over an investigation into a Colorado gubernatorial candidate's campaign ad to avoid potential conflicts of interest after authorities learned a Denver-area federal agent may have been involved.

The investigation is examining whether GOP Rep. Bob Beauprez accessed a restricted federal database for information used in a television ad to attack his Democratic challenger, Bill Ritter.

Beauprez has denied any wrongdoing and has refused to disclose the name of the person who gave his campaign the information.

"It's important this thing comes to a close quickly. Right now, we have no indication we are even the subject of an inquiry," Beauprez spokesman John Marshall said.

FBI spokeswoman Rene VonderHaar said the U.S. attorney's office in Denver recused itself from the case when it learned of the possible involvement of a Denver-based federal agent. The Department of Justice transferred control of the investigation to its Cheyenne, Wyo., office, she said.

Cory Voorhis, a federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement agent and registered Colorado Republican, provided the information, a person in government who was briefed on the investigation told The Associated Press last week. The person spoke on condition of anonymity because of the investigation.

Voorhis has not publicly commented.

Spokesmen for the U.S. attorneys in both states refused to comment. ICE officials have not returned calls.

The ad suggested Ritter, a former Denver district attorney, was soft on illegal immigration, saying he accepted a plea bargain with an illegal immigrant arrested in Colorado who was later accused of sexually assaulting a child in California. The ad said the plea bargain didn't require deportation.

State investigators, acting on accusations of wrongdoing by Ritter's campaign, concluded the information came from the National Crime Information Center, a federal database that is supposed to be limited to law-enforcement use. The FBI has launched its own investigation.

Using the database for any purpose other than law enforcement is a federal crime punishable by up to a year in prison.

Pataki Picks Ex-Prosecutor To Weigh In On Hevesi Case (NYT)

By Michael Cooper

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

ALBANY, Oct. 27 — Gov. George E. Pataki appointed a former federal prosecutor on Friday to determine whether the ethics case against Comptroller Alan G. Hevesi for using a state worker to chauffeur his wife was strong enough to seek his removal from office.

Mr. Pataki, who cut short a trip to Hungary to deal with the Hevesi affair, had been expected to announce his decision on whether to invoke a little-known law to call the State Senate into special session to consider removing Mr. Hevesi. But Mr. Pataki, a Republican who leaves office at the end of the year, said he wanted to take the extra step of having an outside expert review the case before calling for the removal of Mr. Hevesi, a Democrat who is seeking re-election, less than two weeks before the election.

DOJ_NMG_0088627

"This is a provision of the law that, to the best of our knowledge, has never been used," Mr. Pataki said. "And it is an extraordinary act for officials to overturn an election of a statewide elected official after a vote by the people of New York, and obviously it's something that, if it's used at all, has to be used cautiously and with great, great care."

So Mr. Pataki appointed David N. Kelley, a former United States attorney for the Southern District of New York, to review the case. Mr. Kelley — who has prosecuted terrorism cases and who won high-profile convictions against Martha Stewart and Bernard J. Ebbers, the former chief executive of WorldCom — is a registered Democrat who won the praise of people within his party for his work as a prosecutor.

The governor said he expected Mr. Kelley to report back to him "within the week," which could lead Mr. Pataki to announce his intentions shortly before the Nov. 7 elections.

Mr. Hevesi, who unexpectedly finds himself fighting for his political life, reacted to the governor's announcement by saying, "As a result of this decision, five million voters will choose their next comptroller, and that's as it should be."

On Thursday, Eliot Spitzer, the state attorney general and the Democratic nominee for governor, withdrew his support of Mr. Hevesi, and several Democrats running in close local elections have followed suit, distancing themselves from the scandal. Most newspaper editorials in the state have backed J. Christopher Callaghan, the largely unknown Republican who is running to unseat Mr. Hevesi.

Republicans are pouncing on the Hevesi case to energize their base in an election season that many Republicans had privately feared would be a rout.

On Friday John Faso, the Republican candidate for governor, and Jeanine F. Pirro, the Republican candidate for attorney general, both released television ads seeking to tie their opponents to Mr. Hevesi. And the state Republican Party released an ad on behalf of Mr. Callaghan, whose campaign has so far lacked the money to broadcast its own ads.

By taking even an incremental step that could lead to removal proceedings, Mr. Pataki was steering the state into uncharted waters. Pataki administration officials said they did not believe any statewide elected official in New York had been removed from office since 1913, when Gov. William Sulzer was impeached.

There are two tracks for removing an official. The Democratic-led Assembly can begin impeachment proceedings, but given Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver's support for Mr. Hevesi, that is considered unlikely. Or the governor can call the Republican-led Senate into session for a trial to remove Mr. Hevesi, which would require the votes of two-thirds of the 62-member Senate, and therefore 7 Democrats among them.

But the way forward is far from clear. The governor said that the law allowing him to seek the removal of an official by the Senate did not appear to have ever been used, and that it gave little guidance in what such a trial might look like, saying only that the Senate shall have the power to make such rules "as it may see fit."

If the governor decides to proceed, Mr. Kelley is likely to present the case against Mr. Hevesi to the Senate, much like a prosecutor. Mr. Hevesi would then have an opportunity to be heard.

Aides to the governor said that if Mr. Hevesi is removed from office, the governor can probably pick a replacement to serve out his term. If Mr. Hevesi resigns, the Legislature as a whole will get to choose a successor, giving the choice to the Democrats.

Blair Horner, the legislative director of the New York Public Interest Research Group, said that it was important for the Senate to establish fair rules, and raised concerns that several senators, including Joseph L. Bruno, the Republican majority leader, had already called for Mr. Hevesi to resign or made statements implying that they thought Mr. Hevesi was guilty. "How can they say they are impartial at trial?" he asked.

A spokesman for the Senate said that the senators would be able to have an open mind when they heard the case.

Mr. Hevesi made it clear in an interview taped Friday with Gabe Pressman for WNBC's "New Forum" that he was still running.

"What I'm doing now, which is a little short of two weeks before an election, is saying to the citizens of New York State: I made a mistake, I really did, a beaut," he said in the interview. "And it's caused me a lot of grief, and I deserve it. But I would like you to analyze that in the context of a 35-year career of service."

New York's Pataki Calls For Review Of Hevesi Findings (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Michael Quint And Martin Z. Braun

Bloomberg, October 28, 2006

Oct. 27 (Bloomberg) -- New York Governor George Pataki today named a former U.S. attorney to review ethics charges against Alan Hevesi, a step that may lead him to recommend that the State Senate remove the comptroller from office.

The governor, a Republican, said he named David Kelley to review the findings to determine ``whether a strong legal case for removal exists." Pataki said he hoped he could have a report from Kelley, who served as U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York, within a week.

DOJ_NMG_0088628

``I don't want to proceed until I am 100 percent confident that a strong case exists that Mr. Hevesi should be removed," Pataki told reporters at his Manhattan office. ``And if in fact that's Mr. Kelley's determination, I will then make the recommendation that the Senate conduct its trial."

Pataki, who leaves office Dec. 31, acted after the state Ethics Commission this week said Hevesi improperly used staffers as his wife's chauffeur and didn't show any intention of repaying the state until his opponent in the Nov. 7 election exposed the practice. New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, a Democrat who is leading in the race for governor, yesterday withdrew his endorsement of Hevesi, also a Democrat, for re- election as the state's fiscal watchdog.

Criminal Probe

Hevesi's once-commanding lead over Republican J. Christopher Callaghan is evaporating, according to a WNBC/Marist poll.

Hevesi's actions are also under criminal investigation by Albany County District Attorney David Soares, who has been conducting interviews and issuing subpoenas. Spitzer's office is looking into whether Hevesi's payment of nearly $83,000 was adequate.

Speaking to reporters after Pataki's news conference, Hevesi said, ``As a result of this decision, five million voters will decide who the next comptroller will be, and that's as it should be." He declined to answer questions.

Pataki, asked if Hevesi should resign, said, ``I think he should take a hard look at where he stands right now. You know, his own running mate, Eliot Spitzer, said that he's compromised his ability to fulfill his responsibilities."

The governor said, `This is a sad day for New Yorkers. We have to have confidence in not just our electoral process but also our elected officials, and I will do everything in my power to make sure that continues to be the case for the people of New York."

Prosecutor Background

Pataki said Kelley would get more than a week if needed it, and probably would present the case to the Senate if there is a decision to proceed with it. Kelley served in the U.S. attorney's office in New York from 1988 to 2005 before joining law firm Cahill, Gordon & Reindel in September 2005.

Prior to his appointment as U.S. attorney in 2003, he was named co-chair of the Justice Department's investigation into the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. He personally prosecuted John Walker Lindh, dubbed the ``American Taliban." As a U.S. attorney, he also served as a member of President George W. Bush's Corporate Fraud Task Force and the Attorney General's Advisory Committee for White Collar Crime.

``It is an extraordinary act for officials to overturn an election of a statewide elected official after a vote by the people of New York, and obviously it's something that if it's used at all has to be used cautiously and with great, great care," said Pataki, who cut short a trip to Hungary to deal with the Hevesi case.

Won't Quit

Should the governor recommend that Hevesi be removed from office, the 62-member Republican-controlled Senate would meet jointly with the seven judges on the Court of Appeals to hear evidence and Hevesi's defense. A two-thirds vote is required to oust Hevesi, who oversees the state's $142.6 billion retirement system, the second-biggest public pension in the U.S.

Hevesi, 65, in a televised debate with Callaghan earlier this week, said he wouldn't resign and refused to comment on what he would do if indicted.

State Senate Majority Leader Joseph Bruno told reporters in Troy today that if Hevesi is re-elected and the Senate acted to remove him before the end of this year, ``after Jan. 1 we have to go through it all again." Bruno is the leader of the 35 Republican senators who are a majority in the Senate.

``I don't believe he will be re-elected," Bruno said. He said Hevesi ``has lost all credibility as a fiscal watchdog."

Poll Plunge

The ethics scandal has drawn attention to a contest that until recently has been overshadowed by the governor's race, U.S. Senator Hillary Clinton's bid for a second term and the battle between Republican Jeanine Pirro and Democrat Andrew Cuomo to succeed Spitzer as attorney general. The scandal has cost Hevesi, who as comptroller oversees the second-largest U.S. public pension, a once-commanding lead.

A WNBC/Marist Poll conducted yesterday found 50 percent of likely supporters supporting Hevesi and 38 percent for Callaghan, a former treasurer of Saratoga County. The 12 percentage point margin was down from 40 points just six days earlier. When voters were told Spitzer withdrew his endorsement of Hevesi, the race became a virtual tie: 44 percent for Hevesi and 43 percent for Callaghan.

Doolittle Legal Fate Uncertain (SACBEE)

By David Whitney, Bee Washington Bureau

The Sacramento Bee, October 28, 2006

Voters go to polls not knowing if he'll face Abramoff case charges.

Voters in the 4th Congressional District will go to the polls Nov. 7 to decide whether Rep. John Doolittle deserves an eighth term without knowing whether he will face federal prosecution in connection with the ongoing investigation of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The Roseville Republican, who once called Abramoff a good friend, has not been called before a grand jury or otherwise been publicly identified by the Justice Department as being under investigation.

"We are not going to confirm or deny investigations into any individuals," said Brian Sierra, spokesman for the Justice Department's criminal section.

The only congressman to have pleaded guilty in connection with Abramoff is Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, who pleaded Oct. 14 to conspiracy and making false statements and is awaiting sentencing.

Doolittle's long relationship with Abramoff, however, included elements of the kind that contributed to the legal troubles of many of the eight people, including congressional aides and lobbyists, who already have pleaded guilty.

Doolittle has insisted he's done no wrong and is paying a prominent criminal attorney in Virginia to clear his name. The legal tab so far is about $50,000.

The attorney, David Barger, stressed that he had been told by the Justice Department last week that "Congressman Doolittle is not a target of its investigation."

But other criminal defense attorneys said the fact that the Justice Department has not identified Doolittle as a target means little because that typically doesn't happen until all the evidence is gathered and charges are imminent.

"Saying that someone is not a target doesn't really tell you much," said Lawrence Barcella Jr., a former deputy chief of the Justice Department's major crimes division who has extensive experience defending prominent officials charged with political corruption and other white-collar crimes.

"All it means is that the Justice Department is not ready to charge you immediately," Barcella said. "It doesn't necessarily mean you don't have potential jeopardy."

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee isn't waiting for official confirmation.

"Do we really want to elect a congressman who might be on his way to jail?" says a mailer the committee sent to voters last week.

"Eight people have been convicted in the Jack Abramoff bribery scandal," it says. "The facts say John Doolittle is likely to be next."

Charlie Brown, Doolittle's Democratic opponent, has tried to paint the Roseville Republican as part of the "culture of corruption" in Washington and has suggested on the stump that Doolittle will be indicted after the election.

Speaking at a fundraiser in Davis earlier this month, Brown said of Doolittle: "First we'll vote him out of office, then we will wait for the indictments."

Doolittle's campaign spokesman, Richard Robinson, called Brown's statement an act of desperation.

The most concrete piece of independent evidence that Doolittle was at least looked at by the Justice Department is in the records of the clerk of the House.

A woman named Tonya Walker, describing herself as a "secretary on behalf of work" but identified elsewhere as working for the Justice Department, went to the clerk's office in August 2005 and registered to review financial disclosure reports Doolittle filed for 2002 and 2003.

Walker also looked at records of other House and Senate members who had been linked to Abramoff, including six years of filings for Doolittle's former chief of staff, David Lopez.

Doolittle's office dismissed this as meaningless.

"No one knows what the Justice Department was looking for considering it pulled records from all sorts of people who had no relationship whatsoever to Mr. Abramoff," said Laura Blackann, the congressman's spokeswoman.

In Abramoff's signed factual basis for his plea to corruption of public officials, he admits to offering "things of value to public officials in exchange for a series of official acts and influence and agreements to provide official action and influence."

Among these "things of value" were election support, employment for relatives and campaign contributions, all of which Doolittle received.

Doolittle accepted $14,000 in direct campaign contributions from Abramoff and $130,000 more from the lobbyist's clients and associates. Doolittle also used Abramoff's skybox at the MCI Center for a 1999 fundraiser in conjunction with a Washington-Sacramento NBA game.

Additionally, the company of Doolittle's wife, Julie, was hired by Abramoff's law firm from September 2002 to February 2004, receiving more than $66,600.

Her company was initially hired to raise money for a fundraiser for an Abramoff charity; she stayed on the payroll for months after that event was canceled.

A federal grand jury investigating Abramoff subpoenaed records related to her work for Doolittle. But John Doolittle said in February that federal investigators later asked for information about his wife's other clients, which would have included him since his campaign pays her a commission for fundraising work.

Doolittle may have been trying to get his wife on Abramoff's payroll as early as 2000, according to a recently disclosed e-mail written by Kevin Ring, a former Doolittle staffer who later was hired by Abramoff.

In the e-mail to Abramoff, Ring quotes Lopez as saying the congressman was excited about the possibility of his wife taking a job for an Abramoff charity and was eager to talk to the lobbyist. The Doolittles say they have no recollection of that.

In addition, Doolittle assisted Abramoff's efforts to win renewal of a contract in 2000 representing the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands.

Abramoff admitted in his plea deal that he had provided travel for senior members of Ney's staff to go to the Northern Mariana Islands in January 2000 to help him "in obtaining and maintaining lobbying clients."

But three months earlier, in October 1999, Doolittle had publicly worked to elect the commonwealth politician responsible for helping Abramoff get the $100,000-a-month lobbying contract.

In his defense, Blackann said that "the congressman has long been a supporter of the CNMI regardless of whether it was being represented by Mr. Abramoff."

In an interview with The Bee in February, Doolittle said he didn't think anything he did in connection with Abramoff and his clients was wrong, but he acknowledged Abramoff might have a different recollection when, as part of his plea deal, he sat down to tell all to federal prosecutors.

" ... I certainly don't think what he has pled guilty to was part of our relationship, at least not on my end it wasn't, I can say with a certainty," Doolittle said of Abramoff. "But, uh, I don't know what he is saying on his end." About the writer:

The Bee's David Whitney can be reached at (202) 383-0004 or dwhitney@mcclatchydc.com.

BX. PIMP COPS A PLEA (AP)

By Ap

AP, October 28, 2006

October 28, 2006 -- A Bronx man admitted yesterday that for six years he managed a multi-city prostitution ring that included underage girls.

In pleading guilty to two federal charges in Trenton, Matthew Thompkins, 38, said the ring ran from 1999 to December 2005 in Atlantic City, Boston, Las Vegas, Miami and New York. He is the seventh member to plead guilty in the case, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Thompkins pleaded guilty to conspiracy to transport minors to engage in prostitution, which carries a sentence of five to 30 years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000, and conspiracy to engage in money laundering, punishable by up to 20 years in prison and a fine of $250,000 or twice the loss to victims. Sentencing is to be March 2.

The ring took in at least $800,000, officials said. Members would convert the proceeds into money orders of less than $3,000, the legal reporting limit.

A woman who pleaded guilty in June to conspiracy to transport minors for prostitution said she was 16 when she met Thompkins in New York in 1999 and joined the ring. She said she earned him $222,188 in 2004 - yet was paid only $20 a day.

Thompkins agreed to forfeit $748,243, one New Jersey and three New York properties, and eight vehicles belonging to the ring, authorities said.

Mailman Pimp Awaits Delivery To Jail (NSL)

By John P. Martin, Star-ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), October 28, 2006

New Yorker admits to raking in millions with nationwide ring

A New York mailman admitted yesterday that he ran a sprawling multimillion-dollar network that shuttled prostitutes as young as 13 from Atlantic City to Las Vegas and cities in between.

Standing in a federal courtroom in Trenton, Matthew Thompkins acknowledged building and training a "stable" of young prostitutes, housing them in apartments and homes in New York and New Jersey, and hiding millions of dollars in illegal sex proceeds in their names.

His arrest last December by the FBI followed an unusual foray by federal investigators into a crime typically left to local police.

But prosecutors said Thompkins, for years known only by his nickname, "Knowledge," wasn't the typical pimp. He ran his operation so proficiently that his counterparts in the sex-trade industry gave him the ultimate honor three years ago: a 4-foot-high trophy declaring him "International Pimp of the Year."

"He was the master pimp," Assistant U.S. Attorney Jason Richardson said.

Thompkins, 37, pleaded guilty to conspiring to launder money and transport minors across state lines for prostitution. His plea agreement calls for between 10 and 24 years in prison. U.S. District Judge Freda Wolfson set sentencing for March 2.

The plea followed similar admissions from six other defendants. Some cooperated with the FBI; none has been sentenced.

The Justice Department highlighted Thompkins' arrest in December as part of Operation Innocence Lost, a national crackdown on underage prostitution. The year-long probe involved investigators from the FBI, New Jersey State Police, the U.S. Postal Service Inspector General's office, and officers in Atlantic City, Pleasantville and Egg Harbor.

Once an imposing 350 pounds, Thompkins had shed nearly a third of his weight when he was led into court yesterday wearing a brown prison jumpsuit, handcuffs and ankle shackles. He waved briefly at more than a dozen relatives who filled three courtroom benches.

"Between 1999 and December 2005, were you a pimp, that is, did you run a prostitution enterprise business?" the judge asked, one of more than 40 questions to spell out the crime.

"Yes," Thompkins replied.

Investigators said Thompkins counted as many as 60 women in his "stable" over the years, sometimes trading them with pimps in other cities. He required each to keep meticulous records, gave them rooms and $30 a day and demanded receipts to track their spending.

Thompkins wasn't accused of using violence against the women, but agents said some of the women were threatened, especially after they began cooperating with authorities. Many said they had been eased, not pushed, into the world of prostitution by Thompkins or others.

"Smooth talk: These guys had the gift of gab," FBI Special Agent Daniel Garrabrant said.

Once in the ring, few managed to get out, he said. The women charged up to $1,000 a night for sex, and passed it all to Thompkins. One prostitute earned $222,000 in a year, prosecutors said.

With the proceeds, Thompkins lived large. He had a fleet of luxury cars, including a Mercedes-Benz and Cadillac Escalade, that were seized in the ring. He agreed to forfeit eight cars, $748,000 and four properties, including a three-story home in Galloway Township, eight miles outside Atlantic City.

Some of the money he hid in bank accounts under the prostitutes' names or in his fledgling New York recording studio, Hoodlum Records.

Thompkins, who has been held without bail, did not explain his actions but will get a chance to address the judge at sentencing. His defense attorney, Mitchell Elman, declined to comment.

An employee of the Postal Service since 1994, Thompkins agreed to resign as part of his plea. He was promoted to letter carrier about six years ago, though it was not clear when he stopped delivering the mail.

Richardson, the prosecutor, said the postal service wanted to fire Thompkins years ago, but couldn't serve him with termination papers because they couldn't find him.

John P. Martin covers federal courts and law enforcement. He may be reached at jmartin@starledger.com or (973) 622-3405.

Seminole Man Charged In Online Hacking Plot (TAMPTRIB)

By Elaine Silvestrini, The Tampa Tribune

Tampa Tribune, October 28, 2006

TAMPA - A Seminole man slowed a Massachusetts company's Web site by electronically hijacking other people's computers and directing them to launch an attack, a federal criminal complaint alleges.

Federal authorities in Massachusetts charged John Bombard, 32, with two counts of intentionally accessing a protected computer without authorization, charges that carry a maximum of two years in federal prison.

The complaint charges Bombard with hacking into two computer systems June 15, 2004, to establish a "bot" network of compromised computers from which he launched a denial of service attack on Akamai Technologies servers.

A bot, short for robot, is a computer program that seeks vulnerable computers and runs silently in the background until it receives directions from a controlling computer.

According to the Justice Department, some experts think networks of bots, also called "botnets," now send up to three-quarters of all spam.

DOJ_NMG_0088632

A denial of service attack is one in which many compromised computers attack a single target, consuming the target's bandwidth or overloading its resources. Legitimate users of the targeted system are unable to use its services.

The federal charges say Bombard used a variant of the Gaobot worm to infect networks of computers at two major universities, which are not named. The complaint also doesn't say how many computers were used in the attack.

Akamai, headquartered in Cambridge, Mass., distributes online content and business processes over a network of computer servers.

The charges allege that, on the day of the attack, Akamai suffered a significant increase in Web traffic to a number of its domain name system servers. The affected customers' Web sites were rendered inaccessible or had their access slowed.

Bombard's attorney did not return a reporter's call seeking comment.

Federal authorities declined to specifically discuss Bombard's case.

John Lynch, deputy chief for the Justice Department's Computer Crime and Intellectual Property Section, said botnets are a growing problem, however.

Experts say people can protect their computers by using firewalls, antivirus programs and spyware protection.

Reporter Elaine Silvestrini can be reached at (813) 259-7837 or esilvestrini@tampatrib.com.

Jury Spares Convicted Murderer From Death Penalty In Puerto Rico (FINDLAW/AP)

By Yaisha Vargas, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 28, 2006

(AP) - SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico-A jury sentenced a man to life in prison Friday for murder instead of giving him a death sentence sought by prosecutors in a case that sparked renewed opposition to capital punishment nearly 80 years after it was outlawed in this U.S. territory. Carlos Ayala Lopez wept and hugged his attorney after hearing the verdict. Ayala was found guilty three months ago of killing Jose Rodriguez Reyes, a guard at the Veteran's Medical Center in suburban Rio Piedras, in 2002.

Critics, including the governor and Catholic church leaders, spoke out against federal prosecutors' decision to seek the death penalty. Puerto Rico abolished capital punishment in 1929. The last execution was in 1927, when a man was hanged for murder.

Federal prosecutors can seek the death penalty in some cases because Puerto Rico is subject to U.S. federal law. Federal prosecutors claimed jurisdiction in Ayala's case because the killing took place at a federally run institution.

Prosecutors said Ayala shot Rodriguez while trying to steal his gun for a planned drug trafficking operation.

The jury of six men and six women, which convicted Ayala in July, reconvened for the penalty phase of the trial and deliberated for about six hours before delivering the sentence.

Rodriguez's family members said they had hoped Ayala would be executed.

"As long as Puerto Rico doesn't impose death sentences, they won't understand the pain suffered by a family that loses a relative," said Nardelis Rodriguez, the guard's daughter. "It's not a matter of revenge. They killed a good person."

During the trial, protesters held a vigil outside the courthouse. Puerto Rico Gov. Anibal Acevedo Vila, who has urged the U.S. Justice Department not to seek the death penalty in Puerto Rico, said a death sentence in the case would be a "collective tragedy." In May, the Puerto Rican legislature approved a resolution reaffirming the island's anti-death penalty stance.

Death penalty opponents declared victory after learning of the verdict.

"We're very happy there's no death sentence in this case because Puerto Rico doesn't deserve that," said Edgardo Roman, a leader of the Coalition Against the Death Penalty.

Porter Releases Phone Records, Schedules (LVS)

By Tony Cook, Las Vegas Sun

Las Vegas Sun, October 28, 2006

Former aide sticks by his claims

U.S. Rep. Jon Porter released phone records and copies of his daily schedule Friday that he claims disprove a former staffer's allegations that the congressman made illegal fundraising phone calls from his government offices in Henderson and Washington, D.C.

While the records - which in some cases had names and phone numbers blacked out - do not prove that the allegations are false, they appear to conflict with some of the charges leveled by Porter's one-time executive assistant and scheduler, Jim Shepard.

The records show, for example, that Porter made fundraising and other phone calls from a campaign cell phone on April 18, a day when his schedule shows that he was at his district office.

DOJ_NMG_0088633

But his chief of staff, Mike Hesse, said he and Porter were out to lunch when the calls were made, and offered a receipt from about 11:45 a.m. at Sweet Tomatoes to prove it.

Federal law and House ethics rules prohibit lawmakers from making fundraising calls from federal buildings, even if the calls are paid for by a campaign.

Similarly, on April 21, when Shepard claims he witnessed Porter make fundraising calls between 1:30 p.m. and 2:30 p.m. at his Henderson office, Porter's schedule shows that the congressman left for a meeting with Clark County School District officials at 1:15 p.m. and remained out of the office the rest of the day.

Shepard said he remembers the meeting with school officials being delayed and that the schedule - which he kept while he was on Porter's staff - does not match e-mails and call logs he retained. He said he could not share the call logs on the advice of his attorney.

The documents from Porter came on the same day that the U.S. attorney's office turned over a complaint about the calls to the FBI.

"We did receive a referral," said FBI spokesman Dave Staretz. "I can't go into any particulars. We will evaluate the case and determine whether we will open a preliminary inquiry."

In a statement, Las Vegas-based U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden emphasized that no decision has been made on whether to proceed on the request for an investigation from Nevada Democratic Party Chairman Tom Collins.

"There is a distinction between reviewing a request for an investigation and opening an investigation," Bogden said. "We are not stating that Mr. Porter is under investigation, only that the matter will be referred for review."

Shepard told the Sun last week that he witnessed Porter making fundraising calls on a campaign cell phone from his district office on April 17, 18 and 21, and from his Washington office on June 15 and 16.

The records released Friday by Porter also show that on April 17 Porter made several fundraising phone calls during "call time" allotted in his schedule.

The schedule does not specify a location where the calls were made, but Shepard contends they occurred at Porter's district office.

"I can tell you he was not at the district office," Hesse said. He said he wasn't sure, however, where the calls were made.

On June 15, Porter's schedule shows that no call time was allotted, although Shepard insists Porter made fundraising calls from his Washington office that day.

In phone records provided by Porter for June 15, the names and phone numbers of those he called are blacked out.

Hesse said Porter blacked out the names and numbers of any phone calls that did not occur during a scheduled "call time," a period set aside for the congressman to make calls - professional, personal or political.

The information was blacked out, Hesse said, for privacy reasons.

"We are taking an extraordinary step to prove this is false," Hesse said.

Shepard on Friday stuck by his allegations.

"It is not a complete picture," he said of the records released.

E-mails among Shepard, Hesse and Porter's campaign staff back up his account, Shepard said. Asked about the e-mails, Hesse said he does not remember them and that a search of House computer archives did not turn up any e-mails that Shepard contends he sent to Hesse, including one in which Shepard tells Hesse, "We can NOT let him do this anymore."

Hesse admitted Friday that he did not search for e-mails except those listing him as a recipient. Many e-mails that Shepard points to as proof of his claims were not sent to Hesse.

Hesse also noted that if e-mails were deleted before they were archived, there would be no record of them.

Both Hesse and Shepard agree on at least one thing: Both said they welcome an investigation of the allegations. Tony Cook can be reached at 259-2320 or at tony.cook@lasvegassun.com.

Rolling Admitted Shreveport Murders Before Execution (AP)

AP, October 28, 2006

SHREVEPORT, La. - Before being executed for five Florida murders, serial killer Danny Rolling gave his spiritual adviser a handwritten confession to a grisly murder triple slaying 17 years ago in his home town of Shreveport.

Police and the Rev. Mike Hudspeth released copies of that apology and confession on Friday, two days after Rolling's execution.

Police have long suspected that Rolling stabbed William T. Grissom, 55, his 24-year-old daughter, Julie, and his 8-year-old grandson, Sean, as they got ready for dinner on Nov. 4, 1989, in Grissom's Shreveport home.

They had been sure of it since 1997, when Rolling sent a detailed confession, including a description of the crime scene, to the woman he had married in prison, and she sent it to police, said retired police detectives Don Ashley and Danny Fogger, who had worked on the case.

Since Rolling had pleaded guilty in Florida to killing five college students and his execution was expected, Louisiana authorities saw little reason to try him.

Still, police said Friday, it is a relief to have a signed, public confession.

Hudspeth said that during a two-hour visit on Tuesday, Rolling told him that he had killed the Grissoms, and would give him a written confession the following day. That was the document released at Friday's news conference.

Rolling was executed for killing Sonja Larson, Christina Powell, Christa Hoyt, Tracy Paules and Manny Taboada in 1990 in Gainesville, Fla.

He told a Florida television interviewer in 2000 that he accepted responsibility for the Grissoms' deaths, but stopped short of confessing.

Mafia Figure Is Sentenced To Life Term In 2 Murders (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

Baldassare Amato, a powerful Bonanno crime family figure who represents the group's traditional Sicilian roots, stood silently with his arms crossed yesterday as a federal judge denounced him and meted out a life sentence for two 1992 Mafia murders.

As the judge, Nicholas G. Garaufis of United States District Court in Brooklyn, tore into him for "using murder as a business tactic," at several points Mr. Amato raised his right hand to his chin and then crossed his arms again in front of his chest.

"Mr. Amato," said the judge, making no effort to mask his disgust, "you're just a plain, wanton murderer and a Mafia assassin. The sentence I'm going to give you, as far as I'm concerned, is a gift."

Mr. Amato, 54, dressed in a gray prison sweatshirt and khaki trousers, appeared unmoved when the judge handed down the life sentence, almost as though it were a cost of doing business. He and his lawyer had both declined to address the court.

After pronouncing the sentence, Judge Garaufis asked the lead prosecutor in the case, Assistant United States Attorney John Buretta, how much of a fine he could levy.

Mr. Buretta said the maximum was $250,000, and the judge levied it.

Mr. Amato, who is known as Baldo and who immigrated to New York from the Sicilian fishing village of Castellammare del Golfo when he was 18, was convicted on July 12 of racketeering conspiracy charges, including the murders of two Bonanno associates.

The jury concluded that he ordered the murder of restaurant owner Sebastiano DiFalco and carried out a second killing himself, shooting Robert Perrino in the head several times.

Prosecutors had presented evidence that the Bonanno family was concerned that Mr. Perrino, a delivery supervisor for The New York Post, might help expose an infiltration of The Post's delivery operation by the crime family.

The judge said that Mr. DiFalco was killed "possibly because Mr. Amato and his Mafia colleagues wanted to take over the business and they might have had a disagreement over price or some other detail."

The six-week trial was a primer on the devastation that federal prosecutors in Brooklyn have wrought on the Bonannos, cutting a swath through the family's ranks and upending its traditions with a growing cadre of informers.

Mr. Amato was also stoical when Judge Garaufis rejected a request by his lawyer, Diarmuid White, for a recommendation that he be sent to a prison in the New York area so his family could visit. "It's for them, your honor," Mr. White said of the family.

The judge was unmoved.

"I have compassion for the defendant's family, and I also have compassion for the members of the families of Sebastiano DiFalco and Robert Perrino," the judge said. "This defendant made it certain that they would never visit their family member, anywhere."

Mr. DiFalco's two nephews were in court yesterday and said they were gratified by the life sentence and the fine against Mr. Amato. "He's a cold and evil person," said one of them, Sal Montoro, 42. He said Mr. Amato had gone to their uncle's wake and vowed to help find the killer.

For Mr. Amato, after the sentence was handed down, it was a brisk, businesslike handshake and a small smile for his lawyer, and he walked out the courtroom's side door to the holding cells, accompanied by United States marshals.

MAFIA MURDERER GETS LIFE (NYPOST)

By Patrick Gallahue

DOJ_NMG_0088635

The New York Post, October 28, 2006

October 28, 2006 -- A U.S. judge lit into a convicted Mafia hit man before giving him a life sentence in Brooklyn federal court yesterday.

"Mr. Amato, you're just a plain, wanton murderer and assassin, and the sentence I'm going to give you is a gift," Judge Nicholas Garaufis said.

Garaufis tore into Baldassare "Baldo" Amato, convicted of two murders, after his lawyer asked him to consider sending him to a prison close to New York City for the sake of the Bonnano-family soldier's relatives.

"My compassion is overcome by my disgust and disdain for this defendant," he said.

Amato was convicted of racketeering and murdering two men, restaurant owner Sabastiano DiFalco and New York Post delivery supervisor Robert Perrino.

CIVIL LAW:

Ruling Upholds Air Force On Religious Issue (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 27 (AP) — A federal judge on Friday threw out a lawsuit against the Air Force that contended that evangelical Christian values were being illegally pushed on academy cadets.

An academy graduate said he would appeal the decision by the judge, James A. Parker of Federal District Court in Albuquerque. “Our fight is far from over,” said the graduate, Mikey Weinstein of Albuquerque.

The case was brought by Mr. Weinstein and other Air Force Academy graduates who contended that a military chaplain had violated their right to religious freedom by urging cadets to attend Christian services or face “the fires of hell.” That incident, the group asserted, reflected a broader policy of efforts to evangelize members of the Air Force.

But Judge Parker said the graduates could not claim that their First Amendment rights were violated, because they no longer attended the academy. Moreover, he said, the group failed to give specific examples of which cadets had been harmed, or when.

Last year, an Air Force committee concluded that there was no overt religious bias at the academy.

Suit Against Air Force Academy Dismissed (WT/AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

A federal judge yesterday threw out a lawsuit against the U.S. Air Force that contended evangelical Christian values were illegally pushed on Air Force Academy cadets.

U.S. District Judge James A. Parker said the academy graduates who filed suit could not claim their First Amendment rights were violated because they no longer attended the academy.

Moreover, the judge in Albuquerque, N.M., said the group failed to give specific examples of which cadets were harmed or when.

"Without that personal link or connection to future misconduct, plaintiffs have simply not shown that they will suffer an injury in fact that is both concrete and particularized and actual or imminent," Judge Parker wrote.

The case was brought by honors graduate Mikey Weinstein and other Air Force Academy graduates who said a military chaplain violated their religious freedom rights by urging cadets to attend Christian services or face being burned "in the fires of hell." That incident reflected a broader policy, the group charged, of efforts to evangelize Air Force staff.

Mr. Weinstein said he would appeal the decision.

"Our fight is far from over," said the Albuquerque resident.

Last year, an Air Force task force concluded there was no overt religious discrimination at the school but that some cadets and staff were insensitive. And in a step welcomed by conservative Christians, the Air Force in February released new guidelines for religious expression that dropped cautions to top officers about promoting their personal religious views.

The judge also rejected claims by Air Force Master Sgt. Phillip T. Burleigh, who asked to be included in the lawsuit, saying he was discriminated against in 1997 for not attending prayer meetings. Sgt. Burleigh, of Alamogordo, N.M., also said his supervisor used government resources to evangelize recruits, including hiring religious motivational speakers to lecture at mandatory-attendance conferences.

Judge Parker called Sgt. Burleigh's concerns "simply conjectural and hypothetical in nature."

DOJ_NMG_0088636

Mr. Weinstein and a religious freedoms watchdog group in Washington said the ruling delays efforts to protect the rights of people serving in the military.

"Religious bias and the outrageous violations of the separation of church and state continue to spread rampantly throughout our military," Mr. Weinstein said.

The Rev. Barry W. Lynn of the Washington-based Americans United for Separation of Church and State said the case revealed "very serious, systematic violations of the Constitution at the Air Force Academy."

"This is clearly not the end of the story," Mr. Lynn said. "Chaplains and officers are there to meet spiritual needs, and not to convert people to Christianity."

An Air Force Academy spokeswoman declined comment, referring calls to the Pentagon. An Air Force spokesman at the Pentagon said he was not aware of the decision, thus did not have an immediate comment.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Drifter Sought Over Hate Graffiti (WT)

By Matthew Cella, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

Federal and Arlington County authorities are searching for a drifter they believe has been drawing swastikas and other graffiti in the area around Arlington National Cemetery.

Police say that Ronald Bost, 47, of no fixed address, is responsible for a rash of vandalism near Arlington Memorial Bridge and Memorial Drive.

One July incident on a construction site at the Memorial Avenue Rehabilitation Project cost $1,000 to clean.

U.S. Park Police Detective Kevin Fornshill said that Bost is the "chief suspect" in the case, based largely on the fact that Bost has been arrested four times by park police on vandalism charges since the mid-1990s.

"He's out again and he's doing it again," Detective Fornshill said.

In 2004, Bost was arrested for painting swastikas and anti-Semitic obscenities over signs near the Netherlands Carillon at Arlington Cemetery.

His vandalism has been identified around the George Washington Parkway, as far south as Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport and as far north as the Francis Scott Key Bridge.

"The first documented cases we have that are linked to this guy go back to 1997," Detective Fornshill said.

The latest vandalism includes nine cases in which anti-Semitic and anti-Muslim statements and obscene drawings have appeared on construction equipment and road signs in the District and near Arlington National Cemetery and the Iwo Jima Memorial.

Arlington police say they are investigating with the U.S. Park Police because they suspect Bost is connected to at least six recent cases of vandalism in the Rosslyn area.

"We do have a number of cases dating back to 2004 that we think he's responsible for," said John Lisle, a spokesman for Arlington police.

He said the graffiti includes swastikas drawn on signs along a bike path and on newspaper boxes that distribute The Washington Post.

Bost has an extensive arrest record in Virginia, Maryland and the District, mostly for disorderly conduct but also for battery, and he has a felony assault conviction.

Detective Fornshill said that Bost also has been arrested for shouting anti-Semitic statements in Pershing Park in Northwest and outside the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.

U.S. marshals have an arrest warrant for Bost for a parole violation.

Police say Bost is 6-feet-2, weighs 200 pounds and has several tattoos on his arms and hands. Anyone who sees Bost is asked to contact police immediately.

11 In O.C. Charged With Voter Registration Fraud (LAT)

By Christian Berthelsen And Christine Hanley, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

Dozens of people who thought they were signing up to be Democrats ended up Republican. Those accused in the case are low-level, per-signature workers.

DOJ_NMG_0088637

The Orange County district attorney's office has charged 11 people with fraudulent voter registration stemming from a Republican registration drive this year that resulted in dozens of Democrats unwittingly being signed up as Republicans.

Those charged had been paid as much as $10 for each voter they registered as part of a Republican Party effort to recruit more voters in central Orange County. The area includes the district represented by Democratic Rep. Loretta Sanchez, a regular target of Republicans, and a competitive state Senate race.

The cases were filed Tuesday, and three defendants were arrested Wednesday and Thursday. They are in custody and are scheduled to be arraigned today and Monday. The district attorney's office refused to release any information about them, including details usually available, such as the names and charges.

Sources said a press conference is scheduled for Monday, a week before the Nov. 7 election, with Republican Secretary of State Bruce McPherson, who is locked in a tight election battle with Democratic state Sen. Debra Bowen.

"The only thing I can say is it is our policy to not make comments on pending matters, and I don't have any information to share at this time," said Susan Kang Schroeder, spokeswoman for Dist. Atty. Tony Rackauckas. "That's all I'm saying."

A spokeswoman for McPherson declined to comment.

Frank Barbaro, chairman of the Orange County Democratic Party, issued a statement Thursday congratulating Rackauckas on the arrests, putting the district attorney in the awkward position of not withholding comment on his own case.

"Hopefully, these arrests are a good first step toward discouraging those who would wish to suppress the democratic process, and we are hopeful that more preemptive action will be taken in the future," Barbaro said.

The prosecution highlights problems that can occur with signature-gathering and voter registration campaigns in which the workers are paid by the signature. Campaign watchdogs have derisively called it a "bounty hunter" system that creates incentives for often transient, low-paid workers to pad their results to make more money.

The case has been an embarrassment for the Orange County Republican Party since it first became known in February.

The charges come as the party finds itself reeling from a letter linked to GOP congressional candidate Tan Nguyen that was sent to Latino voters this month in what has been described as an effort to keep them from the polls in next month's election. Nguyen is running against Sanchez.

In both cases, Republican officials have quickly distanced themselves from the actions.

The voter registration charges cover at least 37 instances in which Democratic and Green Party voters and even one noncitizen were registered as Republicans. Each defendant was charged with felony counts of fraudulent completion of registration affidavits. The defendants are all low-level workers who circulated registration cards.

No charges have been filed against the companies or executives whom the Republican Party hired to conduct the registration drive, or party officials.

As many as 100 cases were turned over to prosecutors. In other cases, invalid phone numbers and incorrect addresses had been filled in on the forms.

Orange County election officials discovered the allegedly fraudulent registrations during a routine review in February, and Democrats conducting their own registration drive found more. Barbaro, the Democratic Party chairman, said he forwarded 500 complaints to prosecutors.

Scott Baugh, the chairman of the county Republican Party, said he received complaints from people who received letters welcoming them to the party and that registration workers were fired for being too aggressive or submitting faulty paperwork.

The actions did not benefit the party, he said, because the voters would not vote Republican, and it cost the party money to pay the signature gatherers.

"I hope they rot in jail for stealing from us and disenfranchising other voters," he said Thursday.

The recruiters were working for Bader & Associates, a Newport Beach petition consulting firm contracted by the Republican Party to register voters, and a subcontractor.

Tom Bader, the company owner, said Thursday his firm was never under investigation and cooperated fully.

He said it was difficult to control field workers. He said he no longer conducted voter registration drives, and that the news about the criminal cases hopefully would prevent future fraud.

"This action is really helpful," he said. "It's going to send a signal to those out in the field."

One of his subcontractors, John Burkett of Lake Elsinore, said Thursday that he discovered problems with his recruiters' work when he conducted random checks on the forms they had submitted, and notified his clients about it.

He said his three workers who had been charged quit this year. Like Bader, he no longer works on voter registration drives.

"I had questioned them on their voter registrations, because we found a few that were not sufficient," Burkett said. "That's why I don't work with them anymore."

*

christian.berthelsen@latimes.com

christine.hanley@latimes.com

Justice Department Official Meets With Residents Regarding Shooting (LCAP)

By Eric Cormier, AMERICAN PRESS

Lake Charles (LA) American Press, October 28, 2006

Several Lake Charles residents met with an official representing the U.S. Justice Department to start a dialogue about the relationship between the community and police since the Oct. 12 fatal police shooting of 29-year-old Trent Buckins.

The official with the Justice Department's Community Relations Service declined to speak to the American Press, citing governmental restrictions.

Since the November 2004 Chateau Du Lac fatal shooting by police, the Justice Department has had an official visit Lake Charles to help build more trust between the public and police.

The residents who attended Friday's meeting at City Hall — two police officials also attended — are pleased with the Justice Department's involvement.

"I think this is another positive step in the long process to gain clarity to what happened," the Rev. Henry Mancuso said. He was representing the city's Leadership Team for Community and Race Relations.

"This will be a long process to find out the truth of what happened. Until then, there will be tension in the community."

The federal government's response will be helpful in healing whatever wounds have been created since the most recent fatal police shooting, Mancuso said.

District A City Councilman Marshall Simien said the Louisiana State Police report on the shooting might not settle the issues that some residents have with police. That is why he respects the work the Justice Department is trying to initiate to end ill will.

"The Police Department is concerned that if the final report comes back and clears the police officer in question, will that end the situation? Our position is no," said Simien.

"The community at this point is not going to take somebody else's word that the shooting was correct because the question is going to be why did it have to happen? Somebody is dead. Why? What part of the training and protocol at the Police Department says this is justified?"

Wilbert Lewis, president of the NAACP's Lake Charles chapter, said the Justice Department's suggestions for dealing with police shootings, and other actions that might adversely affect a city, correspond with programs the nation's oldest civil rights group has championed.

"During the meeting, the issues of the shooting and alleged acts of brutality committed by the Lake Charles Police Department were discussed," Lewis said. "We do have a serious problem, and the key is to get everybody together and solve it."

One of the programs proposed by the Justice Department representative was a course on racial profiling. The NAACP chapter has asked that a citizen's panel, helping to oversee complaints against the Police Department, also be created.

"Everyone plays a major part in this," Lewis said. "We're not saying we can prevent other shootings from happening, but we have to try."

Police spokesman Sgt. Mark Kraus said the meeting was helpful in starting a dialogue between residents and the department. Police officials believe that as long as the public and police can talk, issues can be resolved.

"When that common ground is generally met, situations are helped," Kraus said.

Kraus said it's important that residents understand the issues that officers face every day before wrong conclusions are made regarding shootings and other incidents that may occur.

Mayor Randy Roach is optimistic that the Justice Department's involvement will help curb perceived problems between the police and residents.

"This is an opportunity for us to look at the relationship between law enforcement and the community and make sure we create an atmosphere of mutual trust and respect Roach said.

"The government's community relations officers are trained to make sure incidents like the shooting don't divide a community. Community relations officials help make us sensitive to issues and to address them up front and not ignore them. If we don't, then we will not have dialogue, and then we run the risk of other problems growing."

Union Claims Police-recruit Bias (INDYSTAR)

By Brendan O'Shaughnessy

The Indianapolis Star, October 28, 2006

IPD chief denies white applicants were passed over

DOJ_NMG_0088639

The police union is accusing the city of racial discrimination by stacking the first recruit class of the merged Indianapolis Metropolitan Police Department with minorities.

Vince Huber, president of the Indianapolis Fraternal Order of Police, said the department added minority candidates to its new recruit class at the expense of white applicants.

Indianapolis Police Chief Michael Spears acknowledged that the department reached into the next recruit class for qualified minorities to increase the diversity in the class, which begins training Nov. 13.

But he said adding minorities to the list did not come at the expense of any white applicants. Instead, he said the move simply increased the number of names submitted for approval to the department's merit board.

The upcoming recruit class will be the largest in history, reflecting a need to keep up with planned retirements and provide enough officers for the larger, merged department. The IPD and Marion County Sheriff's Department will complete the consolidation of their operations Jan. 1.

"We want to make sure we get the most qualified applicants possible," Huber said. "(But) the process should be color-blind."

"We believe we're following the law," Spears said. "None of the white candidates were dropped off simply because they were white."

The merit board, which must approve hiring, promotion and termination decisions, approved 55 candidates. The class includes 16 black, one Hispanic and 38 white candidates, for a minority representation of 31 percent.

The city's Police and Fire departments have operated under a U.S. Justice Department consent decree since 1978 that requires them to reflect the racial composition of the county workforce, which is about 21 percent black. That hasn't been met.

Currently, 15 percent of the IPD's 1,184 sworn officers are black, and 10 percent of the 397 sheriff's deputies are black.

The decree says the departments should aim to hire classes that are 25 percent black until the long-term goal is achieved. In the late 1970s, blacks made up 11 percent of IPD.

Richard Crenshaw, a retired IPD major who leads Fairness in Law Enforcement, which represents black officers, said that group was formed because the Fraternal Order of Police has never supported quotas or conscious efforts to achieve racial equality.

He said black officers who did not feel they got equal treatment never received FOP support and therefore filed the lawsuits leading to the consent decree.

Huber said he disagrees with Crenshaw's assessment of the FOP. Black officers are members of the organization, too, he said.

"We don't want any discrimination to take place in any shape or form. The membership overwhelmingly supports challenging hiring and promotions when we don't feel they are right," Huber said.

The merger of the city and county forces will hurt the numbers because the Sheriff's Department does not have as many minorities. As a single department, black representation will drop by 1 percentage point before factoring in the newest recruit class.

Kobi Wright, the city's top lawyer, said his unit and the merit board authorized the Police Department to interview minorities for this class who had been pre-screened for the second class of recruits. He said the city did that because it wants the department to reflect the diversity of the city.

He, too, denied Huber's allegations.

Nobody was bumped from the first IMPD recruit class, he said, because no list of recruits exists until the merit board approves one. Before that happens, he said, the department relies on a pool of applicants so the police force can keep up with retirements.

Wright said Huber's accusation of discrimination is a perfect example of why the city needs to continue operating under the consent decree.

"The consent decree requires that the city take all reasonable measures to meet the goal," Wright said. "It acts as a shield against lawsuits."

Call Star reporter Brendan O'Shaughnessy at (317) 444-2751.

New Voters Likely Out Of City Elections (BSH)

By Ryan Lafontaine

Biloxi Sun Herald, October 28, 2006

WAVELAND - Nearly 1,000 new residents here likely will be left out of next month's city elections, according to Waveland attorneys.

City leaders hired an independent consulting firm this year to figure a way to include hundreds of new voters living in a newly annexed section of town.

Waveland attorney Zach Butterworth said the Justice Department has not yet determined whether the new voters will be allowed to vote in the Nov. 7 election.

"The new area could have a minimal impact on the elections and the federal government needs to decide if the new voters can be included," he said.

According to federal legislation adopted in the 1960s, the Justice Department must review changes in ballot procedures, voting districts and other electoral rules in several states - mostly in the South - to ensure that minorities maintain influence in elections.

The city settled an annexation dispute in July with neighboring Bay St. Louis in a deal that gave Waveland a stretch of land along the western right of way of Mississippi 603.

Butterworth said new voters in the annexed area will be able to vote in the congressional elections, but not the city.

Before the annexation dispute was settled, the federal government approved a request from the city to merge its voting precincts into one location at the City Hall complex on Coleman Avenue, since Katrina damaged or destroyed many polling places.

Urban planners have created several options for redrawing the city's four ward lines, but it's unlikely the federal government will approve any of them in time for elections.

Butterworth said if the Justice Department approves the annexed voters, the most likely scenario would be to include them as part of Ward 4, rather than redrawing the ward lines.

Besides the several hundred annexed voters, City Hall said Friday that a few hundred new voters living in the old city limits had registered since the 2002 elections, but no one seems to know how many people were displaced and have not returned since the storm.

For Gay Couples, Ruling Has A Cash Value (NYT)

By Tina Kelley

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

TRENTON, Oct. 26 — The New Jersey Supreme Court granted gay couples the same rights as married couples this week, leaving it to the State Legislature whether to call their partnerships marriages or civil unions.

But for Cynthia and Lucy Vandenberg, the landmark ruling is also about another M-word: money.

The Vandenbergs, who have been partners for 12 years, have been forced to open their checkbooks repeatedly over the years to pay thousands of dollars in taxes on health benefits and for legal transactions that married couples rarely face.

There was the $1,500 to change their surnames, for instance, the $1,400 or so in taxes they paid annually for additional health benefits, and the $1,000 they spent so one could adopt the biological child of the other.

“For all of this, you need to hire an attorney, or you find out the hard way,” said Lucy Vandenberg, 37, the director of the state’s Council on Affordable Housing.

Now they wonder how the court’s decision will affect their next child, a son Lucy is carrying. Will Cynthia Vandenberg have to pay to adopt him?

The court gave the State Legislature 180 days to amend New Jersey’s marriage laws to allow same-sex couples to marry, or to create a parallel system such as a civil union to provide them with all the rights of married couples.

In their decision, the justices made it clear that they understood “the social indignities and economic difficulties” gay couples have faced.

“Without the benefits of marriage, some plaintiffs have had to endure the expensive and time-consuming process of cross-adopting each other’s children and effectuating legal surname changes,” the court said.

Other “economic disadvantages,” the court added, included “paying excessive health insurance premiums because employers did not have enough to provide coverage to domestic partners, not having a right to ‘family leave’ time, and suffering adverse inheritance tax consequences.”

The Vandenbergs, who live in Mill Hill, a gentrifying neighborhood in downtown Trenton, have formed a family with another gay couple, John Hatch, 44, and David Henderson, 48, who live a block and a half away and have been together 18 years.

In a 20-page parental contract signed by all four of them, Mr. Hatch and Mr. Henderson each agreed to be the biological father of one of the Vandenbergs’ children, to give up his parental rights so the biological mother’s partner could adopt the child, and to share in parenting responsibilities.

In other words, a contractually constructed partnership of four adults to raise the children.

DOJ_NMG_0088641

Their daughter, Devin, who is almost 2, calls Lucy "Mama," Cynthia "Mommy," Mr. Hatch "Daddy" and Mr. Henderson "Dad." Devin spends most of her time at the Vandenbergs', though as she gets older she will stay with Mr. Hatch and Mr. Henderson on Tuesday nights and weekends.

They say some straight couples they know envy the arrangement. "It's great having more adults around," Lucy Vandenberg said.

Mr. Henderson, a real estate developer, said so many areas of law involve marriage that it is hard for him to imagine a new legal system that would provide equal protection for him and his family.

If the New Jersey Legislature refuses to approve a same-sex marriage law, he said, "it scares me that they could ever actually create some parallel system that was truly equal. Is separate ever equal?"

During an interview with the family, Cynthia Vandenberg, 43, who stays home with Devin, asked Mr. Hatch whether he and Mr. Henderson would marry, should the New Jersey Legislature agree to same-sex marriage.

"You wouldn't go to Las Vegas?" she asked, then stopped herself. "I mean Atlantic City?"

No, he said, he fantasizes about a celebration in nearby Mill Hill Park.

All four drove to a rally in Montclair on Wednesday night after the court handed down its decision. Also there was Whitney Pillsbury-Clarke, 37, who lives in South Orange with his partner, John Pillsbury-Clarke, 41, and the three children they took in as foster children and later adopted.

"They'd give us the kids, they wouldn't even blink," he said, referring to the State of New Jersey. "But we were not good enough to get married. That's always burned us."

He described a wall in their house with the various validations of their commitment.

"There's our certificate of domestic partnership in New York City, a commitment ceremony certificate from the Metropolitan Community Church, and a domestic partnership certificate from New Jersey we got two years ago," he said.

As he spoke, his children, Sabrina, 5; Caitlin, 4; and Dylan, 2, piled in and out of a double stroller and skillfully negotiated the sharing of a bag of bread.

"And now maybe there will be a civil union, and eventually, a marriage certificate," he said, adding that he would like to see federally recognized marriage, so his family could move to any state.

"We'll probably need more wall space," he said.

Looming somewhere beyond the Legislature's decision is the question of how other states will treat New Jersey's same-sex couples. The United States Constitution does not require states to recognize marriages from other states, said Andrew Koppelman, a law professor at Northwestern University and the author of "Same Sex, Different States."

"No court in American history has ever so held," he said.

As Mr. Hatch said, "Domestic partnership is pretty good when you're in New Jersey, but it has no benefit when you're not."

And there are other legal questions that have yet to be resolved. For instance, if a same-sex couple lives in New Jersey, would both partners be eligible for health care benefits under a plan offered by a New York company where one of them works?

Debra E. Guston, a Glen Rock lawyer with several gay and lesbian clients, including the Vandenbergs, said she suspected that many thorny legal issues would arise before a new law was in place.

"I'm sure there'll be a partner who passes away during these six months, and the survivor has to deal with whether or not they're exempt from the estate tax," she said.

Already, one of Ms. Guston's clients, a schoolteacher in West Paterson, may be helped by the ruling. The teacher's school board had refused to extend benefits to her partner, but will probably have to reconsider, after the Supreme Court decision.

"It certainly has accelerated the discussion," Ms. Guston said.

Alicia Heath-Toby, 43, of Newark, one of the plaintiffs in the Supreme Court case, spoke at the Montclair rally, summing up her desire to have the same marital rights as straight people, and to have her love described in the same terms — in legal documents, in daily conversation, on insurance forms.

"No longer is it O.K. to check the 'other' box — if I have to check the 'other' box one more time. ..." she said, as the cheering crowd drowned out the rest of her sentence.

" 'Other' is no longer acceptable," she added. "Let us as a state be able to say, I am more than an 'other.' "

Civil Union Or Marriage? A Long Wait In New Jersey (NYT)

By Laura Mansnerus

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

TRENTON, Oct. 27 — New Jersey legislators, sorting through the few options given them by the State Supreme Court's ruling that gay couples be granted the full rights and benefits of heterosexual husbands and wives, cautioned today that it might take months to decide what to call the solution — marriage or something else.

DOJ_NMG_0088642

But the next few months are booked up.

"There's a tremendous confluence of pretty significant issues the Legislature must resolve" within the six months allotted by the court, Albert Porroni, the chief counsel of the Office of Legislative Services, said on Friday. He noted that both the Senate and the Assembly were heavily scheduled to work on property tax relief until January, and committed to start working on the budget early next spring. That has stopped some legislators from beginning to work on possible measures, which they were instructed to do by the state's high court on Wednesday.

On the liberal end of the political spectrum, at least one bill is already being written by a Democratic lawmaker to extend the term "marriage" to same-sex couples. And on the conservative end, some Republicans have revived a proposed constitutional amendment, introduced long ago, that would override the court's decision.

Many legislators, speaking informally since neither chamber has met since the ruling was issued, say the most likely result would be legislation providing for civil unions rather than marriage.

State Senator John Adler, a Democrat from Camden County who is a supporter of expanded rights for gay couples, said on Friday that whatever solution was arrived at, he would object to any interruption of the property tax discussions.

"I understand that for some New Jersey residents this is a burning issue," Mr. Adler said of the gay-marriage ruling. But he added: "For my constituents, the burning issue is property taxes. I don't want to get sidetracked from this crisis."

For now, Mr. Porroni and spokesmen for the legislative party caucuses said they were not aware of any requests to draft measures that would set up a system of civil unions. Bills cannot be introduced until the next session of each chamber — Nov. 9 for the General Assembly and Nov. 13 for the Senate — although legislators may release drafts at any time.

State Senator Loretta Weinberg, a Democrat of Bergen County, said she was "very interested in sponsoring legislation on civil unions," adding that legislation following the court's directions would not be complex. The only real point of contention, Ms. Weinberg said, was whether to use the word "marriage."

"I have trouble explaining this to a fourth grader," Senator Weinberg said. "We're going to do this, but we're going to have an argument over what to call it."

If the argument lasts too long and the Legislature does not meet its deadline, "the court didn't exactly make clear what would happen," Mr. Porroni said.

The Legislature has had other brushes with the court over ambitious mandates handed down. But Mr. Porroni said that in those instances, like any involving state funds, the deadline was imposed by the yearly budget process.

"We never got to the point where we were at loggerheads and the court would have to figure out what to do," he said.

In Massachusetts, the only state to be ordered by its high court to provide for gay marriage, the Legislature also had a 180-day deadline. Within a month of the ruling in November 2003, lawmakers asked for a clarification — which the court gave by ruling that civil unions would not suffice. As a result, the 180-day deadline for the granting of marriage licenses was enforced on schedule.

Laurence Tribe, a constitutional scholar at Harvard Law School, said the Massachusetts Legislature's request "strongly suggested that they were interpreting the 180-day window as perhaps an opportunity to monkey around and not recognize the full rights in the opinion."

"The New Jersey court has not allowed that ambiguity," Professor Tribe said.

In Massachusetts, the deadline was enforced, and gay couples have been able to marry there since May 2004. By that time, however, the Legislature had adopted a constitutional amendment defining marriage as a union of a woman and a man, and providing for civil unions for same-sex couples.

That proposal is to go before the voters on Nov. 7.

Conserving That Compassion (NYT)

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

When future generations of Americans look back on the current era, they'll puzzle over what it was about George W. Bush that made people imagine there was anything compassionate to his conservatism.

Having apparently lost all hope that he can use terrorism to scare voters into electing Republicans this November, the president has now begun raising the threat of gay marriage.

The moment the New Jersey Supreme Court issued a ruling on the subject this week, Mr. Bush began using every possible excuse to bring up "activist" judges and gay weddings on the campaign trail. "I mentioned his love for his family," Mr. Bush said at a rally for a Republican Senate candidate in Michigan. "He understands what I know, that marriage is a fundamental institution of our civilization. Yesterday in New Jersey we had another activist court issue a ruling ..."

The court in New Jersey, for what it's worth, was hardly activist. The State Legislature had given gay couples the ability to unite in domestic partnerships that gave them most, but not all, of the legal protections available to married heterosexuals. The court simply said that both kinds of partners deserved the same legal protection, and left it up to the lawmakers to figure out how to do it. Hardly a thunderbolt from the sky, but Mr. Bush took up the cause of protecting the “sacred institution that is critical to the health of our society” as if a cadre of antifamily jurists had just abolished matrimony.

DOJ_NMG_0088643

All this is, as everyone knows, just a show for rousing the base. If the last month has taught us anything about the Republican Party, it is that homophobia is campaign strategy, not conviction. Congressmen who trust their careers to gay staffers vote for laws to enshrine second-class citizenship for gays in the Constitution. Gay appointees and their partners are treated as married people at official ceremonies and social gatherings. Then whenever an election rolls around, the whole team pretends it’s on a mission to save America from gay marriage.

Mr. Bush and his faithful acolytes seem perfectly willing to stoke fears that create division and sorrow in a country that doesn’t need any more of either. The president has just a little more than two years left in office. You’d think that for once he’d want to consider devoting his time to making things better instead of worse.

Thought Police In The Lecture Hall (WP)

By Asheesh Kapur Siddique

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Universities are the bulwark of democratic societies -- places where individuals with diverse viewpoints come together to learn and to produce new knowledge for addressing social concerns, free of ideological interference. But these centers of freedom are under attack from people who want to inject partisan politics into our classrooms.

Led by activist David Horowitz, some conservatives are pushing for the adoption of an "Academic Bill of Rights" (ABOR) across America. The bill takes the form of student resolutions or legislative proposals claiming to protect the academic freedom of college students from ideological indoctrination by professors.

My classmates at Princeton passed a modified version of the bill in a student referendum in April. In July, Philadelphia's Temple University became the first institution to officially adopt the policy. Arizona's legislature is preparing to consider a version of the bill.

The College Access and Opportunity Act, passed by the House in March and under consideration in the Senate, aims to deny federal funding to institutions -- even private ones -- that refuse to comply with ABOR's limitations on speech.

In truth, these efforts only hurt the students they purport to help. Horowitz and his backers aren't protecting our rights; they're impeding our educations. The Academic Bill of Rights would substitute political correctness for the free exchange of ideas on campus by preventing faculty and students from discussing fresh or controversial ideas in class. It would restrict what professors can teach and what students can learn.

This exchange between teachers and pupils lies at the heart of liberal education. But ABOR's backers argue that professors presenting new ideas might "indoctrinate" or offend students. Their bill denies us the right to evaluate the merits of ideas and arguments for ourselves by banning "political" or "anti-religious" speech from classrooms.

College students are much smarter and more capable of distinguishing between propaganda and informed opinion than Horowitz and his supporters think. We have a right to learn about any issue our knowledgeable professors deem important to our intellectual growth. This proposal would curtail students' discussion of topics deemed "politically controversial" and liable to "offend" a sensitive classmate.

How can I learn about the modern Middle East in my political science classes if my professor isn't allowed to discuss the "controversial" topic of the Iraq war and its regional effects? Should my biology instructor be prevented from teaching evolution out of fear of offending a creationist classmate? And why should schools allow some left-wing campus agitator in Economics 101 to file a complaint because a lecturer discusses market efficiency rather than Marxist theories of labor?

All these scenarios are possible at institutions cowed into incorporating Horowitz's restrictions into their academic policy. The bill's vague language invites any student with an ideological agenda to use its provisions to politicize syllabi and restrict campus speech.

No disgruntled individual has a right to inhibit everyone else's ability to learn. Youthful skepticism about received wisdom is, of course, essential for intellectual maturation. And a student who puts forth an unpopular argument in class or on an assignment should not be disparaged by an instructor or given a bad grade.

But almost every university has policies prohibiting such harassment along with independent appeals procedures to protect both students and the integrity of the academic environment. Horowitz's restrictions, in contrast, would invite outside monitoring of the classroom, creating hostility between students and professors, and politicizing the intellectual environment at school. It would allow the whims of partisan legislators, rather than the judicious advice of knowledgeable PhDs, to dictate what and how young adults learn.

DOJ_NMG_0088644

My classmates and I want our elected leaders to focus on addressing our real concerns when it comes to getting an education -- student loans, skyrocketing tuition and the post-graduation job market. We don't want them making it harder for us to learn by restricting the free exchange of ideas on campus.

The writer is a senior at Princeton University.

ANTITRUST:

Tribune Is Said To Get Bids From Private Equity Firms (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

The Tribune Company received several preliminary offers late yesterday from a series of private equity firms, according to people briefed on the auction.

The preliminary offers, which are nonbinding and known as "indications of interest," are the first step in an auction for Tribune, which said last month that it would consider selling its 11 newspapers and 25 television stations.

The company includes assets like The Los Angeles Times, The Chicago Tribune, The Baltimore Sun, Newsday and the Chicago Cubs.

Among Tribune's suitors, these people said, are a group including Providence Equity Partners, Madison Dearborn Partners and Apollo Management; another consortium including Thomas H. Lee Partners and the Texas Pacific Group; and the Carlyle Group and Bain Capital, which are each planning to bid separately.

Notably absent from the bidding was any major newspaper company, though it remained possible that Gannett or another rival company could emerge.

Tribune has a market value of $8.2 billion. Analysts have had scattered estimates about how much the company could be sold for, with some estimating a price as high as $10 billion and others estimating Tribune will not fetch any premium.

The preliminary offers from the teams of private equity firms were only for the entire company; it was unclear last night whether Tribune was formally entertaining offers for specific assets like The Los Angeles Times, which has been the target of several wealthy Los Angelenos like David Geffen and Eli Broad.

Exact terms of the preliminary offers could not be learned and it was likely they would change substantially once bidders have access to Tribune's confidential records and books.

Shares of Tribune, which is based in Chicago, fell 32 cents, to $33.47.

Local Support Boosts Baltimore Sun Bidder (WT)

By Sean Lengell, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

BALTIMORE -- The man behind a local effort to buy the Baltimore Sun from the Tribune Co. said yesterday he is encouraged by the amount of community support he has received.

"I have never witnessed this kind of response to a business transaction," said Theodore G. Venetoulis, a former Baltimore County politician and current owner of a Maryland news and political magazine. "Newspapers still have a very substantial role in people's lives. It touches the core of people."

Mr. Venetoulis said he received several telephone calls from potential investors after reports were published yesterday revealing the group's intentions.

"The group we've put together understand two things," said Mr. Venetoulis, who lost a Democratic primary bid for governor in 1978. "One, that this will not be an investment that will provide the usual yield and return that some investors will be used to. Secondly, they've agreed that they would not in any way attempt to jeopardize the paper's independence or attempt to give it a certain ideological bent."

The group includes Abell Foundation President Robert C. Embry Jr. and longtime civic leader Walter Sondheim, the Sun reported.

The founders of the Abell Foundation sold the Baltimore Sun Co. to the Times Mirror Co. in 1986, which sold itself to the Tribune Co. in 2000.

The group has contacted the Tribune Co. about its interest but hasn't made a formal offer for the paper. The Tribune Co. has declined to comment.

Meanwhile, two Boston buyout firms, Bain Capital LLC and Thomas H. Lee Partners LP, may make competing bids for the entire Tribune Co., according to reports published yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0088645

Mr. Venetoulis said that for tax reasons the Tribune Co. was more likely to sell itself as a whole rather than in pieces.

"We'll probably have our best shot at owning the Sun once a private-equity group chooses to spin off the properties," he said. "We can't afford to buy the whole company ourselves."

The Washington-Baltimore Newspaper Guild, which represents the Sun's newsroom staff, recently meet with Mr. Venetoulis' group and said it is open to the idea of a change in ownership.

"It's early to say, but they seem sincere and we like what we've heard so far," said Bill Salganik, a Sun reporter and president of the Washington-Baltimore guild. "We could imagine working with the Venetoulis group."

The Baltimore group is the latest to seek to buy metropolitan daily newspapers from embattled corporations.

A group led by public relations and advertising executive Brian Tierney recently paid $515 million for the Philadelphia Inquirer and Philadelphia Daily News.

A group led by Jack Welch, the former head of General Electric Co., said this week that it was interested in buying the Boston Globe. And in Los Angeles, three billionaires, including music executive David Geffen, have said they want to buy the Los Angeles Times, which also is owned by the Tribune Co.

Most large newspaper companies are publicly held, but as the sector has struggled with declining circulation and advertising revenue, it has fallen into disfavor on Wall Street, often leading to calls to break apart the businesses.

· This article is based in part on wire services reports.

A New Advertising Engine (WP)

By Sara Kehaulani Goo, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Google Expands Its Web Reach to Madison Avenue

NEW YORK -- At Google Inc.'s new office near the Hudson River, Volvo's top U.S. advertising manager has just flown in from California to talk about next year's launch of a new car, aimed at the hip, 20-something crowd.

Linda Gangeri, a Volvo executive, wants to hear Google's ideas about online video. She high-fives the company for its recent decision to purchase online video phenomenon YouTube Inc. and asks for Google's thoughts about how to advertise the new car, which Volvo is considering launching with commercials only on the Internet.

"This is a target we've never reached before and one you cannot reach via traditional marketing messages -- they reject it," she tells them. "We look to you and challenge you, with Google being more of that young, targeted mind-set."

Just a few years ago, Google was a bit player on Madison Avenue. It specialized in tiny text ads shown alongside search results and in the margins of thousands of Web sites that partner with Google.

But recently Google has moved beyond search, reaching out to big advertisers to sell them online graphical or display ads on its partner sites. The firm is developing new Web video ad formats that could give TV commercials a run for their money and has been staffing up new projects to sell ads offline in newspapers and magazines and on radio.

Earlier this month, Google's ambitions were on display when it opened its new office in the old Port Authority building, covering 1 1/2 floors on an entire Manhattan block in the funky Chelsea neighborhood. The company has recruited executives from some of the biggest media firms and is rapidly expanding its 500-member team here in an attempt to cultivate relationships with Madison Avenue and large advertisers.

"There's probably a false assumption in the marketplace that Google is a bunch of machines in Mountain View [Calif.] and we don't have relationships like you might see at Conde Nast up the street or at ABC television," said Patrick Keane, Google's director of product marketing.

Google's strategy is to bring the math and science that fueled its search-engine ad success to other forms of marketing. The company's existing text-ad system allows advertisers to see how many people click on each ad and pay only when someone clicks, helping advertisers calculate the return on their marketing dollars. Eventually Google hopes to offer similar metrics for online video ads and off-line campaigns, though it is still in the early stages of figuring out how those might work.

"They're trying to take the DNA of search marketing" to apply it to other kinds of advertising, said Timothy Hanlon, senior vice president at Denuo, a new-media consulting division of Publicis Groupe. Hanlon added that the bigger pot of money in traditional "brand-marketing budgets" is a natural target for Google.

In wooing Madison Avenue, Google faces some challenges. Its foray into display and video ads brings it face to face with rival Yahoo Inc., which established its office here in 1997 and is regarded as the leader in helping large companies develop branding campaigns on the Web. Last year, Google reorganized its entire sales force into 12 industry-specific teams after realizing that big advertisers didn't want a sales team of "generalists"; they wanted experts familiar with their field.

Ad agencies seem open to working with Google, though some said the search firm has tried to go around them and pitch advertisers directly. And while Google's ad products beyond search are experimental, they seem worth trying, some said.

DOJ_NMG_0088646

"The scariest thing about Google is they don't know what they don't know," said Jason Clement, associate director of search engine marketing at Carat Fusion, an advertising agency. "There's a difference between a Harvard mathematician and someone who's been selling ads for 20 years. The mathematician is smarter, but if you want Coca-Cola's dollars, the guy selling billboards for 20 years is the one you want."

Unlike Yahoo, AOL or other Web sites that attract a big audience, Google doesn't sell ads on its home page, Google.com. Instead, it partners with thousands of other Web sites and places ads on them. Most of the ads today are small text items, titled "Ads by Google," but increasingly Google is helping companies place banner and video ads on these same partner sites.

By applying technology to measure their impact, Google plans to differentiate its banner and video ads from those of its competitors. Teaming with online research firm ComScore Networks Inc., Google is trying to correlate the effectiveness of each ad by tracking the number of people exposed to it who later perform searches about the product.

For example, people who visited the AutoTrader.com site this summer were shown an image of a Volvo sport-utility vehicle advertising the car for lease at $389 a month. ComScore placed "cookies," or tracing files, on the computers of visitors and tracked how many typed the word "Volvo" or "Volvo SUV" into a search box weeks or months later. During the Web campaign for the Volvo's XC90, Google said 39 percent of Internet users who were exposed to the ads later conducted online searches for Volvo cars.

While the online campaign was running, Google also measured a 183 percent increase in visits to the Volvo Car Corp. site, Volvocars.com, and a 164 percent increase in the number of people who clicked more deeply into Volvo's site, indicating greater interest.

Google did not try to correlate viewership of the online ads with car sales data. Nor could it say how much impact a TV campaign Volvo also was running might have had on Internet searches or site visits.

Anna Papadopoulos, interactive media director of Volvo's campaign with ad agency Euro RSCG 4D, said Google's data provided Volvo with confidence and made clear that Google wanted to be accountable for the results. "At the very least, we were able to know that the Google campaign was attributed to" those numbers, she said. Papadopoulos said Volvo also advertises with other major Internet networks, including Yahoo, Microsoft Corp.'s MSN and AOL, and that each has its strengths. Yahoo and MSN, for example, use technology that can show ads to potential customers who have indicated an interest in products based on past browsing. While Google doesn't offer that capability, Papadopoulos likes Google's hands-on customer service. She said she also was impressed with how Google matched the demographics of likely Volvo buyers with visitor demographics at dozens of small sites.

Google, which announced this month that it was buying online video site YouTube for $1.65 billion in stock, has big plans to expand into video advertising. The firm hasn't announced exactly what it plans to do with YouTube, but both properties are pushing a new kind of Internet advertising called "click to play." The ads are essentially online video commercials that don't play unless a visitor clicks on the image.

Google said it opposes "pre-roll" Web ads, which resemble TV commercials by interrupting site visitors and forcing them to watch a video before they can see the content they are seeking. With Google's click-to-play ad service, advertisers will be able to select specific Web sites where they want their video ad displayed or allow Google to select the sites, based on whether the audience of a Web site or its content matches that of the advertiser.

Google thinks the ads will do well with movie studios, which could use trailers as click-to-play ads, and with carmakers, who can use video to draw Internet users shopping for a car. But the format remains new and largely untested.

As one of the most-searched automakers on the Web, Volvo agreed to use Google's new video format to apply its recent "Who Would You Give a Volvo To?" TV ads to the Web. And it is thinking about using the format for its new car next year.

"As a small brand, we do have to take risks," said Volvo's Gangeri. "But at the same time, if you want to reach a target like [our new vehicle], you can't do that in the safe, secure world of Volvo as we know it."

Arcelor Mittal Takes Stake In Mich. Auto Supplier Noble (AP)

AP, October 28, 2006

BRUSSELS, Belgium - Arcelor Mittal SA said Friday it was merging a unit that makes steel for the auto industry with Michigan-based laser welder Noble International Ltd. in return for a 40 percent stake in the business and a $300 million payment.

The Luxembourg-based steelmaker - currently being formed from a tie-up between Arcelor SA and Mittal Steel Co. NV - said it would become Noble's largest stockholder when the deal was complete.

Arcelor Mittal said this would strengthen the company's position with the global car industry. The transaction will combine Arcelor's laser-welded tailored blank business TBA - the largest in Europe - with Noble, North America's largest producer of laser-welded steel products.

Mittal has significant U.S. operations through its earlier acquisition of International Steel Group.

DOJ_NMG_0088647

Combining expected results for this year, the combined Arcelor-Noble business would have a revenue of $1.1 billion and earnings before interest, taxes, depreciation and amortization of $122 million.

The Arcelor unit employs 670 people at nine plants in Europe, one in the U.S. and a quarter stake in a joint venture in China. The company said its revenue would be around $500 million this year.

Noble, headquartered in Warren, has more than 2,000 workers at 12 plants in the U.S., Canada, Mexico and Australia. It expects 2006 revenue to hit $600 million. Earlier this month, it bought Pullman Industries Inc., which makes steel tubular parts for carmakers.

Arcelor Mittal said the deal should close in March 2007 after it wins approval from Noble's stockholders and antitrust regulators.

ON THE NET

Arcelor Mittal SA: http://www.arcelormittal.com

Noble International, Ltd.: http://www.nobleintl.com

FCC Sets Vote On AT&T Purchase Of BellSouth To Nov. 3 (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Molly Peterson

Bloomberg, October 28, 2006

Oct. 27 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Federal Communications Commission plans to vote Nov. 3 on AT&T Inc.'s $82 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp., three weeks after a deadlock on the terms of approval derailed a previously scheduled vote.

The commission, which released its agenda for the meeting today, hasn't indicated what types of conditions it may place on the deal, the biggest telephone-company combination ever.

Facing pressure from the panel's two Democrats, AT&T earlier this month offered concessions including a price freeze on certain business data services and $10-a-month high-speed Internet access for some BellSouth customers. Rival companies want tougher conditions, such as price controls.

``We still continue to believe there's a good chance the FCC will conditionally approve the necessary AT&T-BellSouth license transfers at some point in November,'' Stifel Nicolaus & Co. analyst Blair Levin said today in an investor note.

FCC approval is the last regulatory hurdle for San Antonio-based AT&T, the biggest U.S. phone company, to complete the transaction, which the companies announced almost eight months ago. The Justice Department and 18 states cleared the deal without conditions. FCC deliberations have been complicated by the likely recusal of one member, which leaves the panel evenly split between Democrats and Republicans.

FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, a Republican who initially proposed approving the deal without conditions, postponed an Oct. 13 vote after Democrats Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein, who are seeking conditions, asked for public comment on AT&T's proposals.

The vote could be postponed again if Martin and fellow Republican Deborah Tate fail to reach an agreement with Copps and Adelstein by Nov. 3, analysts said.

Shares of AT&T fell 18 cents to $34.22 at 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading and have risen 40 percent this year. Atlanta-based BellSouth fell 14 cents to $45.04 and has climbed 66 percent this year.

Smithfield Foods Gambling On Merger; Foes Fighting Expansion (DPHR)

By Chris Flores 247-4738

Newport News (VA) Daily Press, October 28, 2006

The pork company's opponents were fighting this week for federal regulators to deny the merger.

Smithfield Foods adversaries are trying to ensure that the world's largest pork company loses a $100 million bet.

If the Department of Justice allows Smithfield to purchase Premium Standard Farms, the $674 million deal will help Smithfield further bolster its position as the company that raises and slaughters the most hogs in the country.

A line of opponents has formed to protest, saying Smithfield will dominate the price of hogs. Smithfield and Premium knew the fight was coming, so the deal stipulates that Smithfield will pay $100 million to Premium if anti-trust regulators deny the deal.

But Smithfield was willing to take the risk. Smithfield gained confidence by surviving federal regulatory scrutiny when it bought Farmland Foods in 2003. Many of the same groups that opposed that deal also oppose this new one. The National Farmers Union, along with a coalition of rural and farm groups, made a case to the Justice Department this week, arguing the deal should be denied.

"The packing industry is already pretty drastically consolidated," said Fred Stokes, spokesman for the Organization for Competitive Markets, an agricultural think tank funded by independent farmers. "And here's the No. 1 hog producer buying the No. 2 guy."

DOJ_NMG_0088648

The opponents of the deal include a growing list of Midwestern politicians, who say the deal will give Smithfield the ability to determine hog prices. They formally asked the Justice Department to scrutinize the merger and have called for congressional hearings.

Smithfield is already the largest processor of hogs, with 26 percent of the market. By adding Premium, the company will have 31 percent. Farmers worry that with less competition for buying hogs, Smithfield can drive down prices.

Smithfield opponents say Premium had the only other slaughter facility in the Southeast. Without that competitor, Smithfield can set the prices it pays all farmers in the region to raise hogs, said Michael Stumo, general counsel for the competitive markets group.

"That, per se, should disqualify the acquisition on anti-trust grounds," said Stumo.

And all sales are under contracts that pay farmers a fee for raising hogs - there is no market price for the hogs themselves to be sold.

"You cannot sell hogs in that region unless you are contracted," said Stumo.

The company also will have a greater concentration of power in the Western and Southern part of the Midwestern hog production area. Even there, only about 10-15 percent of the hogs are sold on an open market.

By purchasing the second-biggest hog producer, Smithfield will raise about 20 percent of the hogs nationwide if the deal closes. Its clout on that side of the business will also help Smithfield influence the purchase of hogs by its competitors.

Stokes said he thinks the case is about as strong as possible, but that doesn't mean the government will intervene. He believes lower-level staff members at the Justice Department will support rejection, but will be overruled by political appointees.

"The chances are good that they're going to approve it," he said.

A Smithfield spokesman didn't return a call for comment.

BD Wins Federal Antitrust Approval For TriPath Deal (BERGCR)

By Dunstan Prial, STAFF WRITER

Bergen County Record, October 28, 2006

Becton, Dickinson and Co. said Friday that federal antitrust approval has moved it a step closer to its planned $350 million acquisition of TriPath Imaging Inc., a manufacturer of cancer-screening products.

BD has said adding TriPath's technology will help it expand its presence in the field of cancer diagnostics.

The deal, which the Franklin Lakes-based maker of medical devices announced in August, still needs to be approved by TriPath's shareholders, said BD spokeswoman Colleen White.

The Federal Trade Commission, which oversees antitrust matters in the United States, said in a statement that it had completed its investigation of the deal and did not plan to take action.

As advances in research have created new opportunities for treating various forms of cancer, the potentially broad -- and lucrative -- market for cancer treatments has prompted health care companies large and small to target oncology.

TriPath, based in Burlington, N.C., uses sophisticated computer imaging to detect cell abnormalities that might indicate the onset of cancer.

BD already owns a 6.5 percent stake in TriPath.

The shares were purchased in 2001, when the two companies first began collaborating to find markers to diagnose cancer.

The acquisition calls for BD, maker of the Ace bandage brand and the world's biggest manufacturer of hypodermic needles, to pay TriPath's stockholders $9.25 a share.

BD's shares fell 18 cents to $70.69 on Friday. TriPath's shares fell 1 cent to $9.13.

At the time the deal was announced, TriPath's shares were valued at $5.12.

A TriPath spokesman did not immediately return a phone call on Friday.

BD's chief executive officer, Edward J. Ludwig, has said the company's strong recent fiscal results will allow BD to pursue growth through acquisitions.

For its fiscal third quarter, which ended June 30, BD reported profit rose 9 percent.This was due in part to the $230 million acquisition in February of GeneOhm, a San Diego-based biotechnology company that has developed a rapid test for diagnosing a powerful virus frequently transmitted among hospital patients.

ENVIRONMENT:

Appeals Court Halts Stryker Activity Here (HSB)

By Gregg K. Kakesako

DOJ_NMG_0088649

Honolulu Star-Bulletin, October 28, 2006

The Army lost a major court battle to local environmentalists and anti-war activists yesterday and might not be ready to deploy a Stryker brigade to Iraq late next year.

A 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals panel in San Francisco, in a 2-1 decision, issued a temporary injunction halting construction, training and any other activities dealing with the $1.5 billion Stryker Combat Brigade planned for the 25th Infantry Division.

David Henkin, Earthjustice attorney, said the case now reverts to U.S. District Judge Dave Ezra to determine if any Stryker-related construction or training can occur while the Army works on a new environmental impact statement.

Henkin said he will not only ask Ezra to prevent the Army from causing "irreparable harm" to environment, but he also does not want the Stryker conversion to be so far along that it cannot be stopped.

The Army has said the 2nd Brigade Combat Team has completed 60 percent of its training and received 70 percent of its equipment. The 2nd Brigade is slated to grow into a 3,500-member combat unit built around 328 of the 19-ton, eight-wheeled vehicles.

Before the injunction was put into effect, the Army had said the 2nd Brigade would be ready to deploy to Iraq by November 2007 as the fifth of seven planned Stryker units.

In court papers, Ron Borne, director of transformation for the 25th Infantry Division's 2nd Brigade Combat Team, listed Stryker-related construction projects that must be completed for the Army to meet its deadline.

The Army issued a terse statement yesterday: "We are in receipt of the court order, and we are complying."

A federal appeals panel ruled Oct. 5 that the Army had violated the National Environmental Policy Act by failing to consider other locations outside of Schofield Barracks for its fifth Stryker brigade.

The court ordered the Army to amend its environmental impact statement -- a process that could take as long as a year. Despite the court's ruling, the Army maintained that it could proceed with 28 Stryker-related construction projects, totaling $693 million, during the review period.

Earthjustice, representing Ilioulaokalani Coalition, Na Imi Pono and Kipuka, sought the temporary injunction last week because the Army planned to start construction Wednesday on a nearly 1,000-acre live-fire training complex at Schofield Barracks.

Henkin said the Army now concedes that this training range is no longer "a critical construction project either for Stryker conversion or to train other units."

Kyle Kajihiro, an anti-war activist, said yesterday that cultural monitors discovered this month what they believe are more than 200 cultural sites, including what could be ancient burial areas.

"It really raises the level of concern since some of them could be sacred burial sites," Kajihiro said.

In court filings last week, Henkin said the Army acknowledged that construction of the $6 million urban-assault course could result in destruction or damage of Hawaiian cultural sites.

Cultural monitors also have had no opportunity to inspect areas where the motor pool and the vehicle wash facility will be built, the environmental group said.

"We're pleased the court recognized the Army's plans to plow ahead with Stryker conversion in Hawaii -- before even looking at other places where it could achieve its goals without destroying cultural sites -- violated both the law and common sense," Henkin said.

In opposing Earthjustice's request for a temporary injunction, U.S. Justice Department attorneys said the appeals court "must balance national security implications of enjoining those activities against the harm alleged by the plaintiffs."

But Earthjustice argued that the Army's "rhetoric rings hollow" that any delay in the development of a Stryker Combat Brigade would jeopardize national security. In an 11-page rebuttal, Henkin said the Army used the same arguments last year.

At that time, Henkin pointed out the Army said any postponement of the 2nd Brigade Combat Team's conversion beyond May 2007 would "significantly degrade the Army's ability to provide effective and ready forces to meet strategic commitments, including ongoing operations in Iraq, and reduce the Army's strategic posture to deter conflict and respond to crisis situations in the Pacific area of responsibility, including the Republic of Korea."

Initially, May 2007 was the date 25th Infantry Division officials had said the Stryker Brigade Combat Team would be ready for wartime duty.

"The Army fails to explain why this half-year delay, which allegedly posed such dire ramifications, did not, when it came to pass, have any adverse consequences," Henkin said.

Fireman Fights To Live, Comrades Fight Blaze (LAT)

By David Kelly, Jonathan Abrams, Maeve Reston And Scott Gold, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

BEAUMONT — Battling gusting Santa Ana winds, fire crews today fought to try to contain the fast-moving Esperanza arson fire that has killed four firefighters.

Officials this morning released the names of the dead.

Killed were engine Capt. Mark Loutzenhiser, 44, of Idyllwild; engine operator Jess McLean, 27, of Beaumont; assistant engine operator Jason McKay, 27, of Phelan; and firefighter Daniel Hoover-Najera, 20, of San Jacinto.

A fifth firefighter was in critical condition this morning in Arrowhead Regional Medical Center in Colton. He was identified as Pablo Cerda, 23, of Fountain Valley.

Cerda has burns over 90% of his body, severe lung injuries and was placed on life support. His chances of survival are considered poor.

At an afternoon news conference at Arrowhead, David T. Wong, chief of trauma, said Cerda has had some improvement in his "minute-to-minute condition," but the overall prognosis remains poor because of the severity of the burns.

Cerda may be sent to surgery later today to have the burned skin removed. Cerda remains under heavy sedation, Wong said.

The rough terrain in the San Jacinto Mountains of Riverside County just west of Palm Springs posed difficult problems for firefighters trying to keep the blaze from the more populated areas, Janet M. Upton, of the California Department of Forestry and Fire Protection, said today. Winds are expected to gust up to 45 mph and firefighters are facing a long day.

"It's mountain goat territory," Upton said.

The sharp winds are expected to continue until at least tonight, said Mike Giannini, battalion chief of the Marin County Fire Department, one of the agencies supplying some 1,750 firefighters.

"The next 36 hours are going to be key for this thing," he said.

Firefighters ignited a small backfire in Beaumont about half of a mile away from a school with 80 children with special needs. The children moved into the gymnasium but did not leave the building. The fire was started to ensure that the Esperanza fire did not leap to the school's grounds.

"Anytime we get winds blowing by we are worried, but we were all ready to go if necessary," said Lynn Elder, who handles community relations for the school, Child's Help, in the foothills of the San Jacinto Mountains.

The Esperanza fire was deliberately set Thursday about 1:12 a.m. in the San Gorgonio Wash. Fed by dry fuel and bitter winds, it has consumed more than 24,000 acres, according to the official website.

The fire is about 5% contained, with no indication when it will be fully controlled. The fire continues to move mainly to the west and southwest, being driven by east to northeast winds.

The fire is moving toward Highway 79, south of Interstate 10, threatening to push toward Idyllwild and San Jacinto this morning. It has destroyed 10 homes and another 500 homes and three commercial structures are threatened, according to the CDF.

The Air Quality Management District also warned that smoke from the Esperanza wildfire is expected to create unhealthful air quality conditions today in areas of Riverside and Orange counties.

Despite the loss of four of their own, firefighters this morning braced for their difficult day. At one camp here, firefighters rose from their tents and grabbed coffee. The about 200 to 300 firefighters were briefed about their assignments, which are detailed down to the specific roads and structures they are to protect.

The sun rose but the wind was already gusting so much that it sent swirling dust devils across the fields at the command post.

About 3 a.m., firefighters evacuated another 100 homes at the south end of Banning, near the foothills below Silent Valley. There were some gusts of wind during the night that sent the fire down toward Banning. The residents went to community centers and to friends' homes.

The South Banning evacuations were in addition to Thursday's at Twin Pines and Poppet Flats. More than 700 people have been evacuated, according to officials.

In Washington, the White House joined the list of public officials to express their condolences over the firefighters' deaths.

"A little bit ago, the president placed a phone call to Tom Tidwell, who's the deputy regional forester of the U.S. Forest Service, to express condolences over what is now being called the Esperanza incident, a fire near Palm Springs, California, that has claimed the lives of four firefighters," said spokesman Tony Snow.

The president also "said he hopes that whoever is the perpetrator will be caught quickly and brought to justice."

More than 100 tips have been delivered to the Riverside County Sheriff's Department as the search continued for those who set the arson fire. Anyone arrested could also face murder charges because of the firefighters' deaths.

DOJ_NMG_0088651

Sheriff's spokesman Sgt. Earl Quinata said this morning that there are no suspects and denied a television report that authorities were searching for a suspect in a white van.

The pool of reward money for information grew to $400,000 from the $100,000 Riverside County officials pledged Thursday.

This morning, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger announced a state reward of $100,000 for information leading to the arrest and conviction in a California court of the person or persons responsible for setting the Esperanza wildfire.

At another news conference, San Bernardino County Board of Supervisors Chairman Bill Postmus said the county would also offer $100,000.

And the Morongo band of Mission Indians offered $100,000.

On Thursday, Schwarzenegger said that he had instructed his administration "to put every resource into fighting this fire and making sure that the evacuees have everything they need."

The governor declared a state of emergency in Riverside County, which allows the state to provide any needed assistance.

Even as officials pursued the arson investigation, the dead firefighters were a grim reminder of the dangers brought by Santa Ana conditions.

"These winds were devil winds. They came out of nowhere," Pat Boss, a U.S. Forest Service spokesman, said Thursday. "They were fleeing for their lives and the flames caught them."

Thursday's death toll was the highest for California's wild land firefighting community in nearly three decades. In 1979, four state forestry department firefighters were killed when flames overtook them as they walked a bulldozed fire line near San Luis Obispo. The most firefighter deaths in a California wildfire occurred in 1933, when 25 firefighters were killed fighting a Griffith Park blaze.

Three years ago — almost to the day — 14,000 firefighters battled California's worst recorded wildfires, which killed 24 people, destroyed 3,361 homes and burned 739,597 acres in Southern California. One firefighter died, and hundreds more had unforgettable close calls. One of those fires, the Old fire in San Bernardino County, also was an arson fire and remains unsolved.

Earlier Thursday, the fire trapped several hundred people for more than eight hours in the Silent Valley recreational vehicle park. A small army of firefighters circled the park to keep the flames at bay, and by afternoon the danger had subsided, allowing residents to leave the park if they wished.

The fire's speed shocked longtime residents of the remote area who are accustomed to the threat.

John Atherton, a 33-year-old construction manager who was working overnight Thursday, raced home after calling home and telling his wife and children to flee. He grabbed his dog, videos of his three daughters — and tax papers.

"You kind of try to prioritize your whole life in a matter of a half an hour," he said.

He placed sprinklers on his roof. As he left, "the fire all of a sudden turned direction and headed straight toward our home," he said. "That was pretty scary."

As he made his way down a road toward Banning, traffic was thick with people fleeing. Atherton stopped to help a neighbor herd a llama. "At that point the fire officials told us we were going to have to leave the animals and get out," he said.

Flames hundreds of feet high jumped Highway 243, setting even the guardrail posts ablaze, and were moving toward Highway 79, which was closed between Beaumont and Hemet.

Evacuation centers were established at Banning Community Center and Hemet High School.

Officials said the fire could burn thousands more acres if it reaches parts of the San Bernardino National Forest where an infestation of pine bark beetles has left stands of dead trees. A red flag warning remains in effect throughout much of Southern California because of low humidity and strong winds.

A brush fire burned early this morning in rural southeast Orange County, prompting officials to evacuate 140 people from a campground and to shut down a long stretch of highway for a short time.

The fire broke out about 4:20 a.m. in a wooded area east of Rancho Santa Margarita, near Cleveland National Forest. Authorities safely evacuated 140 people, mostly children, from the nearby Lazy W Ranch camping ground.

The fire, dubbed the "Lazy W", had consumed less than five acres so far, Lynnette Round, a spokeswoman for the Orange County Fire Authority said this morning.

But the blaze, which is mostly contained, forced officials to close Ortega Highway for roughly 30 miles. One of the key arteries to Riverside County was shut down from Antonio Parkway to the Lake Elsinore exits. The highway reopened before 9 a.m.

david.kelly@latimes.com
jonathan.abrams@latimes.com
maeve.reston@latimes.com
scott.gold@latimes.com

Times staff writers Michael Muskal, Mike Anton and Lance Pugmire contributed to this report. Staff writer James Gerstenzang contributed from Washington

Sheriff's Office 'Taking Lots Of Calls' With Arson Tips (LAT)

By Lance Pugmire, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

More than 100 tips have been received by the Riverside County Sheriff's Department as the intense hunt for the person or group that started the fatal Esperanza fire near Cabazon continued today.

The pool of reward money also grew from $100,000 to $400,000 when the state added $100,000, as did San Bernardino County and the Morongo band of Mission Indians.

"We're taking lots of calls," sheriff's spokesman Sgt. Earl Quinata said this morning. "Our investigators are looking at all the information and following up when necessary."

Quinata said there are no suspects in custody, but an arson-homicide investigation "to find the culprits" is urgently working to "resolve this and assist our firefighters and their families" after the blaze claimed the lives of four U.S. Forest Service crew members Thursday.

The U.S. Forest Service members were caught by flames that shifted in the wind, destroying their firetruck and leaving a fifth member clinging to life.

Fire officials say the Esperanza fire began about 1:10 a.m. Thursday in the foothill area along Esperanza Avenue. Forensic specialists combed the ground near the area searching for clues.

One neighbor near the fire's starting point told The Times he saw two white males in their early 20s fleeing the area. Residents in a Cabazon mobile home community reported they had seen teenagers smoking marijuana in the area.

"There's no indication that [the marijuana smokers are] the source, but we're investigating all tips," Quinata said.

The Riverside County Board of Supervisors has offered a $100,000 reward for anyone providing information that leads to the arrest and conviction of the person or people responsible for starting the blaze.

"The urgency is for people with relevant information to call in," Quinata said.

Anyone with information about how the fire started can report tips to (951) 922-7116.

Calif. Blaze Spreads After Firefighters' Deaths (WP)

By Sonya Geis And John Pomfret, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Reward Increased To $500,000 in Suspected Arson

BANNING, Calif., Oct. 27 -- A wildfire that has consumed thousands of acres west of Palm Springs and has killed four U.S. Forest Service firefighters continued to roar Friday, fed by hot, fast and dry winds, while state and local officials boosted the reward to $500,000 to find the suspected arsonist who ignited the blaze.

The Forest Service and the California Department of Forestry and Fire Protection are investigating the deaths, and on Friday a half-dozen investigators wearing yellow protective suits studied the steep dirt driveway of 15400 Gorgonio View Rd. As a fierce wind whipped past the gutted house on a blackened hill above them, an investigator knelt down, then gestured at the canyon wall, from where the flames had come.

Five Forest Service firefighters were trying to protect the house from the wildfire Thursday when the inferno suddenly overwhelmed them. Three died at the scene, and a fourth died soon afterward at a hospital. On Friday the fifth remained in grave condition, with more than 95 percent of his body burned.

The deaths constituted the worst disaster involving a wildfire since 2001, when four firefighters were trapped by flames and killed in a remote part of Washington state.

On Friday, investigators, as well as the men's families and colleagues, struggled to understand how an experienced fire captain and his crew could have been killed.

"They had a real good, experienced crew," said Jerry Garcia, 29, a firefighter who worked with Capt. Mark Loutzenhiser, 43, and Jess McLean, 27, a fire engine operator. "I've been with them on fires, and I felt real safe with them."

McLean, Garcia said, "was someone I really looked up to. Last season was my first season, and I really trusted him."

The doomed firemen were outside their fire engine, apparently running, when flames caught up with them, said Pat Boss, a Forest Service spokesman. Firefighters carry protective shelters, similar to pup tents, that can shield them from flames, but they did not use them, Boss said.

"They had no time to deploy anything, much less even pull it out of their bag," he said. "They had no idea what hit them."

Also killed were Jason McKay, 27, and Daniel Hoover-Najera, 20.

DOJ_NMG_0088653

Michael Wakowski, a fire division chief in the San Bernardino National Forest, told the Associated Press it did not appear the crew did anything wrong.

"Sometimes things go bad, I hate to say," he said.

Fires move at varying speeds, as leisurely as an adult on an evening stroll or as fast as a sprinter, said Shankar Mahalingam, an engineering professor and wildfire expert at the University of California at Riverside.

"Sometimes, however, it can move hundreds of yards in an instant when it's pushed by the wind. It can climb up canyons incredibly fast with embers shooting forth," Mahalingam said.

Garcia and his crew were eating lunch under a tree while they waited for counselors and a chaplain. Some watched the progress of the fire from a ridge nearby. More than 1,500 firefighters managed to contain the blaze to 24,000 acres overnight, before winds fanned it again. By sundown Friday, the fire had consumed nearly 40,000 acres -- more than 60 square miles.

Forest Service firefighters were pulled off the fire Thursday to give them a chance to grieve. Garcia said he was "emotionally, mentally, physically drained out. It was a good thing they gave us the day off."

But Capt. Garett Armsby, on the same crew as Garcia, was less patient. "We've got a fire happening at our backdoor," he said. "It's hard to just watch it."

Loutzenhiser left behind a wife and five children. Boss said he was active as a youth coach and umpire.

"The kids loved him," said Boss, a friend of Loutzenhiser's for 23 years. "They used to come up and grab his leg. He was a joy to have around."

Arson investigators said they had no major breakthroughs. Witnesses told the Associated Press that, shortly after the fire started in the town of Cabazon, two young men were seen leaving the area, close to a teenage hangout known as Raccoon Rock.

Riverside County sheriff's detectives interviewed other witnesses and fielded about 100 tips.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) added $100,000 in state money to a reward posted by Riverside County for information leading to the suspected arsonist's arrest. A Rancho Mirage resident, the Morongo Indian tribe and San Bernardino County each contributed $100,000, raising the total to $500,000.

The terrain in this mountainous area 25 miles west of Palm Springs is rocky and steep, making it difficult to tackle fires. Winds shift direction quickly. Desert scrub and low bushes make explosive tinder for fire. In addition, some fire experts said, the tendency of government authorities to put out smaller wildfires as quickly as they begin can allow the chaparral to grow unhindered, creating the foundation for even bigger blazes.

"We generally try to catch fires and put them out before they reach a critical size," said Walter Boyce, director of the Wildlife Health Center at the University of California at Davis. "Unfortunately, once they reach critical size, it's only a combination of effort, luck, wind and weather -- and mostly it's the weather -- that allows things to get back under control."

Fire officials said the blaze was only 25 percent contained, and in the areas already burned a sloping, blackened moonscape was still smoldering. Many houses in the area -- such as the one on Gorgonio View Road -- are down long, rutted dirt roads, far from neighbors, with views of oak-filled canyons or the desert floor 3,000 feet below. Several houses were melted ruins, with a satellite dish or a scorched refrigerator barely recognizable.

Pomfret reported from Los Angeles.

Burst Of Wind-Driven Flames Engulfed Firefighters (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

BEAUMONT, Calif., Oct. 27 — The five firefighters of Engine Crew 57 did what they had been trained to do. Spotting great licks of flame nearing a modest house on Thursday morning, they jumped from their truck and began cutting brush and hosing the building.

But then the wildfire did what wind-driven blazes can do: it exploded from a bowl-like gully with deadly ferocity, according to fellow firefighters close to the scene.

There was no time to run, no time to duck into the fire shelters the crew members carried. By the time other firefighters reached them, the Esperanza fire, as the blaze in Twin Pines near here is called, had done its work.

The four other United States Forest Service crews watched helplessly from up on a ridge nearby as the engine crew disappeared in the smoke and flames.

Officials say they believe the fire was intentionally set.

“It blew up like a fireball,” said Pat Boss, a friend of the crew’s captain and a public affairs officer for the Forest Service in Idyllwild, where the captain lived. “They did not see it coming.”

DOJ_NMG_0088654

Three of the firefighters died at the scene. They were Jess McLean of Beaumont and Jason McKay of Phelan, who were both 27 and had been in the Forest Service for several years, and Daniel Hoover-Najera, 20, a seasonal worker from San Jacinto on his second tour of fire duty.

The captain, Mark Loutzenhiser, 44, a 21-year veteran and a father of five known for coaching youth sports, died later at a hospital. The fifth crew member, Pablo Cerda, 23, a seasonal worker who lived in Fountain Valley, was in critical condition with burns over almost his entire body.

All firefighting is dangerous, but wildfires bring challenges of wind and difficult terrain. Friends said these crew members measured success by each house or even acre of their forest they preserved.

"He talked about saving the forest, about being proud to save even a few acres," said Marlene Lopez, a neighbor of Mr. McLean, whom she often saw roaring off to work on his motorcycle or working on fixing up the motorboat in his driveway and his yard.

On Thursday, she said, hours after Mr. McLean's death, his wife, Karen, wheeled the motorcycle inside the house — not the garage, the house.

"I knew something was terribly wrong and she just cried when I asked her if Jess was O.K.," Ms. Lopez said.

State and local authorities have posted rewards totaling $400,000 for information leading to the arrest of the arsonist they believe caused the fire, 90 miles east of downtown Los Angeles.

The deaths have shaken the close-knit world of firefighters here, mostly outdoorsmen who camp and play in the forests they protect, and develop a respect, the word most often used, for the capricious nature of wildfires.

Except for the deaths, this fire probably would not have stood out. It has burned about 39,900 acres, but is dwarfed by other more recent fires, including one in early September that burned more than 200,000 acres north of Los Angeles and was among the largest in state history.

This fire has consumed 10 structures, including five houses, while wildfires in the fall of 2003 in Southern California killed 24 people, destroyed 3,700 homes, and burned 750,000 acres. The record for firefighter deaths is 14 — 10 men and four women who died July 2, 1994, on the side of a ravine in Glenwood Springs, Colo., when fire shot up as if sucked through a chimney.

Groups of firefighters have died before, often caught in the furious Santa Ana winds that blow this time of year and give each fire tricky, hard-to-foresee elements. In this case, the winds have been particularly erratic, so much so that firefighting aircraft have not always been able to attack.

Commanders use computer modeling and mapping and other technology and techniques to get a fix on how the fire is burning and its direction, but a good deal of guesswork and intuition come into play, particularly at the front lines.

"As far as what the fire will do at any particular foot, at any particular second, we can't really say," said Mark Finney, a research forester at the Missoula Fire Sciences Laboratory in Montana. "And those are critical scales for firefighters, and for lots of things: for damage, for effects on vegetation, on houses."

Capt. Joel Vela, a spokesman for the California Department of Forestry, which is coordinating firefighting efforts, said the men experienced hurricane-like conditions at the house, "only instead of rain coming down it was fire."

"It's dark because the smoke has blocked the sun, the wind is blowing, it is like a hurricane," Captain Vela said.

The wind and towering columns of smoke have made it difficult for the authorities to assess their progress, but with additional firefighters and equipment, they say they are making headway. About 2,000 firefighters are at work, and 25 percent of the fire has been contained, they said.

People in Idyllwild, a mountain hamlet of 3,500 people, began organizing fund-raisers for the families of the Crew 57 members. They recalled the firefighters as devoted to family and community.

Captain Loutzenhiser coached volleyball, basketball and baseball, and ran adult athletic leagues, diligently reporting the results to the local newspaper.

Michael Herman, a Forest Service firefighter at the nearby Kenworthy Fire Station, said Mr. McLean was known for hiking steep slopes without breaking a sweat.

Mr. Cerda and Mr. Hoover-Najera were working in the summer and fall and training the rest of the year, on the road toward full-time firefighting jobs, Mr. Boss said.

Mr. McKay, who was raised in the High Desert of Southern California, wanted to be a firefighter since he was a child, family members said. When he was 14, he became a Fire Explorer with the City of Adelanto Fire Department, and later went to Victor Valley College, where he trained to be a wildland firefighter.

The crew members had experienced tough fires before, but with winter approaching and bringing the rains that dampen the hillsides and reduce the fire danger, they were getting ready to wind down. It had been a busy summer here and elsewhere; nationwide 9.4 million acres have burned, well above the 5.3 million average of the past 10 years.

Mr. Loutzenhiser was in the middle of remodeling his house and wanted to finish the work.

DOJ_NMG_0088655

" 'I am looking forward to the winter when things slow down,' " Mr. Boss recalled Mr. Loutzenhiser saying last week.

Taking On A Coal Mining Practice As A Matter Of Faith (NYT)

By Neela Banerjee

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

HALE GAP, Va. — The windswept ridge that Sharman Chapman-Crane hiked to on a recent fall afternoon is the kind of place, she said, that she normally would avoid. From there, she could see what she loved about Appalachia and what it had lost, and she wanted her visitors to see it, too.

The old rounded peaks of the mountains encircled the ridge, dense with trees smudged red and gold. But in the middle of the peaks, several stood stripped bare and chopped up, a result of an increasingly common and controversial coal mining practice called mountaintop removal.

"Doesn't it say in Scripture, 'Who can weigh a mountain, measure a basket of earth?' " Ms. Chapman-Crane said, recalling descriptions of God's omnipotence in Isaiah 40:12. "Well, only God can. But now, the coal companies seem to be able to do it, too."

Ms. Chapman-Crane, her colleagues at the Mennonite Central Committee Appalachia and other Appalachian Christians are trying to halt mountaintop removal, and at the heart of their work, they say, is their faith.

They are part of an awakening among religious people to environmental issues, said Paul Gorman, executive director of the National Religious Partnership for the Environment, an interreligious alliance. Increasingly, religious people across denominations are organizing around local issues, like preventing a landfill, preserving wetlands and changing mining.

"People of faith are thinking afresh about human place and purpose in the greater web of life," Mr. Gorman said. "They are asking, What does it mean to be present in a crisis of God's creation made by God's children?"

Although Christian environmental activists speak out against mountaintop removal at different levels of government, many believe that showing the practice's toll will persuade others to join them in seeking stricter regulation of it, if not an outright ban.

A new group, Christians for the Mountains, urges religious people to take up mountaintop removal "as a spiritual issue," and it has made a DVD that it is distributing to churches and individuals, said Allen Johnson, an evangelical Christian and a founder of the group.

The Rev. John Rausch, director of the Catholic Committee of Appalachia, has led tours of mountaintop removal sites since 1994. Mr. Rausch estimates that 400 people have taken his tour. They learn of the tours by word of mouth or from their churches, pay a few hundred dollars to stay in simple accommodations, hike several miles through forests and mined lands and talk to people whose lives have been affected by mountaintop removal.

The Mennonite Central Committee Appalachia, based in Whitesburg, Ky., gave its first tour in October, focusing on a corner of southeastern Kentucky and southwestern Virginia rich in coal and diverse forests.

On the second morning of the four-day tour, the trip's leaders, Ms. Chapman-Crane and the Rev. Duane Beachey, marched their three-member group up the mile-long trail to Bad Branch Falls. Poplars, beeches, hemlocks and magnolias thatched together a canopy above the trail, and the rain of their leaves made a soft ticking sound. Wild ginseng and wintergreen lined the path. Cottage-size boulders leaned forward over a rushing stream below the trail.

"Not every place on the mountains has waterfalls like Bad Branch," Ms. Chapman-Crane said. "But this is pretty much what it's like on the mountains here. The forests of the Appalachian range are like a northern rain forest."

Mary Yoder, who had volunteered to come on the trip for her congregation, Columbus Mennonite Church in Columbus, Ohio, asked, "So this is the kind of place that gets blown up in mountaintop removal?"

Mr. Chapman-Crane replied, "This is what would be lost, is lost, when they blast a mountaintop."

The United States is rich with coal, and mountaintop removal has begun to replace underground mining in Appalachia as the preferred method of extraction because of its efficiency and lower cost. Mountaintop removal involves leveling mountains with explosives to reach seams of coal. The debris that had once been the mountain is usually dumped by bulldozers and huge trucks into neighboring valleys, burying streams.

The coal industry asserts that mountaintop removal is a safer way to remove coal than sending miners underground and that without it, companies would have to close mines and lay off workers.

Luke Popovich, a spokesman for the National Mining Association, a coal lobbying group, said that by fighting mountaintop removal religious groups might find their priorities colliding.

"They find themselves in a difficult position," Mr. Popovich said, "because they're expressing support for those who purport to protect nature, and, at the same time, that activism carries implications for the human side of the natural equation. Human welfare depends on the rational exploitation of nature."

DOJ_NMG_0088656

Christianity runs wide and deep in Appalachia. At the Courthouse Cafe in Whitesburg, Mr. Beachey explained that as a Christian concern for his neighbors drove his desire to rein in mountaintop removal. But as in much of Appalachia, pastors and churchgoers here are reluctant to stir up trouble: many work for coal companies, or the people next to them in the pew do. Others believe stopping mountaintop removal would eliminate the few jobs that remain.

Many understand their faith differently than Christian environmentalists do. One night, Darrell Caudill and several friends gathered to play their guitars for the environmental tour and sing traditional songs and hymns. Mr. Caudill, 57, works for a coal company and believes in being a good steward of the earth. But to him, he said, being a Christian means being saved and spreading the Gospel. There is no tension between being committed to his faith and supporting mountaintop removal.

"Why did God produce coal then and put it underground?" said Mr. Caudill, who attends a nondenominational evangelical church. "He produced things that we need on this earth. Without coal, you wouldn't have the warmth and light you have right now."

Late in the trip, the tour group drove Lucious Thompson, 63, a former coal miner, to the horseshoe of peaks above McRoberts, where he lives. The peaks have been leveled. The woods where he had hunted are gone. The new grass on the new plateaus barely clings to the soil, which means that McRoberts often floods now after hard rains, he said.

"I've been flooded three times since they started working on the mountaintop," Mr. Thompson said.

He talked of neighbors whose house foundations had been cracked because of the daily blasting, of a pond lost to sludge and of respiratory ailments because of the coal dust flying from the coal trucks.

"The coal company says it's God's will," he said. "Well, God ain't ever run no bulldozer."

People like Mr. Thompson and the woods and mountains of Appalachia seemed to make the point the tour's organizers hoped for. After the tour, Ms. Yoder returned to Columbus to tell her congregation of about 200 what she had learned.

"My comment to the church was that I would do the tour with an open mind," she said, "and my conclusion is there is no room for mountaintop removal in our country."

Preparations For A Flu Pandemic (NYT)

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

The World Health Organization's new plan for ramping up the production of flu vaccine is a measure of how unprepared the world is to cope with an onslaught of pandemic influenza. The plan, conceived by a group of more than 120 experts, lays out a sensible path toward vaccine sufficiency— but it will take years to complete and cost up to $10 billion.

There are no signs yet that the influenza strain causing the greatest concern — a virulent form of avian flu — is ready to sweep through human populations. So far it has infected only 256 people in 10 countries — mostly people in close contact with chickens in Asia — but the highly lethal pathogen has killed some 60 percent of those.

Fortunately, it has not yet developed the ability to spread easily from one person to another, the critical transition for unleashing a pandemic. But if this strain or another does, it will move so rapidly there will be little chance of containing it — unless we start preparing now.

This week, the W.H.O. warned that if a flu pandemic were to occur, the global vaccine supply would fall several billion doses short. It recommended three overlapping responses: increasing the use of vaccines in the normal flu season so that manufacturers are encouraged to expand capacity; new techniques to raise production yields; and development of more potent vaccines that could provide broad and long-lasting immunity.

The price tag would be $3 billion to $10 billion for a global effort that might yield results in three to five years, provided action started now. The Bush administration's pledge of $10 million to W.H.O. to help other countries develop vaccines and manufacturing capacity is prompt but woefully short.

The administration has also invested substantially in vaccine research, including $1 billion to develop new cell-based technologies that would allow rapid expansion of production in an emergency. Although those investments are primarily for our own benefit, the knowledge generated is likely to help others around the world.

Still, both the American and global efforts ought to be intensified. The administration's goal of being able to make enough vaccine quickly to protect all Americans is also probably four to five years away. Neither America nor the rest of the world is yet ready to handle a worst-case pandemic.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Man Gets Probation For Owning Firearms (HIR)

By Eve Byron, IR Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0088657

Helena (MT) Independent Record, October 28, 2006

A Jefferson County man was sentenced to three years of probation and a $2,500 fine for being a convicted felon in possession of firearms.

Edward Betka, 61, received the sentence Friday in U.S. District Court in Missoula.

According to information from the office of Bill Mercer, United States Attorney for the District of Montana, Betka's possession of firearms came to the attention of federal officials after a fire raced through his Basin home in July 2005.

The fire was being investigated as a possible arson case, and a deputy fire marshal accompanied Betka into the home while he retrieved various firearms.

The fire marshal watched Betka pull an undamaged gun case from under his bed, which contained two expensive-looking, high-powered scope-mounted rifles. A friend offered to store the firearms at his home, and took possession of three rifles, one shotgun and a .44-revolver from Betka.

However, Betka wasn't supposed to have any guns, since he was convicted of making false income tax returns, mail fraud, and false representation of a Social Security number in U.S. District Court in Wisconsin in 1990. Convicted felons are not allowed to own or be around firearms.

On Aug. 22, 2005, the friend turned the firearms over to an ATF special agent, and Betka later was charged and pleaded guilty to being a felon in possession of firearms.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Paulette L. Stewart prosecuted the case for the United States.

Feds Were Planning Raid On Vroman's Home (SRPD)

By Mike Geniella, THE PRESS DEMOCRAT

Santa Rosa (CA) Press-Democrat, October 28, 2006

Agents preparing to search D.A.'s property for suspected pot, weapons

Federal agents were preparing to raid the secluded Hopland home of Mendocino County District Attorney Norman Vroman at the time of his death to search for maturing marijuana plants and a possible stash of illegal weapons.

Agents said overflights had detected at least 25 marijuana plants growing on Vroman's property at the end of Sanel Valley Road.

Investigators also suspected Vroman, a self-described "gun nut," may have added to his personal gun collection by taking home weapons seized during drug and other raids or bought with drug-related asset forfeiture money, according to federal Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms agents.

Three days before Vroman died Sept. 21 after a massive heart attack, the FBI's Public Corruption Unit began reviewing results of an investigation involving agents from the ATF and the Drug Enforcement Agency, according to internal documents obtained by The Press Democrat and statements from agents who asked not to be identified.

Documents show federal investigators were completing affidavits in support of warrants to search Vroman's home when he suffered the heart attack Sept. 19 as he prepared to drive to work. Vroman was found by a family member slumped over the wheel of his county-owned car. Vroman died two days later at a Santa Rosa hospital.

Raleigh Vroman said Friday she was unaware of a federal investigation into her husband's activities.

"I don't know what this is about. I don't know anything about marijuana," she said, refusing further comment.

The federal government doesn't recognize California's medical marijuana laws. Vroman was the first district attorney in the state to implement identity cards for patients who have a doctor's permission to use marijuana. Whether Vroman obtained one himself is unknown because confidentiality laws prevent that disclosure.

Documents show tensions rose within federal agencies as investigators pressed to raid the home of a high-profile district attorney who at the time of his death was engaged in a tough re-election fight with Fort Bragg attorney Meredith Lintott.

Vroman's name remains on the Nov. 7 ballot, and there is an active campaign to have voters select his name on Election Day.

FBI spokesman Joseph Shadler said Friday that "given the political sensitivities involved, we won't be making any comments."

In a written statement, an ATF investigator said the U.S. Attorney's Office in San Francisco believed the agents had "probable cause to issue a search warrant for marijuana on Vroman's property, but they refused."

Luke Macaulay, spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in San Francisco, said the office's policy is to neither confirm nor deny an investigation.

After the apparent refusal by the U.S. Attorney's Office, ATF and DEA agents took the case to the FBI's Public Corruption Unit, according to documents and a source close to the case.

DOJ_NMG_0088658

Local authorities were deliberately kept out of the federal loop because of fear of leaks to Vroman's office. Vroman and federal authorities often had been at odds since he served nine months in federal prison in 1993 for failure to file income taxes.

In addition, local authorities said federal agents were aware of Vroman's close political and personal ties with former Sheriff Tony Craver. As a result, county Sheriff Kevin Broin and other high-ranking sheriff's officials were in the dark until the end.

"We learned about the federal investigation the day Mr. Vroman was stricken at his home," Capt. Kurt Smallcomb said.

Craver, reached Friday by phone at his new home in Caldwell, Idaho, said he was surprised to learn of the federal inquiry.

"I think it highly unlikely Norm would have contraband, whether marijuana or illegal weapons, at his home," he said.

About the suspicions of federal agents, Craver said, "It's too bad the search warrants weren't served so this kind of stuff could have been cleared up once and for all."

Interim District Attorney Keith Faulder, Vroman's chief deputy, said he learned of the investigation after Vroman was stricken and entered the hospital. Faulder said ATF investigators called and questioned staff members about serial numbers identifying two submachine guns and silencers that were kept in a gun safe in the District Attorney's Office.

The federal investigation stopped days later when Vroman died, and no warrants were issued.

The marijuana allegedly growing on Vroman's property "vanished" the day Vroman was rushed to the hospital, according to documents outlining the DEA investigation.

Since Vroman's death, family and supporters have campaigned aggressively to block the election of Lintott. Vroman's name remains on the Nov. 7 ballot, and if more votes are cast for him than for Lintott, the county Board of Supervisors will appoint a new district attorney.

In the meantime, a legal fight is being waged in the state Court of Appeal, First District, in San Francisco over Mendocino County's decision to proceed with the Nov. 7 election rather than setting a special election. In either case, Faulder has made it clear he wants to succeed Vroman.

Neither Lintott nor her campaign consultant, Terry Price of Santa Rosa, would comment Friday on the Vroman investigation.

In May, it was disclosed that since 1999 Vroman's office had spent $646,348 of $853,122 that flowed into a special "asset forfeiture" account. The total represented the amount of drug-related money and other assets, including guns and cars, seized during county drug raids by local, state and federal agencies. The distribution is overseen by the state Department of Justice.

Vroman's spending included the two submachine guns stored in the office, firearm sound suppressors, a gun safe for the District Attorney's Office and $39,100 in firearms training for his staff.

Comments can take a few minutes to display.

Comment Guidelines

Your opinions should contribute to a candid and constructive community conversation. Personal attacks and profanity are not permitted. See our full User Agreement and use THIS LINK to notify us of concerns about a comment. We'll then promptly review and remove it if it falls outside our guidelines.

Guilty Plea In Plot To Bomb Abortion Clinic (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

A Prince George's County man admitted in federal court yesterday that he intended to attack a Berwyn Heights abortion clinic with a pipe bomb this past summer.

During a hearing in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt, Robert Weiler Jr., 25, pleaded guilty to possessing a pipe bomb, being a felon in possession of a firearm and attempting to destroy or damage an abortion clinic.

A plea agreement worked out between Weiler's attorney and Assistant U.S. Attorney Bryan E. Foreman calls for Weiler to be sentenced to five years in federal prison.

U.S. District Judge Deborah K. Chasanow scheduled sentencing for Dec. 18.

Weiler said little during the hearing. He gave brief answers to Chasanow's questions about his background and mental health and about whether he understood the terms of his plea.

When asked whether he had been treated for alcoholism or mental illness, Weiler replied that he had met with a mental health expert at the Charles County Detention Center. He did not elaborate.

"Do you agree that you are, in fact, guilty?" Chasanow asked.

"Yes, your honor, I do," Weiler responded.

Weiler's father, Robert F. Weiler Sr., and mother, Catherine, were in the courtroom yesterday. They and Weiler's attorney, Assistant Federal Public Defender Michael CitaraManis, declined to comment after the hearing.

DOJ_NMG_0088659

The defendant's parents had tipped off Prince George's police to his plans, calling to report their suspicions June 4, more than a week after he disappeared from their home and stopped returning their calls.

On June 7, Robert Weiler Jr. called agents of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives to turn himself in. When he was arrested the next morning at a rest stop in Western Maryland, he told agents that he had a handgun stolen from a friend and that he had made a pipe bomb and left it in the closet of a house in Riverdale Heights. Hours later, the bomb was partially detonated by bomb squad technicians.

The next day, Weiler provided a recorded confession in which he said he had intended to use the pipe bomb to blow up an abortion clinic on Greenbelt Road, a short drive from the federal courthouse, according to a statement of facts that is part of the plea agreement. He also said he had planned to use the gun to shoot doctors who perform abortions.

When he appeared in court four days after his arrest, Weiler wore a T-shirt with "Help Cure Abortion" on the front. On the back was "ABORTION: The leading cause of death in America." Yesterday, Weiler wore a short-sleeved white dress shirt and dark trousers.

TAX:

No Taxes Until After The Election (NYT)

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

To avoid looking like Scrooge, the Internal Revenue Service typically lets up around the holidays in its hounding of tax delinquents.

But this month, the indulgence began even before Macy's was decorated. The Times's David Cay Johnston reported yesterday that on Oct. 10, the I.R.S. commissioner Mark Everson told his troops to delay tax enforcement in areas affected by Hurricane Katrina — until after the midterm elections and the holiday season.

Until after the elections?

To explain his action, Mr. Everson said that a pre-election reprieve was as routine as the Christmastime hiatus. Four former I.R.S. commissioners interviewed by Mr. Johnston disputed that.

Mr. Everson also said that in his mind the elections were part of a continuum that ran through the holidays. That would make him the only person in the country who envisions Congressional campaigns as the start of Christmas shopping season.

Mr. Everson does his agency and law-abiding taxpayers a disservice. In delaying the enforcement actions, there's no avoiding the appearance of a political motivation. Many voters in the devastated areas are bound to be angry at President Bush and, by extension, Republicans. By easing up now, the I.R.S. avoids stoking that anger.

The possibility that Mr. Everson is wielding power in ways to please his boss, President Bush, is especially disturbing given that he has courted that suspicion before. After the administration failed repeatedly this year to achieve its goal of repealing the estate tax, the I.R.S. moved to eliminate the jobs of nearly half of the agency's lawyers who audit estate tax returns. Mr. Everson's explanation that the employees were no longer needed was unconvincing because the agency would not release enough data for researchers to independently verify his claim.

Mr. Everson needs to admit his mistakes, rather than trying to say they were not mistakes at all. And to make the I.R.S. more transparent. And to stay out of politics.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Tax-Cut Rollback Not On Table, Rangel Says (WP)

By Lori Montgomery, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Lawmaker Tries to Counter GOP Alerts

To hear Republicans talk, Rep. Charles B. Rangel, the gravel-voiced New York Democrat who stands to take over the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, is "giddy" about the chance to undo popular tax cuts enacted during President Bush's first term in office.

But Rangel said yesterday that he had no intention of rolling back the cuts, most of which are scheduled to expire in 2010, if Democrats claim the House on Nov. 7.

"I think it would be ridiculous for us in 2007 to be talking about 2010 tax cuts," Rangel said in an interview. "I don't want to go retroactive in terms of any of the tax cuts. I think retroactive tax increases are bad tax policy."

DOJ_NMG_0088660

As the prognosis for Republicans to maintain control has grown increasingly gloomy, Rangel has become a favorite rhetorical punching bag for President Bush and Republican leaders. At fundraisers, in news releases and on the campaign trail, Republicans have been warning voters that a Democratic House would raise taxes and wreak havoc on the nation's economic recovery. They raise the specter of Rangel's bejeweled hands on the controls of federal tax policy like some terrifying Halloween goblin.

Last week, House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) attacked Rangel by name two days in a row in news releases with such headlines as "Dem Tax Hikes Would Threaten Strong Economy." "The American people don't trust Charlie Rangel and his tax-happy Democrat friends because they know Democrats will work overtime to raise their taxes," Boehner said.

At a fundraiser this week in Florida, Bush reminded the crowd that Rangel, "the ranking member of the Ways and Means Committee . . . would be the one who would take the lead in taxes" if the Democrats take over. Noting that Rangel has said he "couldn't think of one of our tax cuts he would extend," Bush joked, to laughter and applause: "See? They're genetically disposed to raise your taxes."

Rangel, a firebrand liberal and partisan brawler who has represented New York City in Congress since 1971, laughs at such statements. "It's really working my base, too, you know. So it works out for everybody," he said.

Of his comment to Bloomberg News in September that he "cannot think of one" of Bush's tax cuts that merit renewal, Rangel said he was discussing the ground rules for broad-based tax reform to fix what most experts agree is an inefficient and unnecessarily complicated tax system.

"I was asked, 'Are there any tax cuts you would say you want to extend?' And I said no. And I mean it," Rangel said. "That's what tax simplification is all about -- determining what we're going to keep and what we're not going to keep. I have to say everything is on the table."

Does that mean the cuts that have so far saved taxpayers an estimated $1.1 trillion will not survive their expiration date? Rangel demurs.

"I'm 76 years old. I don't buy green bananas," he said. "Who knows what's going to happen in 2010? It just doesn't make sense, with all the problems we are facing, to be discussing the extension of tax cuts that don't expire till 2010."

If Rangel does become the first Democrat to chair Ways and Means since 1994, he said his first priority will be to restore bipartisan cooperation to a committee that he said has been ruled by Republican fiat. Some "low-hanging fruit" to prove his good intentions: Moving stalled trade agreements and making permanent the research and development tax credit, which firms can claim for research done in the United States. Corporate groups are working to save the credit, which is in danger of expiring unless Congress acts quickly to extend the credit.

Rangel said he also plans to hold a bipartisan retreat to start cracking all the tough fiscal nuts: the spiraling cost of Medicare, the expanding reach of the alternative minimum tax and Social Security reform. But talks will start on his terms, he said. For example, if Bush does not abandon his plan to divert Social Security tax dollars to private accounts, Rangel said, "that means he's not going to deal with it."

"It's much easier to fight [the Republicans] than to work with them. But the American people want us to work together. And I am not convinced [voters] are just teed off with Republicans," he said, laughing. "I'm not being benevolent. I'm not being fair. I'm being as political as I've ever been. It's in the best interest of my party to get something done."

Waxman Plans Tougher Oversight Of Companies (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- California Rep. Henry Waxman, the vocal corporate critic slated to run a powerful committee if Democrats win the House, said he would aggressively expand oversight of many large industries -- with a focus on drug prices, oil-company profits and Halliburton Co.'s contracting work in Iraq.

In an interview, Rep. Waxman, the senior minority member of the House Government Reform Committee, said he also would boost oversight of the Bush administration, along with "waste, fraud and abuse" across the federal government -- especially rebuilding efforts in Iraq and the Hurricane Katrina-ravaged Gulf Coast. The committee has extensive -- and vaguely defined -- oversight responsibilities covering broad swaths of corporate America and the government, and the chairman has the power to issue subpoenas, compel testimony and call hearings.

Of particular concern, Mr. Waxman said, would be rooting out what he called "profiteering." His aides define the term broadly enough that it encompasses Iraq contracting, the massive growth in homeland security expenditures, pharmaceutical prices and soaring oil-industry profits. Probes into prices and profits could prove controversial, however, because the government itself has never been able to define precisely what constitutes price-gouging or profiteering.

In discussing his goals, Mr. Waxman is touching on many of the hot-button issues being aired both in the campaign and behind the scenes among Democrats. The party has been debating how much to spotlight what could be controversial actions before voters go to the polls, or how much to stick to more general policy slogans. Republicans already have begun trying to cast Mr. Waxman as a partisan who would abuse his investigative powers.

DOJ_NMG_0088661

A 32-year veteran of the House, Mr. Waxman, 67 years old, has had little real power since Republicans took control of the House in 1994. Democrats currently are 15 seats shy of a majority, but polls suggest they could win enough seats on Nov. 7 to make up the gap. A Democratic takeover of the Senate also is widely seen as possible, though less likely.

When Democrats last held power, Mr. Waxman headed the Commerce Committee's subcommittee on health and environment, where he was a thorn in the side of big business. He led well-publicized crusades to get tobacco regulated as an addictive drug, increase federal oversight of dietary supplements and toughen auto-emissions standards, and helped write a raft of landmark legislation like the Clean Air Act, the Ryan White AIDS bill and laws mandating smoke-free airplanes, clearer nutritional labeling and access to generic drugs.

He also showed a keen eye for the theatrical in hearings -- such as the April 14, 1994 session in which the seven chief executive officers of the nation's largest tobacco companies famously testified that "nicotine is not addictive."

In the minority, Mr. Waxman has carved out a role as a self-appointed watchdog. He has issued more than 2,000 investigative reports in the past eight years, cataloging everything from shortcomings in the Department of Homeland Security to misleading information being provided in federally funded abstinence-only programs.

Several business trade groups declined comment on Mr. Waxman. Political analysts said executives -- particularly in industries like managed care and pharmaceuticals -- have reason to fear being targeted by the lawmaker and his investigators.

"Corporate executives may not be familiar with Waxman yet, but some of them will be by this time next year," said Andy Laperriere, a political analyst at the International Strategy & Investment, a brokerage and research firm which has released a series of reports on the business implications of a Democratic House.

As for the administration, he said, "When Republicans wake up at night worrying about oversight, they probably envision Henry Waxman."

Mr. Waxman is only one of several Democrats critical of business and the administration who stand to hold prominent posts if Democrats retake the House. Republicans seeking to bolster their base are pointing out that incoming Democratic chairmen -- particularly those with oversight responsibilities like Mr. Waxman -- would emerge as some of the most important, and powerful, members of the new majority.

Beyond Mr. Waxman, the main Republican targets are Democrats Michigan Rep. John Conyers, who could take over the Judiciary Committee and has talked about the prospect of impeachment proceedings against Mr. Bush; Michigan Rep. John Dingell, who stands to take over the Energy and Commerce Committee; and New York Rep. Charles Rangel, who would run the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, and who opposes extending many of Mr. Bush's tax cuts.

As chairman, Mr. Waxman would see his committee staff double, to 70. How he used his expanded powers would help shape the direction of a Democratic majority and send an early signal about whether the party plans to spend the next two years battling the administration or seeking common ground so that policy initiatives on issues like health care and the economy stand a better chance of becoming law.

Should Democrats win, Mr. Waxman's ascension to the helm of the Government Reform Committee could further highlight the debate simmering within the party since its 2004 electoral losses. The more liberal wing, represented by candidates like Connecticut Senate challenger Ned Lamont and activist organizations like MoveOn.org, wants the party to take a harsher stance against the Iraq war and corporate conduct. Centrists like New York Sen. Hillary Clinton, by contrast, have tried to shore up the party's standing with the business community and declined to call for an Iraq withdrawal, arguing that would alienate many moderate voters.

Mr. Waxman said he is mindful that his decisions about where to focus his potential new investigative muscle -- and how hard-line a stance to take with the administration and the oil and pharmaceutical industries -- carry political risks for the Democrats. The lawmaker stressed that he has no "agenda" in place to guide his first months as chairman of the committee, no investigations teed up, and that he saw subpoenas as a "last resort" for compelling information that he hoped could be obtained through less confrontational methods.

Mr. Waxman, a fierce critic of the Iraq war, also said he was unlikely to investigate whether the administration had manipulated prewar intelligence on Iraq, a stance likely to disappoint many Democratic liberals.

"I know a lot of people feel it should be investigated, but I just don't know if it would be productive now," he said. "The whole premise of that war has been discredited so thoroughly that I don't know what a hearing would establish that goes beyond that."

Instead, Mr. Waxman said his main focus would be on pocketbook issues like the billions of dollars alleged by government investigators and critics to have been stolen or misspent in Iraq, the high price of many prescription drugs and the oil industry's soaring profits.

DOJ_NMG_0088662

In part, Mr. Waxman appears to be falling in line behind the economically populist positions increasingly espoused by Democratic leaders like Nancy Pelosi, the California lawmaker who could become the first female House Speaker in the nation's history. Many Democrats this fall are railing against the oil and drug industries. Ms. Pelosi has said that within the first 100 hours of taking power, Democrats would work to raise the minimum wage, cut student-loan interest rates and rewrite the Medicare prescription-drug benefit to take away advantages given pharmaceutical makers.

In recent years, Mr. Waxman has forced the State Department to retract a report that erroneously had suggested that terror-related casualties had declined in 2003 and replace it with one that showed that both fatalities and the overall number of large-scale terror attacks had soared that year. As the ranking member of the Government Reform Committee, he has repeatedly lambasted the administration for the failure to find weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, faulty prewar intelligence and the billions of dollars of no-bid contracts awarded to Halliburton and Kellogg, Brown & Root, its engineering and construction unit.

Halliburton declined to comment about Mr. Waxman specifically, but said the company would cooperate with either party. "KBR has been performing work for the U.S. military for more than 60 years, in both Democratic and Republican administrations, and the company will continue to cooperate with the appropriate government agencies as they fulfill their important oversight responsibilities," says Cathy Mann, a spokeswoman for the company.

Rep. Waxman also has harshly scrutinized the 2003 Medicare prescription-drug bill. In the summer of 2004, he led a group of 19 lawmakers who filed a federal lawsuit demanding that the Department of Health and Human Services disclose disputed cost estimates about the bill after evidence emerged suggesting that former Medicare chief Thomas Scully threatened to fire the program's chief actuary if the staffer told lawmakers the true cost of the program.

Mr. Waxman has in the past said that he wanted to modify the bill to eliminate the so-called donut hole, a coverage gap that impacts many senior citizens, and allow the government to negotiate lower drug prices with pharmaceutical companies.

Write to Yochi J. Dreazen at yochi.dreazen@wsj.com1

This Chairmanship Fight May Not Have Been Anticipated By Democrats (CQ)

By Patrick Yoest

CQ Daily, October 27, 2006

Rep. Bob Filner, D-Calif., may be in line to become the next chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee if the Democrats win control of the House, but his behavior as ranking member has raised questions about whether he's the right Democrat for the job.

Enter Rep. Michael H. Michaud of Maine, who plans to challenge Filner for the gavel.

Neither Filner nor Michaud is a veteran, but the similarities end there.

Filner is a fiery former college professor who was jailed in Mississippi as a Freedom Rider in 1961. Michaud is a high school graduate who spent years working in a paper mill.

Filner's hot temperament, visible in his fights with current chairman Steve Buyer, R-Ind., and a profanity-laced tirade outside VA headquarters in June, have raised some eyebrows.

Michaud favors a calmer approach to committee work.

"We'll fight very hard for veterans. . . . But we can do that without loud speeches and rhetoric," Michaud said.

Filner, however, said you have to be loud sometimes to get things done. "I only take the position of the bomb thrower when they exclude me," he said.

The Non-Contract With America (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

A joke in Washington these days is that the only thing that can save the Republicans on Election Day is the Democrats. House Speaker-in-waiting Nancy Pelosi seems to get this joke, because with few exceptions she's kept her Members tight-lipped and unspecific: As New York Senator Chuck Schumer has put it, why take the focus off the GOP?

This is in notable contrast to 1994, when the Gingrich Republicans ended a 40-year Democratic House majority by laying out a 10-item agenda known as the Contract with America. What Democrats are campaigning on this year is a Non-Contract with America -- mostly generalities about "helping the middle class" and "ending the corruption in Washington."

As a campaign strategy, this may well pay off. But if they do win, Democrats will have to fill their campaign vacuum with something, and the best clue to what that would be is what they've already proposed. We've taken some time to inspect these policy priorities and thought we'd share a few of the highlights, if that's the right word. (Warning: Keep sharp objects away from drug-company and Wal-Mart shareholders.)

Tax increases. The Bush tax cuts expire in 2010, and any chance that they'll be made permanent will vanish with a Democratic Congress. The question is whether Democrats will try to raise taxes even sooner. Most Democrats voted against the

DOJ_NMG_0088663

Bush tax cuts, but this week Ms. Pelosi said on CNBC's Kudlow & Co. that "Democrats like tax cuts. We support middle-class tax cuts."

The same isn't true, however, for the "investor" tax cuts of 2003 that coincided with the acceleration of the current expansion. Ms. Pelosi says reversing these tax cuts "at the high end" would be "an earlier resort." This would raise the top income and dividend tax rate back to 39.6% from 35%, and the capital-gains rate back to 20% from 15%, substantially raising the cost of new investment in the United States. Economist John Rutledge estimates that raising the dividend rate alone would reduce the value of the S&P 500 stocks by between 5% and 8.5%, roughly a $500 to $700 billion decline in the wealth of the 52% of American households that own stock.

"Paygo budgeting." President Bush would no doubt promise to veto any direct tax increase, but having the power of the purse would give Democrats plenty of leverage. What if they framed the political choice as a tax increase on "the rich" versus funding the war on terror?

Democrats have also pledged to restore so-called pay-as-you-go budget rules, which sound like a restraint on budget deficits but in practice restrain only tax cuts. They don't apply to the growth of current entitlement programs or to domestic discretionary spending, only to tax cuts or new entitlements. This formula would probably take us back to the 1980s, when Democrats insisted on higher domestic spending while fighting Ronald Reagan's increases in defense spending.

Health-care regulation. Big Pharma and private insurers, watch out. Michigan's John Dingell, who would run the Energy and Commerce Committee, has co-sponsored the "Patients Before Profits Act" that would gut funding for the new Medicare Advantage plans that are proving so popular with seniors. Instead, he and the other Democrats who run health-care panels want to direct all seniors into a single government-run Medicare drug plan. Another proposal from top Democrats, the Medicare for All Act, would make all Americans, of any age, eligible for Medicare and pay for it with a new 1.7% payroll tax on workers and 7% on employers.

Ms. Pelosi has also pledged to pass, in her first 100 hours as Speaker, legislation to require the government to "negotiate lower drug prices." That's a euphemism for imposing price controls on new medicines, which can take as much as $800 million in research and development to bring to market. The actor Michael J. Fox is getting headlines for his ads in favor of Democrats who support stem-cell research, but price controls would do far more to delay the introduction of new treatments for Alzheimer's, Parkinson's or cancer.

The union label. AFL-CIO headquarters would be rocking with hope once again. A job-killing hike in the minimum wage, to $7.25 from $5.15, would whisk through Congress, and we'd expect that Mr. Bush would sign it.

But another top priority for Democrats is the Employee Free Choice Act, which has at least 215 co-sponsors in the House and 44 in the Senate. This would allow labor to turn workplaces into union shops without an election or secret ballot. Unions would merely have to gather signatures from a majority of workers at a work site, which means labor organizers could strongarm employees who opposed such a petition. This would almost surely pass the House.

Democrats have also moved well to the left on trade since the Bill Clinton-Nafta era. Mr. Bush's trade-promotion authority, allowing up-or-down votes on trade deals without amendment, expires next July, and there's little chance House Democrats would extend it. The entire Democratic leadership opposed free trade with tiny Oman and with Central America, so deals now in the works with Vietnam and other countries would also be long shots. Sorry, Robert Rubin.

Energy. The Pelosi Democrats favor a "windfall" profits tax on oil companies and a virtual moratorium on drilling for more domestic oil in Alaska and on the outer continental shelf (where the U.S. may have more energy than Saudi Arabia). These policies would make the U.S. more dependent on foreign oil. There would also be an effort to pass new, and higher, fuel-mileage mandates, which would make things tougher on what's left of Detroit. And lobbying would begin for the U.S. to sign the Kyoto Protocol on global warming and to subsidize, even more than Republicans already have, ethanol and other "alternative" fuels.

We could go on, in particular in the regulatory arena, where agencies would be under greater pressure to restrict mergers, among other things. But you get the idea. A Democratic triumph would produce a major shift in the national policy debate, and we can understand why Ms. Pelosi isn't plastering most of this agenda on billboards around the country. Not everything would become law, to be sure, especially if Mr. Bush were finally willing to use his veto pen. However, elections have consequences, and we thought our readers might like to know about them before November 7.

White House Is Trimming Army Budget For Next Year, Officials Say (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 27 — White House budget officials are planning on asking for a $121 billion budget for the Army next year, not the $138 billion that senior Army officials have been seeking, two senior Pentagon officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0088664

Army officials were told of the decision in an Oct. 19 memorandum from Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon R. England, which noted that changes in the Army allotment were still possible, as deliberations continued over the Bush administration's budget for the 2008 fiscal year, said officials who had seen the memorandum.

The Army budget figure was first reported by Bloomberg News. The request will go to Congress in February.

But it appears that the preliminary decision to scale back the annual budget request for the Army could be offset later in the year, in a so-called supplemental appropriation like those Congress has passed every year since 2001. The extra money in those bills has financed the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, as well as unanticipated costs elsewhere.

In another memorandum issued this week, Mr. England informed the Army and other military services that the administration's ground rules covering what costs can be included in so-called supplemental spending bills "are being expanded" to include "costs related to the longer war against terror," not just continuing operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

He said that in some cases the supplemental spending could be used to buy newer equipment or to speed other improvements in military capabilities.

Steven Kosiak, a defense budget analyst at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, said the Pentagon was "sending a signal to the services" that they now have permission not to limit their request to war-related costs.

Supplemental financing for the Defense Department this year totaled $117 billion, Mr. Kosiak said.

Though the administration has decided to seek only a $7 billion increase over this year's $114 billion appropriation for the Army, supplemental financing offers a chance for the Army to restore some of the money it has been denied, officials said.

Rice's Counselor Gives Advice Others May Not Want To Hear (NYT)

By Helene Cooper And David E. Sanger

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 27 — For the last 18 months, Philip D. Zelikow has churned out confidential memorandums and proposals for his boss and close friend, Condoleezza Rice, that often depart sharply from the Bush administration's current line.

One described the potential for Iraq to become a "catastrophic failure." Another, among several that have come to light in recent weeks, was an early call for changes in a detention policy that many in the State Department believed was doing tremendous harm to the United States.

Others have proposed new diplomatic initiatives toward North Korea and the Middle East, and one went as far as to call for a reconsideration of the phrase "war on terror" because it alienated many Muslims — an idea that quickly fizzled after opposition from the White House.

Such ideas would have found a more natural home under President George H. W. Bush, for whom Mr. Zelikow and Ms. Rice worked on the staff of the National Security Council. They reflect a sense that American influence is perishable, and can be damaged by overreaching, as allies and other partners react against decisions made in Washington. They form a kind of foreign policy realism that was eclipsed in Mr. Bush's first term, in favor of a more ideological, unilateral ethos, but that has made something of a comeback in his second term.

Whether Mr. Zelikow, 52, is giving voice to Ms. Rice's private views, or simply serving as an in-house contrarian, remains unclear. Some of his ideas have become policy: he had called for the closure of secret prisons run by the Central Intelligence Agency a year before the Supreme Court decision that prodded the Bush administration to empty them.

The United States offered North Korea a chance to negotiate a permanent peace treaty, per Mr. Zelikow's advice, and he, along with Ms. Rice, was one of the backers of the Iran initiative, in which President Bush offered to reverse three decades of American policy against direct talks with Tehran if Iran suspended its uranium enrichment.

Neither North Korea nor Iran has bitten on the initiatives, but America's allies have applauded them. Mr. Zelikow's assessments of the Iraq war, first disclosed in Bob Woodward's book "State of Denial," were presented to Ms. Rice in 2005.

Ms. Rice keeps Mr. Zelikow close at hand, and the fact that his memorandums have surfaced in recent books and news articles suggests, at a minimum, that he and his allies are aggressively lobbying for his ideas. Mr. Zelikow (pronounced ZELL-i-ko) is being talked about inside the State Department as an outside shot for the vacant job of deputy secretary of state, but some believe that his management style is too combative for the job.

Friends of both officials say that Ms. Rice appears to regard Mr. Zelikow as a kind of intellectual anchor during what has been a turbulent period for American foreign policy, in Iraq and beyond.

"He's a very important intellectual resource, even if she may not always agree with him," said Brent Scowcroft, the former national security adviser, who has been a mentor to both.

Michael A. McFaul, a political science professor at Stanford University who knows both the secretary of state and Mr. Zelikow, said that "the limited results" of the administration's approach had "created space for guys like" Mr. Zelikow.

DOJ_NMG_0088665

Mr. Zelikow is hardly a household name, even at the State Department, where his title is counselor to the secretary of state. He has few staffers, no line authority, and occupies an office at the very end of the hall on the seventh floor, where Ms. Rice and other top officials also have their offices. He is a sometimes-geeky intellectual known for fingernails that are bitten down to nubs.

But questions about his role were sharpened last month after Mr. Zelikow gave a speech at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy in which he offered what many believed was an oblique criticism of the decision by Mr. Bush and Ms. Rice not to push Israel to return to the negotiating table with the Palestinians. He also said progress in that conflict was essential to forming a consensus among the United States, moderate Arabs and Europeans on Iran.

The address may have been an example of what Mr. Zelikow, in two speeches last year, called "practical idealism." But it did not go over well. The State Department quickly distanced itself from the speech, issuing a statement denying any linkage, and Israeli officials, flustered by Mr. Zelikow's remarks, said Ms. Rice later assured the Israeli foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, that the United States saw the Iranian and Palestinian issues as two separate matters.

Neither Ms. Rice nor Mr. Zelikow would comment for this article.

But friends of both Ms. Rice and Mr. Zelikow say her initial decision to appoint Mr. Zelikow to the counselor post last year reflects her openness to views at odds with the more ideological approach that has been dominant under President Bush.

Ms. Rice had to expend a substantial amount of her own political capital to get the White House to support her choice, friends say, given Mr. Zelikow's previous job as staff director of the 9/11 Commission, where he played a major role in writing the report that took both the Clinton and Bush administrations to task for failing to act with sufficient seriousness against the threat from Al Qaeda.

But Ms. Rice arrived at the State Department insistent that she would surround herself with her own people, friends say. Vice President Dick Cheney wanted her to appoint his former deputy national security adviser, Eric S. Edelman, as her political director; she balked and instead chose R. Nicholas Burns, a friend who had worked for her at the security council during the administration of the first President Bush. Likewise, in choosing Mr. Zelikow as her counselor, she eschewed Elliott L. Abrams, a darling of neoconservatives and the pro-Israel lobby.

Mr. Zelikow and Ms. Rice co-authored a book about Germany's reunification, "Germany Unified and Europe Transformed: A Study in Statecraft" (Harvard University Press, 1995). It is not exactly light reading, but at its core it is a study in realpolitik, examining — and admiring — the tempered, carefully managed American response to the collapse of the Soviet Union.

It is a book that Mr. Zelikow could write again today, but one that Ms. Rice could not, friends and associates of both say. Ms. Rice herself has said that she went through something of a transformation after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, in which she moved away from the classical realism of her own roots and Mr. Zelikow's, and closer to the neoconservatives who dominated policy discussions in the first term. Ms. Rice has told friends that President Bush has had a major impact on her thinking in terms of reintroducing values-based politics and ideology.

An example of the distance between Mr. Zelikow and his boss emerged this summer, at the start of the Israel-Hezbollah conflict. The position adopted by Ms. Rice — that Israel be permitted to continue its bombardment of Hezbollah despite the mounting civilian death toll in Lebanon — satisfied conservatives in the administration, including Mr. Cheney, who were pushing for strong American support of Israel.

That support also included the decision by the administration to heed Israel's desire that America not push it to resolve the Palestinian conflict until the Palestinian Authority improved security and cracked down on attacks by groups considered to be terrorist entities by Israel and the United States.

But in his speech to the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, Mr. Zelikow implicitly acknowledged that that stance does not win America any friends in the Muslim world, and thwarts other American foreign policy objectives.

Joseph Nye, the former dean of the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard and one of Mr. Zelikow's friends, said, "If you look at the distance where the administration went away from the realism of the 2000 campaign, Philip never went on that kind of excursion."

Mr. Zelikow sat out the first Bush term, running the Miller Center of Public Affairs at the University of Virginia. But Ms. Rice turned to him for key tasks, and he drafted much of the 2002 "National Security Strategy of the United States," the document that fundamentally reordered American national security doctrine after the Sept. 11 attacks.

He became the executive director of the 9/11 Commission, from where he pressured Ms. Rice to turn over highly classified intelligence estimates and testify in front of the commission. Officials who worked with him marveled at his industry and precision, but described him as far more opinionated than his gather-the-numbers approach might first suggest. Staffers on the commission said other colleagues were assigned the task of smoothing over the bruised egos of those who had crossed Mr. Zelikow.

DOJ_NMG_0088666

The position of counselor to the secretary of state, a post that over the years has been filled by some of Washington's brightest diplomatic lights, allows Mr. Zelikow to fly under the radar, and Ms. Rice has used that flexibility from the beginning of her term, when he was sent off to Iraq to provide an outsider's assessment of what had gone wrong.

OTHER NEWS:

Housing Slump Slows Economy (WP)

By Nell Henderson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Growth Far Below Pace Early in Year

The cooling housing market sent a chill through the economy in the third quarter, helping to slow growth to its weakest pace in more than three years, the government said yesterday.

The nation's gross domestic product, the value of all goods and services produced, expanded at a sluggish 1.6 percent annual rate in the quarter, down from a moderate 2.6 percent pace in the second quarter, the Commerce Department reported. In the first three months of the year, the economy grew at a sizzling 5.6 percent annual rate.

With less than two weeks to go before the midterm congressional elections, the report instantly became campaign ammunition. Democrats emphasized the slowdown while Republicans highlighted signs of economic strength.

Financial analysts were split on whether the report reflected an economy poised for a rebound or headed into a prolonged slump. The debate turns on differing forecasts of how the housing market will affect consumer spending.

The sharp slowdown during the year resulted from a combination of soaring energy prices, rising interest rates and plunging home construction and sales. Oil prices and the cost of a 30-year fixed-rate mortgage peaked in July, and gasoline averaged around $3 a gallon for much of the summer.

Home building plunged at a 17.4 percent annual rate in the third quarter, the steepest fall in four consecutive quarters of declines, the report showed.

"A downturn in the housing market packed a wicked punch for the U.S. economy in the third quarter, but it was not a knockout blow," said Stuart G. Hoffman, chief economist of PNC Financial Services Group.

Optimists note that some forces behind the slowdown have eased. The Federal Reserve has held short-term interest rates steady since June, and mortgage rates have fallen since July. Gaso line and other fuel prices have tumbled since mid-August, putting more cash into consumers' pockets to spend on other things.

Both consumer spending and business investment outside of housing rose faster in the third quarter than in the second, and unemployment remains low, encouraging many analysts to predict that the economy will regain momentum in the coming months.

"The recent slowdown will prove temporary," said James W. Paulsen, chief investment strategist at Wells Capital Management. "Outside of the housing and auto industries, economic growth remains strong and has actually been accelerating."

Other observers were more pessimistic, expecting the housing slump to deepen and continue into next year. That would push up unemployment and prompt consumers to rein in spending, holding economic growth to a crawl through 2007, they said.

"The correction in the housing sector still has a long way to go and the full impact on consumption won't become apparent until next year," said Paul Ashworth, senior U.S. economist for Capital Economics Ltd.

The divergent forecasts explain why the Federal Reserve left its benchmark short-term rate unchanged Wednesday. Central bank policymakers generally share the more upbeat outlook but see the possibility that the economy could weaken more than they expect.

The Commerce Department report also supported the Fed's forecast that slowing economic growth will gradually weaken inflation. Consumer prices, excluding food and energy prices, rose at a 2.3 percent annual rate in the third quarter, according to a Commerce Department price index. That's higher than many central bank policymakers prefer but lower than the 2.7 percent pace of the second quarter.

Heading into the final campaign stretch, President Bush and other Republicans have emphasized the good economic news, such as the low 4.6 percent unemployment rate, rising incomes and falling oil prices.

"It is a healthy economy," Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson said yesterday during an interview on CNBC. "The economy is creating new jobs . . . there has a been a real increase in wages."

Democrats countered that the Commerce Department figures reflect a weakening economy.

"Once again, the Bush economy is going in the wrong direction," said Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney (N.Y), the senior House Democrat on Congress's Joint Economic Committee. "An economic recovery that never benefited working Americans in the first place now has slowed to a crawl. President Bush's economic happy talk is betrayed by the facts on the ground and the stats released today."

DOJ_NMG_0088667

U.S. Economic Growth Cools Down (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Economic growth slowed in the third quarter to its most anemic pace since 2003, highlighting the impact of the housing downturn and raising questions about the economy's direction.

The Commerce Department Friday said the economy expanded at an inflation-adjusted annual rate of 1.6% from July through September. That was slower than the 2.6% rate in the second quarter and the 5.6% surge in the first.

Stocks tumbled in reaction to the weaker-than-expected report, which came after a three-month rally on Wall Street. The Dow Jones Industrial Average retreated from its record, falling 73.40 points to close at 12090.26. Bond prices rose slightly, and the yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note fell to 4.67%. (See related story4.)

With midterm elections less than two weeks away, the report also sparked debate. Some economists said a long period of tepid growth is in store, citing an expected decrease in production in the housing and auto sectors. Others said recession is a possibility. Yet, many economists predicted the economy will bounce back during the current quarter, particularly if gasoline prices don't soar again.

"A downturn in the housing market packed a wicked punch for the U.S. economy in the third quarter, but it was not a knockout blow," wrote Richard Moody, senior economist at PNC Financial Services Group.

David Huether, chief economist of the National Association of Manufacturers, said rising exports, business investment and consumer spending will cushion the economy from any further downturn in the housing market. "With three of the four pillars of the expansion remaining firm, the foundation for continued growth going forward is solid," he said.

Mr. Huether projects the economy will expand between 2.7% and 3% in the fourth quarter. Similarly the Fed's monetary-policy committee said in the statement accompanying its decision to hold short-term interest rates steady earlier in the week that "Going forward, the economy seems likely to expand at a moderate rate."

Others are less certain. Ian Shepherdson of High Frequency Economics said he expects little improvement in the fourth quarter and minuscule growth next year. He puts the chance of a recession at 40%. Joseph Carson of AllianceBernstein sees 1.9% growth for 2007 and a roughly 25% chance of recession. The economic slowdown "may not be severe in depth," Mr. Carson said, "but it may be pretty long."

Recession, as a rule of thumb, is when the economy contracts for two consecutive quarters. One reason many economists say a slowdown is more likely than an outright recession is because they believe the Fed would lower interest rates if the economy doesn't recover.

Most economists said the Fed will need to see more evidence before it changes its current stance of keeping rates steady as it waits for inflation to ebb. "They're far away from easing at this point," said Jan Hatzius, chief U.S. economist at Goldman Sachs.

Friday's report contained good news on inflation. The Fed's preferred measure of core inflation -- the index of personal consumption expenditures excluding food and energy -- rose at a 2.3% annual rate in the third quarter, down from the second quarter's 2.7%.

Consumers were resilient last quarter, despite high gasoline prices in July and August, but much of their stepped-up activity was offset by a steep plunge in residential construction and greater spending on imported goods.

Separately, the University of Michigan Friday said its index of consumer sentiment rose to 93.6 from 92.3 earlier this month and 85.4 in September. Buoyed by lower gasoline prices, consumers' assessment of current and future conditions rose. The survey also found many people are still concerned about the housing market. "Consumers remain uncertain about how much more home prices might fall and therefore reported their continued reluctance to purchase a home any time soon," said Richard Curtin, who oversees the survey.

Write to Christopher Conkey at christopher.conkey@wsj.com13

Oil And Housing Put Brake On US Growth (FT)

By Krishna Guha

Financial Times, October 28, 2006

US economic growth slowed to an annualised rate of just 1.6 per cent in the third quarter of 2006, figures revealed on Friday, as a brutal correction in housing construction and an oil-fuelled rise in imports dragged down economic activity.

DOJ_NMG_0088668

The news of the sharper-than-expected slowdown comes at a bad time for the Republican party, which has been leaning on its economic record to shore up support damaged by the war in Iraq in the run-up to midterm elections for Congress on November 7. Growth in the quarter was the slowest since early 2003.

However, strong consumer spending – particularly on automobiles – ensured the economy continued to expand, though below its potential growth rate.

Inflation pressures eased a little, with the core personal consumption expenditure deflator rising at an annualised rate of 2.3 per cent, down from 2.7 per cent.

Bond prices rallied on the evidence of economic weakness, with the yield on 10-year Treasuries falling to 4.68 per cent, while equity prices stalled.

Most analysts expect growth will rebound in the current fourth quarter, as lower oil prices depress imports, though it will probably remain below trend.

Figures from the eurozone showed growth in lending to the private sector equalled its highest rate since the launch of the euro in 1999, highlighting robust economic activity in Europe but raising expectations of possible further interest rate rises by the European Central Bank.

Democrats seized on the weak US third-quarter growth numbers as more evidence that the US was "on the wrong track".

However, Hank Paulson, the Treasury secretary, dismissed weak third-quarter growth as a "blip".

In an interview with the Financial Times, Carlos Gutierrez, the commerce secretary, said the capacity of the economy to absorb the correction in housing was "another example of how resilient and how strong this economy is".

Although headline growth was lower than consensus, the report is unlikely to prompt the Federal Reserve into early consideration of interest rate cuts. This week, it issued a statement saying: "Going forward, the economy seems likely to expand at a moderate pace."

The statement was widely seen as a pre-emptive strike ahead of the third-quarter growth report.

Additional reporting by Michael Mackenzie

Growth Slackened In Summer (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

Chilled by a summer slowdown in the housing market, the economy was held to a growth rate of 1.6 percent in the third quarter, the lowest since early 2003, the government reported yesterday.

But evidence of a decline in inflation coupled with vigorous consumer spending left most economists saying that the overall economy is unlikely to be dragged into a recession even as the housing market continues to falter.

"We are in a housing recession, but we are not in a broader economic recession," said Richard B. Hoey, chief economist of Mellon Financial.

The government report, which showed growth slowing from a 5.6 percent pace in the first quarter and 2.6 percent in the second, appeared to validate the expectation of the Federal Reserve chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, that the economy is settling softly into a pace consistent with what he considers an acceptably low level of inflation.

"Ben Bernanke's forecast was that past Fed tightening would slow demand," Mr. Hoey said. "The forecast is tracking as far as I can see."

Stocks fell and bond prices rose as investors factored in the weaker-than-expected growth this summer, concluding that the Fed was less likely to raise interest rates next year.

With the midterm elections little more than a week away, the Bush administration sought to persuade voters that the economy, while beating at a slower pace, remains healthy.

"We have a very strong, large resilient economy that can absorb a housing correction," said Carlos M. Gutierrez, the commerce secretary. "If you isolate the impact of the housing correction and look at all the rest, those are solid numbers."

But Democrats seized on the report to criticize the administration's economic management.

"Economic growth has slowed even before most ordinary Americans have benefited from this recovery," Senator Jack Reed of Rhode Island, the ranking Democrat on the Congressional Joint Economic Committee, said in a statement. "It's clear that we need a new direction in policy to create an economy that works for all Americans."

The economic deceleration in the third quarter was almost single-handedly brought about by the steep contraction in home building.

Residential investment plummeted 17.4 percent in the quarter, its biggest decline in more than 15 years. This alone reduced economic growth in the third quarter by over 1.1 percentage points.

DOJ_NMG_0088669

The building of factories, warehouses and commercial structures picked up some of the slack. Business investment, including structures and machinery, added nearly 0.9 percentage point to gross domestic product in the quarter.

But what is most remarkable is that the pricking of the housing bubble has barely spilled over into consumer spending, which is still chugging along. The government reported that consumer spending grew 3.1 percent in the third quarter — nearly twice as fast as overall economic growth.

"We have the most reckless and relentless consumers in the world," said David Kelly, economic adviser at Putnam Investments in Boston. "It's wonderful."

The housing freeze had long been expected to put a chill on consumers' appetites. Sales of existing homes have declined almost 14 percent over the last year. The median price of new homes has fallen by almost 10 percent in the last 12 months and existing-home prices have started to decline nationwide.

Many economists assumed that just as consumers had leveraged their buying power by borrowing against the value of their homes when house prices were rising, now that house prices are falling they would start saving some money.

That, however, has not happened. Rather, increasing employment and falling gas prices seem to be providing consumers with new reasons to spend. The personal savings rate remained negative, at minus 0.5 percent of total disposable income.

The University of Michigan's index of consumer confidence recorded its eighth-largest monthly gain in October, vaulting to its highest level since June 2005. Optimism was driven by falling gas prices as well as expectations of faster economic growth, larger wage gains and low unemployment.

Richard Curtin, who runs the university's surveys of consumers, noted that consumers remain reluctant to buy a home, keenly aware of the decline in house prices. Still, their overall appetite to spend remains as brisk as ever.

Inflation, meanwhile, has started to abate — at least for now. The measure of inflation preferred by the Fed, which measures the prices of goods and services, excluding food and energy, that consumers buy, rose 2.3 percent in the third quarter. This is down from the 2.7 percent rate of the second quarter, bringing inflation closer to the 1-to-2 percent range Mr. Bernanke considers acceptable.

The growth rate reported by the government is only a preliminary approximation. Historical experience suggests that subsequent revisions could change it substantially, for better or worse.

But whatever the ultimate verdict on the summer period, several economists argue that growth in the fourth quarter is likely to be higher, as consumers spend the extra money in their wallets from lower gasoline prices on other items.

"So far the quarter is going swimmingly," said Richard Yamarone, director of economic research at Argus Research.

The outlook for next year will depend on whether the continuing weakness in the housing market affects spending.

Orawin Velz, director of economic forecasting at the Mortgage Bankers' Association, estimated that the fall in residential investment would continue to drag on the economy through the middle of next year, but that its impact would decline over time. "We think the third quarter will be the peak of the damage," Ms. Velz said.

While many economists foresee a longer period of housing weakness, she said that supply and demand should come into balance by mid-2007 and that home construction would start rising next summer.

Still, if the weak housing market starts cutting into consumption, the drag on overall growth could be more intense.

While it is not yet evident in the official numbers, builders are starting to shed workers as older projects are completed and there are fewer new ones to take up the slack. This will probably cut into workers' income and spending, slowing growth.

In contrast to many business economists, Dean Baker, co-director of the liberal Center for Economic Policy and Research in Washington, argued that a consumer reaction to the weak housing market would pull the economy into a recession next year.

"Homeowners had been pulling equity out of their homes at more than a $700 billion annual rate," Mr. Baker wrote yesterday. "This borrowing will slow sharply in the quarters ahead."

But others insisted that consumer appetites should not be underestimated. "Consumer spending hasn't stopped growing in 59 straight quarters, and some pretty awful things have happened in those 59 quarters," Mr. Yamarone said. "We all keep forgetting that the consumer is resilient."

Housing Slows Economic Growth (WT)

By Patrice Hill, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

The steep downturn in the housing market took its toll on the economy in the summer quarter, holding growth down to a 1.6 percent pace, the slowest in more than three years, the Commerce Department reported yesterday.

Housing construction fell by 17.4 percent after declining by 11 percent in the spring quarter, the biggest drops since 1991, which was the last time the housing market went into such a sharp downturn. The slump in housing largely offset greater strength in business investment in office buildings, plants and computers, as well as an uptick in consumer spending during the third quarter.

DOJ_NMG_0088670

"We are feeling the effects of the housing bubble bursting," said Joel Naroff, president of Naroff Economic Advisors, a Pennsylvania forecasting company, expressing hope that housing will rebound quickly. "While the ill wind is not pleasant, it is not likely to be long lasting," he said. "Businesses and households did their part to keep the economy going."

Consumer spending expanded by 3.1 percent while commercial construction jumped by 14 percent and equipment spending rose by 6.4 percent -- all strong showings that muted the collapse in housing.

"Consumers and business investment continued to stave off the recession that the housing adjustment and the tide of imports could easily cause," said Peter Morici, business professor at the University of Maryland.

He calculated that housing subtracted 1.1 percentage points from economic growth while burgeoning imports -- primarily purchases of fuel and goods from China -- deducted another 1.3 points. The trade deficit during the quarter remained at a record 6.1 percent of economic output.

Still, consumers have survived the downdraft in housing pretty well so far, because they still have substantial equity in their homes built up after five years of double-digit gains in many areas, Mr. Morici said. He expects growth to pick up in the months ahead.

Consumers have been bolstered by a record fast drop in oil and gasoline prices since Labor Day, and a move by the Dow Jones Industrial Average to surpass its previous record high set in 2000. A measure of consumer sentiment published by the University of Michigan yesterday showed an uptick in response to both developments, which may stimulate stronger consumer spending in the final quarter of the year.

Some economists are not so sure the economy will bounce back quickly from the housing debacle, however.

Jason Schenker, economist at Wachovia Securities, said the depth of housing's troubles caught many analysts by surprise and is forcing Wachovia and others to revise their forecasts for economic growth.

"We still expect a bumpy-to-soft landing, but not a hard landing" for the economy, he said. "We won't get a recession."

Christian E. Weller, senior economist at the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank, said the economy cannot easily shake off the effects of the housing slump because of the critical role housing played in boosting economic growth between 2000 and 2005.

"The underlying story is that since the sharp end to the housing boom, there has not yet been a replacement to drive the economy," he said. "Other sectors of the economy either failed to grow fast enough to compensate for these declines, or presented an additional strain on the economy."

Consumers had to dip further into their savings and go deeper into debt to keep contributing to economic growth during the quarter, and federal spending on defense and other areas already is high and cannot be expected to fill in gap, Mr. Weller said.

"The important question is whether the continued expansion in business investment will be enough to create new jobs with higher wages and spur income-led consumption growth," he said. "For the economy to regain a healthier footing and end its dependence on debt, income needs to grow faster again."

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, sought to put the best face on the news, noting that the economy expanded forthe 20th straight quarter and remains on solid footing.

After A Strong Week, A Whimper (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

Stocks pulled back yesterday after a government report stirred concerns that the economy may be slowing too much.

Investors have bid up stocks sharply this month on the notion that the economy is slowing but that the slackening pace poses no threat to corporate profits and consumer spending. Investors are also counting on a gradual slowdown to reduce the threat of inflation and persuade the Federal Reserve to lower short-term interest rates.

While investors expected that yesterday's advance reading on gross domestic product from the Commerce Department would show slowing growth, the report underscored concern that a cooling housing market could spill over into other parts of the economy.

"I think that the market actually was poised for profit taking and consolidation," said Quincy Krosby, chief investment strategist at the Hartford. The G.D.P. report gave investors an excuse to catch their breath after the recent run-up, she said, calling the pullback a healthy pause.

The Dow Jones industrial average was down 73.40 points, or 0.60 percent, at 12,090.26. The average had achieved a new high close in each of the previous four sessions and in 13 of the previous 18 sessions.

DOJ_NMG_0088671

Broader stock indicators also moved lower yesterday. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slipped 11.74 points, or 0.85 percent, to 1,377.34, and the Nasdaq composite index fell 28.48 points, or 1.20 percent, to 2,350.62.

Technology stocks retreated afternoon after a report from Goldman Sachs that warned of weakness in orders for computer parts.

Over all, the major indexes showed gains for the week despite yesterday's decline. The Dow rose 0.73 percent for the week, while the S.& P. gained 0.64 percent and the Nasdaq added 0.36 percent. Even with the overall advances in the market, the S.& P. stands about 9.8 percent below its high close of 1,527.46 and the Nasdaq is even further off, about 53 percent below its high.

Bonds rose, with the benchmark 10-year Treasury note gaining 11/32, to 10118/32, and the yield, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, falling to 4.67 percent from 4.72 percent late Thursday. The dollar was mixed against other major currencies, while gold prices rose.

The G.D.P., the broadest measure of the economy, showed that growth slowed to 1.6 percent in the third quarter; economists had been expecting a 2.1 percent expansion. The report identified the slumping housing market as a significant drag on growth, as money pumped into home building fell by the largest amount since 1991.

The University of Michigan reported that its consumer sentiment index rose to 93.6 for October from a reading of 85.4 last month, which provided some optimism. A decline in oil prices, which hit lows for the year a week ago and are sharply off midsummer's highs, has left more money in consumers' wallets.

Light crude oil settled up 39 cents, to $60.75 a barrel, on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Subodh Kumar, chief investment strategist for CIBC World Markets, said the markets moved lower yesterday as investors tried to balance expectations about the economy with Fed policy and oil prices. The central bank left short-term interest rates unchanged on Thursday, as expected, and offered a little-changed opinion on the health of the economy.

"The fact that there is a moderate pullback tells you that the overall market risk is not extreme," he said.

A flood of corporate earnings has held investor attention in recent weeks, with record profits from Chevron giving a dose of good earnings news yesterday. Chevron, which rose 18 cents to $67.68, reported its third-quarter profit surged 40 percent, to $5.02 billion, topping estimates. The year-ago quarter in part reflected costs tied to Hurricane Katrina.

Microsoft fell 1 cent, to $28.34, even though it reported better-than-expected profit and raised its forecast.

Alltel, a wireless carrier, declined $4.19, or 7.2 percent, to $53.99 after its third-quarter profit, though up 11 percent, missed expectations.

BorgWarner fell $3.06, or 5 percent, to $58.25, after its third-quarter profit fell 36 percent as global sales failed to offset sizable production cuts by automakers in North America.

Ingersoll-Rand, which makes industrial equipment, declined $1.45, or 3.7 percent, to $37.45, after posting a 4 percent drop in its third-quarter earnings, in part because of tax expenses and lower sales of its Bobcat equipment. The company also said its fourth-quarter profit would be below what Wall Street had expected.

Dow Steps Back On Concerns About Economy (WSJ)

By Shefali Anand

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

What goes up, must eventually take a breather.

After finishing at a record high on each of the week's first four days, the Dow Jones Industrial Average fell Friday amid news of a softer-than-expected economy.

Even so, October is shaping up as the blue-chip average's strongest month in more than a year. The Dow industrials are up 3.52% in October. If that holds up it would be the best month since July 2005, when they jumped 3.56%.

On Friday on normal trading volume, the Dow retreated 73.40 points, or 0.60%, to 12090.26, but it was up 0.7% for the week, and 12.8% year-to-date.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slid 0.85%, or 11.74 points, to 1377.34, up 0.6% for the week, and 10.2% in 2006.

The last few weeks' gains have been driven largely by strong corporate earnings, coupled with falling gasoline prices and the perception of a benign economy.

"We've really had a heck of a run...at some point you are going to consolidate a little bit and pause," said Andy Brooks, head of stock trading at Baltimore money-management group T. Rowe Price.

On Friday, investors focused on Commerce Department figures showing quarterly economic growth at the slowest rate in three years, a seasonally adjusted 1.6% annual rate for the third quarter.

DOJ_NMG_0088672

The report suggested weakness in the housing market, with investment in residential housing dropping 17%, the steepest drop since the first quarter of 1991.

But worries were muted somewhat because investors already knew housing was weak. Business and consumer spending, about which investors have been concerned lately, rose for the quarter, 8.6% and 3.1% respectively.

Crude-oil futures contracts for December delivery rose on Friday by 39 cents or 0.65% per barrel, to $60.75 at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

The Nasdaq Composite Index, filled with volatile technology stocks, fell 1.20%, or 28.48 points, to 2350.62, its biggest drop since early September, pulled down by big technology stocks such as Intel. The stocks were hit following a report from Goldman Sachs that Asian demand for motherboards is declining.

Meanwhile, oil major Chevron provided an upbeat note by releasing better-than-expected earnings, as did Microsoft after regular trading hours on Thursday.

Microsoft's earnings rose 11% in its first fiscal quarter, while Chevron's third-quarter net income jumped about 40% over the same period last year.

Microsoft stock declined marginally, however, as the company offered disappointing guidance about performance in the current quarter.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks fell1 and bonds gained2. The 10-year Treasury note rose 11/32, or $3.44 for every $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.681%. The 30-year bond was up 21/32 to yield 4.799%.

The dollar weakened3. Late in New York, it traded at 117.58 yen, down from 118.39. The euro rose against the dollar to $1.2735 from $1.2690.

Write to Shefali Anand at shefali.anand@wsj.com4

Dollar Declines Against Rivals After A Sign Of Slowing Growth (WSJ)

By Dan Molinski

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

The dollar dropped to a one-month low against the yen Friday as worries of a slowing U.S. economy boosted the chances of interest-rate cuts next year by the Federal Reserve.

The dollar's downward spiral was triggered by a weaker-than-expected third-quarter gross-domestic-product report, which sent the dollar to the one-month low of 117.13 yen, while the euro hit a three-week high at $1.2751. The dollar recovered slightly against its rivals later in the session, but remained overall in negative territory.

Speaking on CNBC television shortly after the data were released, U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson sought to reassure markets, saying the U.S. economy was "healthy," but many currency analysts weren't convinced.

"Although the optimists will be looking for a rebound in the fourth quarter, the [dollar's] momentum now has clearly downshifted going toward the end of the year," said Brian Dolan, head of currency research at Forex.com.

Late Friday, the euro stood at $1.2735 from $1.2690 late Thursday, while the dollar was at 117.58 yen from 118.39 yen. Sterling was fetching $1.8967 from $1.8906 late Thursday. Coming as it did just after the Federal Reserve, in its statement after this week's meeting, seemed to be backing off from further monetary-policy tightening, the GDP number banished any remaining worries of further rate hikes from currency traders minds.

"The GDP report gives the Coup de Grace to the tightening cycle," said Ashraf Laidi, chief foreign exchange analyst at CMC Markets.

In Brazil, where a presidential-election runoff is set for Sunday, the real closed slightly stronger against the dollar Friday.

The dollar's weakness also lifted the Chinese currency, the yuan, to fresh postrevaluation highs in the over-the-counter market of 7.8870 yuan to the dollar. The U.S. currency exited active trade at 7.8891 yuan, down from Thursday's close of 7.8959 yuan.

Onshore markets were little affected by rules from China's foreign-exchange regulator, the State Administration of Foreign Exchange, that banned onshore domestic institutions and individuals from trading in offshore yuan derivatives, dealers said.

--J.R. Wu contributed to this report.

Write to Dan Molinski at Dan.Molinski@dowjones.com1

Wholesale Gasoline Prices Rise, Cost At Pump Could Follow Suit (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

Wholesale gasoline prices have shot up over the past week, and prices at the pump may soon follow.

DOJ_NMG_0088673

U.S. prices have dropped an average of 27% to $2.20 a gallon of regular gas Friday from a peak of $3.03 a gallon in August, according to the AAA, the motorist organization. That has left more money in the pockets of motorists, giving a shot in the arm to retail spending and the U.S. economy.

But the retail price slide may be coming to a halt. Wholesale gasoline prices have risen 8.9% over the past 10 days, to $1.56 a gallon in New York Mercantile Exchange trading Friday. Spot crude-oil prices, meanwhile, have gone up 5.4% over the past nine days period, to $60.75 a barrel Friday, stemming a plunge that had taken the price from $77.03 a barrel in July to $57.22 a barrel Oct. 12.

There's often a 10-day or two-week time lag before changes in the wholesale gasoline market show up at the pump. And more than a week of data is needed to mark a trend in the volatile energy market.

Yet, as another indicator that the price trend may be shifting back up, the average U.S. price of regular gasoline rose a little over a penny Thursday and Friday, to $2.20 a gallon, the first consecutive-day increases since the first week of August, according to the AAA.

The price increases came after key members of the Organization of Petroleum Producing Countries made good on their pledge to cut crude deliveries by 1.2 million barrels a day, and put a floor under the plunging price of crude oil.

In recent days, Saudi Arabia, Iran, the United Arab Emirates and Nigeria all informed their customers that November crude-oil deliveries will be lower. Venezuela suggested that OPEC cut an additional 300,000 barrels a day in December.

Then, in a report Wednesday, the Energy Information Administration said U.S. gasoline, crude oil and distillate fuel inventories fell by 11 million barrels, their largest weekly decline since Hurricane Katrina 13 months ago.

Together, the OPEC and EIA reports helped to persuade traders to bid up wholesale crude oil and gasoline prices.

Oil Prices, Now Likely At Bottom, Are Poised To Rise, But Moderately By MATT CHAMBERS (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

After losing a quarter of its value from record highs, crude oil has very likely bottomed for the year as the northern hemisphere winter ushers in the prospect of a modest resurgence in prices.

Growing belief in the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries' ability to cut oil production and the advent of cold temperatures whittling away high U.S. oil stockpiles pushed prices above $60 a barrel again this week.

Oil was given additional support Friday by reports that Saudi Arabia and Bahrain are leading a deployment of naval forces in the Persian Gulf after receiving information suggesting "a strong possibility" that insurgents may attack a major oil-loading facility in Saudi Arabia. The warning served as a reminder of oil's vulnerability to terror threats.

Traders on the New York Mercantile Exchange floor say that with prices having held at around $60 a barrel for more than a month, after a rapid drop from their July 14 record of $78.40, chart analysis is also starting to favor a price rise.

"With supplies tightening, participants' confidence in OPEC growing, and colder weather raising heating demand during the current refinery maintenance period, the supertanker that represents market perception is beginning to turn," said Mike Fitzpatrick, an analyst and trader at Fimat USA in New York.

Oil prices skyrocketed during the summer. But traders began selling in earnest near the end of the U.S. summer-driving season, with the trend only exacerbated by the fact the hurricane season turned out to be tame and the Iran nuclear standoff faded from the market's radar.

That prompted investors holding long positions in oil, or bets prices would gain, to bail out, speeding the fall in the price of oil and ultimately pushing benchmark futures in New York to an 11-month low of $56.55 a barrel on Oct. 20.

"We are not sure if we still have longs losing money from much higher levels, but they have been a factor whenever crude prices have tried to rally in October," said Peter Beutel, president of trading advisory firm Cameron Hanover.

Oil prices hit their bottom for the year after OPEC said it planned to cut production by 1.2 million barrels a day to buoy prices. The initial decline was attributed to skepticism about the cartel's ability to enforce the cuts.

But with the United Arab Emirates joining Saudi Arabia in telling customers to expect less oil in November and Iran indicating it is going to follow suit, the prospect of the cuts tightening the crude market is starting to be factored into trades.

"I think a combination of the OPEC meeting and the actual cuts they are putting in place, the fact the market is oversold and with winter coming, has kind of turned the market around," said Tom Bentz, an analyst and trader at BNP Paribas in New York.

Still, the huge price drops of August and September are fresh in analysts' minds and no one expects a fast rise.

Nymex crude prices rose 39 cents to $60.75 a barrel Friday.

In other commodity markets:

SOYBEANS: Prices on the Chicago Board of Trade rose, supported by technical-chart strength and speculative buying. November soybeans advanced 7.75 cents to $6.3550 a bushel.

DOJ_NMG_0088674

NATURAL GAS: Futures extended losses for a second straight day on moderating weather forecasts and high levels of gas in underground storage. The November contract expired 34.4 cents lower at $7.153 a million British thermal units on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Write to Matt Chambers at matt.chambers@dowjones.com1

Campaigns Go Negative For A Reason (LAT)

By Richard Simon And Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

It works, says one expert. But the nastiness of this election season leaves some wondering what line is left to cross.

In the waning days of this year's closely contested midterm election, attacks aimed at impugning a candidate's character and morals are increasingly dominating campaigns, raising questions about the appropriate boundaries and tenor of the debate.

On Friday Jim Webb, the Democratic Senate candidate in Virginia, came under harsh attack for explicit sexual passages he wrote in a novel several years ago — the latest twist in his tight race with Republican incumbent George Allen.

In Tennessee, much of the week's campaign focused on a television ad featuring a woman suggesting that she had met U.S. Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., the Senate Democratic candidate, at a Playboy-sponsored party and saying, with a wink: "Harold, call me."

In New York, Michael Arcuri, a Democratic candidate for Congress, was accused of calling a phone-sex line and billing taxpayers for the charge.

And in Pennsylvania, Democrats recently needled President Bush for signing a bill for National Character Counts Week a few days before campaigning for Republican Rep. Don Sherwood, who has admitted to having an affair.

"We've reached the point where negative ads have become more important than positive campaigns, and there's almost no line left to cross," said University of Pennsylvania political scientist Don Kettl. "If it's there to be found, the highly paid opposition researchers will find it. And if they find it, they'll use it."

Looking at it from a campaign strategist's point of view, Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, said: "Negative ads work, which is why you see so many of them."

The focus on the conduct of candidates comes against the backdrop of a sex scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) that has added to GOP jitters about their ability to hold on to control of Congress.

"High stakes can mean low tactics," said Jack Pitney Jr., a political professor at Claremont McKenna College. "When a great deal is riding on an election, partisans may feel justified in doing things that might otherwise seem out of bounds."

Conservative commentator Tamar Jacoby, who recently called for dialogue between Democrats and Republicans, said the ascendancy of personal attacks reflected a "fundamental mistrust" between political parties in a polarized nation.

"When you think that somebody is fundamentally different from you, and doesn't share your goals for the country, it gets easier and easier to say mean things about them," said Jacoby, a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute think tank. "It's like what often happens when countries are preparing for war against one another. They start to say really mean things, so it dehumanizes [the opponent] and allows you to go to war."

Jacoby added that the public is both repelled and fascinated by the personal attacks.

"I think the public is fed up with it, but people do pay attention to the ads," she said. "Everybody likes a good fight."

Some candidates are fighting back.

When the National Republican Congressional Committee aired an ad accusing Arcuri of calling a sex hotline, the candidate dug out 2004 phone records to show that an aide had misdialed the number. It had the same last seven digits as the number for the state Department of Criminal Justice Services, which was dialed shortly after the first call, his campaign said. Threatening legal action, Arcuri's campaign persuaded TV stations not to run the ad.

But with control of Congress at stake, even a work of fiction can become a true-to-life campaign issue.

In Virginia, where turnout by conservative voters could prove pivotal, the Allen campaign on Friday seized on Webb's writings — issuing a statement from a "mother of three" calling portions of his books "shocking" and reflecting "a pattern of demeaning treatment toward women."

The conservative Traditional Values Coalition demanded that Webb withdraw from the race, citing his "XXX-rated writing." Webb, a decorated former Marine who fought in Vietnam, has written several war novels.

The attack on Webb came as the Allen campaign has been rocked by charges of racial insensitivity, which have put in play what was once considered a safe GOP seat.

Webb, a former Navy secretary, called the attack a "classic example of the way this campaign has worked. It's smear after smear."

DOJ_NMG_0088675

Democrats responded Friday by citing racy novels written by Republicans, including the 1981 novel "Sisters" by Lynne Cheney, Vice President Dick Cheney's wife, which includes a lesbian love affair. Lynne Cheney said Friday on CNN, "I have never written anything sexually explicit."

The attacks are expected to escalate even more before the Nov. 7 election, especially in Virginia, one of three states — along with Tennessee and Missouri — whose races may determine which party controls the Senate. If Democrats can capture two of the three, they could gain a Senate majority, given other expected pickups.

The Republicans' eleventh-hour attacks follow GOP promises to make the 2006 elections not just about broad national themes but about sharp personal differences between candidates. GOP strategists have said for weeks that they will work to localize races by making them a "choice" between two candidates rather than a referendum on President Bush.

Democrats have focused on character too. In a New York race, Republican Rep. John E. Sweeney is the target of a Democratic-sponsored online ad that uses an actor to portray him carousing at a frat party. "We deserve a congressman who fights for more than his right to party," says the ad. Sweeney was criticized earlier this year after attending a party at Union College.

Such attacks make it harder to govern, Jacoby said, once the election is over and lawmakers have to coexist if not cooperate with one another.

"It's very hard to get to a compromise," she said, " if you don't trust the other guy."

richard.simon@latimes.com

ricardo.alonso-zaldivar@

latimes.com

Times staff writers Peter Wallsten and Moises Mendoza contributed to this report.

Swinging Along (NATJOUR)

By Charlie Cook

National Journal, October 28, 2006

Another week has gone by and little has changed. The Republican Party still seems to be headed toward a very tough election.

In the House, Republicans are most likely to see a net loss of 20 to 35 seats, and with it their majority. In the Senate, the GOP could lose at least four, but a five- or six-seat loss is more likely. A six-seat change tips the chamber into Democratic hands.

Could the situation change? Could the trajectory of this election be altered if the spotlight shifts from Iraq, congressional scandals, budget deficits, Hurricane Katrina, Terri Schiavo, stem-cell research and immigration onto something else, like terrorism or national security? Of course it could. In the time it takes to read this article, something could happen. A confrontation at sea involving a freighter going into or coming out of North Korea, for example, could dominate the news and the public consciousness. But unless something of that magnitude happens, we have to go with the situation as it stands.

While some stick to the assumption that this is a normal political environment, that this election is an "all politics is local" election like 1996, 1998, 2000, 2002 and 2004, they do so in the face of an enormous amount of polling data that demonstrates a horrendous political climate -- the kind that one sees periodically in midterm elections like 1958, 1966, 1974 and 1994, and even occasionally in presidential election years like 1932, 1964 and 1980.

Since 1994 is the most recent of these "wave" elections, when all politics is hardly local, compare the most recent NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll, conducted October 13-16 among 1,006 registered voters nationwide, with the comparable NBC/WSJ poll from October 1994. President Bill Clinton and the Democrats were in the hot seat, headed toward a 52-seat loss in the House and an eight-seat Senate defeat.

In the October 1994 NBC/WSJ poll, 39 percent of voters thought the country was headed in the right direction, compared with 48 percent who said it was on the wrong track -- a nine-point lead for wrong track. In the recent poll, just 26 percent said right direction and 61 percent said wrong track; a net difference of 35 points, significantly worse than 1994.

The October 1994 poll gave Clinton a job approval rating of 48 percent and a disapproval rating of 43 percent, a five-point difference. This month, just 38 percent approved of President Bush's performance compared to 57 percent who disapproved, a net disapproval of 19 points. Again, it's significantly worse than 1994.

In the poll taken 12 years ago, 24 percent approved of the job Congress was doing and 67 percent disapproved, a net disapproval of 43 points. In last week's poll, just 16 percent approved of Congress and a whopping 75 percent disapproved, a 59-point net disapproval.

At this point in 1994, the GOP had moved into a six-point lead in the generic congressional ballot test (44 percent to 38 percent). In the latest poll, the Democrats have a 15-point lead -- 52 percent to 37 percent. Once again, much worse than '94.

DOJ_NMG_0088676

Finally, in October 1994, 39 percent said their congressman had performed well enough to deserve re-election compared with 49 percent who thought it was time to give a new person a chance -- a 10-point difference. In the new poll, the same 39 percent favored re-election, but the percentage preferring a new representative was a bit lower at 45 percent, a six-point difference and only marginally better for incumbents than 12 years ago.

In short, in four of the five diagnostic indicators, the situation is significantly worse for Republicans today than it was for Democrats in 1994. And in the remaining one, this year is marginally better.

Before anyone can erroneously draw the conclusion that this survey is just another mainstream/liberal media effort, the poll was supervised by designates from both the NBC News Political Unit and the political editor of the Wall Street Journal, collaborating with a top pollster from each party. The Democrat is Peter D. Hart, truly one of the deans of the political and Democratic polling communities. The Republican side was headed up by the late Robert Teeter, a true pioneer and leader in polling for the GOP. After Teeter passed away several years ago, Bill McInturff took over. McInturff is a senior partner in Public Opinion Strategies (R), the largest and most-respected survey research firm in the party, with the largest share of sitting senators, governors and House members. So this is hardly a poll that could be labeled slanted, and in fact is designed by two of the best practitioners on the planet.

Does this mean that Democrats are headed to victories of 52 or more seats in the House and eight or more seats in the Senate? Of course not. The number of vulnerable GOP House and Senate seats is smaller than the number Democrats faced in 1994, and the number of retirements this year is less than 12 years ago. But then again, no one is talking about a 52-seat House or eight-seat Senate gain for Democrats this year. In the House in fact, the halfway point between the 20- to 35-seat estimate mentioned above is 27.5 seats, just a bit over half of the 52 seats gained by the GOP in 1994.

Do Republicans have a financial advantage over Democrats in terms of national party spending? Yes, but that advantage is the narrowest its been in 20 years. The Sept. 30 cash-on-hand figures for the Republican National Committee and the GOP Senate and House campaign committees were just $10 million more than the Democratic National Committee and its Senate and House committees, $77 million to $67 million. The GOP spending advantage is there, but it's nothing like the 50- to 125-percent advantages that we have seen in previous elections.

Do Republicans, in their "72-hour program," have a superior get-out-the-vote operation compared with Democrats? No question. But the rule of thumb that campaign professionals have always used is that a strong GOTV operation is good for a point or two, certainly not much more than that. Having to pull out voters who are disillusioned by Iraq, scandals and other issues will be a challenge even for this exquisitely designed operation.

One way of looking at it is that the wave this year may be as big as or even bigger than in 1994, but there are fewer structures on and near the beach, and those that are in danger are made with somewhat sturdier construction than those in 1994, hence the likelihood of smaller losses. But smaller losses like 20 to 35 seats still would cost the GOP the House, and losses of five or six in the Senate put that chamber right at the tipping point.

At this stage, the Cook Political Report puts four GOP seats in the "Lean Democratic" column, and classifies 27 more as "Toss Ups." (Keep in mind that the almost ironclad, years-old policy of the Cook Political Report is to not rate unindicted incumbents worse than a Toss Up.) Another 17 GOP seats are in competitive races, but are still ahead by enough to warrant a "Lean Republican" rating, and then there are 18 more long-shot opportunities for Democrats, those rated in the "Likely Republican" column, leaving 166 as "Solid Republican." No Democratic seats remain in the Toss Up column, while seven are considered "Lean Democratic."

In the Senate, GOP incumbents Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania and Mike DeWine in Ohio remain distinct underdogs. Conrad Burns of Montana and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island also run consistently behind and face uphill struggles, but in most polls they are not nearly as far behind as Santorum and DeWine. In Missouri, incumbent Jim Talent is basically running even, while George Allen maintains a modest but consistent lead in Virginia. In the Tennessee Republican open seat, there has been a small but potentially important shift in momentum away from Democratic Rep. Harold Ford Jr. in favor of former Chattanooga Mayor Bob Corker, the GOP standard-bearer. Ford had maintained a small lead and a world-class campaign but stumbled a little bit recently, while the Corker campaign, for the first time in this general election campaign, is showing signs of life. The race is likely to remain very close, but there were no positive signs for the GOP until the last week or two -- now there are.

Will Republicans pick off a Democratic seat? Republicans continue to argue that Democratic incumbent Debbie Stabenow remains highly vulnerable and that Macomb County Sheriff Mike Bouchard is within single digits and showing signs of life. That seat looks to be a better shot for the GOP than the Cantwell race in Washington state or the open seat in Minnesota.

But the seat most recently considered the best GOP pickup opportunity has seen a bit of a reversal. Republican state Sen. Tom Kean Jr.'s momentum appears to have halted in the last week or two, with very real questions arising about whether Kean will have the funding to compete in the extraordinarily expensive New York City and Philadelphia media markets. Appointed Sen.

DOJ_NMG_0088677

Robert Menendez (D) remains plagued by ethical and legal allegations -- he clearly has problems -- but the inability of the GOP to commit the $5 million or so necessary to do the job could make the difference.

Could things change, as they did in early September when the pendulum swung from Iraq and scandals to terrorism, national security and appreciation for falling gasoline prices, only to swing back at the end of the month? Sure. But it has to swing, and that does not appear to have happened yet. Maybe it will, but maybe it won't.

Polls And Pundits: How Reliable Are Forecasts? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

But will today's polls translate into a Democratic victory on Election Day? History suggests the vagaries of polling and the importance of the final two weeks of campaigning make that far from certain.

Here's a look at how well polls and pundits predict elections:

How reliable are polls? Polls can't predict the outcome of an election; they only take a snapshot at a given moment. Opinions often change in the final days before an election. Up to a quarter of voters don't decide whom they'll vote for until the week before an election, according to Republican pollster Bill McInturff. As many as 8% don't decide until Election Day.

In 1994, when Republicans won control of Congress, few pundits predicted the landslide. In July 1994, the Pew Research Center said that 47% of voters would likely vote Democratic, while 45% would vote Republican. By November, the poll showed Republicans ahead by just two percentage points. Yet Republicans actually ended up trouncing the Democrats, winning 52 House seats and eight Senate seats.

Polls in the run-up to this election are more consistent than usual. From June to late October of this year, people who said they plan to vote Democratic have fluctuated by two percentage points, compared with seven percentage points over the same time period in 1994.

Are polls biased? Polls are only as good as their sample and the questions asked. If the sample group is too narrow or too small, it can skew results. The average size of a poll is 1,000 adults, and pollsters have models that try to include all races, ages and socioeconomic backgrounds.

But modern technology poses new challenges. Most polls depend on land-line phones, but one in 10 adults now has only a cellular telephone. That poses a potential sampling problem, since nearly half of voters with only a cellular phone are under 30 years old, compared with 13% who have land-lines. Still, a recent Pew report concluded that cellphone-only users are not yet "creating a measurable bias in the overall finding."

Early voters also can affect poll bias. About a fifth of all votes cast in the U.S. are cast before Election Day, up from at least 8% in 1994, according to Michael McDonald of George Mason University. This "very subtly biases the results," he says, since this growing category isn't always accounted for in polling models.

What might change in the final days? A lot. A key factor is voter turnout, which is hard to predict. Pew reports that more than half of Democrats say they're enthusiastic about voting, up from 40% in 2002, while Republican enthusiasm is down. Republicans hope the polls aren't capturing large numbers who may be unenthusiastic but nonetheless are dedicated party voters. In recent years, get-out-the-vote campaigns have been the Republican Party's forte.

Democrats are trying to capture Republican and independent voters who are dissatisfied with the Iraq war or Congress. But some traditionally Republican-leaning independents now inclined to vote Democratic could get cold feet in the voting booth, says Andrew Kohut, president of the Pew Research Center.

--Lauren Etter

GOP Retains Cash Edge Over Resurgent Democrats (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Democrats continued to raise large amounts of campaign cash this month, but not enough to erase the Republicans' multimillion-dollar lead.

According to the parties' latest financial disclosure statements, Democratic Party committees outraised the national GOP committees during the first 18 days of October. Riding a wave of optimism about the party's chances of gaining seats in the House and the Senate in the Nov. 7 midterm elections, the Democrats' national reelection committees collected $25.9 million in the period. The Republican committees raised $18.6 million in the same period.

In addition, three dozen or more Democrats seeking seats in the House that are occupied by Republicans raised at least $1 million in the current election cycle -- the minimum that, political experts say, would enable a challenger to mount a full-fledged election bid.

DOJ_NMG_0088678

Nevertheless, the Democrats' last-minute fundraising surge was not enough to overcome the GOP's earlier fundraising advantage. The three national Republican Party committees had $17 million more cash on hand than their Democratic counterparts as of Oct. 18, according to this week's financial reports.

What's more, Republican committees spent nearly twice as much on their toughest House races than Democratic committees did. The nonpartisan Campaign Finance Institute calculated that Republican committees spent $1 million on average to help each of the 35 GOP incumbents who are considered to be most in danger of losing reelection bids. Democratic committees spent an average of about $574,000 on behalf of each of the party's challengers in those races.

In addition, most of the Republican candidates in the House's tightest contests reported having more money in the bank than their Democratic rivals.

With the midterm elections so near, both parties are pouring huge sums into the House's three dozen or so competitive races.

"During the endgame, the parties are spending as much as the candidates themselves," said Michael J. Malbin, executive director of the Campaign Finance Institute.

Even so, Malbin noted, so many GOP candidates are behind in recent polls that not even their well-funded party committees can afford to expend resources on all of them.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee -- the party's House reelection organization -- reported raising $6.9 million and spending $25.8 million from Oct. 1 to 18, retaining $17.1 million in the bank. The National Republican Congressional Committee reported $6.6 million in receipts and $27.4 million in disbursements over the same period; it still had $18.3 million available.

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee raised $9.1 million and spent $22.5 million from Oct. 1 to 18; it had $9.7 million in the bank. The National Republican Senatorial Committee reported that it collected less than half as much -- $3.6 million -- and dispensed a third as much -- $6.8 million -- from Oct. 1 to Oct. 18, and was left with $8.9 million.

The Democratic National Committee said it collected $10.2 million and spent $13.6 million during the first 18 days of this month. It had $4.8 million in cash as well as $4 million in debt.

The Republican National Committee reported raising $8.4 million and spending $12.9 million during the period. Its cash on hand: $21.8 million.

Politics Campaign Cash Clues (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A rush of final campaign spending next week will provide important clues to where the Republican firewall against a Democratic takeover of the Senate is shifting -- and whether Republicans are even trying to build one to protect their House majority.

Overall, Republican committees have raised more money than the Democrats, $445 million to $330 million. They also have a cash advantage in the final weeks -- $17 million, reports released Friday show.

The big Senate questions: Now that the Republican Party has decided to stop investing in Ohio, where incumbent Sen. Mike DeWine is trailing in polls, where does the money go? Will the party divert big money from the Buckeye State to make a last stand in Tennessee, where Republican Bob Corker is fighting to hold the seat of departing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, or double-down its bet on Virginia Sen. George Allen, who is clinging to a razor-thin lead?

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee recently sunk $1.7 million into ads attacking Mr. Allen; Republican Party committees countered with $1.4 million, according to a study released this week by the Campaign Finance Institute, a nonpartisan political-money watchdog group.

But the Virginia race remains a dead heat, and party officials on both sides are predicting another $3 million could be spent in the Old Dominion by Election Day.

Republican Party leaders also will have to show their hand in New Jersey, where they have been flirting with spending millions to try to oust freshman Democratic Sen. Bob Menendez. Democrats have used $2 million to build a firewall of their own around Mr. Menendez, who is viewed as their most -- and perhaps only -- vulnerable incumbent in that chamber.

The balance of the Democrats' Senate payout, roughly $16 million, has been used to attack Republicans. Republican Party committees have spent $12 million -- all of it aimed at holding Democrats' net victories to fewer than six, the magic number that would flip control of the chamber.

In the House, where Democrats need 15 seats to win control, the field continues to worsen for Republicans. Party leaders have been forced to spend in such states as Idaho, which wasn't on anyone's map of contested races at the start of the year. It isn't clear they have the money to sustain such a broad defense through Election Day.

DOJ_NMG_0088679

In the first two weeks of October, Republican Party committees spread millions of dollars across 53 House races while Democrats concentrated on 33. The Republican expenditures include eleventh-hour contributions to protect incumbents in New Mexico, Virginia, Pennsylvania and West Virginia who have suddenly seen their races turn more competitive. Overall, Republican committees have spent $45 million on House races.

The Democrats have spent $26 million, almost all of it trying to snatch Republican-held seats. Of the eight races in which Democratic incumbents are facing serious challenges, the Republican committees stopped spending money in four earlier this month, all but ceding them.

Among the trends that can be detected in this year's midterms is that both political parties have become more-cohesive units, with members of Congress working as teams to defeat the other side, says Anthony Corrado, an expert on campaign finance at Colby College in Maine.

Behind their loyal small-donor bases, the most important set of contributors for both sides this year are their own incumbents, sitting in safe districts, who are transferring large sums into the central committees to help their colleagues.

Democrats Get Late Donations From Business (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny And Aron Pilhofer

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 27 — Corporate America is already thinking beyond Election Day, increasing its share of last-minute donations to Democratic candidates and quietly devising strategies for how to work with Democrats if they win control of Congress.

The shift in political giving, for the first 18 days of October, has not been this pronounced in the final stages of a campaign since 1994, when Republicans swept control of the House for the first time in four decades.

Though Democratic control of either chamber of Congress is far from certain, the prospect of a power shift is leading interest groups to begin rethinking well-established relationships, with business lobbyists going as far as finding potential Democratic allies in the freshman class — even if they are still trying to defeat them on the campaign trail — and preparing to extend an olive branch the morning after the election.

Lobbyists, some of whom had fallen out of the habit of attending Democratic events, are even talking about making their way to the Sonnenalp Resort in Vail, Colo., where Representative Nancy Pelosi of California is holding a Speaker's Club ski getaway on Jan. 3. It is an annual affair, but the gathering's title could be especially apt for Ms. Pelosi, the House minority leader, who will be on hand to accept $15,000 checks, and could, if everything breaks her way, become the first woman to be House speaker.

"Attendance will be high," said Steve Elmendorf, a former Democratic Congressional aide who has a long list of business lobbying clients. "All Democratic events will see a big increase next year, no question."

While business groups contained their Democratic contributions to only a handful of candidates throughout the year, a shifting political climate and an expanding field of competitive Congressional races has drawn increased donations from corporate political action committees.

For the first nine months of the year, for example, Pfizer's political action committee had given 67 percent of contributions to Republican candidates. But October ushered in a sudden change of fortune, according to disclosure reports, and Democrats received 59 percent of the Pfizer contributions.

Over all, the nation's top corporations still placed larger bets on Republican candidates. But at the very time Republicans began to fret publicly about holding control of Congress, a subtle shift began occurring in contributions to candidates, particularly in open seats.

"We keep fighting up until the last minute of the last day," said William C. Miller, vice president for political affairs at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, carefully measuring his words to remain positive about the Republicans' chances. "But when the smoke clears on Nov. 8, there are certainly going to be lots of opportunities for us to get to know the new freshman class."

An analysis by The New York Times of contributions from Oct. 1 to 18, the latest data available, shows that donations to Republicans from corporate political action committees dropped by 11 percentage points in favor of Democratic candidates, compared with corporate giving from January through September.

Republicans still received 57 percent of contributions, compared with 43 percent for Democrats, but it was the first double-digit October switch since 1994. "A lot will hold their powder for now," said Brian Wolff, deputy executive director of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "But after the election, we will have a lot of new friends."

Even before the election, many new contributions were funneled toward open races, like the Eighth Congressional District in Arizona. The Democratic candidate, Gabrielle Giffords, received checks of $5,000 each from the political action committees of

DOJ_NMG_0088680

United Parcel Service and Union Pacific. Lockheed Martin split the difference, donating $3,000 to Ms. Giffords and sending the same amount to her Republican rival, Randall Graf.

Until October, Lockheed Martin, the giant military contractor, had been following its pattern from recent elections of giving about 70 percent of contributions from its political action committee to Republicans. But Lockheed Martin's generosity shifted in the first half of October, with Democrats receiving 60 percent of donations, or $127,000.

While Republicans and Democrats are feverishly soliciting contributions until Election Day, campaign finance reports filed this week provide a window into the final days of a raucous midterm election campaign. The analysis of 288 corporate political action committees, which have contributed more than $100,000 this election cycle, found that at least 65 committees had increased their ratio of contributions to Democrats by at least 15 percentage points, including Sprint, United Parcel Service and Hewlett-Packard.

A notable exception to the flurry of last-minute giving is Wal-Mart.

"We had a two-year strategy to build up relationships with Democrats," said Lee Culpepper, the vice president for federal government relations at Wal-Mart. "This wasn't something that we decided in August that we needed to do and we ran out helter-skelter to try to do it."

One sign of fresh interest in the prospects of Democratic Congressional races came one morning this week when more than 100 lobbyists crowded into Democratic Party headquarters on Capitol Hill. Over Dunkin' Donuts and coffee, the executive director of the party's Congressional committee, Karin Johanson, delivered a private briefing on the race to a sea of unfamiliar faces, despite spending 30 years in politics.

"People are excited," she said later in an interview. "It was, by far, the best attended one ever."

As some young Republican lobbyists fled Washington to spend the final days working on too-close-to-call races in Ohio or Pennsylvania, their senior counterparts stayed behind to begin studying prospective members of the new freshman class. Even if Republicans hold control, the next Congress will almost certainly include at least a handful of moderate Democrats who defeated Republicans and will be looking for allies in the corporate world.

Peter Welch, the Democratic candidate for Vermont's single House seat, has already been telephoning some members of the Washington business lobby, offering an opportunity to begin a good relationship if he wins election. Never mind that his Republican opponent, Martha Rainville, has received a host of endorsements from the business community.

"The real story of the 2006 contributions is what happens in the early phase of 2007, with a change in party control," said Bernadette A. Budde, senior vice president of the Business-Industry Political Action Committee. "There will be proverbial meet-and-greets all over town so we will have a sense of who these people are."

Many of these meet-and-greet sessions will have a dual purpose: political action committees will offer contributions to help candidates wipe away debt their campaigns accrued during the race.

Spending in the midterm election campaign is forecast to reach $2.6 billion, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, including $1 billion from political action committees. While many business groups have been eager to appear as if they have been handily contributing to Democratic efforts, it was not until this month that the trend became apparent enough to quantify beyond party leaders or prospective committee chairmen.

Democrats who are not in tight races — or even standing for re-election in some cases — have seen their contributions increase more than some of those facing the most competitive contests. That is an easy way, lobbyists say, for political action committees to increase the share of their Democratic contributions, a percentage that is carefully tracked by party leaders when they reach the majority.

Representative Adam Smith of Washington, who leads a coalition of centrist Democrats, said he has detected a friendlier relationship with the business community in recent months, a welcome change from years of Republican rule when "Democrats were basically frozen out in every way."

"I hope that the new Democratic majority will take a more open and cooperative approach," Mr. Smith said in an interview. "I hope there won't be a sense of, 'Oh, you gave too much money to Republicans, so we're not going to talk to you.' "

Moderate Republicans Feeling Like Endangered Species (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 27 — Facing the loss of fellow moderates in the Nov. 7 elections, Republican centrists in the House and Senate are faulting Congressional and party leaders for pursuing a strategy dominated by conservative themes.

Leading moderates say Republicans concentrated on social wedge issues like same-sex marriage while pressing national security almost to the exclusion of popular wage and health policies that could have helped endangered Republicans in the Northeast and the Midwest.

DOJ_NMG_0088681

"There wasn't an impetus to help develop a political and legislative plan that incorporated the broad umbrella of philosophy in our party," said Senator Olympia J. Snowe, Republican of Maine, whom experts expect to be easily re-elected. "I think they always operated under the wrong assumption that you just appeal to the base and no more than that."

Ms. Snowe and other moderates, while holding out hope that most of their counterparts would hang on, were dismayed by the prospect of depleted ranks, saying it could lead to a more polarized Congress.

Two Senate Republicans often found in the small moderate bloc, Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and Mike DeWine of Ohio, are in serious jeopardy. Two leading House moderates are retiring, another lost a primary, and at least six others are in difficult re-election fights in Connecticut, New Hampshire, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania and elsewhere.

The centrists said heavy losses outside strongholds in the South and parts of the West and Midwest could imperil the party's future. They say Republicans cannot sustain a long-term majority unless the party thrives throughout the country.

"There are some people who, because they are so pure and so sure of themselves, they are willing to run the risk of having the Republican Party no longer be national but be more regional," said Representative Sherwood L. Boehlert of New York, a respected moderate who is retiring. "They think they can maintain their majority as a regional party."

Conservatives say the overall party message was developed to draw the most loyal voters to the polls by emphasizing bedrock principles. The leader of one group that backed conservative candidates in Republican primaries, angering the moderate wing, said some moderates were in trouble simply because they strayed too far, alienating Republicans without attracting Democrats.

"We have people who are certainly well left of the center of the Republican conference on all issues, including economic and growth issues," said the leader, Pat Toomey, a former congressman from Pennsylvania who heads the Club for Growth. "I'm not hoping they lose. But if they do, I think we will be able to recapture those seats with pro-growth candidates who distance themselves from Democrats."

Even conservatives acknowledge that the push did not make it easy for candidates in close races in New England and Ohio.

"It is a real quandary," Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas, said. "It is true that in order to motivate folks there has been an appeal made to turn out our conservatives, which by definition doesn't help those who are not as in tune with the base."

In past election cycles, Republican moderates, like their right-leaning Democratic colleagues in the South, have survived by emphasizing differences with their own party on pivotal issues. Independent voters at home have indicated a willingness to back their lawmakers and draw a distinction between them and the party.

But this year, given the Iraq war, dissatisfaction with President Bush and a series of Republican scandals, some voters no longer seem willing to separate the two.

"It appears we have finally pushed them far enough to vote for the Democratic Party," said Sarah Chamberlain Resnick, executive director of the Republican Mainstreet Partnership. "As a loyal Republican, I think that is scary."

Democrats have also made a concerted effort against vulnerable Republican moderates, which Senator Susan Collins, another Republican of Maine, said was not much of a reward for those willing to try to work with the opposition party.

"There is no one who has voted more often with the Democrats than Linc Chafee," Ms. Collins said. "Yet that didn't stop them from going after him with everything they had. That is a good lesson."

Ms. Collins and Ms. Snowe noted that although voters indicate a strong desire for bipartisanship, some lawmakers most likely to be punished are the very ones who have reached across the aisle.

Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, made no apologies for focusing on Republican moderates and said Republicans should blame the party leaders for its approach.

"They left these guys to fend for themselves in districts that have been trending Democratic," Mr. Emanuel said. "What we did was recruit and fully fund our candidates."

Republicans leaning toward the middle on social, environmental and spending matters have been raising the alarm for months, saying the party was missing opportunities to bolster moderate candidates with measures on raising the minimum wage, expanding stem cell research and ethics reform.

But the minimum-wage increase died when it was tied to a move to repeal the estate tax, President Bush vetoed the stem cell measure, and the drive for ethics reform collapsed.

"I don't think the agenda has been particularly helpful," said Representative Michael N. Castle, Republican of Delaware, who said some Republicans had been dismissive of the centrists until the leadership was desperate for votes on major bills.

"I will be the first to say there are those in the Republican Party who feel moderates are essential only in terms of numbers," Mr. Castle said.

While Republican moderates struggle to maintain their numbers, some top Democratic challengers are from the more moderate wing of that party, raising the prospect that some gains will come from the right.

DOJ_NMG_0088682

That possibility also gives Republican moderates hope that even if they number fewer, they could potentially band with Democrats in the center to influence measures.

"I think," Ms. Collins said, "the moderates in both parties could be empowered."

DNC Wooing Black Voters (WT)

By Brian Debose, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

The Democratic National Committee is hiring more black advertisers, pollsters and grass-roots operatives in a revamped effort to increase turnout by black voters on Election Day.

Democratic officials say the black vote is essential -- particularly in Senate races -- to beat Republicans.

"There are a lot of races that will be impacted by African-American and Hispanic voters in crucial states, and we had a lot of candidates stress that they need these votes to win," DNC spokeswoman Amaya J. Smith said.

She said the DNC is running a national ad campaign targeting black and Hispanic voters. It also is funding phone banks and has people on call to take voters to the polls.

"We are reaching out to people who we know are our voters but may not have come out in the last election," Miss Smith said.

The difference is the party is not outsourcing its get-out-the-vote operations as it has in the past, said Donna Brazile, a political consultant who heads the DNC Voting Rights Institute.

She said that for the first time in recent memory, the party is taking its political destiny in its own hands, with the operations all being managed by people with experience turning out black and Hispanic voters in their specific cities and states.

"They have been remarkable in correcting the mistakes of the past, and this is the best work I've seen for a midterm election," Miss Brazile said.

Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, the District's nonvoting representative, has warned the party for years about the importance of ensuring black voters get to the polls.

"I think they understand that the black vote is a solid, sure vote that you don't have to wonder about," Mrs. Norton said.

According to exit polls in 2004, black voters constituted 11 percent of the electorate, and 88 percent voted for Democrat John Kerry. The impact of black voters in key states is even larger. In Maryland, for example, 23 percent of voters in 2004 were black, and 93 percent of those voted to re-elect Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski, a Democrat.

Historically, Mrs. Norton said, both Republicans and Democrats have underestimated the difficulty in turning out voters for midterm elections, but she said Republicans woke up to that fact in 1994 when they used their get-out-the-vote efforts to wrest control of Congress.

"What gives me hope is that the poll figures are so much better for us than they were for the Republicans in 1994, also a non-presidential year," Mrs. Norton said. But, she added, "Republicans didn't have the turnout machine that they have now and their turnout is better than ours."

Longtime Democratic pollster Ron Lester said Republicans have had more time to perfect their turnout strategies.

Mr. Lester, who lives in Prince George's County, has polled Maryland elections for decades. He said his main problem has been that the national Democratic Party never communicated with the local party and had no system in place to track its voters.

He said Republicans work on turnout year-round and are in constant contact with their voters, making it easy to find them and track their voting habits.

"They use a database that they have been building for years, to the point where today my friends who are Republican pollsters, they can go to a block somewhere in some town and tell you exactly where the three Republican voters live on that block, right off the bat," Mr. Lester said.

Terry McAuliffe recognized this problem in 2001 when he became DNC chairman. He copied the Republican model, investing heavily in building a similar database using credit-card information, vehicle registrations and other data to identify likely Democratic voters.

This database, which cost the party tens of millions of dollars to assemble, has given the Democrats a tool to challenge Republican turnout nearly vote for vote, Mr. Lester said.

"The DNC probably has the most effective technical operation they have had in years, but as always they are still playing catch-up," he said.

Hollywood Director Targets Democrats In Ads (WT)

By Marc Ballon, Special To The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088683

Movie director David Zucker has made a living off of satirical comedies, including "Airplane" and "The Naked Gun," but the one-time liberal activist is now focusing his camera to mock Democrats in political ads.

In Mr. Zucker's opinion, portrayed in Internet ads for the Republican National Committee, Democrats are unable or unwilling to confront threats to America and are fiscally irresponsible.

"I still can't believe I'm a Republican," said Mr. Zucker, a former campaign adviser to President Bill Clinton.

"There are just certain things ingrained in our Jewish roots. Our fathers voted for Roosevelt, and we voted for JFK, [Hubert] Humphrey and Clinton. But the Democratic Party has changed."

Mr. Zucker defected to the Republican Party after the September 11 attacks, supported President Bush in 2004 and has become more vocal in his beliefs -- disregarding the possible impact on his career in Hollywood, a liberal haven.

Mr. Zucker, 58, said he's tired of Democrats calls for "talk, talk, talk" and looking to the United Nations to solve the world's most tangled problems.

Hollywood happily forgives druggy actors and boozy directors, "but I don't think a Republican can be rehabbed," Mr. Zucker said.

Mr. Zucker made an ad attacking Massachusetts Democratic Sen. John Kerry in 2004, appeared on a few talk shows to discuss his political conversion and "fell in with the dark side," quipped his brother Jerry Zucker,co-director of "Airplane" and director of "Ghost."

The RNC asked Mr. Zucker to make the new spoof ads because of his "stellar reputation and high-quality production," said Tara Wall, RNC director of outreach communications.

Like his movies, the Internet spots that Mr. Zucker directed and co-wrote employ fast-paced, gag-a-second slapstick humor that has made him a king of spoof.

One of Mr. Zucker's ads -- funded by the RNC and now available on YouTube.com and an RNC parody site called "America Weakly" -- spoofs the Democrats' reputation as the party of tax-and-spend liberals.

It opens with a shot of a couple peacefully sleeping in bed. A narrator's voice interrupts the calm: "What if you woke up a year from today, the Democrats had taken over, and you were able to see their new taxes?"

Suddenly, a man in a dark suit, the Democratic tax man, appears in the bedroom and holds out his hand for a payoff. He shows up again and again. He hits up a woman who has just given birth, and even demands payment from her newborn. The 90-second spot ends with an army of ominous-looking Democratic tax men, briefcases in hand, marching down the street like some spooky army.

The RNC rejected a second Zucker spot that mocked the Democrats as weak on defense. The controversial ad, which has leaked to YouTube.com, features a Madeleine Albright look-alike handing a basketball autographed by Michael Jordan to North Korean leader Kim Jong-il, an event that actually took place in 2000.

"The Democrats' thoughtful gift had two major results," an ominous voiceover says. Suddenly, an image of a nuclear missile being fired followed flashes on the screen, followed by Mr. Kim doing a reverse dunk.

Republican political strategist Arnold Steinberg thinks such funny ads "can be very effective.". Humorous spots, he said could generate lots of press, thereby broadcasting Mr. Zucker's message to an audience beyond the Internet.

Having spent nearly 30 years spoofing police dramas, disaster flicks and horror films, beginning with the 1977 cult-classic, "The Kentucky Friend Movie," Mr. Zucker now wants to turn his withering satirical eye to politics.

Without divulging too many details, Mr. Zucker said he plans to make a film lampooning politics, sandwiched between a super-heroes spoof and "Scary Movie 5."

"You have people like Michael Moore going into foreign countries saying Americans are the stupidest people in the world," said Mr. Zucker, a father of a 4-year-old daughter and 6-year-old son.

"I want to tell the real America story, that America is a force for good."

Allen Blasts Webb Novels For Sex Scenes (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Tim Craig, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Veteran Says Works Reflect Trauma of War

RICHMOND, Oct. 27 -- Virginia Sen. George Allen (R) has accused his Democratic opponent, James Webb, of writing inappropriate sex scenes and demeaning descriptions of women in his fictional books, the latest character attack in a close and nasty campaign.

With 10 days remaining before Election Day, the allegations about sex-laced passages in Webb's writings inject a new question into a campaign that has centered almost exclusively on character issues: Should the author of a fictional work who runs for office be personally held to account for the scenes in his books?

DOJ_NMG_0088684

Webb, a former U.S. Navy secretary, responded angrily Friday on Washington Post Radio, defending his novels as "serious" works and calling Allen's attack part of the senator's negative campaign that is devoid of ideas. "To take these things out and pull excerpts out and force them on people . . . is just a classic example of the way this campaign is run," Webb said. "Literature is literature. I've made my career as a novelist. George Allen doesn't have a record to run on."

Webb's books, including "Lost Soldiers," "Something to Die For" and "Fields of Fire," are historical novels that describe wartime horrors in Vietnam and people dealing with the aftermath of combat. Webb is a decorated Marine who served in Vietnam.

Allen campaign officials provided excerpts from the books -- some of them depicting acts of incest and graphic sexuality -- to the Drudge Report Web site Thursday night. Matt Drudge's Internet blog often breaks or promotes stories with sensational angles, most recently the scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.). Allen's aides, who have been trying to get other news organizations to write about the excerpts for weeks, issued statements saying the fictional scenes in Webb's novels reflect poorly on Webb's character and fitness for office.

Allen told reporters after a campaign stop in Harrisonburg that Webb's books are demeaning to women. "My opponent hasn't been in public office," he said. "But he talks about the books he's written and his creative writing, his novels. Those are some of his writings. . . . People can make that judgment."

Allen's aides would not say whether the senator had read Webb's books. They said he did not know about the books' contents six years ago, when he accepted Webb's endorsement for his first Senate campaign.

Webb said the graphic scenes in his novels, many of which are set in wartime, are taken out of context and do not accurately reflect the books or their content: combat. He said he has written about disturbing scenes that he witnessed on the battlefield or as a journalist in Southeast Asia.

"It is an observation about how the human species lives," Webb said after Mark Plotkin, the radio show's host, read one of the more lurid passages, prompting objections from the candidate.

Webb told Plotkin that listeners should read a book by Allen's sister, Jennifer, who described her brother's harsh physical treatment toward her. He also shot back that Vice President Cheney's wife, Lynne, wrote a novel, "Sisters," which contains scenes of rape and a lesbian love affair. "You can read Lynne Cheney's lesbian love scenes if you want to get graphic on stuff," he said.

In an interview later on CNN, Cheney declared Webb to be "full of baloney" and denied that she wrote anything in "Sisters" that is sexually explicit.

"His novels are full of sexually explicit references to incest -- sexually explicit references," she said.

Her book is out of print and difficult to find, but independent reviews describe it as highly sexual and "steamy" and mention lesbian characters.

Allen's attack on Webb's novels occurred three weeks after the senator gave a two-minute speech pleading for a return to issues after having defended himself against personal-character scandals for months. "The negative personal attacks and baseless allegations have also pulled us away from what you expect and deserve," Allen told voters in the unusual paid television commercial.

By Friday morning, however, the new allegations unleashed by his campaign had become the highlight of morning talk-radio shows and cable news outlets. Conservative groups seized on the news, with one calling for Webb to withdraw for writing "Triple X" novels. Cable news shows debated the issue throughout the day.

Several Web sites and blogs printed the passages. One, from "Fields of Fire," was: "He saw the invitation with every bouncing breast and curved hip. . . . He was thirteen. . . . She was fifteen. . . ." Another was about a man seeing his mother: "She was naked underneath the robe . . . and the robe fell loosely away, revealing her."

Kay James, an Allen campaign adviser, criticized the writings: "How can women trust Jim Webb to represent their views in the Senate when chauvinistic attitudes and sexually exploitative references run throughout his fiction and nonfiction writings?"

Webb's allies rushed to his defense, saying the attempt to criticize an author for scenes in a work of fiction reflects a Republican campaign in Virginia that is in disarray and desperately searching for a way to win at any cost.

Steve Jarding, a senior Webb adviser, said Allen's lack of wartime experience disqualifies him from commenting on Webb's novels.

"Senator, you have not earned the right to question Jim Webb's wartime experiences," Jarding said. "Perhaps if you had gone to Vietnam and served as a company commander instead of serving as a [cattle] driver at a dude ranch . . . you would temper your feigned indignation."

Best-selling author John Grisham, who with Stephen King held a fundraiser for Webb in Charlottesville, said Friday in an interview: "This is a clear sign of a desperate campaign if they plow through novels trying to find evidence of character. I seriously doubt George Allen is much of a reader, but if he would read more, maybe he would understand the difference between fiction and nonfiction."

DOJ_NMG_0088685

Some people said Webb's novels are works of imagination intended to be informative and provide entertainment, not statements of actions that Webb endorses.

Margaret R. Soltan, an English professor at George Washington University, said voters should not regard Webb's novels as indicative of his views, any more than voters in England should have been deterred by some of Winston Churchill's more shocking writing.

"To think along those lines exposes you as a person who has no culture," she said.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a Vietnam war hero who has endorsed Allen, praises "Lost Soldiers" on the book jacket. "It captures well the lingering scars of the war," he says. "A novel of revenge and redemption that tells us much about both where Vietnam is headed and where it has been."

An aide to McCain said Friday she could not reach the senator.

Staff writer Robert Barnes contributed to this report.

Virginia Senate Candidate Attacked Over His Novels (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 27 — The volatile Virginia Senate race took another turn on Friday when the Republican incumbent, George Allen, drew attention to sexually explicit passages from novels written years ago by his Democratic challenger, Jim Webb.

With less than two weeks before Election Day, Mr. Allen, who has been on the defensive because of accusations that he made racially insensitive remarks, issued a news release that quoted the passages and called them “very disturbing for a candidate hoping to represent families of Virginians.”

In the release, titled “Webb’s Weird World,” which was released to and displayed on the Drudge Report Web site, the Allen campaign also asserted that Mr. Webb’s writings were filled with “chauvinistic attitudes and sexually exploitive references.”

Mr. Webb, who was secretary of the Navy in the Reagan administration, has written six novels about the military and wartime, including “Fields of Fire,” an acclaimed 1978 work about the Vietnam War, according to his campaign Web site.

Democrats aligned with the Webb campaign immediately denounced the Allen statement as the act of a desperate politician trying to deflect attention from his own troubles. They also circulated comments by Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, praising one of the novels, “Lost Soldiers,” that the Allen campaign had singled out because it described a provocative scene involving a boy.

Mr. Webb, a Vietnam veteran, reacted angrily in an interview Friday morning on WTOP radio in Washington when the host asked him about the passages, including one in his novel “Something to Die For” involving a stripper that the host read on the air.

“I don’t think that’s appropriate for you to read on WTOP,” Mr. Webb said, according to The Associated Press.

“There are hundreds of thousands of American servicemen who have been in that environment,” he added. “It’s an observation about how the human species lives.”

Mr. Webb then attacked Mr. Allen personally. “You ought to read what George Allen’s sister wrote about him if you want to read about attitudes toward females,” he said, alluding to an autobiography by Jennifer Allen in which she describes her brother as a bully who once dragged her upstairs by her hair because she had defied her father at bedtime.

The Allen campaign’s effort to draw attention to Mr. Webb’s writing comes at a particularly sensitive time, as Washington grapples with the political fallout of the Congressional page scandal involving sexually suggestive messages from a Republican congressman.

Beyond that, the statement from Mr. Allen plays neatly into the campaign’s larger effort to portray Mr. Webb as hostile to women. The campaign, for example, recently ran advertising accusing Mr. Webb of insensitivity to women’s rights, based on an article Mr. Webb wrote nearly 30 years ago arguing against admitting women to the Naval Academy or combat service.

Mr. Webb has apologized for that article and said that he played a significant role in expanding the number of women in Navy leadership positions while he was in the Reagan administration.

In its latest attack, the Allen camp takes particular issue with the portrayal of women in Mr. Webb’s novels, saying female characters are consistently “servile, subordinate, inept, incompetent, promiscuous, perverted, or some combination of these.”

Until the start of the general election season, Mr. Allen, who was once considered a front-runner for the party’s 2008 presidential nomination, appeared to have a significant edge in his race against Mr. Webb.

But two episodes late this summer renewed questions about racial and ethnic insensitivity that have hung over Mr. Allen.

DOJ_NMG_0088686

The first involved his use of the word “macaca” to describe a Democratic operative of Indian descent — a word that critics attacked as a racial slur with origins in the name of a type of monkey.

A few weeks later Mr. Allen, who is Presbyterian, responded angrily when a reporter asked whether his mother had been born Jewish. After that exchange, Mr. Allen later said, his mother told him for the first time that her family was indeed Jewish.

On Friday, Chris LaCivita, a consultant for the Allen campaign, issued a statement that Mr. Webb had extolled his experience as a writer “but has anyone really read what he has written?”

“Some of the references are simply disturbing and continue to show a pattern of disrespectful treatment of women,” Mr. LaCivita said.

Democrats, who view the Virginia race as possibly one of the most decisive battles of the midterm election, have been bracing for the Allen campaign to mount an attack based on Mr. Webb’s novels.

On Friday, they offered a vigorous defense of Mr. Webb, pointing out that Republican authors like Lynne Cheney and I. Lewis Libby Jr., the vice president’s wife and his former chief of staff, have produced sexually explicit novels.

Mr. Libby wrote a thriller, “The Apprentice,” that includes references to bestiality, pedophilia and rape; Mrs. Cheney, in turn, published “Sisters,” a novel that describes a lesbian love affair.

Kristian Denny Todd, a spokeswoman for the Webb campaign, said that a scene in “Lost Soldiers” that describes a father placing his naked son’s penis in his mouth involved a cultural expression of affection that Mr. Webb had witnessed as a journalist in Thailand. “He doesn’t get it,” she said. “But it’s a cultural thing.”

Ms. Denny Todd said that fiction writers often wrote about things that they do not condone. She added: “It’s fiction.”

Webb Hit For Novels' Sex-laced Language (WT)

By Seth Mclaughlin, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

U.S. Senate candidate James H. Webb Jr. faced more criticism yesterday about his characterizations of women, when critics publicized excerpts of his novels, including graphic sexual passages involving women and children.

"There is nothing that's been in any of my novels that has not been illuminating of the surroundings, or defining a character or moving a plot," said Mr. Webb, a Democrat. "I'm a serious writer."

Andrea Lafferty, executive director of the Traditional Values Coalition, said she was "sickened" by what she had read.

"Democrat or Republican, an individual like that belongs on the couch of a therapist, not on the floor of the United States Senate," she said.

Laura MacLeod, another woman in the Virginia coalition, said she will take Mr. Webb's novel "Lost Soldiers" to "every ballet practice and every soccer game" until the Nov. 7 election.

Mr. Webb's writings started appearing on conservative blog sites as early as Oct. 16, but were not picked up by the press until Thursday night, which prompted the coalition to hold a press conference yesterday outside Mr. Webb's office in Arlington.

The passages come from five of Mr. Webb's wartime novels, starting with "Fields of Fire" in 1978. The excerpts include pedophilia, acrobatic young strippers and the homosexual behavior of guards at a prison in Vietnam.

The women said Mr. Webb's character is a bigger issue than the Iraq war and that the content of Mr. Webb's work was worse than the sexually explicit e-mails Rep. Mark Foley, Florida Republican, sent to congressional pages.

Mr. Webb said he was warned by friends before entering the race that the 2 million words he has published made him an opposition researcher's dream and that they would be taken out of context to be used against him.

Excerpts were read yesterday morning on the Don Imus radio show on MSNBC and on The Washington Post radio show "The Politics Program With Mark Plotkin," despite Mr. Webb saying that would be inappropriate and that people chose to read his novels.

"Some of Webb's writings are very disturbing for a candidate hoping to represent the families of Virginians in the U.S. Senate," the campaign of incumbent Sen. George Allen, a Republican, stated in a press release. "Webb's novels disturbingly and consistently -- indeed, almost uniformly -- portray women as servile, subordinate, inept, incompetent, promiscuous, perverted or some combination of these."

Webb adviser Steve Jarding responded by saying: "Senator, you have not earned the right to question Jim Webb's wartime experiences, from the ugliness of combat to the ugliness of what happens to civilians in nations ravaged by war. Senator, Jim Webb wrote of things he witnessed. They may have been ugly, but we should learn from their ugliness about the consequences of our votes and actions before we send men and women into war."

The Allen campaign could not be reached for further comment.

Mr. Webb, 60, has been criticized for his views on women since the beginning of the race, particularly for an article he wrote in 1977 that questioned a woman's place at the U.S. Naval Academy.

DOJ_NMG_0088687

The criticism yesterday was the latest personal attack in a campaign that has focused more on character than policy issues.

Mr. Allen seemed poised to get the race back on course when he aired a rare, two-minute TV address asking that the final weeks focus only on the major issues, including fighting international terrorism.

But Mr. Allen has continued to run ads hammering Mr. Webb's character, and the Webb campaign has responded.

In August, Mr. Allen, 54, was videotaped at a campaign stop calling an Indian-American volunteer for the Webb campaign "macaca." And former classmates at the University of Virginia have said he used the "n-word" while attending school there in the 1970s.

The coalition's small press conference yesterday sparked a strong reaction from a Webb volunteer going to the headquarters.

"What is outrageous is that the guys who are dying in Iraq and Afghanistan, that's the tragedy," Pat Heineman, the mother of an Army National Guardsman who spent a year in Afghanistan, said to the women.

'Brothels, Sex Kittens, Pedophilia?' (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

Republicans panicking is not a pretty sight.

Candidates around the country have been race-baiting, gay-baiting, Michael J. Fox-baiting and Hispanic-baiting. But now it has come to this: Republicans are novel-baiting.

Still trying to recover his balance, after slipping on a macaca and admitting he was a Jewish bubba, one criticized for using racist language, displaying a Confederate flag at home and keeping a hangman's noose at his old law office, Senator George Allen of Virginia unleashed a vicious attack on Jim Webb Thursday night. He called him a fiction writer.

Senator Macacawitz, as he is now known in Washington, sent the cyber- gossip Matt Drudge a press release called "Webb's Weird World." It featured racy quotes from his rival's novels and the contention that they were "very disturbing for a candidate hoping to represent the families of Virginians." It said Mr. Webb's novels about the military and war portrayed women as "servile, subordinate, inept, incompetent, promiscuous, perverted, or some combination of these."

Excerpts from Webb novels included passages in which a man performs a sexual act on his son; a "naked young stripper" performs a sexual act on a banana, and male guards at a Vietnamese prison camp perform a sexual act on each other.

"There is nothing that's been in any of my novels that, in my view, hasn't been either illuminating surroundings or defining a character or moving a plot," Mr. Webb said on Washington Post radio yesterday.

Mr. Webb, a 60-year-old former Republican and Vietnam vet who was President Reagan's secretary of the Navy, was already defending himself for a 1979 magazine article called "Women Can't Fight," in which he called a Naval Academy dorm a "horny woman's dream."

He bridled at the latest attack, snapping, "You ought to read what George Allen's sister wrote about him if you want to read about attitudes toward females." Mr. Allen's younger sister, Jennifer, wrote a memoir in which she described her brother pulling a Michael Jackson and dangling her over a railing at Niagara Falls, and slamming a pool cue against her boyfriend's head. (She later said the pool-cue story was a joke, calling the book a novelization of the past.)

So the Old Dominion race now comes down to one guy denying he's a racist and the other denying he's a sexist, and the supposed sexist attacking the supposed racist as a sexist. Webb's campaign sent out a press release yesterday noting that Mr. Allen nearly joined a males-only country club in the '90s, when he was Virginia's governor, and opposed co-education at the Virginia Military Institute.

Women make up half of all Virginia voters, so it's a good bet they will determine who wins the race between two candidates who "exude machismo," as The Washington Post put it: "James Webb, the marine firing his M50 antitank rifles in the jungles of Vietnam, and George Allen, the tobacco-chewing cowboy who as governor once stirred G.O.P. delegates with this line about Democrats: 'Let's enjoy knocking their soft teeth down their whining throats.' "

The Republicans' usual trick — having Dick Cheney terrify women into thinking that terrorists will kill their children if they vote for girly Democrats — isn't flying this year, so now the G.O.P. is resorting to more personal, and goofy, attacks.

Senator Allen may be able to hurt Mr. Webb, especially if he prints up all the steamy quotes on fliers and puts them on the windshields of Virginia churchgoers on Sunday.

Gary Hart, who used to write novels with another former senator, William Cohen, once told me that politicians are suspicious of other pols who read novels, much less write them. "They thought I was strange," he said, "because I was caught reading Tolstoy and Kierkegaard."

DOJ_NMG_0088688

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee fought back yesterday by putting out excerpts from G.O.P. pulp fiction. “Brothels, sex kittens, pedophilia?” they began their sampling of Republican scribblers, including Lynne Cheney, Newt Gingrich and Scooter Libby.

The Democrats also turned up a romance novel by Susan Combs, a Republican candidate for Texas comptroller. Ms. Combs wrote “A Perfect Match” about “a freckle-faced brunette,” a cryptologist from the National Security Agency who falls for her “gray-eyed bodyguard” with his “powerful, strong arms” and his erotic pistol-cleaning technique. She desired him to “fill the aching void at her center” where a “deep heaviness throbbed in her belly.”

It’s what the Democrats’ candidate, Jim Webb, would diplomatically call “a horny woman’s dream.”

Hot-Button Social Issues Dim In Ohio Senate Race (WP)

By Stephen Koff And Bill Sloat, Religion News Service

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Economy, War Have Grabbed Voters' Attention

SPRINGFIELD, Ohio -- Russell Mossbarger, a Republican regular, saw President Bush in 2004 as a man who reflected his own moral and Christian beliefs. But then, he says, his party overplayed its churchiness.

"People got tired of it all the time," said Mossbarger, 71, in a bowling alley near Springfield, a small industrial city that is one of Ohio's bellwether communities. "They wore it out, I think."

A Free Will Baptist, Mossbarger wears a ball cap with the U.S. flag. He worries that politicians will try to take "under God" out of the Pledge of Allegiance.

"But this year, other issues are more important," he said. "Jobs are leaving the country. There's war. It's doubtful the Pledge of Allegiance is more important right now."

Two years after Republicans fused love of God and love of country into such a potent political message in Ohio that national Democrats were discombobulated, the combination of patriotic and religious fervor seems dimmed. Now, with a midterm election approaching and one of the hottest Senate races in the country being waged, not much is being said on the campaign trail about the "three G's" -- gays, guns and God -- in any part of Ohio. Here in the southwestern part of the state, barely a peep is heard about abortion or other social issues.

"Actually, I'm not hearing anything. You just hear the usual kind of stuff, like the economy," said Linda S. Rosicka, Clark County's elections director.

Whether the primacy of social issues was overstated in 2004, those issues have largely fallen off the stump in this year's election. When they do come up, it's usually in ways that are less public, such as in gatherings of Christian conservatives supporting Republican Ken Blackwell's gubernatorial campaign.

Sen. Mike DeWine (R), an ardent foe of abortion, hasn't launched any ads or campaign offensives using social issues, but he says he talks about them when asked. He didn't hesitate in an interview to criticize his opponent, Rep. Sherrod Brown (D), on one such issue, saying Brown has failed repeatedly to vote to outlaw late-term or what opponents call "partial birth" abortion.

"There are fundamental differences between Congressman Brown and myself, and one of the fundamental differences is he voted to continue to practice partial-birth abortion," DeWine said.

Brown's campaign says that's because the bill did not allow an exception for the health of the mother.

Social issues still could become crucial behind the scenes in coming weeks, when interest groups try to motivate members to vote for the sake of balance on the Supreme Court or constitutional battles over abortion rights.

But voters rarely hear those issues mentioned in political speeches, in political news stories and commercials, even in talk around the town square. The reason is pretty simple, political experts say: It's the economy. And the war in Iraq. And the war on terrorism.

"They're hearing the news every day about Iraq, they're getting their paycheck every week" and making decisions about taxes, said Brian Nienaber, a vice president of the Tarrance Group, a Republican-leaning Washington polling firm. "In times of war, it is hard to think, 'What kind of social direction should our country be taking?' " he said.

Celinda Lake, a Democratic pollster, says evangelical voters still care deeply about social issues. But, Lake said, "the next tier of voters, the kind of blue-collar, exurban voters who take their kids regularly to church, they're really economically hard-pressed."

Of course, abortion, same-sex marriage, gun rights and fights over religious symbols and words are not the only social issues that can light up a campaign. The minimum wage goes to the heart of a social issue, says the campaign of Brown, the Senate candidate.

"He's met and held events with ministers and pastors across the state in churches on those issues," said Brown spokesman Ben LaBolt. "He believes it's a moral imperative to support working people."

DOJ_NMG_0088689

DeWine also supports a ballot measure to raise Ohio's minimum wage.

Back in Springfield, inside a used-car dealership, Barbara Courtney, a Democrat, says hot-button social issues subsided after the 2004 election, when voters approved a state constitutional ban on same-sex marriage.

"The voters stopped it, and there are other things on people's minds now than all that this year. There's a war, and it hasn't stopped. It's still going on. There are so many people unemployed," she said.

"They aren't praying to stop the gays," she said. "They are praying for work."

Evangelicals Fire Up The Faithful (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

Even Those Disappointed With Republicans Seek To Turn Out the Vote

SHARONVILLE, Ohio -- If Republicans still have an ace up their sleeve in this fall campaign, it's people like Phil Burress.

Mr. Burress, a thrice-married, self-described former pornography addict, is president of Citizens for Community Values, a statewide network of politically active Christian conservatives. His work here in 2004 helped turn out evangelical voters who put President Bush over the top in Ohio -- the state that made the difference between victory and defeat.

This time around, Mr. Burress isn't nearly so happy with the president and his party. In fact, he can hardly say enough about how fed up he is with Republicans from Columbus to Washington for not following through on promised social initiatives. He is especially exercised about Ohio's Republican Sen. Mike DeWine, who incensed conservatives last year by helping to broker a compromise with Democrats over confirming the president's judicial nominees.

So what is his advice to others? Hold your nose and vote. And that includes voting for Mr. DeWine, whose fate could determine whether Republicans keep control of the Senate.

That attitude represents an important firewall for the Republican Party at a time when most polls and independent analysts forecast big midterm election losses Nov. 7, threatening the party's majorities in Congress, the governorships and some state legislatures. Republicans worry that religious conservatives, so critical to Republicans' wins of recent years, will stay home this time.

But a look at the movement in Ohio suggests otherwise. The turnout machine that has pulled evangelical conservatives to the polls in massive numbers is churning away, and for a reason little appreciated outside their circles: the sense that voting is their Christian duty. Ron Martin, pastor of Cincinnati's Central Parkway Ministries just south of here, is typical when he tells his church members, worn Bible in hand, "You have a moral obligation to vote." And because such voters' litmus-test issues are abortion and gay marriage, that typically means vote Republican.

Earlier this month, Mr. Burress's organization sent a million voter guides to 7,500 churches statewide for distribution in Sunday bulletins. The guide refers voters to the group's election Web site, where they can type their zip code and see all candidates who will be on their ballots, alongside each candidate's stance on abortion, marriage, pornography and other social issues. Those guides are based on candidates' responses to a questionnaire. Many Democrats, and moderate Republicans, didn't respond; the site notes that.

The 64-year-old Mr. Burress is an essential player in the Bush-era Republican Party's vaunted get-out-the-vote machine. In 2004, he led the drive to put on the Ohio ballot a state constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriages and civil unions. Then he put his organization, based in this conservative Cincinnati suburb, to work registering tens of thousands of new voters to support the amendment.

Those voters turned out and, by and large, also cast ballots for President Bush. On election night, as the battle between Mr. Bush and Sen. John Kerry swung back and forth, Ohio emerged as the state that would decide the outcome. By morning, it had gone Mr. Bush's way -- tipped by a wave of Christian conservative voters larger than expected. Bush strategist Karl Rove calls him one of the party's "spark plugs."

Now, late in this year's campaigns, a new controversy over gay marriage is energizing conservative Christian voters. New Jersey's Supreme Court, in a closely watched case, on Wednesday declared the state has to give same-sex couples the same rights and benefits as those granted to married heterosexuals. Within an hour of the news, the ruling set off a series of conference calls among Christian conservative leaders, including Mr. Burress.

"In the Christian conservative movement, it's created a shock wave," says Harry Jackson Jr., a Pentecostal bishop in Lanham, Md. He, like Mr. Burress, is a board member of the Arlington Group, a national network of conservative religious leaders. "This is probably the best possible thing that could have happened to the moral values movement two weeks before the election," he says.

Mr. Burress absorbs all this from behind his desk 500 miles from Washington, D.C. Like others on the religious right, Mr. Burress has had his faith in Republicans shaken by scandals and unfulfilled promises to push harder for a federal amendment against same-sex marriage. And that was before the recent shock over Florida Rep. Mark Foley's improper email messages to young male pages in the House, and reports that Republican leaders failed to heed warnings about them. Then came a book from a former White House aide, alleging that administration officials call evangelicals "nuts" and, with the president's acquiescence, stymie faith-based social initiatives he has long publicly espoused. The White House disputes those claims.

DOJ_NMG_0088690

Yet Mr. Burress gets excited when talk turns to his get-out-the-vote efforts. He recently got a call from Pastor Martin, who operates ministries for the poor and homeless in central Cincinnati. The pastor was so vexed at Sen. DeWine that he confessed he might vote for the Democrat, Rep. Sherrod Brown.

"You're not going to vote against DeWine, are you?" Mr. Burress protested. "Let me tell you about Sherrod Brown!" He went on to dismiss the Democrat as a pro-abortion, pro-gay-marriage liberal. And he pointed out that re-electing Mr. DeWine is crucial to keeping a Republican-majority Senate to confirm the president's conservative court nominees. The pastor was converted.

Exit polls of 2004 voters underscored the importance of Christian conservatives to Republicans. Nearly a quarter of all voters were white evangelical born-again Christians. Eight out of ten voted for Mr. Bush. The rest of the electorate went to Democrat John Kerry, 56% to 43%. In a nonpresidential election, turnout falls for all groups. But Mr. Rove predicts evangelicals' turnout "will be substantial," on par with the 2002 midterm when Republicans made gains.

The latest Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll shows Republican voters overall are less interested in the election than Democrats are. But it also shows conservative Republicans far more engaged than nonconservatives. Moderate Republicans have been more disillusioned by spiraling spending, scandals, the war and a sense that the party panders to religious conservatives on social issues.

Recently Mr. Burress traveled to Grand Rapids, Mich., for a conference of nearly 2,000 of the country's leading social conservatives. Attendees were upbeat, he says, galvanized by the stakes in the election. With Bush appointees John Roberts and Samuel Alito on the Supreme Court, "the values voters understand that the next Supreme Court vote could be the one to outlaw abortion," he says.

James Dobson, one of Christian conservatives' foremost national leaders, has held rallies in several cities this fall. In St. Paul, Minn., just after the Foley news broke, he said it made for "a hard day" and he remained "very irritated and disappointed with the Republican Party" for failing to deliver on conservatives' issues. But he urged 2,000-plus listeners, "If you can find a politician who understands the institution of the family...it would be a sin not to vote for him."

His group, Focus on the Family, and another, the Family Research Council, recently released a "Vote Scorecard" for Congress, rating members based on their stances on abortion, judicial nominations, gay marriage and stem-cell research. Every embattled Senate Republican save one -- Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island -- is given a perfect score. So are many at-risk House Republicans.

Paul Weyrich, who founded the Christian conservative movement with the Rev. Jerry Falwell, says he recently had a conference call with Christian conservatives from Pennsylvania to rally support for Republican Sen. Rick Santorum. He says evangelicals there "are highly motivated for Santorum. Polls showing him way behind don't bother them."

Like evangelicals elsewhere, those in Pennsylvania are circulating voter guides, working phone banks and going door-to-door. The Santorum campaign sends regular emails to evangelical voters, with video links. While it may not be enough to save the senator, given his unpopularity with independents and moderate Republicans, party leaders say a healthy turnout of evangelicals could make the difference for several House members.

In Tennessee, by contrast, Christian conservatives are cool to Republican Senate nominee Bob Corker, skeptical of his claims to oppose abortion rights. Tennessee Right to Life declined to endorse him, even though Democrat Harold Ford favors abortion rights. Yet the antiabortion group's leader said in a statement, "We'll be very busy on other races."

What will bring many out in Tennessee and seven other states are amendments to ban same-sex marriage. In 2004, similar proposals in 11 states proved a magnet for evangelical voters.

In Missouri, Christian conservatives are mobilized against a proposal favoring stem-cell research. Republicans are banking on these conservatives to also vote for embattled Sen. Jim Talent. He had alienated them by vacillating on the issue. Party leaders are rallying evangelicals with pleas to defeat the pro-abortion rights Democrat, Claire McCaskill, and keep the Senate in Republicans' control.

Here in Ohio, a pro-gambling initiative will draw evangelicals hoping to kill it. They are also excited about Republican gubernatorial candidate Ken Blackwell. In 2004, he was the only Republican leader to support Ohio's successful amendment banning same-sex marriage.

The alliance of religious conservatives and Republicans has come under strain in Ohio. Scandals have touched a number of officials including Republican Gov. Bob Taft. Congress's Jack Abramoff influence-peddling case recently claimed Ohio Republican Rep. Bob Ney, who pled guilty to corruption charges.

DOJ_NMG_0088691

"This is what we worked for, to have this?" asks Mr. Burress.

He has other complaints. In Columbus, the Republican-led state Senate gutted a bill his group supported to restrict strip clubs, he says, while in Washington the president works hard on economic conservatives' priorities -- overhauling Social Security and cutting taxes -- but hardly at all against same-sex marriage. For that, Mr. Burress and other conservatives blame Mr. Rove, the president's strategist.

Tensions flared in a conference call several months ago between Christian conservative leaders and Mr. Rove. According to participants, Mr. Rove argued the marriage amendments weren't decisive in Mr. Bush's re-election. Provoked, Mr. Burress approached the speaker phone.

"Mr. Rove, this is Phil Burress. Are you trying to tell me that the president would have won Ohio if the marriage amendment had not been on the ballot?" Bishop Jackson, who is African-American, similarly upbraided Mr. Rove: "Sir, I am part of this group because I grew weary of the Democratic Party taking blacks for granted."

In an interview, Mr. Rove says his point was that Christian conservatives in all states -- not just those with marriage initiatives -- came out in greater numbers in 2004 than in 2000. That reflected general outrage about a Massachusetts court decision favoring same-sex marriage, he says, and conservatives' sense the president is on their side.

Next to Mr. Rove, only Mr. DeWine comes in for harsher criticism from Mr. Burress. "Sen. DeWine has been wrong on so many of the family issues," he says, dropping a two-inch-thick binder of research.

But then Mr. Burress says that Mr. DeWine, father of eight, is "a great family man, a pro-lifer to the bone. That's why we keep him." And with that, he is back again to the forces that keep him and other Christian conservatives politically active -- and voting Republican.

Write to Jackie Calmes at jackie.calmes@wsj.com1

'The Daily Show' Swinging Into Ohio (AP)

AP, October 28, 2006

COLUMBUS, Ohio (AP) -- Comedian Jon Stewart will make a special preview appearance Saturday as Comedy Central's "The Daily Show" gears up for a week of broadcasts from Ohio.

Stewart said the Saturday event will be at Value City Arena, an appearance added after spaces for the four nights of tapings at Ohio State University's more intimate Roy Bowen Theatre filled up.

The Ohio "Midwest Midterm Midtacular" excursion marks the popular news parody show's fifth trip outside New York in 10 years, but its first to "a random zone" outside a big city on the East or West Coast, Stewart said in an interview with The Associated Press.

"We wanted to go there because Ohio was so crucial last time. They were sort of the focal point, the swing state, if you will," he said. "We want to know what happened to all that loving attention that they were given in 2004, and if they feel lonely."

Asked if he would be laughing at Ohio or with Ohio, Stewart equivocated.

"First of all, I didn't realize Ohio was laughing. I was not aware of that," he said. "We will be laughing with parts of Ohio at other parts of Ohio. But I won't say which ones."

Cleveland Cavaliers star LeBron James -- whom Stewart called "for all intents and purposes, the king of Ohio" -- will be the featured guest on opening night Monday.

Stewart said many of the big-name politicians the show approached -- including U.S. Sens. George Voinovich and Mike DeWine, Gov. Bob Taft and gubernatorial candidates Ted Strickland and Ken Blackwell -- declined.

As for Taft, he said, "We had a shot at him for a bit there. Then we realized that his approval ratings actually make Cheney seem likable."

Judge Approves Ohio Rules On Voter Surveys (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Oct. 27 (AP) — A federal judge who had struck down state rules on conducting surveys of voters leaving polling places ruled Friday that revised guidelines for the practice were legal, rejecting a call for clarification by the national news media.

ABC, CNN, CBS, Fox News, NBC and The Associated Press sued Monday, arguing that Secretary of State J. Kenneth Blackwell's latest directive, which stated that loitering and delaying voters were prohibited, was confusing. Later, and in smaller type, Mr. Blackwell's order noted that the polling practice was legal.

The judge, Michael H. Watson of Federal District Court, ordered the new rules last month when he struck down Mr. Blackwell's 2004 order against polling voters within 100 feet of a voting place.

DOJ_NMG_0088692

The news outlets had asked Judge Watson to spell out the rules for county election boards and to force Mr. Blackwell to post them so members of the news media could interview voters leaving polling places on Nov. 7.

In his decision Friday, Judge Watson needled Mr. Blackwell's office for noting the judge's earlier decree in smaller type but said the posting was still legal.

The news media group has jointly conducted surveys of voters leaving polling places for numerous elections, using results to project winners and to analyze political and social trends.

A Candidate's Sister Steps In To Defend Him On Stem Cell Issue (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

This 30-second television advertisement for Michael Steele, the Republican candidate for Senate in Maryland, is running in Washington and Maryland. It features his sister, Dr. Monica Turner, a pediatrician. The spot is in response to an advertisement for his Democratic opponent, Representative Benjamin L. Cardin, in which the actor Michael J. Fox, who has Parkinson's disease, accuses Mr. Steele of wanting to "put limits on the most promising stem cell research."

PRODUCER — OnMessage Inc.

THE SCRIPT — Mr. Steele says: "I'm Michael Steele, and I approve this message." Dr. Turner says: "I'm Dr. Monica Turner. Congressman Ben Cardin is attacking Michael Steele with deceptive, tasteless ads. He is using the victim of a terrible disease to frighten people all for his own political gain. Mr. Cardin should be ashamed. There's something you should know about Michael Steele. He does support stem cell research, and he cares deeply for those who suffer from disease. How do I know? I'm Michael Steele's little sister. I have M.S., and I know he cares about me."

ON THE SCREEN — The spot opens with images of Mr. Steele, the lieutenant governor, wading through a crowd. It then moves on to his sister, sitting in a brightly lit and austere living room. Dr. Turner, who exhibits no signs of multiple sclerosis, is in a chair, speaking directly into the camera.

ACCURACY — Mr. Steele's campaign says he supports stem cell research that does not require the destruction of embryos. Mr. Fox has recently taken issue with people calling him "a victim," and has dismissed accusations that he has been used by politicians like Mr. Cardin who have featured him in their advertisements this year.

SCORECARD — The Cardin advertisement with Mr. Fox was a powerful repudiation of Mr. Steele, given by one of the nation's leading advocates for stem cell research. But Mr. Steele's sister would seem no less effective in this ad defending her brother, in calm but firm terms. These two campaigns should perhaps return to their earlier advertising duel, over puppies. Mr. Steele mockingly implied Mr. Cardin's ads made the Republican out to be such a monster that he hated puppies, and so Mr. Steele appeared in a commercial with one; Mr. Cardin's campaign responded with an ad saying Mr. Steele might like puppies, but he liked President Bush more. JIM RUTENBERG

Third-party Zeese Won't 'Be A Spoiler' (WT)

By S.a. Miller, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

Third-party candidate Kevin B. Zeese said yesterday his long-shot run for U.S. Senate in Maryland is gaining momentum because of gaffes by the Democratic nominee, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin.

Mr. Zeese, the nominee of the Green, Libertarian and Populist parties, said Mr. Cardin "committed political suicide" by skipping a debate Thursday in Charles County sponsored by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

"He chose to offend a key voting block," Mr. Zeese told The Washington Times.

Mr. Zeese, 51, said the pull-out will send ripples of disapproval through the statewide NAACP meeting today in Baltimore and compound resentment about the lack of black candidates at the top of the Democratic ticket.

"It shows a lack of confidence and a willingness to hide rather than confront issues," he said.

Mr. Zeese also said he benefited when Mr. Cardin stumbled and stammered through a televised debate Wednesday when confronted by the Republican nominee, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele.

Mr. Cardin declined to respond.

Recent polls show Mr. Cardin and Mr. Steele in a dead heat, with Mr. Zeese garnering about 6 percent of the respondents.

Mr. Zeese bristled at the suggestion that he could cost Mr. Cardin the election by fracturing the congressman's liberal voter base.

"I'm certainly not going to be a spoiler," he said. "It is a question of people hearing me. If they hear me, I'll win."

Mr. Zeese and Mr. Cardin are scheduled to debate at the NAACP's meeting today. Mr. Steele had not committed to attending.

DOJ_NMG_0088693

Black voters could decide the election. They account for about 40 percent of Democratic voters in Maryland, where registered Democrats outnumber Republicans nearly 2-to-1.

Mr. Cardin, 63, has struggled to woo black voters amid criticism that the state Democratic Party blocked the candidacy of former NAACP leader Kweisi Mfume, who narrowly lost the primary despite Mr. Cardin outspending him by about $3 million.

"The black community knows that if it had not been for the Democratic leadership selecting Cardin, then Mfume would be the candidate," Mr. Zeese said.

Mr. Steele, 48, the first black elected to statewide office in Maryland, has the potential to break the Democratic lock on black voters and has helped make his party competitive in the state for the first time in a generation.

However, Mr. Zeese, who lives in Takoma Park and is the director of the District-based anti-war group DemocracyRising.US, said his anti-establishment message is more in tune with Maryland's political aesthetic.

"Both of the other candidates are, in my view, exactly what is wrong with politics in America," he said. "Both are special-interest funded and put corporate interests before the people's interests. My views are more consistent with the views of Maryland voters, [and] African Americans will get more from my agenda than from Steele's agenda."

Mr. Zeese proposes a complete withdraw of U.S. troops from Iraq within six months, the elimination of income tax on the first $100,000 earned, universal health care and government-paid college tuition for all citizens.

Mr. Zeese, who concedes that his limited funding and inability to air TV ads has hampered his run, said he will spread his message with grass-roots campaigning at grocery stores, Metro stations and house parties until the Nov. 7 election.

He will participate in an anti-war rally today in Annapolis.

Mr. Zeese frequently criticizes Mr. Cardin's record on the Iraq war, faulting the 10-term congressman for running as an anti-war candidate after repeatedly voting to fund the war and voting against a bill that would have required President Bush to offer an exit strategy.

Mr. Cardin has made his vote against the Iraq invasion the cornerstone of his campaign and cites it as the chief example of how he "stood up to President Bush."

Mr. Cardin has declined to respond to Mr. Zeese and continues to focus on his run against Mr. Steele.

"Cardin is an insecure guy," Mr. Zeese said. "He is running away from his record [and] the inconsistencies between his rhetoric and his record. ... He is misleading the voters."

Bloomberg Sends Troops To Help Lieberman (NYT)

By Diane Cardwell

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

In his battle for re-election to the United States Senate without the backing of the Democratic Party, Joseph I. Lieberman is deploying a secret weapon in the race's closing days: a sophisticated operation to identify and turn out voters, courtesy of Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg.

The Bloomberg group includes several top-level operatives who played key roles in the mayor's decisive re-election last year or who are in the administration, and have taken leaves from their jobs to work on Mr. Lieberman's campaign.

Since Mr. Lieberman lost the Democratic primary in Connecticut to Ned Lamont, they have helped open campaign offices, devised a strategy to reach voters and are corralling enough volunteers to cover 2,800 shifts at more than 700 polling sites on Election Day, Nov. 7.

Given that Mr. Lieberman does not have a party apparatus to help build his field operation, the efforts of the Bloomberg team could prove critical in one of the most closely watched races in the nation.

"There is no independent network," said Stu Loeser, Mr. Bloomberg's chief spokesman, who played the same role in the re-election effort. "To a certain extent, we were the last independent campaign."

The workers on loan are the most vivid example yet of how Mr. Bloomberg, a Republican who often breaks with his party on issues, could build a permanent political apparatus to support like-minded independent candidates across the country — if not a national bid for himself.

With his 2005 re-election campaign behind him, Mr. Bloomberg has been relishing his role as kingmaker, endorsing Gov. Rod Blagojevich in Illinois and Gov. M. Jodi Rell in Connecticut, raising money for Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger in California and appearing in a television commercial for Representative Christopher Shays in Connecticut. (Mr. Blagojevich is a Democrat, and the others are Republicans.)

But his work for Mr. Lieberman, which includes substantial fund-raising and Mr. Bloomberg's first out-of-state stumping in addition to the gift of manpower, marks his most intense and direct engagement in someone else's political bid. It may not only broaden his image of nonpartisan, influence-free pragmatism, but it could also test how well his political machine can function in an independent campaign with national repercussions.

DOJ_NMG_0088694

Just after losing the Democratic primary, Mr. Lieberman's campaign enlisted Josh Isay, who had worked on Mr. Bloomberg's re-election campaign, as the new media consultant. From his administration, the mayor dispatched Korinne Kubena, the chief of staff to Kevin Sheekey, a deputy mayor who oversaw Mr. Bloomberg's two mayoral campaigns, to direct the get-out-the-vote effort for Mr. Lieberman. Brian Honan, who was the deputy field director in the mayoral campaign and now works in the Bloomberg administration's state lobbying operation, is serving as Ms. Kubena's deputy.

Ariel Dvorkin, an administration aide, is helping compile a voter database for Mr. Lieberman; Josh Gold, who was on Mr. Bloomberg's campaign field staff, is now the deputy director of Mr. Lieberman's Stamford campaign office; and Neil Giacobbi, who became chief of staff to City Councilman David Yassky after running the volunteer effort for Mr. Bloomberg, is the director of the Lieberman office in Stamford.

"The mayor has obviously decided to try to make a difference in a few races in which he believes in the candidate," Mr. Sheekey said. "In some places you can help them by doing a fund-raiser in New York, others where you can help by showing up for a day, and others where you can help by putting folks on the ground."

Lieberman aides say that Mr. Bloomberg brings a certain gloss and legitimacy to Connecticut, where he appears to have a strong appeal.

"He is an icon of independence and straight talk and putting the public interest over party consideration," said Dan Gerstein, Mr. Lieberman's communication director. "He's a great practitioner and advocate for the kind of politics Joe Lieberman practices."

Aides to both men say they have known each other since before Mr. Bloomberg became mayor and admire each other's accomplishments and independent streaks. Described as having a casual, friendly relationship, they have run into each other at events in Washington over the years and have worked together on various issues involving the city, including domestic security.

Capitalizing on all this, the Lieberman campaign plans for Mr. Bloomberg to greet commuters with the senator on Monday morning in Stamford, and to attend a fund-raiser there. Mr. Bloomberg headlined a fund-raiser in Chicago this week, which raised close to $230,000, according to the campaign. He plans to hold a third fund-raiser at his Upper East Side town house on Wednesday.

Lieberman aides say the money the mayor is raising is crucial, but it is the staff additions that represent an unusual degree of engagement for Mr. Bloomberg and show how he has developed his own potent political team to deploy as he wishes.

That team brings with it an approach that has been under development for some time and is similar to the one that President Bush used in his re-election bid in 2004. For Mr. Bloomberg's first bid in 2001, Mr. Sheekey said, the campaign engaged in a targeting operation that merged voter information with consumer data to identify potential supporters and tailor specific messages to them. That method allows campaigns to identify voters by tastes and habits whether or not they live in an area where support for a particular party is strong.

In that 2001 campaign, outreach was primarily through mail and telephone, since the campaign could not recruit a strong contingent of workers on behalf of a political unknown, Mr. Sheekey said.

By 2005, though, the Bloomberg team was able to bolster its voter identification effort with an aggressive operation involving 50,000 workers fanning out through the city to knock on doors and reinforce the mayor's message, Mr. Sheekey said.

With a version of that machine in Connecticut, Mr. Bloomberg's aides are coy about where it might go next, particularly whether to support other like-minded candidates or even the mayor himself.

"There are a lot of things the mayor had done in his campaign which the Lieberman campaign needed," Mr. Sheekey said. "You get involved in races where you want to make a difference and where you can make a difference, in that order."

Anti-war Chafee In Tight Race In R.I. To Keep His Senate Seat (WT)

By Amy Fagan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

Republicans may lose a key Senate seat they've fought fiercely to hang onto this year, as liberal Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee trails his Democratic opponent in Democrat-leaning Rhode Island.

This Senate race, perhaps ironically, has become a referendum on President Bush and the Iraq war, observers say. Though Mr. Chafee often bucks Republicans on issues from taxes to abortion and voted against the Iraq war, Democratic candidate Sheldon Whitehouse has tried to paint him as a boon to the Republican majority and Mr. Bush's agenda -- a theme that seems to have resonated. Mr. Chafee is four to ten percentage points behind in recent polls.

"It has become a referendum on Bush and Iraq and people are blaming Chafee even though he voted against the war. It's one of the most ironic elections," said Darrell West, Brown University political science professor.

According to SurveyUSA's October numbers, Mr. Bush's approval rating in this tiny state, where most voters register as "unaffiliated," is the lowest of all 50 states, at 23 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0088695

But Republicans say don't count Mr. Chafee out yet. Earlier this year they gave major time and money to help him fend off a more conservative Republican primary challenger and they succeeded when many thought they wouldn't. They contend they'll repeat that on Nov. 7 because Mr. Chafee is an independent voice who matches well with Rhode Island voters and is within striking distance according to the polls, most of which show him within the margin of error.

"This race is neck and neck right now, but at the end of the day Mr. Chafee is going to meet with success and be re-elected," said Dan Ronayne of the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NSRC). "Our focus needs to be on the choice between the two candidates."

For his part, Mr. Chafee has fought back against the accusation that he is just another Republican by touting his independence on issues such as Iraq, stem-cell research and taxes. He also is trying to steer the race back to local issues -- running recent ads criticizing Mr. Whitehouse for being soft on corruption as state attorney general.

Some say it is difficult to steer the race back to local issues this year. "In an election that has in many respects become nationalized, it's even harder for Chafee to win," said John Fortier of American Enterprise Institute. "It's not an election about primarily what you've done for Rhode Island."

But the fight will only get more intense in the final days. The NRSC has run an ad arguing Mr. Whitehouse will support higher taxes -- prompting Mr. Whitehouse's camp to fire back with an ad showing sharks and claiming national Republicans are back to help Mr. Chafee protect Mr. Bush and keep the party in power.

"A Republican-led Senate is not good for Rhode Island. ... That is the fundamental issue in the race," said Alex Swartsel, spokeswoman for Mr. Whitehouse.

Chafee campaign manager Ian Lang said "there's a reason why Sheldon Whitehouse has only tried to run against George Bush and that's because [Mr. Whitehouse] doesn't have a record. They know if they run against the senator's record they're not going to win."

Wal-Mart Dismisses Adviser Who Created G.O.P. Ad (NYT)

By Michael Barbaro

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

After infuriating Canada's ambassador to the United States and raising the ire of the N.A.A.C.P., a Republican television commercial mocking Representative Harold E. Ford Jr. of Tennessee has become a political liability for an unlikely third party: Wal-Mart Stores.

Under pressure from black leaders and union groups, Wal-Mart, the nation's largest retailer, said last night that it had cut ties with a prominent Republican strategist who helped create the provocative advertisement.

The strategist, Terry Nelson, was hired by Wal-Mart Stores Inc. in 2005 to help burnish its image after a wave of attacks from organized labor and liberal groups.

After Mr. Nelson's affiliation with the Republican commercial became public this week, the Rev. Jesse Jackson demanded that Wal-Mart fire Mr. Nelson and a union group threatened to run advertisements in Tennessee linking the retailer to it.

In the commercial, which was financed by the Republican National Committee, actors in mock interviews spoke sarcastically about Mr. Ford and his candidacy for the Senate seat in Tennessee.

In a scene that black leaders say has racist overtones, a white actress says she met Mr. Ford, who is black, at a "Playboy party."

"Harold, call me," she says coyly.

Canadian officials objected this week to a separate scene in which an actor says, "Canada can take care of North Korea. They're not busy."

The aside is a perceived slight to a country that has troops in Afghanistan as part of NATO forces, and on Wednesday, Michael Wilson, Canada's ambassador to the United States, contacted the White House to complain.

A statement from the Rev. Jesse Jackson, distributed by the group WakeUpWal-Mart.com, which is backed by unions, said, "Wal-Mart has the responsibility to dismiss Terry Nelson, with explanation, and apologize to Harold Ford Jr. Even though the Republican Party pulled the ad, if you throw ink on a suit, you leave a stain. They threw ink on Harold Ford Jr., and many people believed it to be true, resulting in a negative impact."

Wal-Mart said in a statement that Mr. Nelson's Washington consulting firm, Crosslink Strategy Group, "sent a letter to Wal-Mart ending its working relationship with our company."

"We believe this is the right course of action," Wal-Mart said.

A person familiar with the letter said it made clear that the decision to end the relationship was based on requests from Wal-Mart. The person, not authorized to speak publicly, did so on condition of anonymity.

Mr. Nelson did not respond to several telephone and e-mail messages.

DOJ_NMG_0088696

Wal-Mart's relationship with Mr. Nelson threatened to set back the retailer's extensive efforts to reach out to African-Americans, who account for a large number of its employees and customers.

Over the past year, H. Lee Scott Jr., the chief executive, has met with members of the Congressional Black Caucus and appeared on the Rev. Al Sharpton's radio show.

The commercial has created a public relations problem for Republicans less than two weeks before Election Day.

Mr. Nelson has worked for various Republican leaders, including President Bush and Senator John McCain of Arizona. As a founder of Crosslink Strategy Group, he also consults for corporations. Mr. Nelson has helped recruit Wal-Mart's suppliers to join an advocacy group that trumpets its accomplishments and has overseen a program to register Wal-Mart employees to vote in Nov. 7 elections in part as a reaction to Democratic attacks against the company.

In Indiana, Local Issues Take Toll (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

With Voters Riled by Road Fees, Time Zones, Republicans Focus on National Issues

MISHAWAKA, Ind. -- Preparing to take questions from Rotary Club members at Houlihan's Restaurant here for a weekly luncheon, Republican Rep. Chris Chocola jokes that he has just one rule: "I won't talk about time zones or the toll road."

It has been a dependable laugh line this fall in Mr. Chocola's northern Indiana district, but the issues are no joking matter for the 44-year-old lawmaker and two fellow Republican congressmen in Southern Indiana. According to public and internal polling, all three are in tight races and may lose in next month's election.

One reason: voter dissatisfaction with how the Republican-led state government has handled local issues. Democratic challengers are successfully tapping into that sentiment to sway voters, and turning local issues into a decisive factor here at a time when global issues such as terrorism and the Iraq war continue to dominate in races across the country.

Voter worries about the local economy had already damped support for Mr. Chocola and two other endangered Republican incumbents, Reps. Mike Sodrel and John Hostettler. Two local issues -- a fight over what time zone the state should be in and its leasing of a northern Indiana toll road to a foreign consortium -- have added to voter anger, creating a toxic atmosphere for all Republicans in the state, including the federal lawmakers who have had no direct decision-making authority in these matters. The bad feelings could make it difficult to coax Republicans to the polls on Nov. 7.

The local issues have proven a particular problem for Mr. Chocola, since they affect his constituents disproportionately. The district is split between Central and Eastern time zones and residents of one county -- St. Joseph -- are still miffed that their request to change to the Central time zone from the Eastern so they could be on the same time as nearby Chicago was denied. Residents of other counties, meanwhile, are unhappy with other changes to the state's time-zone policy.

The issue sprang up last year after Indiana decided to observe daylight savings time, which means Hoosiers will change their clocks this weekend along with much of the country. That decision reopened a debate that has festered for well over a hundred years. Indiana counties surrounding Chicago and Evansville traditionally have been on Central Standard Time, while much of the rest of the state is on Eastern Standard Time.

After Indiana adopted daylight savings time, each of its 92 counties was asked to decide which zone they wanted to be in: Central or Eastern. In the end, 17 counties asked to switch to the Central time zone. The federal Department of Transportation, which has the final say over such matters, let eight make the switch. Five months later, six of those counties asked to switch back. They said they were unhappy that neighboring counties weren't allowed to change, too.

"It's a mess," said Ray S. Winey, a native of Mishawaka.

The other local issue working against Mr. Chocola is the leasing of the Indiana Toll Road. Dubbed the "Main Street of the Midwest," the toll road stretches 157 miles between the Ohio and Illinois borders and serves as the main east-west artery in the northern part of the state.

Earlier this year, Gov. Mitch Daniels and state lawmakers agreed to lease the road to a foreign consortium for 75 years. The $3.85 billion deal provided a windfall to fund the state's effort to rebuild local roads and bridges. But the massive deal was a tough sell to some wary residents and remains a deeply divisive issue here.

In the North, residents have complained that the consortium will almost certainly raise tolls and that too much of the money -- some $2.5 billion -- would be used to fix roads and bridges in other parts of the state. Others, especially in central and southern Indiana, fret about the highway being leased to foreign companies.

Mr. Chocola declined to take a public stand on either the time zones or toll road, saying it would be inappropriate to comment because they aren't before Congress.

State Democrats said he should have stood up for constituents, and have assailed Republicans statewide on both fronts.

DOJ_NMG_0088697

The state's largest newspaper, the Indianapolis Star, recently endorsed Democrat Joe Donnelly, Mr. Chocola's opponent, partly because "a congressperson should at least have spoken up informally about the momentous deal involving an interstate highway, even if the federal government was not directly involved."

Mr. Donnelly had voiced opposition to leasing the toll road.

Along the farm fields that blanket Mr. Chocola's district and in small towns like Plymouth, population 9,840, neighbors are waging a battle of yard signs. Neither party has been able to hold the deeply divided district for long; when the two men ran against each other in 2004, Mr. Chocola won a second term with 54% of the vote to Mr. Donnelly's 45%.

Mr. Chocola complains that Republicans aren't getting enough credit for the improving economy, although he acknowledges his constituents have more reason to be concerned than most. His predominantly blue-collar district is home to several auto-parts makers, including Kokomo-based Delphi Corp., which is in bankruptcy protection, and AM General, which makes Hummer SUVs in South Bend.

"I think there's just more anxiety up there, period," said Murray Clark, the state's Republican Party chairman. "They're anxious about the toll road. He's been blamed for that."

Consequently, while other endangered Republicans are turning to local issues to direct voter attention away from the unpopular war in Iraq and other national issues, in Indiana, Mr. Chocola and his two Republican colleagues have sought to focus voters the opposite way. They are talking about tax cuts, immigration and why they think the country would be a much-worse place if Democrat Rep. Nancy Pelosi were to become House Speaker.

Write to Amy Schatz at Amy.Schatz@wsj.com2

A G.O.P. Redoubt Upstate Suddenly Seems Less Sturdy (NYT)

By Fernanda Santos

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

WATKINS GLEN, N.Y., Oct. 26 — This picturesque corner of southwestern New York, with its rugged terrain sheltered by mountains and dotted with lakes, is as red as the blue state of New York gets.

Republicans have outnumbered Democrats here since the Republican Party's founding in 1854. Two years ago, President Bush won 56 percent of the vote in this area's 29th Congressional District, the biggest share of any district in the state.

But as the midterm elections approach, 2004 increasingly seems like a long time ago. The region's freshman Republican congressman, John R. Kuhl Jr., 63, who goes by Randy, faces a spirited challenge from a Democratic newcomer, Eric Massa, 47, a retired Navy commander who disagrees with the incumbent on most issues, from the war to immigration to health care.

In recent weeks, the Republican Party has stepped up efforts to safeguard Mr. Kuhl's seat, which has long seemed comfortably secure. Last month, Vice President Dick Cheney flew to Rochester for a fund-raiser for Mr. Kuhl. Laura Bush is scheduled to campaign for him in the town of Greece, near Rochester, on Saturday, just 10 days before elections nationwide that have the potential to shift control of one or both houses of Congress to the Democrats.

Mr. Massa, meanwhile, has stepped up fund-raising efforts, with noteworthy success. He raised $171,000 from Sept. 30 to Oct. 18, or nearly three times as much as Mr. Kuhl, who collected $65,000, according to the Federal Election Commission. As of Oct. 18, Mr. Massa had about $341,000 left in the bank, about $108,000 more than Mr. Kuhl, according to the commission.

"Frankly, a lot of Republicans, especially the traditional ones, feel betrayed," said Bob Lonsberry, a conservative talk radio host on WHAM-AM (1180) in Rochester. "They don't feel the party is fighting for their values."

In Mr. Kuhl and Mr. Massa, voters here will have a clear choice.

Mr. Kuhl is a low-key, affable lawyer-turned-politician who served for 24 years as a New York assemblyman and senator, running unopposed several times, before being elected to Congress in 2004.

Since then, he says, he has visited all of the district's 145 communities at least twice.

Mr. Kuhl often speaks of his close relationship with his constituents, and reminds voters of the state and federal dollars he has brought to their hometowns. He likes to say that he went to Washington to "change the system."

Mr. Massa is an energetic campaigner with an electrifying speaking style, taken to moving his hands and stomping his feet for emphasis. He served in Beirut, Bosnia and the Persian Gulf during his 24 years in the Navy and worked on the staff of the House Armed Services Committee. He left that job to work for Gen. Wesley K. Clark's presidential campaign in New Hampshire.

He is a cancer survivor who supports universal health care, while Mr. Kuhl wants reforms to reduce Medicare and Medicaid costs.

Mr. Kuhl says the United States must stay in Iraq to held build a democracy, while Mr. Massa favors dividing Iraq into Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish regions, followed by a gradual withdrawal of American troops.

"I'm not a politician. I'm an old sailor," Mr. Massa said on Wednesday, before he sat down to talk to a group of teachers and veterans at a local sports bar.

DOJ_NMG_0088698

"At one point in my life, I was a Republican," he said. "Now, I'm a registered Democrat. I didn't leave the Republican Party; it ran away from me. And because I have experience on both sides of the aisle, I'm bilingual, and bringing that to Congress is what's going to be a major factor to allow me to work with all members."

The 29th district of New York is about as big as the state of Connecticut and is largely agricultural. A budding tourism industry caters to wine and racing fans alike. The track here plays host to a leg of the Nascar series.

"This is a district of small towns and rural counties tied together with a set of communities where people lead a more cosmopolitan lifestyle," said Gerald Gamm, chair of the political science department at the University of Rochester. "But for the most part, this is strong Republican territory, where people believe in balanced budgets, in a government that doesn't meddle in their affairs and uses force responsibly and only if necessary.

"These days," Professor Gamm added, "this is a place filled with discontent."

The economy of upstate New York, which crashed long ago and is still on its knees, is a leading concern, but also weighing heavily on voters' minds are immigration and health care reform, taxes and the war in Iraq, according to interviews with about a dozen farmers, teachers, veterans, firefighters and small-business owners this past week. All expressed disappointment with the Republican Party and President Bush.

Mr. Kuhl has run into this frustration on the campaign trail. In a meeting on Tuesday with about 60 farmers, who rely heavily on Mexican immigrants to harvest their crops, he heard an earful.

The farmers were upset at Congress — and disappointed in Mr. Kuhl — for approving an immigration bill that is heavy on enforcement, but does not provide for a guest-worker program that they say would solve their labor-shortage problems. President Bush signed the bill into law on Thursday.

"There's a big misunderstanding down in Washington that the immigrants we have here are taking jobs away, but these people, they're the only ones willing to do the work," thundered Jeff Morris, who grows wine grapes on 110 acres of land just outside this village in the Finger Lakes region.

"They're the best thing we've got going for us, and they're fundamental to our survival," he added.

Mr. Kuhl told the farmers that he had been convinced that a such a guest worker program might, indeed, make sense.

"The timing is right, from my perspective, to move on a legal, temporary work force for agriculture," Mr. Kuhl said in an interview after the meeting.

An analysis published on Wednesday in the Evans-Novak Political Report, a newsletter edited by Robert D. Novak, the conservative columnist, rated the race as leaning Democrat, while the nonpartisan Cook Political Report said on the same day that the district was leaning Republican.

"The big risk for Kuhl is, are traditional Republicans so ticked off that they're going to sit out this election?" said Mr. Lonsberry, the radio host, whose program has a solid, devoted audience throughout the district.

"To me," he added, "this election is going to come down to whether a certain number of these Republicans will stay home and the Democrats, who are invigorated by the Massa campaign, will show up to vote en masse."

This Time, Ballot Issues Could Rally Liberal Base (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb And David S. Broder, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Wage Initiatives Seen As Favoring Democrats

CLEVELAND -- On a recent Saturday afternoon, a team of canvassers armed with handheld digital devices spread out across the city. Their aim was to urge residents to support a ballot initiative requiring an increase in Ohio's minimum wage.

But one beneficiary could be someone hoping for a new job that pays a good bit better than minimum wage: Rep. Sherrod Brown (D), who is running to unseat Sen. Mike DeWine (R), the two-term incumbent, on Nov. 7.

"Congress has raised its own pay 10 times while the minimum wage stayed the same," Brown told a crowd last weekend at East Cleveland Community Theater.

In 2004, Republicans in Ohio and elsewhere tended to benefit from ballot initiatives. Measures to ban same-sex marriage, for example, passed easily. In the process, some election analysts said, the measures revved the conservative base to help Republican candidates from President Bush on down.

In 2006, Democrats are hoping to prove that ballot politics can work in the other direction. Measures to increase the minimum wage are before voters in six states. Four of those, Arizona, Ohio, Missouri and Montana, feature close Senate races with a GOP incumbent. In Missouri, moreover, a measure backing stem cell research is ahead in the polls -- which Democrats say could lift their candidate.

DOJ_NMG_0088699

In Ohio, recent polls show that at least 70 percent of voters support an initiative to raise the minimum wage from $5.15 an hour to $6.85 and index it to inflation. A coalition of labor unions, faith groups and liberal activists is working to pass it. If their efforts also pump up voter turnout for Democrats, Brown said, he is happy for the help.

"Some people will vote because of the minimum wage," Brown said in an interview. "I think it will help bring out voters. I'm guessing those voters will vote for Democrats. It's up to us to make sure they do."

Eight states have ballot measures to ban same-sex marriage, but their impact may be less than in previous years. Few of these states have competitive Senate or House races. And in those that do, such as Virginia and Tennessee, the issue is not as prominent as it was around the country in 2004.

In Virginia, for example, Sen. George Allen (R) supports a proposal against same-sex marriage while former Navy secretary James Webb (D) opposes such a ban. But only a slim majority of the electorate favored the initiative in a recent Washington Post poll, and the Senate race has been dominated by topics such as the war in Iraq and the character of the candidates.

The Missouri stem cell initiative, which the state's Senate candidates disagree on, would amend the state constitution to ensure that any form of research that is legal in the United States cannot be restricted in Missouri. State Auditor Claire McCaskill (D) supports the measure, and Sen. James M. Talent (R) opposes it. The initiative is being publicized with more than $15 million from Jim and Virginia Stowers, a Kansas City couple who are benefactors of a vast medical research center.

"There are many people in this state . . . [whose] politics might be different except for stem cell research," McCaskill said in an interview. A recent poll suggested sizable support for the initiative: 58 percent.

But mobilized against the proposal is Missouri's antiabortion movement, a key constituency for Talent, who is neck-and-neck with McCaskill in recent polling.

Advocates of increasing the minimum wage say the issue can be framed as more than economics, echoing as a values issue in the same way abortion and same-sex marriage do. Almost 2 million people make the minimum wage or less, according to the Labor Department. The Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, a left-leaning Washington think tank, estimates that the real buying power of $10,700 -- about what a full-time minimum-wage worker makes in a year, before taxes -- is the lowest in half a century.

"Rewarding hard work with a fair wage is not just an abstract pocketbook economic issue but a statement of values," said Kristina Wilfore, executive director of the Ballot Initiative Strategy Center, which promotes using ballot strategy for liberal causes. "While the left usually talks in dry economic terms, the right made a concerted effort to copyright values -- meaning a set of divisive, scapegoating issues. The popularity of the minimum-wage initiatives is a testament to how powerfully progressive values speak to Americans."

In many states, labor is taking the lead on the minimum-wage effort. The AFL-CIO's minimum-wage work is part of its $40 million operation to reach more than 12 million people in union households in 21 states.

Republicans are watching the minimum-wage strategy. The GOP took steps earlier this year to avoid a showdown when Congress tried to raise the minimum wage. Democrats balked when the GOP tried to tie the increase to a tax cut. Aware of emerging minimum-wage efforts, legislators in Arkansas and Michigan raised their states' minimums.

Republicans are banking that their turnout effort this cycle will overcome any enthusiasm among the Democratic base over the minimum wage and other issues.

Mike DuHaime, the Republican National Committee's political director, said he does not discount Democrats' turnout operation. "They have some very good allies like labor and 527 organizations who have a proven history of turning people out," he said. But he added that he is confident that races will hinge on the quality of candidates.

The minimum wage resonates in Ohio because thousands of factory jobs that paid well have been lost and replaced with low-paying service and retail jobs. Since 2000, Ohio's economy has lost more than 200,000 jobs, government statistics show. Policy Matters Ohio, a liberal think tank, estimates that increasing the state's minimum wage would benefit about 700,000 low-wage workers.

Cathy Madewall, 49, an administrative assistant in Cincinnati, said she heard about Let Justice Roll, a faith-based effort in Ohio to raise the minimum wage, at her church. She has not been active in politics in the past, but she has spent hours working for the minimum-wage campaign. And she will vote for a Democratic slate this fall.

"It's a huge issue for a lot of people who are affected by poverty," she said. "Sometimes they're busy working and they don't have time to vote. I think they'll make time to vote."

The idea of pursuing the minimum-wage strategy in Ohio was born after the 2004 election. Ohio Senate Minority Leader C.J. Prentiss, who had tried unsuccessfully to pass minimum-wage legislation, was taken aback by the support for the initiative against same-sex marriage from the GOP base and even African Americans who would ordinarily vote for Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0088700

"We looked at the minimum wage as something that would make sense -- not only energizing the base but also the right and just thing to do," said Prentiss, one of the leaders of the Ohio minimum-wage effort. "It has the same ring for me as for people who are passionate about defining marriage between a man and a woman."

Now, with 10 days till the election, things are looking rosy for Buckeye Democrats. The minimum-wage initiative is likely to pass. Rep. Ted Strickland (D) has a decisive lead in the gubernatorial race over Ohio Secretary of State J. Kenneth Blackwell (R), and Brown has been ahead of DeWine in recent polls.

But it is by no means a sealed deal for Democrats, especially in the Senate race. Some say the initiative might not be linked strongly with Democrats. The measure has widespread support, and DeWine voted for the minimum-wage increase in Congress this year.

In an interview, DeWine said that he supports the minimum-wage initiative and that "it's certainly possible" the Democratic strategy of using the issue to mobilize their base will work. But he cautioned that there are several initiatives on the ballot, "and it's hard to tell what's going to play out. . . . Turnout is a very complex thing. It's nuanced, and you never really know how things will turn out until it's over."

What's more, he said, the GOP base has been growing in intensity as the campaign enters its final stage. "I think it's kicked in pretty hard in the last 10 days or so," DeWine said this week, adding that terrorism and the prospect of Supreme Court appointments are major motivating factors.

Paul Hanrahan, a software programmer in the Cleveland suburb of Rocky River, will vote for the minimum-wage initiative next month. "It will get people off the welfare rolls," he said. "If you give them a minimum wage, maybe people will be able to take care of themselves."

But Hanrahan is no Democrat: He intends to vote down the Republican line on Nov. 7, mainly because, he said, the GOP is more sympathetic to religion and traditional family values.

With just over a week left in the campaign, Brown strikes the minimum-wage chord hard at nearly every appearance. Recently, he addressed the Service Employees International Union Local 3, and his talk left no doubt in the mind of Anton Farmby, a Local 3 officer, about what the impact of the initiative will be on the Senate race.

"I think Sherrod Brown and all the members of the Democratic ticket will ride on the coattails of the minimum wage," he said.

As Campaign Days Dwindle, Marriage Issue Heats Up In Va. (WP)

By Chris L. Jenkins, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

N.J. Ruling Sparks Action on Amendment Question

The hundreds of Sunday congregants came to their feet as the Rev. Mark Becton, of Grove Avenue Baptist Church outside Richmond, finished his sermon.

"Believing that God ordained marriage as the institution between one woman and one man . . . I'm voting 'yes' for the marriage amendment," he exhorted, referring to the state constitutional amendment that will be on the Nov. 7 ballot. "I'm voting 'yes' to restate what I know God intended and what I believe our founding fathers understood: Marriage is the union of one man and one woman."

Five days later and across town, Dyana Mason, a gay-rights activist helping to lead the fight against the ballot question, was standing before her own kind of congregation, arguing the opposite: "This amendment is not about defining marriage," she said to a group of youth organizers at Virginia Commonwealth University, referring to the wording of the ballot question, which says that the state will not recognize a relationship between unwed couples that seeks to "approximate the . . . effects of marriage."

"It's important for us . . . to remind people . . . to read the amendment because it will do so much more than just ban gay marriage," she said.

Similar messages will go out from pulpits, by phone and on radio and television and will appear on front doorsteps over the next 10 days as organizers, religious leaders and volunteers for and against the amendment that would ban same-sex marriages, civil unions and domestic partnerships wage well-financed campaigns to win over Virginians.

Their efforts took on fresh urgency this week after the New Jersey Supreme Court directed legislators there to craft a bill offering same-sex couples the same rights as opposite-sex couples. Supporters of the amendment pounced on the decision, saying they will use the New Jersey action to rally conservative voters to the polls.

"It's definitely going to be part of our talking points," said Chris Freund, spokesman for the Family Foundation.

DOJ_NMG_0088701

Opponents of the ballot measure recognized the decision's importance to their effort as well, almost immediately sending an e-mail to followers saying that "we can't let this issue get hijacked by those who seek cynically to provoke voters into unreasoned reflex reactions."

As campaign armies fan out, the two sides will try to appeal to different instincts. Supporters are trying to rally their legions by appealing to their strong-felt opposition to same-sex marriage, whereas opponents will try to get voters to set aside their emotions about gay marriage and think about the specific wording of the amendment.

"If this amendment focuses on gay marriage . . . if we get diverted to only an emotional argument, we lose," said Arlington County Board member Jay Fisette (D), who became the state's first openly gay elected official in 1997. "If we focus on what the amendment actually says, we can win."

Same-sex marriages and civil unions are illegal in Virginia, but supporters say the amendment is necessary to protect against judges who might deem the statute unconstitutional, which happened in Massachusetts in 2003.

Polls have shown that the idea has received consistent support, but opponents also see an opportunity for victory. A Washington Post poll released this month found that 53 percent of Virginia voters back the amendment and 43 percent oppose it but that the difference narrowed to a virtual tie when respondents were asked to consider arguments for and against the measure.

"It's hard to know which side to believe on this thing," said Frederick Nelson, a Richmond office manager who said he has been paying close attention to the issue. "My mind is made up on gay marriage. I don't believe in it. But I just want to know what this thing's going to do. If I can't figure it out, I'll just vote no."

Lisa Trevor, a stay-at-home mother shopping in Alexandria last week, held a similar view. "I can't say that I've come around on the position that gays should be married," she said. "I've heard about what I guess people are saying about what [the amendment] would do. So I guess I'm open to that part. But nothing else."

Trying to bolster their argument that Virginians can change their minds, opponents have highlighted a handful of public officials who once supported the amendment but have switched their positions.

Three Democratic state delegates have renounced their support, saying they had thought more deeply about the amendment's full impact, and state Sen. R. Creigh Deeds (D-Bath), a former nominee for attorney general, said he now opposes the measure after supporting it earlier this year.

"Nothing has happened to change my belief that marriage is between one man and one woman, and nothing could," Deeds said in a statement. "It is clear to me now, however, that the language goes far beyond existing law."

Opponents said that during the next 10 days they will continue a statewide advertising campaign on cable television, pressing voters to think about the impact of the measure.

Supporters said they will focus much of their effort on church members, with messages similar to the one Becton delivered. A group of pastors held a news conference Thursday at Regent University in Alexandria to reaffirm their support for the amendment, citing their belief in "traditional marriage." They also said that the decision in New Jersey was further evidence that more protections are necessary in Virginia.

At the same time, backers of the amendment have started a media blitz. Ads that are airing on Christian and talk radio aim to rebut the notion that the amendment could affect wills and other contracts between all unmarried couples.

"All those rights will continue to be available to all unmarried people," says a fictional character in the ad named Linda. "The real issue is, how are we going to define marriage for our children?"

US Mid-terms: Ballot Propositions (BBC)

BBC.com, October 27, 2006

In elections which could hinge on turnout, both Republican and Democratic Parties will be doing all they can to get their voters to the polls in the US mid-term elections.

A key weapon in the fight for turnout is the ballot proposition: a local initiative attached to the vote which will galvanise electors on ideological or social grounds.

The strategy was used to effect in the 2004 presidential elections, when emotionally-charged issues like same-sex marriage helped sway voters.

This year's mid-term polls - where local issues play big - will see attempts once again to capitalise on the power of the proposition, especially in swing states.

STEM CELL RESEARCH

In Missouri - where the Democrats have identified one of the six potentially winnable seats they need to take control of the Senate - a ballot initiative to allow stem cell research has become a defining issue.

Fox has endorsed Democrats who back stem cell research

DOJ_NMG_0088702

Polls put Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill, in the 'yes' camp, and the incumbent Republican Senator Jim Talent neck-and-neck.

Actor Michael J Fox, who has Parkinson's Disease and supports stem cell research, has stepped into the fray with a high-profile campaign advert in which he backs Ms McCaskill.

Sen Talent must keep the support of conservatives who are opposed to the research, without going so far that he alienates undecided moderate voters.

In Wisconsin and Maryland - where the battle is less close - Democratic candidates have based their campaigns around ballot measures on stem cell research. President George W Bush is against the research.

Voting in shadow of stem cell debate

SAME-SEX MARRIAGE

Voters in eight states - Colorado, Idaho, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin - will be balloted on proposals to ban same-sex marriage.

A New Jersey ruling has reignited the debate over same-sex marriage

The Republicans will hope to bring religious conservatives, their traditional support base, flocking to the polls to back any ban. Democrats will seek to dynamise their supporters to oppose it.

A ruling in New Jersey giving gay couples the same rights as heterosexual couples has worked to reignite the debate - probably to the Republicans' advantage. President Bush was quick to make use of the issue in a stump speech in Iowa.

In Virginia, an increase in conservative turnout could help Republican Senator George Allen, whose re-election campaign was hit in the summer by controversy over an alleged racial slur.

In Wisconsin, Republican Mark Green - who supports a ban - may see the benefit as he seeks to beat Democratic Governor Jim Doyle at the polls.

Map: Gay marriage across the US

MINIMUM WAGE

Measures to raise the minimum wage may lend a hand to the Democrats in half-a-dozen tight races for Senate or governorships.

Voters in Arizona, Colorado, Missouri, Montana, Ohio and Nevada will be balloted on whether to raise wages from the federal minimum of $5.15 (£2.70) an hour.

While less emotive than some propositions, polls suggest minimum wage measures are popular and so will increase turnout, to the advantage of the Democrats.

The party is hoping to capitalise on concerns over the state of the American economy, which may be slowing down after a long period of growth. US voters also felt the pinch of higher gas prices earlier this year.

ABORTION

The abortion issue will be galvanising voters in South Dakota.

South Dakota will vote in a referendum on a strict abortion ban

Earlier this year, the state legislature passed a law under which all abortions are banned - including in cases of rape or incest - unless the mother's life is at risk.

However, pro-choice campaigners gathered enough signatures to put a referendum on the ballot, giving voters the option to repeal the ban - or back it.

Supporters of the law, one of the toughest in the US, hope the case could help challenge the 1973 Roe v Wade US Supreme Court decision that legalised abortions everywhere in the country.

However, the issue is creating divisions even within the state's anti-abortion camp, with some believing the measures - signed into law by Republican Governor Mike Rounds - are too restrictive.

ANTI-SMOKING MEASURES

Half-a-dozen states have anti-smoking measures on the ballot on 7 November.

In the key swing state of Ohio, voters will be presented with two options. The first - backed by tobacco-industry money - would impose a partial ban on smoking indoors. The second, backed by anti-smoking groups, would be a more sweeping ban.

Voters in Arizona and Nevada will also find two propositions on the ballot, one stricter than the other, banning smoking in most public places.

A proposition in California would quadruple state cigarette taxes, with the extra revenue going to fund health initiatives and anti-smoking campaigns.

Voters in Arizona, Missouri and South Dakota will also decide on measures to raise taxes on tobacco, though by a lesser degree.

ENERGY TAXATION

The environmental debate has made it onto the ballot in California, with a proposal to fund alternative energy projects by levying a tax on oil production in the state.

The No on 87 campaign is partly funded by US oil producers

Reports suggest more than $100m (£52.7m) has been spent on the rival campaigns over Proposition 87.

The star-studded, Democrat-backed Yes on 87 camp includes former President Bill Clinton, actress Julia Roberts, tycoon Richard Branson and Google co-founder Larry Page, with the bulk of campaign funding coming from Hollywood producer Steve Bing.

The No on 87 camp is funded largely by "Big Oil", including Chevron and Exxon. Adverts warning voters the measure could hit them at the petrol pump seem to be proving effective.

In addition, Republican Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger - a No campaign supporter - is currently well ahead of Democratic challenger Phil Angelides in the polls.

California to vote on new oil tax

EMINENT DOMAIN

States including California, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Michigan and New Hampshire have ballot initiatives aimed at restricting eminent domain, or the government's power to seize private property.

The propositions are largely a response to a US Supreme Court ruling in 2005 that gave the government the right to seize homes for "public benefit", where previously they could only be taken for "public use".

Many fear the ruling means land can now be requisitioned for commercial ventures that benefit the local economy, not just public projects like road building.

Earlier this year, activists in New Hampshire tried to seize the home of Justice David Souter, who ruled with the majority in the Supreme Court decision, to highlight opposition to it.

Building Better Citizens (NYT)

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

Rhode Island voters will have a chance on Nov. 7 to do the right thing and amend their state Constitution to restore voting rights to felons who have completed their prison sentences. Allowing former convicts to vote strengthens democracy, and helps them to integrate into society and move beyond a life of crime.

Rhode Island, like many states, restores felons' voting rights only after they have completed not only their prison sentences, but parole and probation. This policy keeps thousands of citizens, many of whom were in for nonviolent crimes, from voting, sometimes for decades. Andres Idarraga, a Brown University student who served more than six years in prison on drug and gun charges, is disqualified from voting for the next 30 years.

Ex-felons go to school, work and pay taxes. Their views about who should represent them should be respected in a democracy. Restoring their right to vote will also help with the critical issue of "re-entry," helping them fit into society so they do not return to crime. The chief of the Providence police wrote in The Providence Journal that denying released prisoners the vote "weakens the long-term prospects for sustainable rehabilitation."

If the amendment passes, a new state statute would also take effect requiring the prison system to help former prisoners register when they are released. Across the country, far too little is done to inform ex-prisoners of when their right to vote is restored, and how to go about qualifying to vote. Election officials often do not know the intricacies of the law, and give out incorrect advice. The combination of the constitutional amendment and the statute would make Rhode Island a model for the nation.

Felon disenfranchisement is a relic of another America. It was often done to keep blacks from voting, or to stigmatize ex-offenders. Rhode Island, which was founded by religious dissenters, can strike an important blow for inclusion by allowing people who have paid their debt to society to participate in democracy.

Marriage Ruling Resonates (LAT)

By Stephanie Simon, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

The Grand Junction Daily Sentinel, a small newspaper in western Colorado, last week urged voters to reject a proposed state constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage. "The traditional concept of marriage is not endangered in this state," the paper wrote.

On Friday, the editorial page editor, Bob Silbernagel, said he had changed his mind.

DOJ_NMG_0088704

He was jolted, he said, by the New Jersey Supreme Court decision this week that granted gay and lesbian couples in that state all the rights and benefits of marriage. The court left it up to legislators to decide whether to call such partnerships marriages or civil unions.

Before the New Jersey ruling, Silbernagel said, he had largely stopped worrying about this issue, lulled by a flurry of decisions rejecting same-sex marriage in New York, Washington state and elsewhere. The ruling in New Jersey was his wake-up call.

"We had thought it was adequate to have clear language in state law that marriage was only the union of one woman and one man," Silbernagel said. Now, he said, he realizes that's naive: If a court in New Jersey can grant same-sex couples equal rights, so can a court in Colorado.

So he dashed off a six-paragraph retraction of his earlier editorial. The new piece informed the Daily Sentinel's 30,000 readers that Amendment 43 was "a virtual necessity."

The change of opinion expressed in a small Colorado paper probably will not affect the outcome on election day: The ban on same-sex marriage is expected to pass handily; a poll in mid-September found 52% of voters in support, 42% against.

But the Daily Sentinel's reversal thrilled conservatives who are hoping the New Jersey ruling will help their cause in races across the country. Republicans in close Senate races in Virginia and Tennessee have moved to capitalize on the issue by proclaiming their opposition to same-sex marriage. President Bush raised the subject during campaign stops for Republicans in Iowa and Michigan.

"The New Jersey ruling could be the 'October surprise' that galvanizes social conservatives and sends values voters to the polls in record numbers," said Bill Maier, a vice president of the conservative ministry Focus on the Family.

Lisa Moreno, who's working to defeat the Colorado amendment, wasn't so sure: "I think most Coloradans see through that."

Meanwhile, Silbernagel said he had gotten very little response to his about-face — just one letter by late afternoon. On the paper's website, the editorial barely made it into the top-10 list of most viewed stories. More popular: an article about this week's local snowfall — all 0.18 inches.

stephanie.simon@latimes.com

A Rising Star From Illinois Makes Some Noise In L.A. (LAT)

By Carla Hall, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

Sen. Barack Obama addresses a rapt crowd at an African American museum and attends a Democratic rally at USC.

Barack Obama was telling a story about campaigning for the Senate in Illinois two years ago. He was on a road trip with Dick Durbin, the state's senior senator, he explained. They were traveling in downstate Illinois — far away from Obama's home base of Chicago.

Obama paused before a rapt crowd at the California African American Museum in Exposition Park to deliver an aside: "And southern Illinois is the South."

"HEL-lo!" history professor Wanda Powell rang out in agreement.

"One place we went to was a place called Cairo, Ill.," Obama continued.

"The reason why everybody remembers Cairo is because back in the late '60s and early '70s, Cairo was the site of some of the worst racial violence."

That story ended with Obama and Durbin spotting people in Cairo sporting Obama buttons and ready to fete the candidate with barbecue.

But everyone at the museum already knew how the bigger story unfolded: Democrat Barack Obama — the son of a black father from Kenya and a white mother from Kansas, as he fondly recited several times Friday — electrified the 2004 Democratic National Convention as a speaker, won his Senate race and in two short years catapulted from junior senator to fantasy presidential candidate and Time magazine cover guy.

"We brought students here," said Powell, a history professor at Los Angeles Southwest College. "This is a historic moment."

Obama swung through Los Angeles on Friday, speaking to a crowd of 825 at the museum. Then — with actor Ben Affleck — he promoted Proposition 87 at a news conference at USC's Topping Student Center. Later in the afternoon he delivered a 14-minute speech in shirt sleeves at a campus rally with Democratic gubernatorial candidate Phil Angelides, Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and just about every other California Democratic office holder who could find their way to USC.

People came to the day's events clutching copies of Obama's new book, their cameras and their hopes that he is the political force that can unify a divided country.

DOJ_NMG_0088705

"We live in Orange County. We live behind the Orange Curtain," said Jona Knight, a human resources manager, as she waited in line to have her copy of Obama's "The Audacity of Hope" signed. "I'll get his signature on this book. I'll give this book to my grandchildren."

She came with her friend, Pamela Reeves, a paralegal and psychotherapist intern, who said: "It's not just blacks or African Americans — there are a lot of people that feel like they can have a connection with this guy."

Even members of the on-campus chapter of the College Republicans, standing at the back of the Democratic rally with their Schwarzenegger signs, were diplomatic: "I'm not really on point with his views, but he's definitely a popular man," said Cheyenne Steel, a 19-year-old sophomore.

At the museum speech and book signing, sponsored by Eso Won Books and the Urban Issues Forum, Obama signed every volume. As though on an assembly line, people walked by, proffered a book — and Obama, a left-hander who curls his fingers around the pen, flicked out his signature: a big B joined with a big O and a line shooting out from there.

Younger members of the museum crowd wanted him to go with the momentum and run for president in 2008. Older fans counseled caution. "He needs some more seasoning — then there'll be time to run for president," said Quincy Beaver, 84, president of the Martin Luther King Jr. Democratic Club.

Some fretted like worried mothers: "I don't trust the powers-that-be not to have other plans for him," said Valaria Lincoln, 72. "I'm afraid for him."

There were no fears among the students who besieged Obama at USC, wearing Democratic buttons and hoisting cellphone cameras aloft to click him and Affleck as they spoke on behalf of Proposition 87, the Clean Alternative Energy Act.

"He has already proven himself to be the most galvanizing leader to come out of either party, in my opinion, in at least a decade," said Affleck, wearing an untucked blue shirt and gray trousers as he introduced Obama, who was in a white shirt and dark suit jacket and went tie-less all day. "

Obama reminded the audience that the proposition is opposed by the "big boys," meaning the oil companies. And he spoke of the overdependence on foreign oil. "We're sending $800 million a day to some of the most hostile nations and effectively funding both sides in the war on terror."

"It was nice to have Ben Affleck there," said Alexander Shams, a 16-year-old freshman, "but Barack Obama was the star."

At the rally for the Democratic Party in front of a flag-draped Doheny Library, Obama spoke last, after Villaraigosa and Angelides. Under a cloudless sky and bright sun, before hundreds, Obama removed his suit jacket and rolled up his shirt sleeves — a stark contrast to the dark-suited, buttoned-up politicians around him.

"How you doing, USC?" he called out as the crowd roared in delight. "I'm fired up. I'm so fired up I had to take off my jacket."

Once more he went over his message: "We're all connected. We have a stake in each other," he said, "despite our much-vaunted individualism."

He continued: "There's just one ingredient it's going to take to make it happen on Nov. 7," he said. "That's all of you."

Then he managed to segue from Martin Luther King Jr.'s entreaty to his followers in the early days of the Selma marches — not to give up but to stand together — to Angelides (trailing the governor in double digits) and to how all Democrats standing with him would be a powerful force.

Then he was sent off with a crescendo of applause.

carla.hall@latimes.com

Schwarzenegger, Angelides Both Profess To Lean Green (LAT)

By Tim Reiterman, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

With perspectives as different as a Hummer and a hybrid, the gubernatorial candidates court the environmental vote.

SAN FRANCISCO — With his popularity lagging, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger seized center stage at a United Nations conference in June 2005 by unfurling an ambitious plan for reducing greenhouse gas emissions in the most populous state.

"As of today," he said, "California is going to be the leader in the fight against global warming."

By standing against climate change, the Republican governor set himself apart from the Bush administration and laid claim to a central environmental issue in his reelection effort.

"It was a key symbolic step … that inoculated him against one of the major strategies [his opposition] had: linking him to President Bush and the skepticism the administration has about … whether global warming is real," said Bruce Cain, director of UC Berkeley's Institute of Governmental Studies.

DOJ_NMG_0088706

Three days later, Schwarzenegger's Democratic would-be successor, state Treasurer Phil Angelides, told the same conference of his own efforts to protect the planet by steering billions of dollars in public pension money to clean technology, renewable energy projects and developments that would avert urban sprawl.

"California should own this industry," Angelides said, "so we can have a clean environment and the high-wage, high-skill jobs to power our economy."

The episode captures a basic distinction between the environmental records and styles of the leading gubernatorial candidates in the Nov. 7 election.

The pro-business Hummer aficionado and former movie star has used his office to undertake high-profile initiatives for air quality and the protection of ocean and forestland, while critics grumble that his less visible actions sometimes have belied his lofty words.

The state treasurer, a hybrid-driving former developer who has bumped heads with conservationists, has employed the financial clout of two of the nation's largest pension funds — with far less fanfare — to establish himself as a "green" investor.

"The environment is an issue which voters have told us consistently is very important in deciding [how] to vote for major public offices such as governor," said Mark Baldassare, research director at the Public Policy Institute of California.

While Schwarzenegger has been running on the record he fashioned since ousting Gov. Gray Davis in the recall three years ago, his campaign has portrayed Angelides as a scofflaw former developer.

Angelides was cited by federal officials in 1987 for illegally filling wetlands for a development. He eventually agreed to create other wetlands as mitigation.

When Angelides and his partners proposed two housing projects in Sacramento a decade later, the City Council approved a plan he pushed for providing alternative habitat for two endangered species. But environmental groups successfully sued the federal government to block permits for the developments.

After Angelides was elected treasurer in 1998, a compromise negotiated without his involvement set aside habitat, and the developments were built.

Angelides said he built innovative projects that minimized traffic, pollution and effects on wildlife. "Any time you're in business, there are going to be areas of disagreement, and any time you do new things, there always are going to be critics," he said.

As state treasurer, Angelides has headed boards overseeing state employee and teacher retirement funds.

"I began thinking about ways our pension funds could make investments that would … return solid yields at the same time we … advanced marketplace solutions to environmental challenges," he said.

In February 2004, he inaugurated his Green Wave initiative, calling on the two state retirement systems to put $1.5 billion into companies with sound environmental practices and into new technologies.

Angelides' action made California a leader in "green" investments, said Mindy Lubber, head of Ceres, a Boston-based coalition that promotes socially responsible institutional investment.

During Schwarzenegger's first year in office, environmental groups told him he could build a powerful legacy. Warner Chabot, vice president of the Ocean Conservancy, presented the governor with a doctored photo of Mt. Rushmore that showed Schwarzenegger's face in place of President Theodore Roosevelt's.

Schwarzenegger later established a series of marine preserves between Santa Barbara and Half Moon Bay — about 18% of the ocean waters under state control. Chabot called his ocean policies "bold, visionary and substantial."

Other conservationists, however, have criticized many of the governor's appointments.

"Arnold Schwarzenegger is a master communicator," said Mary Nichols, head of the UCLA Institute of the Environment and former resources secretary under Davis. "But the action has not matched the rhetoric."

In 2005, the governor outraged environmentalists by naming former industry lobbyist Cindy Tuck as head of the Air Resources Board. The state Senate refused to confirm her.

Environmental activists also cried foul that year when, in what the governor's office described as a routine changing of the guard, Schwarzenegger replaced the entire state Reclamation Board, whose members had started taking tough stances against development near levees suspected of being weak.

Environmentalists also have said that only one of his four Coastal Commission appointees has a good voting record.

Terry Tamminen, a Democrat who ran the California Environmental Protection Agency for Schwarzenegger, said the governor appointed the best available people to the commission and chose as chairwoman Meg Caldwell, a Stanford University environmental law lecturer with high marks from conservationists.

By opposing offshore oil drilling, the governor bucked the Bush administration. But environmentalists, residents and Angelides criticize Schwarzenegger for indicating support for a proposed offshore liquid natural gas terminal between Malibu and Oxnard, which they fear would pollute the air, spoil views and encourage more similar development.

DOJ_NMG_0088707

Tamminen, now with Schwarzenegger's reelection campaign, denied that the governor has endorsed the proposal. He said Schwarzenegger wants cleaner natural gas for the state but no terminals where they could do environmental harm or present terrorism risks.

The governor has balanced the demands of environmentalists and the business community, said Cain of UC Berkeley.

"What obviously is going on is Arnold is as publicly environmentalist and populist as possible, and as quietly pro-business as possible," he said.

The governor's recent signing of Assembly Bill 32 — setting targets for cutting greenhouse emissions — pleased environmentalists and the 200-member Silicon Valley Leadership Group. But some of Schwarzenegger's most ardent supporters, such as the California Chamber of Commerce, fought the bill, saying it would hurt the economy.

In early 2004, the governor launched the Hydrogen Highway, a system of stations for dispensing the clean-burning fuel as automakers produce vehicles that can run on it. So far, Tamminen said, there are more than 20 stations. The state's goal is about 100 by 2010.

But the governor did not make good on his promise to convert one of his four Hummers to hydrogen. Spokeswoman Julie Soderlund said that instead, he is switching one to bio-diesel, a fuel made with renewable resources such as vegetable oil.

Schwarzenegger opposes Proposition 87 on the November ballot, which would generate $4 billion for renewable energy by charging oil companies extraction fees.

"He supports the goal but does not think the way to do it is through taxes," Tamminen said.

Angelides supports Proposition 87. He also wants to add $1.5 billion in public pension money to the oil fees to create more clean technology and renewable energy.

tim.reiterman@latimes.com

For exclusive Web features, including the new Political Muscle blog, go to latimes.com/calpolitics.

Faso Plays Up The Woes Of A Spitzer Ally (NYT)

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

"Corrupt," a 30-second commercial for John Faso, the Republican candidate for governor, begins running today on network affiliates and cable stations across the state.

PRODUCER Greener and Hook.

THE SCRIPT Announcer: "Eliot Spitzer has one set of standards for his friends and another for everyone else. New York's Ethics Commission says Spitzer running mate and State Comptroller Alan Hevesi knowingly and intentionally broke the law, stealing tens of thousands of dollars from taxpayers. But when Sheriff of Wall Street had a chance to investigate and call for Hevesi's resignation, Spitzer said no."

Eliot Spitzer: "I know Alan. I know him to be an honest, stupendous public servant."

Announcer: "Eliot Spitzer. Stupendously protecting his cronies at our expense."

ON THE SCREEN Sepia-colored images of Mr. Spitzer, looking stern at times and cackling at others, appear as the announcer speaks. Similar images appear of Mr. Hevesi, including one unflattering close-up of him licking his lips. Newspaper headlines about the Hevesi scandal flash on the screen. The following sentence also appears: "Spitzer refused to investigate or ask for Hevesi to resign." A video clip of Mr. Spitzer's remarks at a Faso-Spitzer debate is used against him; the producer uses a sound effect to create an echo of "servant" from Mr. Spitzer's remarks. The ad ends with these words appearing: "Eliot Spitzer — Stupendously Protecting His Cronies."

ACCURACY Mr. Hevesi is not Mr. Spitzer's running mate; they have been allies and are on the same Democratic ballot on Nov. 7. Mr. Hevesi failed to reimburse the state for use of a public employee to ferry around his wife; after it was revealed, he wrote a check, but he may owe more. Mr. Spitzer did not initiate his own investigation when the Hevesi scandal surfaced; he waited for the Ethics Commission to release its report this week and then began an investigation, which his spokeswoman termed the proper process. Mr. Spitzer withdrew his endorsement of Mr. Hevesi on Thursday, but Mr. Faso is correct in saying that Mr. Spitzer has not called for his resignation.

SCORECARD This is only Mr. Faso's second commercial of the general election campaign; struggling to raise money, he has not been able to afford more, and many New Yorkers still do not know much about him. Hammering Mr. Spitzer with the Hevesi scandal could score points, and the ad does so effectively. Still, making hay over the comptroller may not lead many voters to support a candidate they do not know well (Mr. Faso) over one who has high favorability ratings (Mr. Spitzer). But the ad is a stark reminder of what a political headache Mr. Hevesi has become for his old ally, Mr. Spitzer.

PATRICK HEALY

Ethics -- Public And Private (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0088708

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

Corporate ethics has been much in the news in recent years, and the margin for an executive slip-up these days is narrow. Backdate an option to attract a new employee, or fail to supervise a leak probe, and you can face 20 years in the slammer. Rather more lax standards seem to apply to our political class, however, and Exhibit A is Alan Hevesi.

The New York State Comptroller was recently found to have used a public employee at taxpayer expense to chauffeur his wife around for three years. Mr. Hevesi somehow failed to disclose this personal use of public assets, and he has since claimed he merely "forgot" to reimburse the state. The Ethics Commission that looked into the matter found that the $82,688 he did finally pay the state after the allegation came to light wasn't enough to cover the actual cost.

At a recent debate with his GOP opponent, Mr. Hevesi claimed his wife needed the limo service for her security. Alas, her driver had no security background and was unarmed. Mr. Hevesi has nonetheless dismissed the episode as an "aberration" and has refused to resign or drop out of his race for re-election to a second four-year term.

We'd normally ignore this kind of state government corruption. But Mr. Hevesi's spectacle is instructive because in recent years he has been one of America's loudest corporate scolds. As Comptroller, he supervises the state's pension money and he has used that post to slam corporate officials who played even tangential roles in corporate scandals.

Most prominently, he pursued the directors of WorldCom in a lawsuit, claiming they should be held personally liable for not discovering the fraud committed by CFO Scott Sullivan. These directors played no direct role in the accounting fraud at WorldCom and they were also victims of that fraud, losing a combined $250 million in stock when the company went bust.

But Mr. Hevesi declared when a settlement was reached that "I felt personally that this would be unfair and not a deterrent for future failures on the part of directors if they weren't held personally liable." That use of "personally" is especially redolent now that Mr. Hevesi's taxpayer-paid family limousine service has been exposed.

All of which raises an issue of the difference between public and private standards of accountability. In the wake of this decade's scandals, business executives are subject to greater scrutiny and ever-higher ethics standards. Some of this has been useful, though much of it in our view has been needlessly costly and intrusive. But our public servants, especially those in such corrupt state capitals as Albany and Trenton, haven't been subject to the same degree of accountability.

Only last month and after the Hevesi scandal had first broke, New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer responded to criticism from his GOP opponent John Faso by saying, "I know Alan. I know him to be an honest, stupendous public servant." Stupendous at least was right. This week, as the public furor grew during an election season, Mr. Spitzer finally turned on Mr. Hevesi and withdrew his political endorsement. That's a long way from cleaning up Albany, but it's a start.

In Clean Politics, Flesh Is Pressed, Then Sanitized (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 27 — Campaigns are filthy. Not only in terms of last-minute smears and dirty tricks. But also as in germs, parasites and all the bacterial unpleasantness that is spread around through so much glad-handing and flesh-pressing.

“You can’t always get to a sink to wash your hands,” said Anne Ryun, wife of Representative Jim Ryun, Republican of Kansas.

Hands would be the untidy appendages that transmit infectious disease.

Like so many other people involved in politics these days, Mrs. Ryun has become obsessive about using hand sanitizer and ensuring that others do, too. She squirted Purell, the antiseptic goop of choice on the stump and self-proclaimed killer of “99.99 percent of most common germs that may cause illness,” on people lined up to meet Vice President Dick Cheney this month at a fund-raiser in Topeka.

When Mr. Cheney was done meeting and greeting, he, too, rubbed his hands vigorously with the stuff, dispensed in dollops by an aide when the vice president was out of public view.

That has become routine in this peak season of handshaking, practiced by everyone from the most powerful leaders to the lowliest hopefuls. Politics is personal at all levels, and germs do not discriminate. Like chicken dinners and lobbyists, they afflict Democrats and Republicans alike. It would be difficult to find an entourage that does not have at least one aide packing Purell.

Some people find that unseemly in itself.

“It’s condescending to the voters,” said Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico, a Democrat.

A fervent nonuser of hand sanitizer, Mr. Richardson holds the Guinness Book of World Records mark for shaking the most hands over an eight-hour period (13,392, at the New Mexico State Fair in 2002).

Indeed, what message does it send when politicians, the putative leaders in a government by the people, for the people, feel compelled to wipe off the residues of said people immediately after meeting them?

DOJ_NMG_0088709

"The great part about politics is that you're touching humanity," Mr. Richardson said. "You're going to collect bacteria just by existing."

Still, politics can be an especially dirty place to exist.

"Every time you're with big groups of people, you're going to be exposed to rhinoviruses, adenoviruses and the viruses that cause gastroenteritis," said Senator Tom Coburn, an Oklahoma Republican and physician.

Mr. Coburn said he washed his hands whenever possible but did not use any antigerm lotions. Being a doctor, he said, he has been exposed to more bugs and, thus, enjoys greater immunity than most other people.

For what it is worth, Howard Dean, also a doctor and the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, said he did not bother with the stuff, either.

"If you've had children, you're immune to everything," said Mr. Dean, a father of two.

As with most things, this places Mr. Dean at loggerheads with President Bush.

"Good stuff, keeps you from getting colds," Mr. Bush raved about hand sanitizer to Senator Barack Obama, Democrat of Illinois, at a White House encounter early last year.

Mr. Obama, who recounts the episode in his new book, says that after rubbing a blob of it on his own hands, the president offered him some, which he accepted ("not wanting to appear unhygienic.")

Mr. Obama has since started carrying Purell in his traveling bag, a spokesman said.

It is not clear when politicians became so awash in the gel. In one semifamous cleanliness lapse in the 1992 presidential campaign, Bill Clinton, who had just shaken dozens of hands at a tavern in Boston, was handed a pie but no fork on his way to the car. The ravenous Mr. Clinton promptly devoured it using his unwashed hand. He eventually became a serious user of hand wipes and lotions at the urging of his doctor, an aide said.

Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, said he learned about hand sanitizer from observing Senator Bob Dole's abundant use of it in his 1996 presidential run. Mr. McCain remains vigilant today.

"I use it all the time," he said through a representative. "I carry it with me in my briefcase."

Purell, which is made by GOJO Industries of Akron, Ohio, came on the market as a consumer product in 1997 and became popular in campaign vans, holding rooms and traveling bags in the 2000 campaign. Donald Trump, the billionaire germophobe who contemplated running for president, even distributed little bottles of it to reporters.

"One of the curses of American society is the simple act of shaking hands," Mr. Trump wrote in his book "Comeback." "I happen to be a clean-hands freak."

Al Gore is, too. He turned his running mate, Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, onto sanitizer in 2000, and Mr. Lieberman became an evangelist.

"He said it was one thing he learned from Gore," said an aide to Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, Rebecca Kirszner, who became a popular dispenser of Purell on a senatorial trip to New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina.

Mr. Richardson said that if he ran for president, as he is considering, he had no intention of conforming to the norms of his antiseptic peers.

"I just won't use the sanitizer," he said. "I've been offered it, but I've turned it down."

This positions Mr. Richardson as the early hygienic maverick of 2008.

"I'm not afraid to get my hands dirty," he said.

Justices To Take Up Autism-Case Dispute (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 27 (AP) — The Supreme Court agreed Friday to consider an appeal by an autistic child and his parents, who want to sue over his school accommodations without hiring a lawyer.

The parents, Jeff and Sandee Winkelman, say they cannot afford a lawyer to argue their court case against the school district of Parma, Ohio, near Cleveland, over the education of their son, Jacob.

The federal appeals court in Cincinnati ruled that the Winkelmans, suing under the Individuals With Disabilities Education Act, had to find a lawyer to represent Jacob, although other federal courts have ruled differently in cases involving that law.

The Bush administration then urged the justices to take the case, saying that in adopting the measure, Congress clearly intended that parents be able to represent their children in such court proceedings.

The Winkelmans' suit contested Parma's plan to educate Jacob at a public school. They wanted the district to pay his yearly tuition of $56,000 at a private school that specializes in educating autistic children.

Whether Jacob should have private schooling at public expense is not before the justices, only the question of his parents' right to go into federal court without a lawyer.

DOJ_NMG_0088710

The justices also agreed Friday to hear the case of a sheriff's deputy in Georgia who purposely bumped his car into a vehicle he was pursuing at high speed, causing an accident that left the suspect a quadriplegic.

The Sheriff's Office of Coweta County, Ga., had asked the court to consider whether an officer violates a fleeing suspect's constitutional rights by using deadly force to terminate a high-speed chase.

Two lower federal courts ruled against the deputy, finding that his action was out of proportion to the risk that the suspect had posed to other drivers and pedestrians.

How To Socialize With An Ex-President? Finance His Good Deeds. (NYT)

By Patrick Healy And Eric Konigsberg

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

For New Yorkers thinking of dropping by Pastis this morning to experience the joys of long lines, attitudinal service and cramped tables, forget it — unless you're prepared to spend at least $100,000 for that croque-monsieur, monsieur.

Former President Bill Clinton is making another king-of-the-world swing through Manhattan this weekend, doing two of the things he does best: reveling in adulation and raising money.

Over three days of festivities to mark his 60th birthday — which include a golf tournament and a concert by the Rolling Stones at the Beacon Theater — Mr. Clinton expects to bring in more than $20 million for his foundation's array of philanthropic projects.

His birthday, incidentally, was more than two months ago, and this weekend is the climax of what has been quite a fall season for Mr. Clinton, who is proving once again that he is the hardest-working man in show business. He lined up $7.3 billion in pledges last month for the Clinton Global Initiative, a project of his Clinton Foundation that focuses on fighting poverty and promoting religious tolerance.

And in Toronto last month, at another birthday party in his honor, he raised a separate $21 million for the foundation. He has also raised tens of millions of dollars this year for Democratic candidates.

Some of this weekend's participants say that when it comes to Mr. Clinton, there is no such thing as too much.

"I only wish the weekend cost more, because the more money, the more good work the president can do," said Mark Weiner, a prominent Democratic fund-raiser who is serving as an honorary host of the events. His co-hosts are two other Clinton friends, Ronald W. Burkle, a financier, and Steve Bing, a producer.

Mr. Weiner added: "I consider President Clinton to be the most popular person on the planet, and perhaps the most popular American in the history of this country. And his foundation work is a wonderful thing."

But while there seems to be no shortage of fondness for Mr. Clinton in New York, his industriousness does put him at risk of driving supporters to wonder, what price love?

People contributing $60,000 were invited to a welcome reception at the Gramercy Park Hotel scheduled for last night, a reception and premium dinner seats tonight at the Museum of Natural History, and a reception and Rolling Stones concert tomorrow night, which is also being filmed for a planned Martin Scorsese movie.

In addition to those events, donors who have contributed $100,000 or raised $250,000 also received four tickets for brunch at Pastis with Chelsea Clinton and her parents; "gold" dinner seats tonight; and an invitation for one to play in a presidential golf tournament tomorrow with Mr. Clinton at the Bayonne Golf Club in New Jersey.

Those who have contributed $500,000 — the "birthday chair package" — got "platinum" dinner seating tonight, a backstage pass and dinner with Mr. Clinton before the Stones concert. They can also have their picture taken with him.

One Friend of Bill and a supporter of Hillary Rodham Clinton's senatorial campaigns said privately that he was skipping this weekend because he was "Clintoned out." He added that the Clintons' spate of fund-raisers, which date back to some this summer in the Hamptons, had been "absolutely endless."

James Thurber, director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at American University in Washington, said that some donors eventually tire of being asked for money. "It's pretty costly these days to be a Friend of Bill, especially since you have to be a Friend of Hillary, too," Mr. Thurber said.

Another Clinton ally, Sarah Kovner, said that she and her husband, the lawyer Victor Kovner, would not be attending. "I have my Vassar reunion this weekend," she said. "Also, I think this one is for really big-money donors. I was at the Clinton Global Initiative, which was my contribution to the foundation."

She said that she considered the relatively cheap "membership" fee of $15,000 to participate in that event money well spent.

"They spend two and a half days talking in a substantive way about the work they're doing," she said. "It's not for people who are interested in just showing up."

DOJ_NMG_0088711

A spokesman for Mr. Clinton noted that people who did not support the former president as a candidate are now donating to the foundation's nonpartisan efforts. The activities of the foundation, which had a budget of $42 million last year, include a major H.I.V. initiative that has reduced drug prices from $1,000 a year to about $140 in roughly 60 countries.

Other programs focus on supporting health care and clean water projects and reducing greenhouse gas emissions in 24 major cities.

"If you can raise the money to support your programs, why wouldn't you?" said the president's spokesman, Jay Carson. "$100,000 is AIDS drugs for 500 kids."

The Clinton birthday bash got off to an unofficial start on Thursday night, as about 1,000 people gathered under a tent at Tavern on the Green in Manhattan to celebrate Mrs. Clinton's 59th birthday (which actually fell on the same day as the party). The event cost $1,000 a plate and netted about $1 million for her re-election campaign.

Mr. Clinton's high profile on the fund-raising circuit this year has fueled speculation that his efforts are simply a prelude to what he would provide should Senator Clinton run for president in 2008.

"I think with him standing next to her, she's definitely one of the front-runners," said John Catsimatidis, another high-level Clinton donor.

Terry McAuliffe, Mr. Clinton's longtime confidant and an official organizer of the parties, said that they were being held now, rather than closer to Mr. Clinton's birthday on Aug. 19, because "two months ago would've been right in the middle of the elections" — the thick of campaigning — "and we didn't want to be raising money for his foundation when people could be giving to other Democrats' campaigns."

Mr. McAuliffe said, chuckling, that by now any potential donors to the foundation have had earlier opportunities to give to candidates. "We've already hit everybody up pretty hard by now."

Unaired Ad Gets Dixie Chicks Flick A Whole Lot Of Ink (WP)

By Lisa De Moraes

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

NBC and CW networks became unwitting stealth-marketing partners with the Weinstein Co. when they refused to air ads for the film company's upcoming docu-flick about the storm that erupted when the Dixie Chicks' lead singer said in a 2003 concert she was ashamed President Bush was from her home state of Texas.

Or, as we like to say here at The TV Column, when refusing ads for a flick about Censorship and Freedom of Speech, it's always best not to tell the producer in writing that you "cannot accept these spots as they are disparaging to the President" or that your network "does not have appropriate programming in which to schedule this spot" -- because such statements are going to wind up in a news release about network censorship.

It all started earlier this week when Weinstein submitted ads for its new Barbara Kopple documentary "Shut Up & Sing" to the broadcast networks for review by their standards and practices departments.

NBC said it "cannot accept these spots as they are disparaging to President Bush."

CW said it "does not have appropriate programming in which to schedule this spot."

Weinstein said: "Eureka!"

And on Thursday evening, it sent out a news release headlined:

"In an Ironic Twist of Events, NBC and the CW Television Networks Refuse to Air Ads for Documentary Focusing on Freedom of Speech."

"It's a sad commentary about the level of fear in our society that a movie about a group of courageous entertainers who were blacklisted for exercising their right of free speech is now itself being blacklisted by corporate America," bemoaned Weinstein Co. co-chairman Harvey Weinstein.

"The idea that anyone should be penalized for criticizing the president is sad and profoundly un-American," he added.

And, because Weinstein Co. didn't send out the announcement until too late for reporters in some areas of the country to get an "outside expert" on the phone to comment, it even provided them with one, throwing in a quote from "famed litigator David Boies."

(Boies, FYI, is one of the "legal eagles" who crafted the exit agreement from Disney of the former Miramax chiefs -- Bob and Harvey Weinstein, Variety reported back when.)

"It is disappointing and troubling that NBC and The CW would refuse to accept an otherwise appropriate ad merely because it is critical of President Bush," Boies said in the news release.

"Political criticism is at the heart of the First Amendment. The legal issues are complicated; the policy is not. The public deserves to hear more than the official point of view."

DOJ_NMG_0088712

All good stuff. But the Weinstein Co. probably should not have thrown in at the end of the release that it is "exploring taking legal action." Way too Snidely Whiplash.

In case you haven't yet seen it, the 15-second version of the ad opens with President Bush saying in a televised speech, "The United States is ridding Iraq of weapons of mass destruction."

Then the words "Lies Exposed" appear on a black screen.

Cut to: Natalie Maines saying she's embarrassed about Bush, to thunderous applause.

Cut to: Clip of some local news chick saying to camera, "The radio station has set up these garbage cans for people to throw out their CDs."

Cut to: Much hooting and hollering at anti-Dixie Chicks protest, with crowd shouting "U.S.A.! U.S.A.! and waving signs suggesting the singers should be tried for treason. "Move to France, Dixie Chicks!" one guy suggests helpfully.

Cut to: The words "Conspiracy Uncovered" on a black screen.

Cut to: The lead singer reading a message that says "Natalie Maines will be shot dead in Dallas, Texas."

Cut to: News conference with someone official-sounding saying, "The FBI had some intelligence, but they didn't share it." (Which in and of itself is actually a very funny line.)

Cut to: Bush saying, presumably to reporters, while walking, "They shouldn't have their feelings hurt because some people don't want to buy their record."

Cut to: Maines on a couch, reading Bush's comment about their feelings being hurt. " 'Have their feelings hurt'?!" she says, incredulously. "What a dumb --"

Before she can get out the last word, the picture cuts away and Voiceover Guy says, "Rated R -- select theaters this Friday."

When a small movie like this one gets a very limited release -- just four theaters this weekend -- with the intention of going wide after that, word of mouth is critical and that's when you often see stealth marketing campaigns, such as whipping the media into a froth over some angle on the flick to generate millions in free publicity. (The movie opens nationwide Nov. 10.)

Yesterday both NBC and CW noted Weinstein Co. hadn't actually tried to make a national media buy for the ads. So, they seemed to be saying, their comments about the ads are a moot point.

"While a spot was submitted to our broadcast standards and practices department for review and was rejected because it violated our policy of not broadcasting ads that deal with issues of public controversy, the Weinstein Company did not make a national media buy for 'Shut Up & Sing,' nor did anyone from the company inquire about buying time on the network," NBC said.

CW, which values brevity, merely said for the record that the Weinstein news release is "flat-out inaccurate. The whole matter is a mystery to The CW."

"We have lots of issues with commercials all the time," Alan Wurtzel from NBC told The TV Column. Wurtzel oversees the standards department in his capacity as president of research and media development of NBC Universal.

"NBC got back to the film company explaining the ads violated NBC's policy against taking ads that dealt with issues of public controversy, and one of the ways they were doing that was being disparaging of Bush. . . . We never heard from them again," he said.

"These are guys who know what the procedure is with respect to ads clearances -- they've done this for 20 years. Normally they'd be on the phone in a second saying either 'how do I fix it to make it comply?' or 'let me talk to your boss.' In neither case did that happen. . . . This leads me to believe they might have had another objective."

Asked whether he thought NBC had played into the film company's hand, Wurtzel said, "I will say there have been other instances in the past where [companies] get more publicity by having an ad rejected than run."

Los Angeles Abuse Cases Are Settled For $10 Million (NYT)

By Neela Banerjee

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 27 — The Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Los Angeles and a Catholic religious order have agreed to pay $10 million to settle claims made by seven victims of sexual abuse by clergy members, lawyers for the parties involved said Friday.

While the amount per victim is large relative to payments made to settle sexual abuse cases in other parts of the country, it is typical of the sums paid in California, which has a taken a strong stance toward the Catholic Church in abuse cases. In 2003, for example, the state extended its statute of limitations for child sexual abuse cases, and the Los Angeles District Attorney's Office has been conducting a criminal investigation into the archdiocese since 2002.

DOJ_NMG_0088713

More than 95 percent of the $10 million settlement will be paid by the religious order, the Carmelites, Province of the Most Pure Heart of Mary, which is based in Darien, Ill. The archdiocese will pay less than 5 percent, lawyers for the plaintiffs and the order said.

The settlement for the most part is not covered by the Carmelites' insurance, said Jim Geoly, the order's lawyer, adding that the order might have to borrow money to pay the sum.

Mr. Geoly said the order wanted to avoid protracted litigation, which he said would have amounted to going to war with the plaintiffs, "because that's what litigation is."

"They are deeply sorry that this sexual abuse occurred and that the church didn't have more understanding of this kind of problem at the time," he said. "They want to do everything they can to make it right, even though money can't make the abuse go away."

The seven plaintiffs accused four Carmelite priests and one Carmelite brother of sexual abuse in a period from the early 1950s to the late 1970s.

Several of the claims focused on the Rev. Dominic Savino, who held several high-ranking faculty positions at Crespi Carmelite High School in the Encino section of the city before he was removed from the ministry in 2002. One plaintiff accused Father Savino and another priest of raping him at the school when he was 15 and continuing the abuse from 1978 to 1979, said John C. Manly, a lawyer for the plaintiff.

Mr. Manly and victims' rights groups welcomed the decision by the Carmelites, though they said that it had been hard-won.

"I'm glad Carmelites did the right thing," said Mr. Manly, himself a Catholic, "but I think that's what's ultimately wrong with the Catholic Church: you shouldn't have to sue your church to get them and the bishop to do the right thing."

Movement Reportedly Seen At N.Korea Site (AP)

By Bo-mi Lim, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 28, 2006

South Korean military officials have observed activities at the North's suspected nuclear test site that may be preparations for a second test, news reports said Saturday.

Yonhap news agency, citing several unidentified military officials, said Seoul is keeping a close watch on the movements of trucks and soldiers at the Punggye-ri site in the country's remote northeast.

"It is clear there are movements at Punggye-ri after the (previous) nuclear test," one military official was quoted as saying. "We are closely monitoring to see if these are preparations for a second nuclear test."

Another official confirmed activities at the site, but said another test "is not believed to be imminent," according to Yonhap.

It was not immediately clear how the military officials first spotted the activity at the site. However, the United States and South Korea generally share intelligence information from satellite images.

Meanwhile, more unidentified South Korean government officials said they are trying to confirm whether a new facility that has been built at the site could be part of preparations for a second nuclear test, the JoongAng Ilbo newspaper reported Saturday.

South Korea's Defense Ministry said it could not confirm the reports, and the U.S. State Department refused to comment. A Pentagon spokesman, Air Force Maj. David Smith, said: "We don't discuss intelligence issues as a matter of policy."

This is not the first time that suspicious activity has been reported at the North Korean test site. But South Korean officials have said they have no intelligence suggesting another test is imminent.

The reports came a day after the incoming U.N. secretary-general, South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon, met with Chinese leaders to discuss sanctions against the North over its Oct. 9 underground nuclear test.

Ban met on Friday with China's President Hu Jintao, State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan and Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing. South Korea's Foreign Ministry said they would discuss sanctions, but details of their talks were not immediately released.

Ban is visiting the five permanent U.N. Security Council members following his election as secretary-general this month. He pledged to make resolving the North Korea nuclear issue a key priority on his agenda as head of the international body.

The United States has been trying muster greater support for a U.N. Security Council resolution that calls for sanctions in response to the North's nuclear test.

Seoul and Beijing have been reluctant to enforce sanctions over the test for fear they might aggravate their unpredictable neighbor and destabilize the region.

China and South Korea are the North's main aid providers and trade partners, and their participation is considered crucial for the success of the U.N. resolution, which bans the sale of major arms to the North and calls for the inspection of cargo entering and leaving the country.

Associated Press writers Meraiah Foley in Seoul and Audra Ang in Beijing contributed to this report.

DOJ_NMG_0088714

Gingerly, South Korea Imposes First Sanction On North (NYT)

By Martin Fackler

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

SEOUL, South Korea, Oct. 27 — South Korea has taken a first step toward imposing United Nations sanctions against North Korea for conducting a nuclear test, banning visits by officials involved in the North's nuclear weapons program.

And in a sign of how Seoul has struggled to carry out the United Nations Security Council resolution without antagonizing the heavily armed North, a third top government official involved in North Korea offered to resign Friday over the test.

The travel ban, first reported by several news organizations on Thursday, is largely symbolic in a country that gets few North Korean visitors at all, much less officials engaged in the North's covert nuclear weapons efforts. It falls short of American requests that South Korea join a United States-led effort to inspect North Korean ships for nuclear and missile-related technology.

South Korean officials have expressed concern that such searches could lead to clashes between South and North Korean warships, something that has occurred in the past.

The resignation offer — by Kim Seung-gyu, head of the National Intelligence Service — came days after the defense minister and the unification minister, the point man on relations with the North, also tendered their resignations.

While President Roh Moo-hyun has not said whether he will accept the resignations, South Korean news media have reported that a cabinet reshuffle is imminent. With the foreign minister, Ban Ki-moon, about to become the new secretary general of the United Nations, Mr. Roh may have to replace all aides who oversee his policy on the North.

The cooperation of South Korea, a major source of trade and investment for the North, is seen as crucial for the success of the United Nations resolution, adopted after the North's test on Oct. 9. The resolution bans the sale of weapons to the North, and restricts sales of luxury goods and travel abroad by its officials.

In addition to not becoming involved in searching North Korean ships, Seoul also has so far balked at taking more punishing steps, like closing a South Korean-run industrial park and a tourist resort in North Korea, which are the North's largest economic contacts with the outside world. Many South Korean officials have said they fear that stronger sanctions could provoke the North into war, or push it toward China.

Using A 2nd Network, Iran Raises Enrichment Ability (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

TEHRAN, Oct. 27 — Iran has begun to enrich uranium in a second network of centrifuges, an Iranian local news agency reported Friday, in defiance of a United Nations Security Council demand that it halt its nuclear program.

ISNA Student News Agency quoted an "informed source" as saying that Iran installed a second cascade of 164 centrifuges two weeks ago and successfully injected gas into it last week, theoretically doubling its enrichment capacity.

"We now have the product of the second cascade," the unidentified speaker was quoted as saying.

International Atomic Energy Agency inspectors know of this activity, he said.

In Washington, President Bush said he was aware of "speculation" that Iran has started enriching uranium in a second network. "Whether they doubled it or not, the idea of Iran having a nuclear weapon is unacceptable," Mr. Bush said.

But Russia's defense minister, Sergei Ivanov, said it was too early to speak about Iran being able to produce weapons-grade uranium. "These are empty centrifuges," he told the Itar-Tass news agency. "You can't produce anything with them, so to speak about enriching uranium is premature."

The announcement was widely expected. On Monday, the head of the I.A.E.A., Mohamed ElBaradei, said that "based on our most recent inspections, the second centrifuge cascade is in place and ready to go."

As Iran was reporting the doubling of its enrichment capacity, the five permanent members of the Council — the United States, Britain, France, China and Russia — and Germany were discussing a draft resolution to impose sanctions on Iran for its refusal to comply with their earlier demand that it stop enrichment.

The draft resolution would reportedly bar Iranian students from studying nuclear physics at foreign universities, prohibit technical or financial assistance that could benefit the nuclear program and impose a visa ban on any Iranians involved in nuclear activities.

A senior Western diplomat in Tehran said Iran went ahead after seeing the limited sanctions imposed on North Korea after its nuclear test this month. "They were reasonably reassured that if North Korea can live with the sanctions, they can do better," said the diplomat, who refused to be identified. "They think if they give in now, it is a sign of weakness and the West will ask for more."

DOJ_NMG_0088715

Iran insists that its program is for peaceful purposes, and that as a member of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty it has the legal right to enrich uranium to produce its own reactor fuel. The United States says Iran, a major oil exporter, has no need for a peaceful nuclear program and is merely using it as a cover for an effort to produce nuclear weapons.

Iran, which already had one cascade of 164 centrifuges in operation, has said repeatedly that it plans to increase the number of centrifuges in operation to 3,000 by the end of this year. In a separate interview, Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, said Tehran was still willing to resolve its nuclear issue through negotiations. But he also issued a veiled threat, saying Europeans "should pay the price" if they choose a different path, ISNA reported. He did not elaborate, but it seemed that he was referring to sanctions.

"If Europeans think they can pursue a radical approach toward Iran and negotiate with us on the side as well, they should know that Iranians are not naïve people," he added.

He also rejected comments made by the foreign minister, Manouchehr Mottaki, who said last week that Iran might consider suspending its program during negotiations. "I do not approve this view," he said. "I am in charge of nuclear issues and I do not think the news was accurate."

Members of the Security Council reacted to the announcement immediately, [a news agency] reported.

The Foreign Ministry spokesman in France, Jean-Baptiste Mattéi, said the report increased the international community's worries about the growth of Iran's capacity to produce fissile material.

"The priority is to move toward the negotiation of a Security Council resolution," Mr. Mattéi told reporters in Paris in response to the news.

A British Foreign Office spokesman said it was a matter for the I.A.E.A., the United Nations nuclear agency, to investigate.

Bush Says It's Unacceptable For Iran To Have Nuclear Weapon (WP)

By Colum Lynch, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush said on Friday he was aware of "speculation" that Iran has started enriching uranium in a second network of centrifuges and said it was unacceptable for Tehran to have a nuclear weapon.

"It says to me that we must double our effort to work with the international community to persuade the Iranians that there is only isolation from the world if they continue working forward on such a program," Bush told reporters during a meeting with NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer.

"I've read the speculation that that's what they may be doing. But whether they doubled it or not, the idea of Iran having a nuclear weapon is unacceptable," Bush added.

Iran Doubles Nuke Enrichment Capacity (AP)

By Nasser Karimi, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 28, 2006

Iran has doubled its capacity to enrich uranium by successfully executing the process with a second network of centrifuges, a semiofficial news agency reported Friday, sending a defiant new message to the U.N. Security Council.

Council members are working on a draft resolution that would impose limited sanctions on the Islamic republic because of its refusal to cease enrichment, a process that can produce fuel for a civilian nuclear reactor or fissile material for a warhead.

The Iranian Students News Agency quoted an anonymous official as saying Iran has successfully begun injecting gas into a second network of centrifuges.

"We are injecting gas into the second cascade, which we installed two weeks ago," the official said, according to ISNA.

The news agency said the second cascade had doubled Iran's capacity to enrich uranium.

"We have already exploited the product of the second cascade," the official was quoted as saying.

Iranian authorities are believed to leak ISNA information that they want published but consider too sensitive for release to official media.

The State Department said it was up to the International Atomic Energy Agency to assess the reports. "I cannot confirm those reports. We are not on the ground," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

President Bush said that regardless of the accuracy, it was "unacceptable" for Iran to have a nuclear weapon and the report underscored the need for the United States and its allies to redouble its effort to stop Iran from developing nuclear ambitions.

The U.N. Security Council has demanded that Tehran cease all enrichment-related activities amid fears by the U.S. and its allies that Iran is seeking to develop a program that can make weapons-grade uranium for nuclear warheads. The Iranians claim their nuclear program is peaceful.

DOJ_NMG_0088716

France's Foreign Ministry called Iran's expansion of its nuclear program a "negative signal" that should be taken to account at U.N. talks over possible sanctions.

A spokesman for the ministry, Jean-Baptiste Mattei, said the Iranian announcement was not a great surprise because the IAEA, the U.N. nuclear watchdog, had said in August that Iran was developing new nuclear capacities.

"The door to negotiations is always open, but at the same time the priority goes to the negotiations for a U.N. Security Council resolution," Mattei said at a news conference.

French President Jacques Chirac, meanwhile, expressed support for sanctions against Iran but insisted that they be temporary and reversible.

Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov said he didn't "share concerns" about the launching of a second network of centrifuges, expressing confidence that the new centrifuges "are under the complete control of the International Atomic Energy Agency, for scientific research purposes."

He also said the centrifuges were "completely empty, so to talk about enriched uranium or uranium for military use, is at the very least premature."

The basis of his statement was unclear, however. The IAEA monitors both "cascades" of centrifuges, but they are not under its "complete control," as Ivanov asserted. And — unlike Ivanov — the Iranian official cited by ISNA said the second network was no longer empty but enriching small amounts of uranium.

Other Russian officials also had shared previously shared the opinion of the United States and its western allies, Britain, France and Germany that even "dry testing" centrifuges was cause for concern.

Russia and China, which can veto Security Council resolutions and have close economic ties with Iran, are reportedly pushing for continued dialogue with Iran instead of punishment.

In a separate report on Friday, ISNA quoted Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, as saying his country's enrichment program should not hinder negotiations with the West.

"It is possible to review both nuclear and regional issues through negotiation," Larijani was quoted as saying.

Larijani called for an open negotiation on the enrichment issue, and blamed the West of being irrational in its opposition to an Iranian nuclear program, which Tehran says is geared toward purely civilian use.

Diplomats, who spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to divulge the information to media, told The Associated Press on Monday that even the decision to "dry test" the 164 centrifuges in the second Iranian pilot enrichment facility showed Iran's defiance of the Security Council. The council had set an Aug. 31 deadline for Tehran to cease all experiments linked to enrichment.

Iran produced a small batch of low-enriched uranium — suitable as nuclear fuel but not weapons grade — in February, using its initial cascade of 164 centrifuges at its pilot plant at Natanz.

The Iran official quoted by ISNA said the nuclear watchdog was fully aware that Tehran was injecting the gas in its new centrifuges, and that nuclear inspectors had already arrived in Iran.

The Vienna, Austria-based IAEA would not comment on the report.

Iran says it plans to install 3,000 centrifuges at Natanz by the end of this year. Some 54,000 centrifuges would be required to produce enough nuclear fuel for a reactor.

Although Iran is nowhere near that goal, its successful operation of more cascades of centrifuges indicates that the country is gradually mastering the complexities of producing enriched uranium.

The U.S. and its European allies are circulating a draft U.N. Security Council resolution that would ban the sale of missile and nuclear technology to Iran and deny the country certain assistance from the U.N. nuclear watchdog.

The enrichment process takes gas produced from raw uranium and aims to increase its proportion of the uranium-235 isotope, needed for nuclear fission.

The gas is pumped into a centrifuge, which spins, causing a small portion of the heavier, more prevalent uranium-238 isotope to drop away. The gas then proceeds to other centrifuges — thousands of them — where the process is repeated, increasing the proportion of uranium-235.

Enrichment Capacity Doubled, Source Says (WT/AP)

By Nasser Karimi, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

TEHRAN -- Iran has doubled its capacity to enrich uranium by successfully carrying out the process with a second network of centrifuges, a semiofficial news agency reported yesterday, sending a defiant new message to the U.N. Security Council.

Council members are working on a draft resolution that would impose limited sanctions on the Islamic republic because of its refusal to cease enrichment, a process that can produce fuel for a civilian nuclear reactor or fissile material for a warhead.

DOJ_NMG_0088717

The Iranian Students News Agency (ISNA) quoted an anonymous official as saying Iran has successfully begun injecting gas into a second network of centrifuges.

"We are injecting gas into the second cascade, which we installed two weeks ago," the official said, according to ISNA.

The news agency said the second cascade had doubled Iran's capacity to enrich uranium. "We have already exploited the product of the second cascade," the official was quoted.

The State Department said it was up to the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) to assess the reports. "I cannot confirm those reports. We are not on the ground," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

President Bush said that regardless of the accuracy, it was "unacceptable" for Iran to have a nuclear weapon and the report underscored the need for the United States and its allies to redouble an effort to stop Iran from developing nuclear capability.

The U.N. Security Council has demanded that Tehran cease all enrichment-related activities amid concern by the United States and its allies that Iran is seeking to develop a program that can make weapons-grade uranium for nuclear warheads. The Iranians have said their nuclear program is peaceful.

France's Foreign Ministry called Iran's expansion of its nuclear program a "negative signal" that should be taken to account at U.N. talks over possible sanctions.

French President Jacques Chirac expressed support for sanctions against Iran but insisted they be temporary and reversible.

Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov said he didn't "share concerns" about the starting of a second network of centrifuges, expressing confidence that the new centrifuges "are under the complete control of the [IAEA], for scientific research purposes."

Russia and China, which can veto Security Council resolutions and have close economic ties with Iran, are reportedly pushing for continued dialogue with Iran instead of punishment.

In a separate report yesterday, ISNA quoted Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, as saying his country's enrichment program should not hinder negotiations with the West.

Iran produced a small batch of low-enriched uranium in February, using its initial cascade of 164 centrifuges at its pilot plant at Natanz.

The U.S. and its European allies are circulating a draft U.N. Security Council resolution that would ban the sale of missile and nuclear technology to Iran and deny the country certain assistance from the U.N. nuclear watchdog.

Iranian Nuclear Effort Defies U.N. Council Again (WP)

By Colum Lynch, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 27 -- Iran has once again defied the U.N. Security Council's repeated demands to halt its nuclear activities, firing up a second line of centrifuges to increase its ability to enrich uranium, according to a report by a semiofficial Iranian news agency.

The report came as U.N. negotiations became bogged down in the face of Russia's and China's reluctance to slap tough sanctions on Tehran. U.S. and European officials say they anticipate a long, hard diplomatic struggle over the coming weeks to fashion a formal reaction to Iran's enrichment activities.

President Bush warned on Friday that it is "unacceptable" for Iran to produce nuclear weapons. But the United States has been stymied in its efforts to gain speedy passage of a sanctions resolution.

Bush said the Iranian report "says to me that we must double our effort to work with the international community to persuade the Iranians that there is only isolation from the world if they continue working forward on such a program."

"The idea of Iran having a nuclear weapon is unacceptable," Bush added after a meeting with NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer. "And it's unacceptable for the United States, and it's unacceptable to nations we're working with in the United Nations to send a common message."

The Security Council passed a resolution on July 31 threatening to consider sanctions against Iran if it did not suspend its enrichment of uranium and a package of incentives. Those incentives, which include greater access to Western markets and guarantees of foreign-supplied nuclear fuel, are backed by the council's five permanent members -- the United States, Russia, France, Britain and China -- plus Germany.

Iran says that it is willing to restart talks with the major powers to resolve the nuclear crisis but that it will not agree to suspend its enrichment activities as a precondition. It maintains that it has the right, under the 1970 Non-Proliferation Treaty, to enrich uranium for the production of nuclear power for what it describes as a purely civilian energy program.

DOJ_NMG_0088718

With no breakthrough in sight, France, Britain and Germany presented the United States, Russia and China this week with a draft resolution that would ban trade related to Iran's nuclear and ballistic-missile programs but would allow Russia to continue to support the construction of an Iranian nuclear facility at Bushehr.

French President Jacques Chirac told reporters during a visit to the city of Wuhan, China, that "appropriate, adapted, temporary and reversible sanctions will probably have to be found and imposed to show Iran that the whole of the international community does not understand its position," according to [a news agency].

The Bush administration declined to endorse the European draft because of concerns that it is too weak to constrain Iran from pursuing a clandestine nuclear weapons program. But Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov has suggested that the European draft is too tough and does not conform with the six nations' aim of eliminating "the risks of sensitive technology falling into Iran's hands" while maintaining "vital channels of communication with Iran."

Russia is furious that the United States in July sanctioned two Russian military contractors -- the state arms exporter Rosoboronexport and aircraft manufacturer Sukhoi -- under the 2000 Iran Nonproliferation Act.

Vitaly Churkin, Russia's ambassador to the United Nations, has hinted that the U.S. failure to lift those sanctions could complicate the Iran negotiations. "If we work collectively, we need to work collectively," Churkin said recently. "If they want to go it on their own, you know legislating unilateral sanctions, they are welcome to tackle the problem alone."

Iran is still years away from producing enough highly enriched uranium to build a nuclear bomb, according to analysts. It fired up its first 164-centrifuge line, called a cascade, earlier this year at the Natanz nuclear facility -- where Iran plans to operate up to 3,000 centrifuges. But it has been progressing at a slower rate than expected, producing only a tiny sample of enriched uranium.

David Albright, an expert on the Iran nuclear program and president of the Institute for Science and International Security, said the second cascade is too small to produce sufficient quantities of enriched uranium for a nuclear bomb. The concern, he said, is whether Tehran's nuclear scientists are close to mastering the full-scale enrichment of uranium at the facility. He said the Iranians are clearly "moving forward" in their understanding of the nuclear fuel cycle.

The Iranian Students' News Agency, which is close to the government, reported that Iran began injecting UF-6 gas into the new cascade earlier this week, a key step in producing enriched uranium.

An official at the International Atomic Energy Agency declined to confirm or deny the Iranian report. But the agency's director general, Mohamed ElBaradei, told The Washington Post on Monday that Iran was days away from using the cascade to enrich uranium.

Rice Says Hezbollah Must Disarm To Be Part Of Lebanon's Political Process (USAT/AP)

USA Today, October 28, 2006

BEIRUT (AP) — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice stepped up international pressure on Hezbollah to disarm, saying in a television interview aired Friday that the guerrilla group must surrender its weapons if it wants to remain part of Lebanon's political process.

Rice urged Hezbollah to lay down its arms according to the cease-fire that ended its 34-day war with Israel last summer, and choose between being a militant group and a legitimate political organization.

Hezbollah is under heavy international pressure to surrender its weapons, but the Iranian- and Syrian-backed group — which holds 11 seats in the Lebanese parliament and two spots in the Cabinet — has refused to disarm.

"If Hezbollah wants to be in politics... Hezbollah should be disarmed. You cannot have one foot in terror and the use of violence and the other foot in politics. It just doesn't work that way," Rice said in an interview with the privately-owned Lebanese Broadcasting Corp.

"Hezbollah has to decide whether it's going to maintain its terrorist wing and remain a terrorist organization or whether it's going to ... be part the political process," she said.

The interview was taped at Rice's office in Washington, and conducted by May Chidiac, a Lebanese journalist who lost an arm and a leg in car bombing in Lebanon in September 2005.

The U.S. government has labeled Hezbollah a terrorist organization and blames it for the deaths of 241 U.S. Marines in the bombing of their Beirut barracks in 1983, as well as for two attacks on the U.S. embassy in Beirut and the 1985 TWA hijacking that killed an American serviceman on board. Hezbollah has repeatedly denied such accusations and says it now opposes terrorism.

Rice also urged the Lebanese government to end what it called Hezbollah's "state within a state" and prevent weapons from reaching the militant group.

"I'm counting on Lebanon to live up to its obligations, and I'm counting on Lebanon to want to evolve to a normal state," Rice told the satellite channel. "And a normal state has an army and police that answer to the state, not to a state within a state."

DOJ_NMG_0088719

The U.N. cease-fire resolution that ended the Hezbollah-Israel war on Aug. 14 called for the Lebanese army to deploy alongside international peacekeepers in Hezbollah strongholds across south Lebanon. Some 16,000 Lebanese troops have fanned out across the region, including along the border with Israel, for the first time in decades.

The two forces are tasked with establishing a Hezbollah-free buffer zone stretching some 30 kilometers (18 miles) north of the Israeli border.

Rice also warned that as Lebanon tries to rebuild, some people might try to destabilize its Western-backed government.

"We've heard that there are people who would like to intimidate or assassinate again," she said, referring to the 2005 assassinations of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri and other anti-Syrian politicians. She did not elaborate.

Asked if Syria was trying to destabilize Lebanon following its withdrawal last year, Rice said: "It's not any great secret that there are concerns about what Syria, which once occupied the country, might try and do through continuing contacts in the country. But I don't want accuse any one place. I just want to make very clear that the international community believes there should be no foreign intimidation of the Lebanese people."

(hd-aj-lf)

Goodwill Ambassador? Venezuela Is Leery Of U.S. Envoy (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

LECHERÍA, Venezuela

PRESIDENT HUGO CHÁVEZ does not bother to hide how he feels about William Brownfield, the United States ambassador to this country. “Start packing your bags, mister, if you keep on provoking us,” Mr. Chávez said on TV this year. “Because I’ll kick you out of here.”

Some of Mr. Chávez’s supporters feel the same way. Protesters on motorcycles chased Mr. Brownfield’s car in Caracas last April, beating on its doors and pelting it with tomatoes and eggs. When Mr. Brownfield visited Nueva Esparta last December to hand out baseball equipment, demonstrators threw rocks at his car.

With relations between Washington and Caracas at a low ebb, Mr. Brownfield, a loquacious Texan and career diplomat, has one of the most challenging jobs of any American ambassador. Though at a career stage when some would prefer a plush embassy in a friendly country, Mr. Brownfield seems to relish the opportunity to engage Venezuelans on a street level.

This is no easy undertaking in a country where President Bush is regularly pilloried (an exposition at the Foreign Ministry in Caracas this week depicted Mr. Bush in Nazi clothing).

While Mr. Brownfield is not always greeted with rocks and eggs, he does find himself fighting an uphill battle almost wherever he goes. That much was evident when he arrived here in eastern Venezuela recently, bodyguards in tow, to deliver one of his speeches that gently rankle Mr. Chávez.

Mr. Brownfield started by thanking Venezuela for offering subsidized heating oil to poor Americans this winter. Then he pointed out that Venezuela’s ambassador in Washington similarly travels around the United States speaking to groups interested in Mr. Chávez’s “Bolivarian Revolution.”

“Why, I think my friend Ambassador Bernardo Álvarez is in San Juan at this very moment,” Mr. Brownfield, 54, said in fluent but heavily accented Spanish. (Mr. Álvarez was there to show support for Puerto Rico’s independence movement.)

Finally, responding to questions from local journalists, Mr. Brownfield defended the Bush administration’s recent prohibition on arms sales to Venezuela, after the State Department listed Venezuela as uncooperative in counterterrorism efforts.

That ended his visit here to an American Corner, one of four he has recently opened in the country. These are essentially libraries and information centers run jointly by the State Department and a local group, where people can study English or read up on American history and culture.

About 30 residents gathered to see him in the municipal building of Lechería, a city led by an anti-Chávez mayor. But even here, the reception was cool. Some tapped messages into their Blackberrys while he spoke. All applauded politely when he finished.

The rest of his trip did not go as smoothly. Tarek William Saab, an author and the governor of Anzoátegui State, described by Mr. Chávez as “the poet of the revolution,” refused to meet with Mr. Brownfield. Executives from two American energy companies with operations here also declined because their partner, Venezuela’s national oil company, denied Mr. Brownfield permission to enter their refining complex.

SO it goes in a country that, paradoxically, maintains resilient commercial ties with the United States. Anti-American sentiment is often directed personally at Mr. Brownfield, who grew up in a ranching family and sometimes sports a University of Texas baseball cap.

DOJ_NMG_0088720

Newspapers have dubbed him el Tejano, the Texan, a nod to his straightforward if ironic style in pressing ahead with his street diplomacy. He grew up not far from Brownfield, a West Texas ranching town named for an ancestor.

After leaving Texas he entered the Foreign Service in the late 1970s, "starting life," as he puts it, in the heart of Venezuela's oil patch in Maracaibo, where there was once an American Consulate. Rising to become one of the most respected American diplomats in Latin America, he accepted assignments in Panama, as political adviser to the United States Southern Command, and as ambassador to Chile. His wife, Kristie A. Kenney, is the United States ambassador to the Philippines.

Since presenting his credentials to Mr. Chávez in August 2004, Mr. Brownfield has repeatedly had to deny claims that the Pentagon is preparing to send the Marines to invade Venezuela. Still, Mr. Chávez finds the United States a convenient boogeyman, using the idea of invasion to strengthen ties with Iran and cement domestic political support.

"We've been a partner with Venezuela for 200 years," Mr. Brownfield said in an interview. "This is a partnership that will endure times of stress."

A hardening of relations seems almost inevitable, with spats emerging almost monthly. The two countries are now clashing over Venezuela's bid to win a seat on the United Nations Security Council and a push by Mr. Brownfield to reopen the consulate in Maracaibo — a support base for Manuel Rosales, the leading opposition candidate in December presidential elections. Both efforts have stalled.

Mr. Brownfield, meanwhile, travels around Venezuela. Often his venues are at baseball diamonds, which he views as areas where the two countries have a history of cooperation. Even Mr. Chávez has been known to don a baseball uniform, evoking youthful dreams of pitching for the San Francisco Giants.

Mr. Brownfield's overtures, like those of American diplomats in Havana, are often regarded here as imperialist aggression. At first glance, the American Corner in Lechería seems benign. Its library has biographies of Bill Clinton, Katharine Graham and Theodore Roosevelt.

But pro-Chávez activists like Eva Golinger, an American lawyer who lives in Caracas, have denounced the American Corners, which are more common in former countries of the Soviet Union, as examples of "psychological and propaganda operations."

"Mr. Brownfield is sticking out his foot, in order to have it stepped on," José Vicente Rangel, Venezuela's vice president, said this year. "What he wants is for some hothead, or some provocateur that they invite themselves, to throw a stone at him."

THE challenges before Mr. Brownfield were evident in a visit to a dilapidated public hospital in Barcelona, a city next to Lechería. He went to publicize a program that brings American doctors to repair cleft palates in poor children.

Families of more than 90 children greeted Mr. Brownfield as he walked throughout the hospital, accompanied by aides and television cameras. Oneida López, the aunt of a 2-year-old boy who had undergone the surgery, said Mr. Brownfield was a "very generous man." But Ms. López said she admired Mr. Chávez more.

She traveled to Barcelona from her home city, Anaco, earlier this month to see the president when he opened a cancer unit at the same hospital. She said she recently started a job as a street sweeper at a cooperative, one of many social welfare programs created by Mr. Chávez. "I love my president," said Ms. López, 31.

Perhaps relations between the countries come into clearer focus when Mr. Brownfield shows his teeth. One story in diplomatic circles in Caracas describes his brief meeting last year with Mr. Chávez.

"Mr. Brownfield recommended holding a friendly baseball game between the staffs of the presidential palace and the United States Embassy, on the condition that the marines played on the American side. "I have only seven of them here," he told Mr. Chávez, who reacted with a cool smile and ended the encounter.

A spokeswoman at Venezuela's communications ministry said she was unable to confirm details of the meeting. An embassy spokesman said only, "On matters as important as baseball, we don't comment."

Colombia City Makes A U-turn (LAT)

By Chris Kraul, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

Bogota, once a world capital of mayhem, is now held up as a model.

A decade ago, the Bosa slum was the black hole of Bogota. Its darkest corner was Laurel Park, a grassless, trash-strewn lot with open sewage and gun-toting gangs bent on muggings and murder.

Today, Bosa has paved streets, new schools, health clinics and cafeterias, and links to a new mass transit system. Laurel Park has been rechristened Park of the Arts and is alive with children at play and free theater, fashion shows and concerts.

Like much of this re-energized capital of more than 7 million inhabitants, the war zone that was Bosa has been transformed.

DOJ_NMG_0088721

"The change has surprised everyone, not just visibly but socially," said Nubia Zuaza, a community activist who has lived in the area for 20 years. "From a focal point of delinquency, the park now embodies a sense of community that wasn't there before."

The same can be said for much of Bogota, which in the 1990s earned a well-deserved reputation as a world capital of mayhem. Car bombings, assassinations, killings and kidnappings sent thousands of Bogota's residents fleeing to the United States or had them hunkering down in their homes. Bogota was, in many urban experts' view, a failed city choked with traffic and pollution and victimized by a seemingly uncontrollable crime wave.

"When I took office, people told me: 'Nobody can fix this. Bogota is totally hopeless,' " said Enrique Peñalosa, the capital's mayor from 1997 to 2000.

Now, visionary leadership by Peñalosa and two other Bogota mayors is credited with helping turn the city around. Improved public finances, reduced crime and congestion, a slew of public works, and reduced and more orderly traffic have made Colombia's capital livable again.

Urban experts around the world are taking notice. At the architecture exhibition at last month's Venice Biennale, the organizers cited the city as an exemplar in mass transit. Highlighted were the continent's largest network of bike paths and Bogota's 300-mile Transmilenio bus system, which after six years of existence boasts a daily ridership of 1.4 million.

The United Nations, the World Bank and the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation have cited the 70% drop in Bogota's homicide rate, an even steeper decline in kidnappings, and the addition of a score of public libraries, most of them in poor areas.

But the proof of the turnaround is in the attitudes of the residents. Polls show that citizens who once overwhelmingly saw life here as a cross to bear are hopeful about the future and happier to be here.

"The quality of life has improved with all that's been done, like the schools and the community dining rooms. People see that the government is doing something," said seamstress Sonia Ruiz, 45, a 25-year resident of the Bosa barrio. She spoke as she walked near the Park of the Arts, which on a weekday afternoon was clogged with kids playing on swings and kicking soccer balls.

Another Bosa resident, 50-year-old electrician Manuel Penola, said that the barrio was "no utopia yet" and that break-ins still happen, potholes go months without fixing, and there is flooding after downpours. "But that's because the city is too big, and barrios like this arose illegally with no planning," Penola said. "Now, at least, we have cooking gas and, with the Transmilenio nearby, the streets are safer and a lot less jammed."

The city appears to have entered an era that author Armando Silva hopefully describes as a "culture of citizenship," a term that could never have been applied to Bogota a decade ago.

"The self-image of crime, violence and no future was so strong in the '90s that no one could see a way out," said Silva, a philosophy professor at the National University of Colombia. "But there has been a change in the political direction of the city, and you have to credit the citizens themselves who demanded it."

Urban planning expert Juan Carlos del Castillo said the seeds of change were planted during the administration of Mayor Jaime Castro in the early 1990s. Castro initiated Bogota's first land-use plan and persuaded the federal legislature to grant him stronger powers, having found himself overshadowed by a city council dominated by corrupt real estate and transportation interests.

"At the time there was total chaos in the city," said Del Castillo, who teaches at the National University of Colombia. "The law of the jungle said that people did whatever they wanted, whether it was walling off a street, ignoring their taxes or gas bills, or parking their cars on sidewalks."

Castro's successor, Antanas Mockus, son of Lithuanian immigrants and a former university rector, tried to restore a sense of citizenship, employing a whimsical approach that included using mimes to shame motorists into heeding stoplights and crosswalks. But he also played fiscal hardball to improve tax collection and clean up the city's finances.

Mockus said in an interview that he also attacked Bogota's seemingly unsolvable crime problem by approaching it as an "epidemiologist would tuberculosis." He mapped out areas where crime was highest and targeted them by increasing patrols and halting liquor sales selectively after 1 a.m. on weekends.

"Crime is caused not only by professional criminals but by social aggression, arguments that get out of hand, often when alcohol is involved," Mockus said. "My approach was that all of us have a rude person inside of us and it's our job to regulate him."

Although crime has by no means disappeared, most Bogotanos you stop on the street tell you their city feels safer.

"Two or three years ago, I never walked downtown alone. Now I feel I'm taking no risk in going," 25-year-old domestic worker Mari Cordero said as she left her job in Bogota's wealthy Chico section.

By the end of Mockus' first term in December 1997 (he was reelected in late 2000 and began a second three-year term in 2001), crime rates had begun to fall and public finances were strengthening. Thanks to Castro's improved property-tax collection and Mockus' reorganization of the power company, Mockus left a budget surplus of about $700 million for incoming Mayor Peñalosa.

DOJ_NMG_0088722

A part-time professor and business consultant with the U.S. firm Arthur D. Little before taking office, Peñalosa used the surplus to launch a public works program designed to dramatically reduce traffic, which he describes as Bogota's bane. "Cars are lethal weapons that dehumanize society," he said.

"I could have used the surplus to build seven elevated highways for more cars, but that would have left no money for public spaces or libraries," Peñalosa said. "Those highways would have been undemocratic since 70% of Bogotanos don't have cars."

Using a model set by the Brazilian city of Curitiba, he planned and began construction of the Transmilenio bus system and restricted each private automobile's circulation to five days a week.

The current mayor, Luis Eduardo Garzon, has taken on the poverty fight, guaranteeing free lunches to the poor and elderly in a program called "Bogota Without Hunger" and extending the city's free health clinic network.

The city's development trajectory is not without critics, including Venus Albeiro Silva Gomez, the federal deputy who represents the Bosa district. "Too much of the spending is directed to the north of the city where the rich people live," he said, "and not enough in the south where the poor are."

But few would dispute that Bogota has vastly improved since a decade ago.

"It's difficult to measure, but I think the city has recovered its self-respect," urban planner Del Castillo said. "If you asked people 10 years ago, they'd tell you the city is governed by thieves. Today it's the opposite."

chris.kraul@latimes.com

Times researcher Jenny Carolina Gonzalez contributed to this report.

Coca Growers Resist Bolivia Crackdown (WT)

By Martin Arostegui, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

SANTA CRUZ, Bolivia -- Indigenous coca farmers who helped put President Evo Morales in power are violently resisting even the token eradication efforts demanded by the United States to avoid Bolivia's decertification as a country cooperating against drug trafficking.

Dissatisfied with new laws permitting peasant farmers to grow up to half an acre of coca for traditional use, the farmers are backing demands for increased acreage with road blocks and gunfights that so far have killed two growers and wounded two police officers.

The government, which this week was maneuvering in New York to secure a two-year term on the U.N. Security Council, is divided on how to proceed.

It came to power in January with strong backing from Andean Indians who for centuries have used the coca leaf as a mild stimulant, and Mr. Morales, a former coca grower who heads Bolivia's largest coca-growing syndicate in the Chapare Valley, has repeatedly pledged to use "peaceful" means to limit cultivation of the leaf.

But police and elements in his own government are concerned that as much as half the current coca production is being diverted into the production of cocaine for the illicit international market.

The State Department publicly warned Mr. Morales during his visit to the United Nations in New York last month that Bolivia must eliminate 12,000 acres of coca cultivation or face decertification as a country cooperating against drug trafficking, which would mean a cutoff of aid.

The statement followed talks in Washington with Vice President Alvaro Garcia Linera, who agreed to eradicate roughly 15 percent of the country's estimated coca acreage.

But Felipe Caceres, the vice minister for social defense and a former coca grower himself, said in a recent interview with Bolivia's largest newspaper La Razon, that 50 percent of coca production currently goes to drug trafficking, an estimate supported by national police.

U.S. Ambassador Philip Goldberg also has called on Bolivia to renew joint operations with U.S. anti-drug agencies. But Mr. Morales has rejected U.S. calls to end his policy of permitting traditional coca farmers to cultivate up to 1 cato, or half an acre, of the crop.

"We won't accept impositions," the president said in a speech to the U.N. General Assembly, where he called for coca's legalization.

Instead, Mr. Morales has appealed to the coca syndicates to hold down production out of their own self-interest.

"We cannot allow the uncontrolled growth of coca, as it will reduce the price," Mr. Morales recently told a gathering of the Six Federations of Coca Growers of the Tropic of Cochabamba. He also admitted that "there exists an excess production of coca that generates a legal problem."

DOJ_NMG_0088723

Even so, coca growers are now demanding to be allowed to double or triple the permitted acreage. More than 1,200 peasant farmers who have planted about 2,000 acres of new coca in national parklands outside the Chapare Valley have insisted that they need to grow more because of their distance from roads and markets.

Officials of Bolivia's U.S.-trained anti-narcotics unit, the Special Force to Fight Crime and Narcotraffic, have reported that the excess production is controlled by drug traffickers. But police and army teams were pulled off eradication missions after a gunfight two weeks ago in Carrasco National Park in eastern Cochabamba province.

Two coca growers were killed and two seriously wounded police officers had to be evacuated by helicopter during the heavy exchange of automatic weapons fire.

Eleven soldiers including an army major were taken hostage. The servicemen were released following negotiations with the government, but several hundred coca growers then used dynamite to cut the main road between Cochabamba and Santa Cruz.

Interior Minister Alicia Munoz has minimized the incidents. "These conflicts are small. The government's anti-drug policy is macro. It seeks to dignify the coca leaf and eliminate illegal cultivations which exist in protected areas," she said as coca farmers threw up more blockades in the Yungas Valley.

American Pilots Were At Correct Altitude Over Brazil, Lawyer Says (NYT)

By Paulo Prada And Matthew L. Wald

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

RIO DE JANEIRO, Oct. 27 — The lawyer representing the pilots of an American corporate jet that apparently collided with a Brazilian airliner on Sept. 29 said Friday that his clients were at their assigned altitude at the time of the crash, despite a flight plan that specified a different altitude.

The corporate plane was a Legacy, built by Embraer, a Brazilian manufacturer. It apparently clipped a Boeing 737 operated by Gol Linhas Aéreas Inteligentes, which crashed, killing all 154 people on board.

The collision apparently occurred at 37,000 feet. Brazilian prosecutors have noted that the flight plan, filed by the crew before departure, called for that altitude, and then a descent to 36,000 feet before the location where the collision occurred, and then climbing to 38,000.

The lawyer, Roberto A. Torricella Jr., who is based in Miami, said the two American pilots had confirmed those details. But he says they also told him that when they took off from the southeastern city of São José dos Campos, where their new plane had been made, they were given a clearance by Brazilian air traffic control that superseded the flight plan.

The takeoff clearance called for 37,000 feet for the entire route up to the point of the crash, Mr. Torricella said. As a result, he said, the plane was at the proper altitude.

It is unclear whether testimony by Brazilian air traffic controllers, who have been interviewed for the crash investigation, supports that a takeoff clearance of 37,000 feet was granted. Telephone calls to Brazil's civil aviation authority and air force, which are responsible for the investigation, were not returned Friday night. Investigators for state and federal police forces, who are conducting a criminal investigation, could not be reached for comment.

The American pilots, Joseph Lepore, 42, of Bay Shore, N.Y., and Jan Paladino, 34, of Westhampton, N.Y., flying for ExcelAire Service Inc. of Ronkonkoma, N.Y., remain in Brazil. They have not been charged with wrongdoing, but a judge ordered their passports seized to keep them in the country until a criminal investigation is complete.

Mr. Torricella said that the pilots were questioned immediately by investigators and the police, but had not yet been interviewed by the federal police. Aviation experts said the police might not be ready to do so. Searchers only recently found the 737's cockpit voice recorder, which is being sent to Canada for analysis. There may be other evidence that they have not finished analyzing.

In addition, Brazil is holding a presidential election on Sunday, and the crash has inflamed passions. A prosecutor once speculated that the American crew had turned off their transponder, a device that makes the plane more visible on radar and visible to other planes' anticollision warning system.

A Year After Suburban Riots, France Is Mostly Calm (WP)

By Molly Moore, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

PARIS, Oct. 27 -- French officials deployed 4,000 extra police officers in the country's poorest suburban areas Friday as the anniversary of last year's wave of arson attacks arrived with only scattered incidents of violence, according to early police and news media reports.

DOJ_NMG_0088724

The security precautions followed several weeks of increasing tension in the suburban areas of Paris where residents -- most of whom are Arab and African immigrants and their French-born children -- have complained that the government had not lived up to promises it made, after last year's nationwide rampage, to improve living conditions and employment opportunities.

Small groups of men -- some of them armed -- attacked two public buses in the northern suburbs of Paris early in the evening. In one incident, two armed men boarded a bus in front of a train station in the town of Le Blanc-Mesnil, yanked the driver off the vehicle and ordered all the passengers off before throwing a gasoline bomb and burning the bus, French media reported. Authorities reduced bus service into the area and limited night bus service in many other suburbs.

In the past week, about half a dozen public buses have been attacked and set ablaze in suburbs of Paris and Lyon, and gangs wielding rocks and metal pipes have ambushed police in some Paris suburbs.

Friday morning, in the northern Paris suburb of Clichy-sous-Bois, several hundred residents marched to memorialize the deaths of two local youths last Oct. 27 -- the incident that set off France's worst civil unrest since the student protests in 1968.

The two teenagers were electrocuted when they leapt into an electrical substation to escape police who witnesses said were chasing them. French officials denied that police had been pursuing the youths.

Marchers carried a banner declaring, "Died for nothing." The marchers stopped at the electrical substation where the youths perished and recited prayers in French and Arabic as their families laid plastic-wrapped flowers against the fence.

"Last year we crossed Clichy by weaving between the burnt-out wrecks of cars, creating an image of our city that we didn't want to see," Mayor Claude Dillain told the gathering during a solemn ceremony Friday morning. "Once again France, and even the world, is watching us and waiting to see what we do. So I appeal solemnly for calm and dignity to prevail here."

During last year's violence, gangs of boys and young men torched more than 10,000 cars and attacked nearly 500 schools and other public buildings, mostly government institutions.

Allegations that the government has failed to respond adequately to demands for improvements in the poor suburbs, along with parallel concerns over security and an increasing Muslim population, are among the most contentious issues in the French presidential campaign.

Speeches And Arson Recall Last Year's Unrest In France (NYT)

By Ariane Bernard

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

CLICHY-SOUS-BOIS, France, Oct. 27 — Hooded attackers burned two buses on Friday night in a city near this Paris suburb on the anniversary of the start of last year's suburban unrest.

Additional police officers had been put on duty for Friday night, as France braced for possible violence. In recent weeks, bands of youths had attacked police patrols and buses in the suburbs of Paris and Lyon.

In the Friday night arson, the two buses were attacked separately in Le Blanc-Mesnil, north of Paris. The passengers and drivers of both buses were able to escape unharmed, said the Paris-area transportation authority, the RATP.

In one of the attacks, assailants broke the bus's windows and threw firebombs into the vehicle. A spokeswoman for the RATP said that she was unsure if the bombs were thrown before or after the passengers left the bus. The spokeswoman, who could not be identified by name under the transportation authority's ground rules, said she did not have details of the other attack.

During the day on Friday, several hundred people in this poor suburb of Paris participated in a silent march in memory of two teenagers whose accidental deaths last year triggered three weeks of unrest that shook the country.

In speeches after the march, local officials and family members of the teenagers called for calm. The two teenagers, Bouna Traoré, 15, and Zyed Benna, 17, were electrocuted last Oct. 27 at a power substation where they and a friend were hiding. Some accounts at the time said they had been running from the police. The friend was severely wounded but survived.

"Once more, France, the world, are watching us," said the mayor, Claude Dilain, after dedicating an understated white stone monument in front of the teenagers' school.

"This is a solemn call for calm," said the mayor, who is a Socialist.

The marchers, many of them youths wearing white T-shirts bearing the words "Dead for Nothing," paused by the power substation where the teenagers died. Men and women cried as they passed the site, and an imam said prayers for the dead.

Many expressed not only sadness over the deaths, but also disappointment with how little things had changed in France's tough suburbs. The unrest last year, during which thousands of cars were set ablaze and businesses were trashed, shed light on the plight of the country's underprivileged populations, mainly Arabs and black Africans and their French-born children, who feel disenfranchised. In some immigrant neighborhoods, unemployment runs considerably above the national average.

After the march, Muhittin Altun, 18, the survivor of the accident that killed his friends, said, "You'll see, it's going to explode, it's going to explode everywhere, because for the past year, they have been trying to put us to sleep."

DOJ_NMG_0088725

But Sylviane Dubuisson, 52, who runs a bakery here, said she disapproved of the march because she feared it could lead to new violence. Speaking of the two teenagers, she said, “They died, it’s sad, but they have to rest in peace and we need to forget.”

French Muslims Mark Day Of Sadness To Honor Dead (LAT)

By Alissa J. Rubin And Achrene Sicakyuz, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

The anniversary of two youths' deaths finds that little has changed.

CLICHY-SOUS-BOIS, FRANCE — One word summed up the mood at the commemoration Friday of the deaths of two French youths whose electrocution set off a series of fiery riots a year ago.

"Triste," said one person after another in French. Sad.

"The atmosphere was sad," said Maamar Hamoude, who works for a local nonprofit organization, as he stood for a few minutes after the ceremony in this rundown suburb to dedicate a memorial. "It was a paying of respects to the young men who died, and in a certain way to all the young people here who have so little," he said.

Teenagers Bouna Traore and Zyed Benna, children of immigrants from Africa, were apparently fleeing from the police when they were electrocuted a year ago Friday after they took refuge in an electrical transforming station. Their deaths brought to the surface fury at France's failure to integrate minorities, primarily of African and Middle Eastern origins.

In the weeks of rioting that ensued, thousands of cars were set on fire and some shops looted. However, only one person died and a small number were injured.

Although there are 5 million Muslims in France, the majority from immigrant backgrounds, few have made their way into the country's elite. There are barely a handful of minorities in politics, just one junior minister from a minority background, and token numbers in France's top universities and its police force.

Most live in desolate concrete housing projects or dilapidated homes in suburbs an hour or more by bus or train from the large French cities where most jobs are. Unemployment is well above 20% and in some cases as high as 40%, according to French newspapers.

To prepare for the anniversary, the French Interior Ministry put 4,000 additional police on duty. A day earlier, Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy announced that police would also guard bus routes to ensure that drivers and passengers were safe.

Although the emotion often portrayed in the media has been anger, what was on display Friday at the memorial was communal mourning. Many people who came to the two-hour ceremony knew the boys who had died and said that the neighborhoods remained a tinderbox, with an underlying tone of hopelessness. Some of the suburbs' young people seem to believe that only through violence are they heard.

"I think last year's riots have helped us being seen by the rest of France," said Leyla, 18, a young woman who knew one of the boys who died. She did not give her last name.

By early evening Friday there were reports of two buses burned near here; in one case, armed men forced the driver and passengers off before setting it alight, according to witnesses.

"In the last year not a lot has changed," said Fariz, 17, who also did not give his last name. "We don't see much difference. Even if they say funds are being spent, the atmosphere is still tense."

Fariz, like many attending the memorial, wore a long white T-shirt with the names of the two boys who died and the words: "Dead For Nothing." Many refused to talk to reporters, simply shaking their heads.

The event began with a silent march from the border of Clichy-sous-Bois through the housing projects where the boys had lived and into the electrical station where they died and then to the college where the memorial was installed.

The mood was somber, the weather gray and damp. Though most of the marchers appeared young, there were older people as well — mothers wearing long African robes and elaborate head scarves; matrons in traditional Islamic hijab and ankle-length coats, their hair covered, speaking softly in Arabic; and older men in the skullcaps often worn by practicing Muslims.

Some speakers offered benedictions in French, some in Arabic — a signal of the divided identity of the community.

Julian, a 17-year-old who has hopes of becoming a film director, said that the government had to do more to improve the projects. "There are lots of promises about urban renovation, and I hope the government will keep its promises," he said. "There are buildings here where the elevators have not worked for years, and our parents pay taxes. The mood is the same as last year."

Clichy-sous-Bois Mayor Claude Dilain agreed. A strong defender of his town, he said that in the eyes of most residents, nothing had changed in the last year.

DOJ_NMG_0088726

At the same time, he added: "It would have been impossible to change things in a year…. I can explain to the Clichois that when the minister of Interior promises a local police station, he can't do it in a year. I can explain to the Clichois that when a tram is promised, it can't be done in a day.

"What I can't explain to them is the lack of political affirmation…. We expected the government to assert that it was no longer acceptable that 10% of the French population live in conditions that do not match Republican values," he said.

alissa.rubin@latimes.com

achrene.sicakyuz@latimes.com

Men Burn Buses In Paris Suburb (WT/AP)

By Elaine Ganley, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

CLICHY-SOUS-BOIS, France -- Two public buses were torched in a Paris suburb yesterday, the anniversary of the two deaths that ignited weeks of riots in largely immigrant housing projects across France a year ago.

Both buses were burned in Blanc Mesnil, a northern Paris suburb near Clichy-sous-Bois, where last year's violence began, police said.

In the first attack, two armed men forced passengers off the bus before setting it alight, police said. No one was injured.

The second bus was set on fire shortly after.

Witness Thierry Ange, 19, said four hooded men stood in front of the bus, forcing it to stop. He said they pulled the driver out by his tie. He said one of the attackers hit a passenger and kicked her down the bus' steps.

The incidents were the latest in a series of bus burnings over the past few days.

Flaming cars became a symbol of three weeks of rampages last year, which jolted the nation into recognizing discontent among many minorities -- especially those of Arab and black African origin, and France's 5 million-strong Muslim population.

The outburst of anger at the accidental deaths of the two teens -- who were electrocuted in a power substation in Clichy-sous-Bois while hiding from police on Oct. 27, 2005 -- grew into a broader challenge of the French state.

Several hundred people marched silently yesterday through Clichy-sous-Bois, northeast of Paris, in honor of Zyed Benna and Bouna Traore. Zyed, 17, was buried in his father's native Tunisia. Bouna, 15, was of Mauritanian descent.

Adolescent boys in hooded sweat shirts made up a large part of the mixed-race crowd, their heads bent as prayers were read in Arabic and French.

Zyed and Bouna "became a symbol in the projects," said one of Bouna's cousins, Coulibaly.

"I don't see why the violence should recur. That will not solve the problems," she said.

A memorial to the youths was erected yesterday near City Hall, though the site where they died is adorned only with the graffiti and rubble that are the signature of it and similar neighborhoods.

Clichy-sous-Bois has no police station. Officers patrolling here come from outside and have no connection to residents.

Unemployment among the city's 28,000 residents is 23.5 percent -- the national average is 9 percent -- and is 32 percent for those between the ages of 15 and 24, according to the newspaper La Croix.

The police presence was discreet at yesterday's march, but police fanned out elsewhere to brace for possible nighttime violence, with 500 extra riot police assigned to Paris' poor neighborhoods for the anniversary.

Some 100 cars were torched nationwide overnight, half of them in the Paris region, police said. The figure was higher than usual -- police say between 30 and 50 cars are set on fire during an average week, though some weekends the figure jumps to 100. On the most fiery night of last year's riots, more than 1,400 cars went up in flames.

Attackers forced passengers off four buses before torching them in recent days. In response, Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy pledged to assign police to protect buses serving some Paris neighborhoods.

France's trouble integrating minorities and the recent unrest are becoming political priorities in the campaign for next year's presidential and parliamentary elections.

Instead of France's vaunted "egalite," or equality, many immigrants and their French-born children suffer police harassment, struggle to find work and live in cinder-block public housing mired in crime and poverty.

In First Month As Japan's Premier, Abe Veers To Center (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

TOKYO, Oct. 27 — Shinzo Abe rose to become postwar Japan's youngest prime minister by hewing to a conservative, nationalist agenda. He stood tough against China and North Korea, and championed the right's touchstone causes on history.

DOJ_NMG_0088727

But in the month that he has been prime minister, Mr. Abe, 52, has made a beeline toward the center, reaching out to China and South Korea as this region confronted North Korea's recent nuclear test. He has made surprising, if grudging, admissions about Japan's militarist past, assuaging the regional tensions that emerged under his predecessor, Junichiro Koizumi.

It is too early to tell whether Mr. Abe's month in power is evidence of an innate pragmatism, or whether he is consolidating his power before pushing a more conservative agenda. But he has reassured voters in Japan and officials in Washington, won tentative praise from skeptics in China and South Korea and unsettled the Japanese right.

Mr. Abe has made back-to-back visits to China and South Korea. Both countries had refused to hold summit meetings with Japan because of Mr. Koizumi's annual pilgrimages to the Yasukuni Shrine, the Shinto memorial for Japan's war dead and war criminals, as well as a potent symbol of Japanese militarism in Asia.

Japan's deteriorating relations with China had government officials and policy makers in Asia and the United States worried. Both sides had reached an impasse, with Beijing saying it would not meet Mr. Koizumi unless he stopped visiting the shrine, and Mr. Koizumi insisting that he would not stop.

Mr. Abe, a longtime staunch defender of the visits, has now adopted a softer, ambiguous policy. Mr. Abe says he will neither confirm nor deny whether he has prayed at Yasukuni — while letting his aides inform the news media that he has, in fact, visited the shrine.

"His position on Yasukuni is a symbol of conceding to China and South Korea's demands," said Kim Ho-sup, an expert on Japanese-South Korean relations at Chung-Ang University in Seoul. "He seemed hawkish, but after he became prime minister, he handled relations with Asian neighbors and issues like Yasukuni more diplomatically than Koizumi."

"His visits to China and South Korea were very successful," Mr. Kim said.

Michael J. Green, who handled Asian affairs at the National Security Council until last December and is now at Georgetown University, said Mr. Abe has been "able to recast" Japan's relations with its neighbors away from Yasukuni.

"It was smart domestically because it reassured the center that he was able to deal with neighboring states," Mr. Green said. "It was smart internationally because it gave Japan leverage to deal with North Korea. It was smart with the United States because, even though the United States government wouldn't interfere on the history problem, the Japanese government could sense that there was growing unease in Washington about the state of relations between China and Japan."

Mr. Abe built a conservative base by leading efforts in Parliament to revise school textbooks, which the right argues dwell masochistically on Japan's militarist past, and by casting doubts on the validity of the postwar Tokyo trials that assigned guilt to Japan's wartime leaders. Starting in 2002, he rose to national stardom by being tough on North Korea and China.

But in the last month, Mr. Abe acknowledged that wartime leaders, including his grandfather, Nobusuke Kishi, had "great responsibility" for the war and its damages in Asia. Mr. Abe said he accepted two landmark statements made by Japanese governments in the 1990s, apologizing to the rest of Asia for Japan's imperialist past and recognizing the Japanese Army's role in drafting Asian women as wartime sex slaves, or "comfort women."

Hisahiko Okazaki, a former senior diplomat and a leading conservative commentator close to Mr. Abe, said the prime minister had not forsaken his conservative roots but was merely biding his time.

"Regarding policies toward the comfort women issue and other issues like that, he says they were established by previous governments, right?" Mr. Okazaki said. "Since previous governments set those policies, this government can naturally set its own policy. The current government hasn't done so yet. But I think he'll do it according to his convictions once he consolidates his power."

Mr. Abe's softening seems in keeping with a move to tamp down the nationalism of recent years. Last April, former Bush administration officials, including Mr. Green and James A. Kelley, a former assistant secretary of state for East Asian affairs, said at a conference in Tokyo that Yasukuni was giving Japan a black eye. Then J. Thomas Schieffer, the American ambassador to Japan, described as "very disturbing" the view of history presented at Yasukuni's museum — that Japan was tricked into war by the United States and occupied Asia to free it.

Now, Yasukuni officials said that they planned to change an exhibit that states that President Franklin D. Roosevelt forced Japan into war so that the United States could recover from the Great Depression. Taro Nagae, an adviser to Yasukuni and a retired senior researcher at the Defense Agency's National Institute for Defense Studies, said that the museum had planned to review all its exhibits this year, but acknowledged the effects of American unease over the museum.

"I had been feeling it for a while, and when comments by Armitage and Schieffer started appearing on television and in newspapers, I advised in July that we needed to hurry," Mr. Nagae said, referring to Richard L. Armitage, a former deputy secretary of state.

Asked whether the exhibit change was tied to Mr. Abe's administration, Mr. Nagae said: "If I said there was no relationship, I would be lying. There were opinions that we should start the work after the start of the Abe administration."

DOJ_NMG_0088728

Sri Lanka, Tamil Tigers Ready To Meet (LAT)

By Henry Chu, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 28, 2006

The stakes are high but expectations are low as the foes prepare to talk peace again at a time of escalating violence.

COLOMBO, SRI LANKA — In what could be the last, best hope for averting all-out war, the government of this island nation and the rebel Tamil Tigers are due to sit down today for their first face-to-face talks in months over one of Asia's most intractable conflicts.

Both sides have been stung by heavy losses and international criticism in recent weeks, following a surge in combat that has left hundreds dead and thousands more refugees in their own country, forced to flee homes and livelihoods to avoid the crossfire.

In the charged atmosphere, no one is predicting that substantive advances will be made at the negotiating table. But so fierce has been the fighting that even getting the two longtime adversaries to meet today and Sunday in Geneva is being trumpeted as an achievement, and welcomed by residents desperate for a reprieve from the bloodletting.

"For the first round, we are happy that they're going at all," said Jehan Perera of the National Peace Council of Sri Lanka. "The best thing we can hope for is that they commit themselves to stop the violence."

The violence threatens to engulf this teardrop-shaped island, spilling over from the north and east, where the fighting had, until recently, mostly been confined and where the highly armed rebels want to establish an independent homeland for Sri Lanka's ethnic-minority Tamils.

Military checkpoints now ring this capital, in the southwest, amid fears of further attacks like the mine explosion that nearly killed the Pakistani ambassador two months ago. Last week, Tamil Tiger suicide bombers aboard fishing boats shocked the Sri Lankan navy by mounting an assault on a naval base at Galle, a southern port city popular with tourists and far from the traditional theater of war.

Under pressure

Both sides, their casualty counts spiraling since July, are licking their wounds. They are also under intense diplomatic pressure, much of it from major donor countries, to go back to a 2002 cease-fire deal rendered defunct since late last year, when fighting broke wide open again.

"You're getting peace talks because both sides want to communicate to the international community their willingness to negotiate," said analyst Paikiasothy Saravanamuttu, adding: "I would put the bar of expectations fairly low."

This week, Sri Lankan officials unveiled seven areas of discussion they want to pursue with the rebels, including human rights violations and the recruitment of children as fighters, a tactic for which the Tamil Tigers are notorious.

Also on the agenda are issues of economic development and greater autonomy in the north and east — tacit admission by the government that it has failed to address some fundamental grievances underlying discontent in those regions. Sri Lanka's Tamil population has complained for decades of discrimination and persecution at the hands of the majority Sinhalese, who dominate politics and the armed forces.

"It's a new approach," Keheliya Rambukwella, the chief government spokesman, said in an interview here.

"Our interest is how to give benefit to the Tamil community. We are not interested in pacifying the LTTE or any terrorist groups," he said, referring to the rebels, formally known as the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam.

Bolstering the government's position is a new cooperation pact with the main Sinhalese opposition parties on resolving the conflict. The accord gives President Mahinda Rajapakse more flexibility by lessening his dependence on the hard-line right-wing parties that helped elevate him to power last year.

However, Rambukwella is modest about what measurable outcomes can emerge from the weekend talks, the first such tete-a-tete since February. Most likely, the government's seven points will have to wait for the future, he acknowledges; the best result to be expected in Switzerland is that both sides agree to talk again, and write down dates in their calendars.

"This time, you sit together and say hello," Rambukwella said.

The Tigers have not responded directly to the government's new plan. Their priority in Geneva, spokesman Daya Master said, will be on easing the growing humanitarian crisis on the Jaffna peninsula in the north, where choked-off roads have led to food shortages and other hardships.

A cessation of hostilities would be possible, he said, "if the Sri Lanka government is willing to stop the military operations." Most observers, however, blame the Tigers for breaching the 2002 truce and initiating the latest cycle of attack and counterattack.

Guerrilla leaders have warned that the Geneva talks represent the island's last chance for peace. Failure, they say, would mean a return to the full-throated civil war of old, in which about 65,000 people have been killed in the last 23 years.

DOJ_NMG_0088729

It is difficult to gauge whether such comments are merely bluster or brinkmanship. Many analysts believe that both sides are exhausted from fighting and that the negotiations provide a breather, if nothing else.

Sending a message

Until a few weeks ago, it appeared that the Sri Lankan military had gained the upper hand, wresting territory from the Tigers and inflicting major losses, possibly killing hundreds of guerrillas. Government forces scored notable successes in the east, around the strategically important port city of Trincomalee.

But a campaign in the north met with stiff resistance, forcing a government retreat. Then the rebels struck back, on land and sea, with suicide bombings. On Oct. 16, cars piled with explosives rammed into a navy bus convoy in central Sri Lanka, killing about 100 sailors. Two days later came the raid on the naval base at Galle, in which at least one sailor and 15 rebels died.

"That seemed to be a message from the LTTE, that 'we're evening the score,' " said Saravanamuttu, the analyst.

The hope is that the losses on both sides will be instructive rather than purely destructive.

"They've once again learned that there is no military solution to this conflict," said Swedish Maj. Gen. Ulf Henricsson, the former head of the Scandinavian cease-fire monitoring team in Sri Lanka. "The last three months of more or less war fighting showed them that … the achievements on both sides are very limited and the number of killed on both sides is very high."

An estimated 1,000 people have lost their lives since July. All told, after clashes began erupting late last year, about 2,000 deaths have been reported, half of them civilian. Accusations of abuse by both sides abound.

Whether the respite provided by the peace talks turns out to be lasting or simply the lull before a bigger storm remains to be seen.

Nor is it clear how durable the political rapprochement between the government and opposition parties will prove. The Tigers have long contended that negotiating with a fractious, divided Sri Lankan political establishment was futile, an argument that Rambukwella, the government spokesman, admitted had "a validity" to it.

The newly united front now "needs to yield results. It will be judged on the ability to produce peace and a political negotiated settlement," Saravanamuttu said.

Optimism does not come easily here after countless attempts at a peace process and countless failures. What seemed like a historic chance after the cease-fire agreement four years ago has nearly drained away within a matter of months.

"Both sides are hurting…. The military solution has not worked out as both of them thought," said Perera of the National Peace Council.

"Maybe there is enough pragmatism on both sides that they realize they have to do something — people are suffering," he said. "It's true, they don't trust each other. But they have to work something out."

henry.chu@latimes.com

Sri Lankan Government And Tamil Tigers To Meet (NYT)

By Shimali Senanayake

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka, Oct. 27 — The two sides in the long, bloody Sri Lankan conflict are due to meet in Geneva this weekend, for the first time since a suicide bombing killed 98 people two weeks ago, the deadliest incident in the conflict in more than four years.

In a crucial test of credibility, negotiators for the Sri Lankan government and the separatist Tamil rebels will try to salvage a frayed 2002 ceasefire and the fitful talks since then to end the bloodshed in this country.

Though both sides promised anew in February, when they last met, to abode by the 2002 truce, the violence has mounted since then, and the conflict has now claimed more than 2,500 lives this year alone. A meeting was to have been held in June in Oslo, and both sides sent representatives, but the Tamil Tigers ultimately decided not to take part.

No one expects major breakthroughs in the two days of talks scheduled in Geneva. “Expectations must not be exaggerated,” Erik Solheim, the international development minister of Norway, who is facilitating the talks, said today in a telephone interview from Geneva. “Most important is that the parties agree to meet again, and that talks have some calming effect on the violence.”

Diplomats and political analysts interviewed in Sri Lanka said that the best that can be expected is an agreement to hold more talks, and perhaps an agenda of what to talk about.

In private, some of them concede that the warring parties appear to have little or no interest in peace talks, and are attending them only as a sop to mounting international pressure.

The government has been criticized for a conducting chilling wave of abductions and extrajudicial killings and for making it hard for humanitarian agencies to gain access to some of the hardest hit parts of the country. For their part, the Tamil Tigers have been added to the European Union's list of banned terrorist organizations, potentially crimping the group's ability to raise funds among the Tamil diaspora in Europe.

DOJ_NMG_0088730

As for what to discuss in Geneva, the two sides appear to have vastly different priorities. The government wants to discuss political solutions to the conflict, and plans to bring up issues like the rebels' use of child soldiers. The rebels say the talks should focus on humanitarian issues, on the tattered cease-fire agreement and on opening a highway that links the Tamil-controlled north with the rest of the country.

"If the parties can exchange views, discuss the present situation and set dates for at least two more meetings, then these talks can be deemed a success," said Jon Hanssen-Bauer, Norway's special peace envoy.

The 2002 ceasefire hardly now exists, except on paper. In the incident two weeks ago, a suspected Tamil rebel rammed a truck packed with explosives into a convoy of Navy vehicles, killing scores of sailors as well as civilian bystanders. Two days later, using explosive-filled boats, rebels mounted a water-borne suicide attack on a naval base and harbor in a popular tourist area, extending the latest upsurge in violence into a previously calm part of the south that is dominated by the ethnic Sinhalese majority.

The Geneva talks follow a recent agreement between the ruling and opposition parties in Sri Lanka to negotiate a consensus policy on ending the ethnic conflict. That may remove one reason the Tamil Tigers have put forward for resisting a permanent peace deal: that political wrangling among the Sinhalese parties made it impossible for the government to implement one.

But the talks are also overshadowed by a Supreme Court ruling blocking one of the Tamil rebels' chief demands, that the island's northern and eastern regions, which they consider the historic Tamil homeland, be administered as a single entity. The court ruled last week that a proposed merger of the two regions was unconstitutional.

Crucial Sri Lanka Peace Talks Due (BBC)

BBC.com, October 28, 2006

Violence has soared over recent months Sri Lanka's government and Tamil Tiger rebels start talks in Geneva on Saturday in an effort to avert a slide back into war.

Violence between the two sides has soared - since July 372 security force members, 128 civilians and many rebels have died, the government says.

Correspondents say expectations from the talks are close to zero.

The best scenario, many believe, is that the two sides agree on another date for another round of negotiations.

On the eve of the talks, the rebels said the road linking northern Jaffna peninsula with the rest of the country should be opened to facilitate further negotiations.

Spokesman Daya Master told the Associated Press news agency that the rebels would not agree to any future meetings with the government if the demand was not met.

The road leading to the government-controlled city of Jaffna was closed in early August after fierce fighting broke out between the two sides.

The BBC's Dumeetha Luthra in Colombo says if talks fail diplomats believe it is almost inevitable that Sri Lanka will return to all-out war.

Pressure

Seasoned observers say neither party is sincere in wanting to resume negotiations and that the Geneva meeting is essentially a result of intense international pressure.

The last round of discussions was in Geneva in February. Two subsequent attempts at talks failed, most recently in June.

Since then the international landscape has changed significantly for both sides, our correspondent says.

The rebels have been blacklisted as a terrorist organisation by the European Union and Canada.

The government, meanwhile, is concerned about losing its international credibility.

Both parties have been criticised for human rights abuses, while, on the military front, both have suffered reversals of fortune.

U.N. To Limit The Role Of Its Envoy Expelled By Sudan (NYT)

By Daniel B. Schneider

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 27 — Jan Pronk, a United Nations special envoy who was expelled from Sudan this week, will continue to hold his office until his contract expires at the end of the year, but his role is expected to be mainly symbolic.

DOJ_NMG_0088731

The United Nations announced Friday that it planned to send Mr. Pronk back to Khartoum, but only to organize a transfer to Taye Zerihoun, the officer in charge of the United Nations mission in Sudan. He will then return to New York to finish out his term, according to Stéphane Dujarric, the spokesman for Secretary General Kofi Annan.

"The secretary general has made it clear that he alone can decide on the tenure of his special representatives," Mr. Dujarric said. "However, he also realizes that at a critical time in the Darfur negotiations, it is important that we preserve a good working relationship with the government of Sudan, and he is certain that the officer in charge, Taye Zerihoun, will be able to provide this."

Mr. Dujarric said the United Nations did not expect the Sudanese government to reject the compromise.

Only hours after the announcement, however, Abdalmahmood Abdalhaleem Mohamad, Sudan's representative at the United Nations, said his government would not sanction Mr. Pronk's return.

Mr. Pronk, a former Dutch cabinet minister known for his candor, was ordered out of Sudan on Sunday after he reported on his personal blog that a demoralized Sudanese Army had suffered major defeats in fighting against rebels in the Darfur region of the country.

He also said the military had continued to arm Arab militias responsible for atrocities against civilians, despite commitments to end the practice.

Mr. Pronk, who has held his position for two years and had already announced that he would not seek an extension, returned here on Thursday for a meeting with Mr. Annan. As they met, Mr. Mohamad told reporters that Mr. Pronk "became part of the problem, not the solution."

Some United Nations representatives have been dismayed that a high-ranking representative would post sensitive information on the Web.

On Friday, Mr. Dujarric said United Nations staff guidelines on publications and speeches would be updated to address the issue of blogs.

"The fact that they do not include the word 'blog' does not mean we don't expect our senior officials to use proper judgment," he said.

Mr. Pronk has maintained that the information on his Web site was already available in newspapers published in Sudan.

Misery Churns In Eastern Sudan, Away From Spotlight (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

TOGLEY, Sudan — Ali Hamid Ahmed used to be the elder of a village full of green fields and thousands of goats.

But a little-known war between the government and a spreading rebel force drove his people from their homes to a camp at the far eastern edge of Sudan, where the horizon is paper-flat and the land is about as fertile as a sandbox.

The people here are battered by the sun, the wind and the sand; the tribal scars cut into Mr. Ahmed's face when he was a little boy are constantly creased with dust. Mr. Ahmed's people still call him "the chairman," but out here, Mr. Ahmed says, he is the chairman of nothing.

"We have no animals," he said. "All we have is dirt."

It is a scene of desolation and despair in a country with much of both. But what is different about the crisis in eastern Sudan is that few outside organizations are paying attention. While there are an estimated 25,000 aid workers in Darfur, the war-ravaged region on the other side of the country that has become the focus of a ceaseless flurry of diplomatic activity, here in Togley there are not even plastic tarps for the huts.

Eastern Sudan is forgotten Sudan, an intriguing, isolated, sun-blasted corner of the country where a conservative culture and a slow-burning war have conspired to keep the people mired in neglect despite the area's port and oil riches.

The war may finally be over — eastern rebels who had been fighting for a greater share of the country's resources reached an agreement with the government on Oct. 14 to lay down their weapons in exchange for political representation and a share of the nation's oil money.

But the neglect will take years to reverse. Eastern Sudan, which encompasses roughly 180,000 square miles and nearly four million people, is the poorest part of the country, with the highest infant mortality rate and a per capita income in some areas of 25 cents a day, a small fraction of the national average.

In remote villages, most women cannot even write their own names, partly because of a strict Muslim culture that forbids education for girls and confines them to their homes.

"These women have nothing to do but sit around and drink coffee and scar themselves," said Niyal Mohammed al-Haj, a teacher in Kasala, one of the biggest towns in the east. "Girls don't go to school; boys drop out, and nobody cares."

DOJ_NMG_0088732

One of the reasons that the east has largely gone unnoticed is that the scale of fighting could never compete with the conflicts in Darfur or southern Sudan. The fighting here is thought to have claimed between 2,000 and 5,000 lives in the last 10 years, compared with hundreds of thousands in Darfur and the south.

Yet, the east is increasingly vital to the nation, home to gold mines and the country's major oil pipeline and port. As the troubles intensified in Darfur, Sudan's leaders in Khartoum, the capital, could hardly afford to fight another escalating rebellion.

"Khartoum was facing so much pressure on other fronts, it had to put out this fire," said Ahmed el-Amin Terik, an adviser to the state governor here in Togley. "It wasn't like the eastern rebels were so much of a threat. But even a mosquito doesn't let you sleep."

The eastern rebels do not appreciate being likened to mosquitoes. Most are Beja herdsmen, a proud and traditional group, who strut around in white robes and dusty waistcoats with three-foot-long sabers tucked into their belts. They waged hit-and-run attacks against government soldiers from the backs of their camels. Some are already grumbling about getting a raw deal in the peace effort.

The Beja leadership wanted regional autonomy but instead was given nominal positions in the central government.

The Beja also pushed for a bigger cut of Sudan's growing wealth, which is driven by oil exports, and asked for one dollar for every barrel shipped from Port Sudan, which would amount to around $150 million each year. Instead, the Sudanese government set up a $600 million eastern development fund, a substantial commitment, but one that is guaranteed only for a few years.

These issues are similar to what set off the bloodshed in Darfur and the south, where long-marginalized regional ethnic groups have taken up arms against the ruling group of Arab Sudanese in Khartoum. Critics of the central government say the three separate peace deals that have been reached — for the south in 2005, for Darfur this spring and now for the east — are not only shaky, but may encourage wider unrest.

"The message seems to be, if you want more development, you need to pick up arms," said Abda Yahia el-Mahdi, a former finance minister now in private consulting.

When it came time to sign the eastern peace deal at a ceremony in Asmara, the capital of Eritrea, just east of Sudan, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, the Sudanese president, showed up in Beja dress.

"It was ridiculous," said Hashim Hangag, a spokesman for the Beja Congress political party. "Here was a guy who has never stood with the Beja, pretending to be one of us."

Beja political frustrations have been percolating since the 1950s. The central government dammed their rivers and took their grazing land, while delivering few schools, hospitals or roads. The Beja have always been among the poorest and least educated people in Sudan, marooned in an arid, thinly populated area rife with tuberculosis and malaria, and they hardly had the means to fight back.

In the 1990s, that changed. Sudan's government tried to undermine the Eritrean government by arming Islamic fighters who were waging a holy war against it. Eritrea, in return, began arming the Beja.

Rebels from other tribes and other parts of Sudan flooded into Beja territory and opened a new front against the government, an eastern front — and the alliance eventually took that name. One misimpression of Sudan's rebel movements is that they are isolated to one area and fighting to secede. Many, however, including Darfur's rebel groups, have national ambitions and dream not of carving out their own piece of territory but of overthrowing the Arab-led government.

The fighting displaced thousands of people, including 3,000 now in Togley, who drifted from village to village until all their animals died, and then settled on a chunk of land so dry and fruitless that nobody else wanted it.

A turning point came on Jan. 29, 2005, when government troops in Port Sudan killed 25 unarmed Beja men who were protesting what they called a legacy of exclusion. That drove hundreds more into the ranks of the Eastern Front, and the central government began to fear another Darfur.

Serious peace negotiations started this year, culminating in the October agreement.

Several Beja rebels said they had been pressed to accept a less than satisfying deal because the Eritrean government, which had allowed them to operate out of camps along its border, was eager to normalize relations with Sudan and gave them little choice.

The government and some Beja leaders say that peace will bring desperately needed investment, and with the area safe, more foreign aid will flow in. Right now, just a handful of aid organizations operate here, mostly distributing food.

Mr. Ahmed, the chairman of Togley, hopes to lead his people back to their village, but there are literally minefields between here and there. "I know Darfur has problems," Mr. Ahmed said. "But what about us?"

Kidnapping And Turmoil Ahead Of Congo Vote (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

KINSHASA, Congo, Oct. 27 — United Nations forces plunged into Congo's election-related violence again on Friday, this time rescuing a politician who had been kidnapped by rivals.

The day before, several people were killed at a prison riot in Kinshasa, the capital, after a band of political prisoners escaped.

All across Kinshasa, United Nations troops are hunkered down behind sandbags or prowling the garbage-strewn streets in armored personnel carriers bristling with machine guns and water cannons.

This is the increasingly edgy atmosphere in the prelude to the runoff presidential election scheduled for Sunday. The United Nations has spent $500 million on the voting, saying that peace in Congo is crucial for peace in all of central Africa.

The incumbent president, Joseph Kabila, is favored to win, but his rival, Jean-Pierre Bemba, a businessman and rebel leader accused of war crimes, remains enormously popular in the capital. It is Mr. Bemba's supporters, legions of young, broke men, who are blamed for much of the violence.

In July, a few days before the first round of voting, Mr. Bemba's supporters burned a policeman to death at a rally. In August, Mr. Bemba's soldiers tangled with Mr. Kabila's troops in a downtown shootout that killed more than 20 people.

This week, Mr. Bemba's soldiers captured Nzanga Mobutu, the son of the former dictator Mobutu Sese Seko. On Thursday, Mr. Mobutu had been campaigning for Mr. Kabila in Gbadolite, a town in the west where support for Mr. Bemba is strong. When Mr. Mobutu and a contingent of armed guards showed up at a radio station owned by Mr. Bemba, a gun battle erupted, killing four people. Mr. Mobutu was not hurt, and after negotiations between the United Nations and Mr. Bemba's supporters on Friday morning, he was driven away in a United Nations tank.

Both camps accuse each other of intimidating voters. "Bemba's guys are determined to burn this country," said Kikaya bin Karubi, one of Mr. Kabila's top aides.

Mr. Bemba's supporters deny that.

"Don't believe anything Kabila's men tell you," said Oscar Kashala, an American-educated doctor who ran for president in July, lost and is now supporting Mr. Bemba. "Congolese politics have always had the color of deceit."

The country has had a dismal political history. King Leopold II of Belgium colonized it in the late 19th century to extract as much rubber and ivory as possible. His overseers were notorious for their use of the chicotte, a hippopotamus-hide whip that they cracked over Congolese backs.

That ended in 1960, when Belgium abruptly pulled out and granted Congo independence. A few years later, Mobutu Sese Seko, a young army colonel, seized power and soon metastasized into the caricature of an African dictator, building palaces and guzzling pink Champagne while his people starved. When Western support dried up, his power faded, and a former Marxist, Laurent D. Kabila, deposed Mr. Mobutu in 1997, leading to years of conflict. The fighting and chaos claimed countless lives — the International Rescue Committee estimated nearly four million.

It was only after Laurent Kabila was assassinated in 2001 and Joseph, his eldest son, took over, that the bloodshed lessened. Mr. Kabila forged a shaky peace with Congo's other warlords, including Mr. Bemba, who was named one of the country's four vice presidents.

Mr. Kabila, 35, spent much of his youth in Tanzania and trained as an army officer in China. Mr. Bemba, 44, is from one of the richest families in the country and was shipped off to Belgium for boarding school as a boy. He later went into business and then became a militia leader, and international human rights groups have accused him of encouraging his troops to brutalize civilians.

In the first round of voting, Mr. Kabila won overwhelmingly in the east, while Mr. Bemba did well in Kinshasa and the west. Mr. Kabila won 45 percent of the vote, compared with Mr. Bemba's 20 percent. International observers said the vote was mostly fair, though marred by logistical hiccups, standard fare in a country the size of western Europe with 60 million people and only 300 miles of paved roads.

Mobutu's Abduction Heightens Congo Election Tension (AP)

AP, October 27, 2006

KINSHASA, Congo (AP) -- An ally of Congo's president was on Friday evacuated from a town where he was held captive overnight by forces loyal to the opposition.

Nzanga Mobutu, son of late dictator Mobutu Sese Seko, had traveled Thursday to the northern town of Gbadolite to campaign for President Joseph Kabila. Clashes broke out between Mobutu's bodyguards and troops loyal to challenger Jean-Pierre Bemba.

A U.N.-supported radio station reported four people died in the violence.

DOJ_NMG_0088734

Bemba's forces captured Mobutu and kept him holed up overnight in a Bemba-owned radio station, U.N. spokesman Jean-Tobie Okala said.

"This morning they agreed to release him," Okala said Friday.

A U.N. tank picked Mobutu up from the radio station and took him to the airport, where he was flown back to the capital, Kinshasa, Okala said.

The incident increased tensions ahead of Sunday's runoff. Voters will choose the mineral-rich central African nation's first democratically elected leader in four decades.

Friday marked the last official day of campaigning, and caravans of Congolese shouting support for their candidates swept through Kinshasa.

Several demonstrators were injured in scuffles that broke out between rival marchers near the city's airport.

Bemba, an ex-rebel leader who is now one of the country's four vice presidents, canceled a rally planned for the day citing security concerns.

On Thursday at least two prisoners were killed in a riot in Kinshasa after authorities tightened restrictions following the escape of a dozen inmates convicted of involvement in the assassination of Kabila's father, President Laurent Kabila.

The runoff was required after no candidate won a simple majority during the first round July 30. Kabila finished with 45 percent, and Bemba was second with 20 percent.

In August, as first-round results trickled in showing Kabila with a firm lead, street battles erupted in Kinshasa between Kabila's troops and Bemba's guards that shook the city and lasted three days. The two sides battled with automatic weapons, heavy guns and tanks. At least 23 people died.

Bemba, 44, once ruled a vast patch of territory in northeastern Congo. He was backed by neighboring Uganda during Congo's 1998-2002 civil war, which drew in the armies of more than half a dozen African nations.

Kabila signed a peace deal with Bemba and other rebels that ended the fighting and reunited the country, and gave rebel leaders top jobs in a transitional government set up in 2003.

U.N. Study: Foreign Troops In Somalia Raise War Risk (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

NAIROBI, Oct. 27 -- Thousands of Ethiopian and Eritrean troops are in Somalia, backing opposing sides in the struggle for control of the country, according to a confidential U.N. paper. The involvement of the two rivals could set the stage for a regional war.

The U.N. report, dated Oct. 26, cites diplomatic sources in estimating that "between 6,000 and 8,000 Ethiopians and 2,000 fully equipped Eritrean troops are now inside Somalia supporting" the internationally recognized transitional government and the group known as the Council of Islamic Courts, respectively.

"Both sides in the Somali conflict are reported to have major outside backers -- the government supported by Ethiopia, Uganda and Yemen; the Islamic courts receiving aid from Iran, Libya, Saudi Arabia and Gulf States," the report added.

The transitional government and the Council of Islamic Courts have been girding for battle for weeks. Government forces have dug trenches near the western town of Baidoa, the only town the U.N.-backed government controls. The Islamic group has deployed forces at a strategic town between Baidoa and its headquarters in the Somali capital, Mogadishu.

Since taking Mogadishu in June, the Islamic fighters have extended their hold over much of southern Somalia.

Ethiopian officials have said they have only a few hundred military advisers assisting the government. The Somali transitional government has accused Eritrea of arming and supporting the Islamic group, a charge Eritrean and Islamic officials have denied.

The paper was written to help U.N. officials map a strategy on aid to Somalia, a severely impoverished country that has not had an effective central government since 1991.

Ethiopia and Eritrea fought a two-year border war that left tens of thousands of people dead and remains unresolved.

Foreign Troops Set Stage For War (WT/AP)

By Chris Tomlinson, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 28, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya -- Thousands of Ethiopian and Eritrean troops are in Somalia backing opposing sides in the struggle for control of the strategic country, according to a confidential U.N. briefing paper. The involvement of the two Horn of Africa rivals could set the stage for a regional war.

Islamic radicals, said by the United Nations to be backed by Eritrea, held rallies in several Somali cities calling for a holy war on Ethiopia and the internationally backed Somali government it supports.

DOJ_NMG_0088735

The U.N. report dated Oct. 26 and obtained yesterday, cites diplomatic sources in estimating that "between 6,000-8,000 Ethiopians and 2,000 fully equipped Eritrean troops are now inside Somalia supporting" the internationally recognized government and the Islamic group known as the Council of Islamic Courts, respectively.

"Both sides in the Somali conflict are reported to have major outside backers -- the government supported by Ethiopia, Uganda and Yemen; the Islamic courts receiving aid from Iran, Libya, Saudi Arabia and [Persian] Gulf states," the report added.

The transitional government and the Council of Islamic Courts have been girding for battle in recent weeks. Government forces, supported by Ethiopian military advisers, have been seen digging trenches near Baidoa, the only town the U.N.-backed government controls.

The Islamic courts have deployed forces at a strategic town between Baidoa and their headquarters in the Somali capital, Mogadishu, 150 miles to the southeast.

The military moves could be mere posturing ahead of peace talks scheduled for next week in Khartoum, Sudan, but most observers are pessimistic about the chances for an agreement and fear major fighting could follow if talks fail.

"Clearly the situation is rapidly deteriorating and an all-out war is possible," the report said.

Ethiopia and Eritrea fought a two-year border war that remains unresolved. The top U.S. diplomat to Africa, Jendayi Frazer, last week accused Eritrea of using Somalia to open a second front against Ethiopia.

In Washington on Thursday, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack called on Ethiopia and Eritrea not to further aggravate the situation.

"There are tensions between Ethiopia and Eritrea even removing Somalia from the equation. When you add Somalia into the equation, each of Ethiopia and Eritrea's various perceived equities with the various groups in Somalia, then it becomes very complex, a complex situation," he said.

The briefing paper was written to help senior U.N. officials map a strategy of how to provide aid to one of the most impoverished countries in the world, one that has not had an effective central government since 1991.

Geostrategy: China Strengthens Its Ties To Africa (WSJ)

By Shai Oster

The Wall Street Journal, October 28, 2006

Anyone wanting to find an African leader this coming week will need to book a ticket to Beijing.

The heads of all but five of the continent's 53 countries will descend on the Chinese capital for the biggest gathering of foreign leaders Beijing has ever hosted. The three-day summit will highlight a mushrooming trade relationship between the world's most populous country and its second-biggest continent that is stirring angst among some in Washington.

China's leadership is rolling out an enormous welcome for its African guests that hints at Beijing's grand ambitions for the relationship. The airport expressway flutters with hundreds of welcoming flags; billboards across the city have been covered with messages attesting to Sino-African friendship; and television stations are running specials on Africa tourism.

China's modern presence in Africa dates to the Cold War, when it sought to form "anti-imperialist" alliances there to block the U.S. and its allies. In recent years, the focus has changed to acquiring natural resources to fuel China's galloping economy. African oil currently accounts for a third of China's oil imports -- an amount that is likely to increase, as China is expected to become even more heavily reliant on foreign oil sources.

But China's trade relationship with Africa now goes well beyond oil and other natural resources. Africa also offers a largely untapped and underserved market for Chinese companies as they take steps toward becoming global players. Huawei Technologies Co., for example, China's leading telecommunications-equipment maker, has done a thriving business in Africa even as the company has struggled to penetrate more-developed markets.

China's total trade with Africa has ballooned to about $40 billion last year from $10 billion in 2000. Two-way trade rose 30% last year -- faster than China's overall foreign trade -- and Chinese officials expect it to increase at least 25% this year, to more than $50 billion. China now ranks as Africa's third-largest trading partner, behind the U.S. and France.

In Nigeria, Sudan, Angola and elsewhere, Beijing is seen as a more hands-off alternative to the West, which is increasingly imposing stringent environmental and social conditions on aid to African nations. World Bank President Paul Wolfowitz has publicly complained that Chinese banks ignore human-rights and environmental standards when lending in Africa.

But as the gala summit will demonstrate, China shows no sign of wanting to slow its burgeoning rapport with Africa. From Beijing's perspective, it can't afford to -- especially when it comes to oil. "China's options are limited," said Zhang Zhongxiang, a senior fellow at the East-West Center in Hawaii. "As a late entrant to the international oil game, China has little choice but to strike deals with what the U.S. and others call rogue states to secure oil supplies."

Lithuanians Are Given A Taste Of How Russia Plays The Oil Game (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0088736

By Andrew E. Kramer

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 27 — The Russian government has never been straightforward about its plans to take control of the oil and gas business.

So, Lithuanians were suspicious when Russia said it shut its pipeline — the only one supplying Russian crude oil — in late July because of a leak.

In fact, it was not so much the pipeline the Russians were concerned about, according to Lithuanian officials, analysts and company executives. It was what the pipeline was connected to: Lithuania's sole refinery.

And because Russia often gets what it wants, it may not matter that the Lithuanian government had signed an agreement in June to sell the refinery to a Polish company, PKN Orlen, for much more than Russia had offered.

"The goal was to force Lithuania to reconsider the sale," Tomas Janeliunas, deputy director of the Center for Strategic Studies who has followed the sale closely, said in an interview. "They wanted a Russian company to buy the refinery, but for cheaper than a market price."

Lithuania's brush with Kremlin oil politics, critics of Russian business practices say, is a case study of what Vice President Dick Cheney called Moscow's use of energy exports as "tools for intimidation and blackmail" in relations with its neighbors.

That characterization angered Russian officials, who say they are being discriminated against in the business world as many Russian companies expand their operations into Europe.

"What is all the hysteria about?" President Vladimir V. Putin asked at a meeting with German business executives recently, the Interfax news agency reported. "We cannot understand why the media is nervous about Russia's possible investments in Germany."

Russian companies, their accounts padded by high commodity prices, are on a buying spree overseas. A steel mill in Michigan, a pipeline in Germany and a mine in Australia have recently been sold to the Russian companies Severstal, Gazprom and Rusal, respectively.

In Lithuania, the government and Yukos, a company very much out of favor with the Kremlin, were trying to sell the Mazeikiu Nafta refinery in Lithuania in a sale organized by Lehman Brothers of New York.

Four companies bid: two from Russia, one from Kazakhstan and one from Poland. The Russian companies, Lukoil and TNK-BP, lost after entering bids lower than the others. When asked to match the competing prices, the Russians declined, Nerijus Eidukevicius, chairman of the board of Mazeikiu refinery, said in an interview in Vilnius.

In June, PKN Orlen won the refinery with a bid of $1.49 billion for Yukos's 53.7 percent stake and $850 million for the 30.6 percent owned by the Lithuanian government.

"They weren't showing interest," Mr. Eidukevicius said of the Russian companies. "It was strange."

In fact, analysts say, the Russian government was pursuing strategies to win the refinery for a Russian company outside the sale process — and at a knockdown price.

At the time of the sale, Yukos was heading into a politically tinged bankruptcy proceeding in Russia. Rosneft, the state oil company, whose chairman, Igor I. Sechin, is a former KGB agent and Mr. Putin's chief of staff, had already acquired most of Yukos in a forced auction in 2004, and had its sights on the rest.

To get to the front of the line for Yukos assets, Rosneft signed a confidential agreement with Western creditor banks in December 2005 to assume Yukos's debt if the banks forced that company into liquidation, which happened in March. This made Rosneft a creditor in the bankruptcy filing.

The Russian bankruptcy receiver representing Rosneft's claim, Eduard Rebgun, then sued in the federal Bankruptcy Court in New York and in the Netherlands to block the refinery sale, but lost both cases. That ended the legal attempts to win title to the refinery outside the sale run by Lehman Brothers.

In what Yukos executives say was a sign of the deep displeasure of the Russian government at these rulings, Russian prosecutors opened criminal fraud investigations against four Yukos executives. The announcement of these investigations came less than an hour after the decision in Amsterdam on Aug. 17.

The former chief executive of Yukos, Steven M. Theede, an American, called the Russian criminal case against him a "vendetta" that reflected the depth of frustration of Russian authorities at the collapse of their six-month effort to buy the Lithuanian refinery and other smaller Yukos assets in Slovakia and Switzerland.

"When anybody stops them from doing anything it makes them angry," Mr. Theede said.

Russia, meanwhile, suffered a setback of a different nature inside Lithuania, political analysts in that country say.

In the midst of the sale process, a pro-Russian politician in the Lithuanian government whose ministry was responsible for overseeing the refinery sale was ousted in a campaign finance scandal. The minister, Viktor Uspaskich, fled to Moscow and is now wanted by Interpol.

DOJ_NMG_0088737

The Russian government invited his replacement, Kestutis Dauksys, to a Kremlin meeting on May 23 with Dmitri A. Medvedev, a Russian deputy prime minister, according to Mr. Dauksys. The message, he said, was that the Russians truly wanted the refinery.

"He said the Russian government was interested in who buys Mazeikiu Nafta," Mr. Dauksys recalled in a telephone interview. "He said Russian companies are interested in buying it."

"They thought they could buy it at low cost, but that is not possible today," Mr. Dauksys said of the Russians. He returned to Vilnius.

Aleksandr Temerko, a former vice president of Yukos, said the company interpreted Mr. Dauksys's account of the meeting as a threat to Mazeikiu's Russian-controlled oil supply through the Druzhba pipeline.

The refinery immediately retooled for tanker oil, a decision that proved prescient; the first shipment arrived a week before the pipeline was shut.

The sales contract with PKN Orlen had an escape clause if the market value of the refinery dropped significantly before the sale closed. Lithuanian analysts and politicians said that forcing PKN Orlen to exercise this escape clause, thus reopening the sale for Russian companies, was one motive for the pipeline shutdown.

Then, on Oct. 12, a fire at the Mazeikiu refinery caused about $75 million in damage and lost profit for 2006, according to the Lithuanian government and the Fitch credit rating agency. The fire is expected to reduce output by 50 percent until early next year. While arson has not been ruled out, the Lithuanian news media have reported that the likely cause was a petroleum leak. A formal ruling is expected in November.

PKN Orlen, in a statement shortly after the fire, said it would discuss with its lenders whether the sale could go forward.

With his country's largest asset tied up in business negotiations, Russian style, Lithuania's president has hinted at possible reciprocation in kind.

President Valdas Adamkus suggested on Aug. 19 that the only Russian railroad supplying the Kaliningrad region, which passes through Lithuania, could be shut for what the Lithuanian news media called "political repairs."

"We should guarantee the safety of trains and passengers," Mr. Adamkus said, according to the Baltic News Service. "Should repairs be needed in order to increase the safety of railway services, I see no reason to heat up political tensions."

Backsliding In Europe (WP)

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

Democracies take time to mature, even inside the European Union.

HUNGARY'S commemoration of the 50th anniversary of a failed revolution against communist rule this week degenerated into rioting -- another signal that the democracy that now governs that Central European country is far from healthy. The Socialist prime minister has been under siege from the streets since he was caught admitting that his party lied "morning, noon and night" to win reelection in June. His right-wing opposition has been soft on the racists and extreme nationalists who are at the forefront of the disturbances.

The worse news is that Hungarian politics look pretty good compared with most of the other formerly communist countries of Central Europe. Slovakia, which a year ago was being lionized for its cutting-edge free-market policies, now is governed by a coalition of populists, authoritarians and racists who promise to dismantle the reforms. Poland's government is dominated by twin brothers serving as president and prime minister; their most notable acts have been insults to neighboring Germany and an assault on the independence of the country's central bank. The Czech Republic has had no real government at all since a deadlocked election five months ago. Bulgaria's president finds himself in a runoff election for a new term this weekend with a challenger known for insulting Muslims and Gypsies.

This dismal political picture is creating considerable unease in the European Union, which opened its doors to Poland, Hungary, Slovakia, the Czech Republic and four other former Communist states in 2004 and is due to admit Bulgaria and Romania in January. Some are wondering whether the nationalists and racists now on the fringes of several Central European governments could end up leading them in the future, rupturing the European Union's fundamental commitments to human rights. Others fret that repairing the union's frayed institutions after the rejection of a proposed constitution last year will be impossible with such unattractive and unstable partners -- and that any hope of further E.U. expansion will be lost.

In fact, the gloom seems overstated. Despite the political malaise, Central European countries are flourishingly economically, and their abundant workers and hungry entrepreneurs promise to revive Europe as a whole. The rise of populist and nationalist parties is in part a reaction to years of enforced consensus under previous governments that were trying to meet the European Union's myriad entry criteria. Once the finish line was crossed, a backlash against blending into a single transnational superstate was inevitable. The pendulum will swing back as the populists stumble.

DOJ_NMG_0088738

As Russia grows ever more aggressive toward its neighbors, the former Soviet satellites will probably respond by burrowing more deeply into the European Union and NATO. It may be satisfying for Polish nationalists to pretend that Germany is an antagonist or for Hungarians to try equating their current Socialist leaders with the Stalinists of 1956. Yet after 45 years of bitter experience under despotism, Central Europeans won't quickly abandon Western-style democracy or its alliances.

Africa Over A Barrel (WP)

By Abdoulaye Wade

The Washington Post, October 28, 2006

DAKAR, Senegal -- Although gasoline prices have dropped recently in the United States, many Americans continue to worry about the toll of oil dependence at the gas pump and on the U.S. economy. As an African, I feel their pain -- and then some. While the price of a barrel of crude has recently dipped below $60, oil still costs twice as much as it did three years ago -- and experts fully expect the price to climb higher.

President Bush, a one-time oilman, has warned Americans about the danger of a country's being "addicted to oil." Yet the toll of oil dependence in the United States pales beside the pain that soaring oil prices cause in Africa.

In sub-Saharan Africa, in particular, the oil crisis is not a vexing "cost crunch"; it is an unfolding catastrophe that could set back efforts to reduce poverty and promote economic development for years.

In the United States, working men and women fretted when gas prices topped $3 a gallon this year. Here in the capital of Senegal, gasoline costs $5.62 a gallon. Unlike the United States, we are not a rich nation. Imagine having to pay such an exorbitant price to fill up your tank -- but in a country where per capita income is $849 a year. Senegal's electrical utility has been forced to turn off the lights throughout the nation for long periods every day, a crippling problem that could be eased if energy cost less.

The math is not hard to do. Everywhere in West Africa, governments are being forced to reallocate lifeline budget subsidies to counterbalance unprecedented oil and electricity prices. Senegal's direct oil subsidies to domestic consumers have increased fivefold since 2002. Niger's fuel costs have quadrupled. Even in Africa's oil-producing nations, windfall profits from oil have failed to reduce poverty. Per capita income in Nigeria is still $1,400 a year.

If the price of crude oil reaches $100 a barrel within the next year -- as some analysts predict -- a pan-African disaster will be upon us. Richer, oil-producing countries in Africa risk being inundated with mass migrations of people seeking survival.

By draining government treasuries, the soaring price of oil in West African nations has made it all but impossible to proceed with antipoverty efforts, and it is hindering work to increase access to public health services and to reduce the spread of AIDS. It is true that man does not live by bread alone. But being freed from the daily necessities of survival is a prerequisite to educating the workforce and building an economy.

The oil shock wave is undermining American aims on the continent, too. As oil prices go into orbit, America's efforts to promote liberal democratic economies and combat terrorism in Africa are sabotaged. I write this as the head of state of a tolerant, pro-Western -- and predominantly Muslim -- nation.

What can be done? Part of the solution must come from Africa itself. This past summer in Dakar, I convened the first meeting of energy ministers from 13 nations to form the Pan-African Non-Petroleum Producers Association (PANPP), with the intention that it serve as a green version of OPEC. The members of PANPP aspire to become leaders in the field of biofuels and alternative energy strategies, following in Brazil's footsteps. But the development of a biofuel industry, particularly cellulosic biofuels made from agricultural wastes and prairie grasses (which President Bush touted in his State of the Union address) could take a decade or more to come to fruition. Africa needs help today.

As a stopgap measure, I propose that our organization ask African oil-producing nations, as well as the international community and major oil companies, to chip in from recent windfall profits to reduce the increase in oil prices that has taken place since 2003.

If ever there were a time when major oil companies such as ExxonMobil, Shell, Chevron, Total and BP could contribute to stabilizing West Africa by reducing the oil surcharge, it is today. As a champion of market economies, I can appreciate that companies do not easily part with profits. But the continued cost of the oil crisis in Africa could easily destabilize oil-producing nations and shrivel downstream markets for the oil companies elsewhere in the continent. It's in the interest not only of America but also the petroleum industry not to have an Africa in ruins.

The writer is president of the Republic of Senegal.

Stuck In The Canal (NYT)

By David Fromkin

The New York Times, October 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088739

FIFTY years ago tomorrow — on Oct. 29, 1956 — Israeli paratroops were dropped deep behind Egyptian lines in the Sinai peninsula, opening the way for the ground troops that followed. In a lightning campaign lasting less than five days, the Israelis took control of the entire peninsula. The Israelis had a rendezvous at the Suez Canal with the armed forces of Britain and France. But the British and French stopped short of their goal. Like out of shape ex-champions attempting a comeback, the Europeans were unable to get past the first round in their effort to return to the Middle East.

The Suez crisis was a divide in the history of the Middle East. It was the moment when America pushed out the Europeans and then tried to take their place — and the reverberations are still felt today. The road that led to Suez began in 1947, when the British Foreign Office notified the American Department of State that Britain could no longer afford to hold its positions in Greece and Turkey against pressure from Russia. Soon the United States was engaged in an effort to hold the line against Russia — there, but also all around the world.

The Middle East was essential to this policy of containment. The Arabic-speaking Muslim world had been taken in hand by Britain and France after the First World War, and though they had since achieved independence, the countries of the Middle East remained predominantly Western-influenced. European and American oil companies played an important role in Middle Eastern affairs. Britain retained a presence at the strategically vital Suez Canal in the form of a major military base and a garrison of more than 80,000 men. Not until the autumn of 1954 did Britain agree to withdraw from this installation.

The United States had always deplored European — especially British — imperialism. In the First World War, President Woodrow Wilson seemingly hesitated as to which side to join (or whether to at all), and in the end joined Britain and France only as an "associated power" rather than as an ally, thus making clear that our country did not share the goals of the other belligerents — goals that Wilson claimed were imperialistic.

As the United States accepted the responsibility, therefore, of defending the Middle East against possible Soviet aggression, its government was conflicted. In the interest of cold war containment, the United States should have wanted to shore up whatever remained of British and French presence and power in the Middle East, but at the same time the worry was that any association with the Europeans would drag America down.

As early as 1952, the C.I.A. was searching for an Arab leader to support, someone who would make hard, unpopular decisions. Recognizing that such a leader could be expected to have an agenda of his own, the agency needed him to take the lead in defending against Soviet expansionism.

Initially Allen Dulles, director of central intelligence, proposed Gamal Abdel Nasser, the emerging Egyptian dictator. John Foster Dulles, Allen's brother and the secretary of state, agreed. But it soon became evident that Nasser had little or no interest in fighting communism or the Soviet Union. A charismatic figure, he aimed to unite the Arab peoples, and he exploited resentment of Western imperialism to win support. Secretary Dulles then turned to create an alternative anti-Soviet force: the Baghdad Pact, a northern-tier alliance of Turkey, Iran, Iraq and Pakistan. The only Arab state in the lot was Iraq, led by its pro-British prime minister, Nuri as-Said, who was widely perceived as the Anglo-American candidate for leadership of the Arab world, and as such the rival of Nasser.

In putting Nuri as-Said up, Secretary Dulles had in effect challenged Nasser to a duel. Nasser, a military man whose objective was to build his army, showed his independence of the West by ordering arms in large quantity from the Soviet bloc. Dulles took this at first as a bluff; then, when he could not stop it, he took it as a mortal insult — but he floundered, unable to find the right reply.

He offered to finance the Egyptian leader's favorite project: the Aswan High Dam. Then, puzzlingly, he canceled the offer, apparently intending to humiliate Nasser publicly. The Egyptian trumped that. He nationalized the Suez Canal, transferring to Egypt the shares of the company that owned it. Nasser announced that Egypt would finance the dam itself, using the income from the canal. This bold move was a public challenge to Britain, the canal's biggest user and shareholder, and to France, which had created the canal in the 19th century.

President Dwight D. Eisenhower and Secretary Dulles believed that Nasser should be overthrown — some day. Repeatedly they told the British and French that it would be a mistake to use force, at least at the moment. But Britain and France were already planning how they might use force. Frenchmen imagined that Algeria's revolt against them, launched in 1954, was inspired by Nasser, and that without him it would collapse. Britons found themselves losing control of Jordan because of Nasser, and believed that without him they could regain control.

There was more to it. The Western leaders had irrationally come to regard Nasser as dangerous, a Hitler or a Mussolini. Prime Minister Anthony Eden of Britain was typical: a Foreign Office Arabist by background who moved in circles where it was felt that Arabs loved Englishmen, Eden believed that Nasser had somehow stolen that love. It was Nasser, he thought, who had taken away Jordan's famed Arab Legion from its British officers. "I want him killed," Eden said. So for months the allies had been conspiring. They would return to the Middle East, and they would invade Egypt. The confiscation of the canal company spurred them into action.

DOJ_NMG_0088740

Eden, Prime Minister Guy Mollet of France and his foreign secretary, Christian Pineau, joined by a number of colleagues, hatched a plot based on an earlier plan for France and Israel to act together, and in which Britain now joined. In October 1956, Israel attacked Egypt through Sinai and drove to Suez. Britain and France then invaded, occupying the canal and claiming to be separating the Egyptian and Israeli Armies. The British, French and Israelis stuck to their prefabricated story, but their collusion was evident; soon they had to admit the truth.

The Americans had been kept in the dark, and they took it personally. Eisenhower in particular was angered by British wartime colleagues who had lied and deceived him. "What does Anthony think he is doing?" Eisenhower demanded. "Why is he doing this to me?" He refused to listen to excuses, claiming that "nothing justified double-crossing the United States."

The Soviet leader, Nikita Khrushchev, grandstanded, threatening the Western imperialists. That enabled him to take credit for stopping the Europeans — even though it really was America that did it. The United States acted quietly but effectively. The Treasury Department threatened to withdraw support of the British currency unless the British Army left Egypt. Within 10 days, England would have collapsed financially. The British — and the invasion — stopped. To keep from being thought imperialists, the Eisenhower administration saved Nasser. The Suez crisis was over.

Britain and France had gone to war in order to keep their empires; instead, they lost them. The United States had aimed to keep Russia out of the Middle East, but the Suez crisis, and Khrushchev's rhetoric, brought the Russians in. Eisenhower and Dulles believed that by their actions at Suez they were showing the nonaligned nations that, unlike the British and French, Americans were not imperialists — but the third world remained unconvinced. And in Europe, skeptics claimed the episode showed that the Americans intended to steal the empires of Britain and France.

Britain and France drew opposite conclusions from the Suez experience. Britain noted that it was dependent on the United States and would, for the most part, have to act accordingly and follow wherever America led. France decided that the United States would not protect France's interests, and immediately, under Guy Mollet, began to build the atomic bomb — the result of American policy.

Israel compromised itself through its partnership with European imperialism — providing evidence to enemies who had asserted all along that Israel was no more than a European imperialist itself. And its victory in the Sinai campaign — one of many dazzling triumphs — illustrated the paradox that the more Israel won on the battlefield, the further it got from achieving the peace that it sought.

THE undoing of the British-French-Israeli alliance was that it rested on a lie. It is difficult to re-create the shock felt around the world when it became apparent that these supposedly honorable countries, and the principled statesmen who led them, would stoop to such a ridiculous fabrication. It was disgraceful: that they lied, and that the lie was so childish.

Scenarios had been prepared at various levels of the American government in the event that the Europeans acted against the Nasser regime. So far as I know, none of them envisaged the United States intervening to stop them. Had the allies fully and honestly informed Washington of their intentions, either the Eisenhower administration would have persuaded them to adopt an alternative strategy, or the allies would have convinced Washington to let them go ahead, or the United States would have explained to London how America's control of the British currency gave it a veto power over British policy. One way or another, America's angry reaction would have been avoided.

Though it cannot be proved, the lies of the allies weakened their cause in another important way. It outraged public opinion in France and, especially, Britain. A message was delivered: decision-makers in European governments were on notice that they no longer were free to initiate colonial wars.

The Europeans, to their credit, understood the message. Within years of the Suez crisis, Britain and France began decolonization programs in which they released territories they had held around the world. The winds of change had begun to blow — and they had come from Suez.

DOJ_NMG_0088741

Miller, Charles S

From: Miller, Charles S
Sent: Monday, October 30, 2006 12:01 PM
To: Agarwal, Asheesh (CRT); Ames, Andrew; Battaglia, John T; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Beckner, Rick (CIV); Blomquist, Kathleen M; Branda, Joyce (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Davis, Dan (CIV); Davis, Deborah J; Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Gunn, Currie (SMO); Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory; Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); McDonald, Esther Slater; McMahon, Linda M (CIV); Miller, Charles S; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John (USAEO); O'Quinn, John C; Osborn, Tara (CIV); Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Shaw, Aloma A; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 10/30/06 Civil Division News

ACLU drops suit against Patriot Act

Man's transfer to Iraq death row delayed

U.S. hasn't said sorry to Arar, but Ottawa says it's satisfied

Religious suit dismissed against Air Force

'Partial-birth' cases test abortion rights' limits; Central question facing justices: Is procedure medically necessary?

Supermax inmate wins lawsuit over correspondence restrictions

Raytheon Faults Marine Corps Cost Evaluation in GAO Bid Protest

AP

October 28, 2006

ACLU drops suit against Patriot Act

DETROIT (AP) - The American Civil Liberties Union on Friday dropped a lawsuit challenging the constitutionality of the USA Patriot Act.

The ACLU said it was withdrawing the lawsuit filed more than three years ago because of "improvements to the law." The Justice Department argued last month that amendments approved by Congress in March 2006 had corrected any constitutional flaws in the Patriot Act.

"While the reauthorized Patriot Act is far from perfect, we succeeded in stemming the damage from some of the Bush administration's most reckless policies," Ann Beeson, associate legal director of the ACLU in New York, said in a written statement.

The lawsuit, filed in July 2003 on behalf of the Muslim Community Association of Ann Arbor and five other nonprofit groups, was the first legal challenge to Section 215, the part of the Patriot Act that lets federal agents obtain such things as library records and medical information.

The ACLU said the revisions allow people receiving demands for records to consult with a lawyer and challenge the demands in court.

The Justice Department, which first asked that the lawsuit be dismissed in December 2003, said it was pleased by the ACLU's action, which was contained in a one-paragraph notice filed with U.S. District Judge Denise Page Hood in Detroit.

"We ... reiterate that the Patriot Act is a legitimate and important tool that has better helped law enforcement fight terrorism while simultaneously protecting our valued civil liberties," Justice spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said.

END

AP

October 28, 2006

Man's transfer to Iraq death row delayed

WASHINGTON - A federal appeals court said Friday that the military may not turn an American citizen over to Iraqi officials to face the death penalty until the Supreme Court can hear his case.

The Supreme Court's decision in the case will help decide what rights American citizens have when detained by U.S. military forces overseas.

Mohammad Munaf was convicted and sentenced to death by an Iraqi judge this month on charges he helped in the 2005 kidnapping of three Romanian journalists in Baghdad.

Munaf, who was born in Iraq and became an American citizen in 2000, asked a U.S. judge not to let the military transfer him. He claimed his trial was flawed and his confession was coerced.

Those would normally be grounds for American citizens to challenge their imprisonment. But U.S. District Judge Royce Lamberth said this month that he had no authority to intervene because Munaf was being held by coalition military forces, not by the U.S. military alone.

The U.S. Appeals Court for the District of Columbia Circuit also declined to step in but said Friday that the military must give Munaf 10 days to appeal to the Supreme Court and wait for the court to rule before transferring him.

END

Globe and Mail

October 30, 2006

U.S. hasn't said sorry to Arar, but Ottawa says it's satisfied

SIMON TUCK

From Monday's Globe and Mail

OTTAWA — Ottawa says it's “satisfied” with the U.S. response to Canada's protest about the handling of torture victim Maher Arar, even though the letter written by U.S. Secretary of State Condoleeza Rice contains no apology for the deportation that led to a harrowing year in a Syrian jail as a suspected al-Qaeda terrorist.

Dan Dugas, a spokesman for Foreign Affairs Minister Peter MacKay, said yesterday that the federal government is happy with the substance of the letter, received last week just a couple of weeks after Ottawa wrote to Washington to mark its official protest of Mr. Arar's deportation.

The letter from Ms. Rice assures Canada that the United States is committed to informing and consulting Ottawa about any Canadian citizen who may be involuntarily sent to any third country. Those principles are consistent with the Monterrey Protocol, a 2004 agreement between the two countries.

Mr. Dugas, who has seen the letter from Ms. Rice, confirmed that the document contains no apology from the United States to Canada or to Mr. Arar.

“We are satisfied with the content of the reply.”

But Lorne Waldman, Mr. Arar's lawyer, said he finds it “very disturbing” that Ottawa is satisfied despite the lack of contrition on the part of the Americans, saying Ms. Rice's letter achieves nothing for Canada or Mr. Arar.

“It's very disturbing that they're satisfied with the content when there's no apology,” he said. “If they're going to be satisfied with that, there's really no point.”

In Washington, a spokeswoman for the State Department would not comment yesterday on the matter, saying she wasn't able to confirm or deny reports about Ms. Rice's letter.

Mr. Arar, an Ottawa engineer at the time, was arrested in a New York airport in September, 2002. Citing information from unspecified foreign agencies, the United States deemed him an al-Qaeda terrorist and sent him to a Syrian jail.

He was freed about a year later only after public protests and a written appeal from former prime minister Jean Chrétien to Syria's president.

Following an inquiry into the case, Justice Dennis O'Connor recommended that Canada lodge an official protest with the United States. Ms. Rice's letter was in response to that protest. The inquiry concluded that Mr. Arar had been wronged by his own government, the RCMP and the United States.

Liberal MP Dan McTeague said the Conservatives talk frequently about their record in improving Canada's relationship with the United States, but can't get a simple apology from Washington for such a clear wrong.

“Perhaps it's time for them to put that to the test and call in a chit,” Mr. McTeague said. “I think that's the least Mr. Arar deserves.”

The NDP has charged that the U.S. broke its own law in its handling of Mr. Arar.

“By law, the United States was obligated to return Maher Arar to Canada, as he requested,” NDP MP Alexa McDonough said last month. “As well, the U.S. should have informed Canadian officials of [Mr.] Arar's deportation. By doing neither, the U.S. broke its own laws.”

Public Safety Minister Stockwell Day said last month that Ottawa has also removed the names of Mr. Arar, his wife, Monia Mazigh, and their two children, from any lookout list and has suggested that the United States may wish to do the same.

Mr. Arar, now living with his family in Kamloops, B.C. where he is working on a PhD program in computer science, could not be reached yesterday for comment.

END

AP

October 30, 2006

Religious suit dismissed against Air Force

By LARA JAKES JORDAN
Associated Press writer

WASHINGTON -- A federal judge on Friday threw out a lawsuit against the Air Force Academy that claimed evangelical Christian values were being illegally pushed on cadets.

The academy's critics said the decision by senior U.S. District Judge James A. Parker in Albuquerque, N.M., would likely be appealed.

The high-profile case was brought by a group of Air Force Academy graduates who charged that a military chaplain violated their religious freedom rights by urging cadets to attend Christian services or face being burned "in the fires of hell." That incident reflected a broader policy, the group charged, of efforts to evangelize U.S. Air Force staff.

But Parker, in a 16-page decision, said the graduates could not claim their First Amendment rights were violated since they no longer attended the Academy. Moreover, the group failed to give specific examples of which cadets were harmed, or when.

"Without that personal link or connection to future misconduct, plaintiffs have simply not shown that they will suffer an injury in fact that is both concrete and particularized and actual or imminent," Parker wrote.

The judge also rejected claims by Air Force Master Sgt. Phillip T. Burleigh, who asked to be included in the lawsuit after allegedly being discriminated against in 1997 for not attending prayer meetings. Burleigh, of Alamogordo, N.M., also claimed his supervisor used government resources to evangelize recruits, including hiring religious motivational speakers to lecture at mandatory-attendance conferences.

Parker called Burleigh's concerns "simply conjectural and hypothetical in nature."

Last year, an Air Force task force concluded there was no overt religious discrimination at the school but that some cadets and staff were insensitive. And in a step welcomed by conservative Christians, the Air Force in February released new guidelines for religious expression that dropped cautions to top officers about promoting their personal religious views.

The lawsuit was brought by Mikey Weinstein, of Albuquerque, an Air Force Academy honors graduate who could not be immediately reached for comment Friday. But the Rev. Barry W. Lynn of the Washington-based Americans United for Separation of Church and State said he expected the graduates to appeal the decision.

"These were very serious, systematic violations of the Constitution at the Air Force Academy," Lynn said. "This is clearly not the end of the story. … Chaplains and officers are there to meet spiritual needs, and not to convert people to Christianity."

An Air Force Academy spokeswoman did not have an immediate comment.

END

USA Today

10/30/06

'Partial-birth' cases test abortion rights' limits; Central question facing justices: Is procedure medically necessary?

By Joan Biskupic
USA TODAY

NEW YORK — It was just after Mother's Day in May 2003 when Ilene Jaroslaw, about four months pregnant, learned that the fetus she was carrying had a fatal spinal cord and brain defect.

Jaroslaw, then a mother of two, says she was devastated but decided immediately to have an abortion. Because she wanted to have another child — and because she had had two previous cesarean-section deliveries and an unrelated surgery on her uterus — she agreed with her doctor's recommendation to undergo a procedure that would do as little damage as possible to the uterus.

"There was absolutely no hope at all," says Jaroslaw, a 43-year-old lawyer in New York City who talked with USA TODAY about her experience. "This baby was not going to survive long."

For Jaroslaw, having what Congress and critics of the procedure call a "partial-birth" abortion was an intensely personal health decision that led to a happier ending: In 2004, she got pregnant again and delivered a healthy baby girl.

The episode also made Jaroslaw a symbol of the ongoing debate over whether Congress' effort to ban "partial-birth" abortion violates a woman's right to end a pregnancy — a question that goes before the Supreme Court on Nov. 8. Under a federal law passed by Congress in October 2003 and tied up in the courts ever since, Jaroslaw could not legally have undergone the procedure because her life was not in danger.

Jaroslaw's reasons for having the procedure — to preserve her ability to have more children by avoiding the hemorrhaging and perforation of the uterus that can occur with other abortion methods — would not have cleared the legal hurdle set by Congress.

That's partly why the pair of cases that come before the Supreme Court next week are widely viewed as a major test of efforts to restrict abortion. The issue is not the fundamental question of whether abortion should be legal, first established by the court's ruling in Roe v. Wade in 1973. Instead, the cases test the Republican-led Congress' power to limit the reach of that ruling by restricting medical options for women.

The law is called the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003. Lawyers for the two challengers now before the Supreme Court, Eve Gartner of Planned Parenthood and Priscilla Smith of the Center for Reproductive Rights, note that there is no medical procedure known by that name and contend that the phrase is needlessly offensive and misleading.

On a more technical level, the cases put on exhibit dueling medical opinions over whether certain second-trimester abortion procedures are ever necessary.

For the court, the cases — Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood Federation of America and Gonzales v. Carhart — represent the first significant test of whether abortion rights in America will change now that moderate Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a key vote in favor of such rights, has retired.

Six years ago, when the justices struck down state bans on "partial-birth" abortions because the laws did not include exceptions for when a woman's health was at risk, O'Connor cast the decisive fifth vote on the ideologically divided, nine-member court. Last term, she was replaced by Samuel Alito, a more conservative judge who, as a member of a lower court, voted for abortion restrictions that O'Connor later rejected.

The federal ban — which is similar to the state laws voided by the high court six years ago — has been rejected by three sets of U.S. district courts and appeals courts. The lower courts said Congress' ban violates women's rights to abortion because it lacks a health exception and is too vaguely written.

The lower court judgments conflict with Congress' assertion that "partial-birth" procedures are never the best option to preserve a woman's health.

"This is an excellent case to test the direction of the court on abortion rights," Georgetown University law professor Randy Barnett says.

Abortion rights groups such as Planned Parenthood say Jaroslaw and thousands of women like her personify the need to preserve the second-trimester procedures known in the medical community as "intact dilation and evacuation" (or intact D&E) and "dilation and extraction" (D&X).

The methods involve dilating a woman's cervix to allow most of the fetus to emerge into the vagina intact, rather than dismembering the fetus in the uterus by using forceps and other instruments. In the intact method, a doctor then suctions out the fetus' brain to collapse the head and allow delivery.

The American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists has reported that such methods increasingly are viewed as the safest abortion procedures for the second trimester of pregnancy, roughly the 13th to 26th weeks of gestation.

Second-trimester procedures account for about 11% of the estimated 1.3 million abortions performed in the USA each year, according to the Guttmacher Institute, a research group that supports abortion rights. It's unclear, however, how many of those abortions are done with the intact D&E or D&X methods because no one keeps a precise count.

The Bush administration, in defending the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003, has argued in court papers that Congress had solid grounds to believe that any procedure in which a doctor "partially delivers a (living) fetus intact … and then kills the fetus" is never medically necessary.

The government is appealing a ruling by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit, in a case begun by Planned Parenthood, and a ruling by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 8th Circuit, in a case started by Nebraska physician LeRoy Carhart.

U.S. Solicitor General Paul Clement has told the justices that the "gruesome" procedure "resembles infanticide."

Clement has said Congress' ban is not unconstitutional because there are alternative methods of second-trimester abortions that would remain legal. Those include a standard D&E procedure in which a doctor dismembers the fetus in the uterus, and another method known as "induction," in which a woman is given drugs that cause her to go into labor and deliver the fetus.

Groups filing briefs in support of the administration include the American Association of Pro Life Obstetricians and Gynecologists. The association argues that such alternative methods are medically appropriate even for women such as Jaroslaw with uterine scarring from a prior cesarean section or other uterine surgery.

Elizabeth Shadigian, a physician affiliated with the University of Michigan's medical school who is president of the pro-life group, says there is little evidence to suggest that "partial-birth" methods are better in preserving a woman's health.

"There is almost no data on it," Shadigian says. "It's not good enough that someone believes it's better. You have to prove it's better." She said women should wait until studies are done on "the long-term effects of the procedure."

In court filings, Planned Parenthood counsel Gartner says that if Congress' ban is allowed to take effect, doctors would not be able to give their patients the best medical care.

Physicians would be "chilled from continuing to provide these procedures, … (and) women's liberty will be infringed and their right to choose abortion unduly burdened," Gartner says.

She also notes that the records from the cases now before the Supreme Court show several instances in which women suffering from serious medical conditions or carrying fetuses with severe anomalies would benefit from the intact D&E procedure.

"Even for women whose health condition is not compromised, intact D&E is a significantly safer method of abortion," Gartner says.

Clement acknowledges in his filings that physicians disagree over the necessity for the intact D&E and D&X methods. However, he insists that the justices must defer to Congress' finding that "there is substantial evidence … that partial-birth abortion is never" medically necessary.

Jaroslaw, a graduate of Harvard College and of Georgetown Law School, says she came forward to speak about her abortion because "the issues aren't as simple as people think. Nobody in advance of a diagnosis says, 'I want that procedure.' What people want is proper medical care."

Jaroslaw, a native of Flushing, N.Y., married a fellow lawyer, David, in 1992. She gave birth to a boy in 1997 and a girl in 1999. She says the children were delivered by cesarean section because she previously had uterine fibroids and other gynecological problems.

Jaroslaw says that when she became pregnant in 2003, everything looked good in early tests. "So we tell our families I'm pregnant. We tell friends. A few weeks after that, I tell people at work. I wasn't worried."

About 17 weeks into the pregnancy, however, a sonogram showed that part of her fetus' brain was missing. The diagnosis was anencephaly, which is fatal.

Jaroslaw says she and her husband considered abortion the only option. She says she did not want to wait a full nine months to deliver a child that would not survive.

"The idea of being pregnant for so many more months and having people ask about the baby, it would have been a nightmare," Jaroslaw says. She was also concerned that her children would be traumatized by having their sibling be born and die. She says she talked with her rabbi, and he supported her choice.

Jaroslaw says her desire for a third child led her doctor to recommend that she have the fetus removed intact, to avoid trauma to her uterus. "When you've had so many cuts in the uterus, you want as little instrumentation and probing around as possible."

Coincidentally, she underwent the abortion as Congress was debating its ban on "partial-birth" abortion. "I asked my doctor whether, if the bill passed, the procedure I was about to have would be illegal," Jaroslaw says. "He said yes."

Bush signed the bill into law in November 2003.

“I'm a family person,” Jaroslaw says. “I don't think I'm unique in my situation, except that I will talk about it. When I went back to work, people opened up to me with their own stories.”

So how might the Supreme Court — with Alito and Chief Justice John Roberts, who replaced the late William Rehnquist last year — view the most recent attempt to restrict abortion?

The “partial-birth” cases arrive at the court at a time when few Americans — 15% in a Gallup Poll in May — believe abortion should be banned in all circumstances. That poll, typical of nationwide surveys, found that most Americans (53%) believe that abortion should be legal but with restrictions.

The high court generally has reflected that sentiment since Roe v. Wade, upholding abortion rights while opening the door to limits. The current cases could provide a hint of whether greater restrictions might be imposed with the new justices on the bench. However, a veteran justice — Reagan appointee Anthony Kennedy — is more likely to be the key player.

In 2000, when the court voted 5-4 to strike down state bans on “partial-birth” abortion that lacked an exception for cases in which a woman's health was at risk, the bench was deeply divided. Kennedy, who had provided a crucial fifth vote in 1992 when the justices affirmed abortion rights, bitterly dissented in 2000. He said government should be free to outlaw the “abhorrent” procedure and that states had a legitimate “concern for the life of the unborn and for the partially born.” This time, a big question will be whether Kennedy, a frequent swing vote on the court, still supports a ban on the procedure without a health exception.

If he does, the court's reshaped conservative wing — Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, along with newcomers Roberts and Alito — could be positioned to uphold Congress' ban. Scalia and Thomas consistently have voted against abortion rights. Roberts' record as a lawyer in the Reagan and first Bush administrations and Alito's rulings as a lower court judge suggest that they also are likely to take a limited view of such rights.

END

AP

October 29, 2006

Supermax inmate wins lawsuit over correspondence restrictions

DENVER_An inmate at the nation's most secure prison has won a lawsuit challenging the Bureau of Prisons' restrictions on the types of reading materials inmates are allowed to receive by mail.

Mark Jordan, 30, who is expected to be released in 2048 from the Supermax prison for bank robbery and the June 1999 stabbing death of a fellow inmate at the U.S . Penitentiary in Florence, sued the agency in 2003, claiming his rights were violated when certain materials he was sent by mail were denied to him.

He claimed a 2003 prison regulation was unconstitutional, and on Thursday, U.S\l "l". District Judge Phillip Figa agreed, saying it was too broad.

Jordan sued\l "l" after prison officials refused to deliver to him an Internet printout of a 120-page series of essays titled "Justice Denied." He said he and other inmates do not have access to the Internet, and receiving the printouts was the only way he could read the material. He also was refused mail containing photocopies of magazine articles and newspaper clippings.

Prison officials said the materials were kept from Jordan under the 2003 regulation, which prohibited inmates from receiving soft-cover publications unless they were sent directly from the publisher, a book club or a book store.

Figa said under standards established by the U.S. Supreme Court, the 2003 regulation was unconstitutional. Earlier this year, the regulation was changed to allow inmates to receive newspaper or magazine clippings from noncommercial sources if a review determined the pose no threat to security.

"The evidence presented establishes that such items are no more likely to serve as vehicles for the introduction of contraband into the prison than handwritten letters of similar length," Figa wrote. "The regulation ... does not meet the (Supreme Court's standards) and is thus arbitrary and capricious based on the administrative record."

He said unbound pages such as clippings, photocopies or Internet printouts should be treated the same as personal letters and other mail inmates are allowed to receive.

The case is No. 03CV2320.

END

Inside the Navy

October 30, 2006

Raytheon Faults Marine Corps Cost Evaluation in GAO Bid Protest

Raytheon is accusing the Marine Corps of failing to accept the least expensive bid in a competition to develop thermal imaging systems, according to a protest filed with the Government Accountability Office.

Though Raytheon filed the protest Sept. 27, the details were kept under wraps until Inside the Navy recently obtained a redacted version of the document. Raytheon's protest objects to the Marine Corps' decision to take away a contract and award it instead to L-3 Communications.

L-3's Cincinnati Electronics (L-3CE) division won the contract Sept. 18 as a result of its own protest against the Marine Corps, which was filed in July with GAO.

The contract is for the development of thermal imaging systems for amphibious assault vehicles (AAVs).

As per federal regulations, the Marine Corps issued a stop-work order Sept. 28 to L-3 after Raytheon filed its GAO protest, according to Marine Corps Systems Command spokeswoman Dedra Jones. On Oct. 11, the service "partially lifted" the stop-work order, also in accordance with federal law, "based upon the urgent and compelling requirement for these sights in direct support for our Marines in Iraq and Marines preparing to deploy to Iraq," she said.

Raytheon filed a lawsuit Oct. 18 with the U.S. Federal Court\l "l" of\l "l" Federal\l "l" Claims\l "l". The lawsuit challenges the service's decision to partially lift the stop-work order, according to an Oct. 25 company statement. Partially lifting the order places a limit on "the remedies available to GAO on the meritorious protest" filed earlier by Raytheon, according to the company.

"Raytheon believes that the GAO should be able to draw on its full range of options to assure the Marine Corps receives the best value in response to its [request for proposals]," the statement says.

The parties agreed to hold oral arguments for the court case Nov. 13.

Details of Raytheon's Protest

Raytheon continues to contest the Marine Corps' contract decision through the GAO bid protest process.

The protest argues the Marine Corps' dismissal of Raytheon's proposal was unreasonable because Raytheon's offer was less expensive than L-3's. Raytheon does not disclose the value of its bid in the redacted version of its protest, but L-3's previous protest says Raytheon's bid was around $35 million. According to Raytheon's protest, L-3 bid around $49 million.

Raytheon argues the Marine Corps emphasized in its solicitation that staying close to the service's $35 million cost estimate for the project was important.

Raytheon speculates that the Marine Corps selected L-3's proposal even though it was more expensive because L-3's proposal had a "singular feature" that gave the proposal a "perceived advantage." The public version of Raytheon's protest redacts a description of this "singular feature."

Possibly, this "singular feature" is the cooling system employed in L-3's technology. Raytheon's protest indicates that "L-3 proposed a more expensive cooled system, while Raytheon proposed a less expensive uncooled system."

Another possibility for this "singular feature" is the prism system that L-3 proposed as part of its technology. Raytheon's proposal instead relied on a mirror, according to L-3. In its July 21 protest, L-3 argued that its technology was superior to Raytheon's because a mirror system could not produce an image in the conditions specified by the Marine Corps.

Whatever this "singular feature" is, Raytheon argues that even though L-3's technology had a "perceived advantage" over Raytheon's, the service should not have accepted L-3's proposal because both price and technical capability were significant factors.

"Price is the second most important of the four Factors, and the entire Technical Capability Factor is only 'more important' than Price (not 'significantly' more important as is common in many solicitations)," Raytheon writes. "The RFP also stated that 'the importance of cost as a factor in the final determination will increase with the degree of equality in the overall technical merit of the proposals.'"

Raytheon also notes that although L-3 gave a bid of $49 million for its work, the actual published dollar value of the contract is around $35 million and the Marine Corps could not purchase all of L-3's systems for this amount.

"In other words, the only way the [Marine Corps] can purchase the systems from L-3CE is to reduce the quantity it will purchase, and thus place more Marines at risk by installing improved thermal sights on fewer AAVs," Raytheon writes.

Additionally, Raytheon argues that there is no way that L-3 could produce its technology in its declared estimate of $49 million. The actual cost of L-3's technology would be higher, Raytheon says.

Raytheon also contends that L-3's technology could not produce an image in certain situations and fails to meet some reliability requirements.

Also, Raytheon argues that the Marine Corps' decision to take corrective action in response to L-3's protest was improper. Raytheon indicates that the service's decision "to take correction action was highly prejudicial to Raytheon, because Raytheon's price and significant aspects of its technical solution had been disclosed to L-3CE during evaluation testing (in some cases, improperly disclosed) and at its debriefing."

As possible remedies, Raytheon requests that GAO make one of several recommendations. GAO should either recommend that the Marine Corps reissue the contract to Raytheon, open the competition again or at least award Raytheon its bid and proposal costs, Raytheon says. -- Chris Johnson

END

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, October 31, 2006 9:02 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Tuesday, October 31, 2006
Attachments:	agnb061031.pdf; agnb061031.doc

This morning's Attorney General's News Briefing is attached.

Website: You can also read today's briefing, including searchable archive of past editions, at http://www.BulletinNews.com/justice.

Full-text Links: Clicking the hypertext links in our write-ups will take you to the newspapers' original full-text articles.

Interactive Table of Contents: Clicking a page number on the table of contents page will take you directly to that story.

Contractual Obligations and Copyright: This copyrighted material is for the internal use of US Department of Justice employees only and, by contract, may not be redistributed without BulletinNewsâ€™ express written consent.

Contact Information: Please contact us any time at 703-749-0040 or Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com. Use of this email address will automatically result in your message being delivered to everyone involved with your service, including senior management. Thank you.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, OCTOBER 31, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

US Unable To Secure Pakistani Arrest Of Al Qaeda Anthrax Expert....3
"Terror Kingpin" To Be Deported From UK To Algeria After US Drops Extradition Request....4
Padilla Seeks Dismissal Of Charges Claiming Torture While In Detention....4
Judge Refuses To Dismiss NYC Material Support Of Terrorism Trial....4
Colorado Lawmakers Seek Supermax Improvements....4
Distribution Of DHS Firefighting Grants Criticized....5

Homeland Response:

FBI Confirms Search Of Student's House Over Fake Boarding Pass Site....5
JetBlue Flight Diverted Over Unruly Passenger....5
Democrats Plan Homeland Security Investigations Should They Win A Majority....6

War News:

Cheney Suggests Terrorists Increasing Iraq Violence To Affect Outcome Of US Election....6
Hadley Meets With Maliki During Unannounced Iraq Visit....6
Casey Reportedly Recommending Iraq's Military Add 100,000 More Troops....6
US Death Toll For October Tops 100 As Sectarian Violence Continues In Iraq....7
Warner Says Iraqis Need Time To Curb Violence....8
Pentagon Rushes IED-Resistant Vehicles To War Zones....8
US Auditor Recommends Iraq's Government Meet "Milestones" Before Receiving Aid....8
Britain Evacuating Civilians From Basra....9
American Soldier Missing In Baghdad Left Base Without Permission....9
Schools Offer Some Respite For Iraqi Children....9
Robinson Blasts Rumsfeld, Says Bush Team, GOP At Fault For Iraq "Mistakes."....9
Pakistani Forces, CIA Predator Prone Destroy School Used As Al Qaeda Training Center....9
Pentagon Mounts Public Affairs Operation....10

Corporate Scandals:

Monster Worldwide Founder Resigns Amid Options Probe....10
Congress To Review SEC Oversight Of Hedge Funds....12
Delphi Settles Civil Fraud Charges With SEC....12
Pickens Pleads Guilty To Securities Fraud....13
Canadian Court Freezes Publisher's Assets In Hollinger Dispute....13

Criminal Law:

Fitzgerald Seeks To Avoid Armitage Issue During Libby Trial 13
Florida Prison Guards Stand Trial In Contraband-For-Sex Case....14
Judge Sets Date For Hawaii Death-Penalty Trial....14
Florida Man Faces Federal Pornography Charges....14
Florida County Commissioner Will Plead Guilty To Corruption Charges....15
Louisiana Police Chief Sentenced To Probation, Restitution For False Claim....15
US To Retry Pellicano-Related Perjury Case....15
California Energy Company CEO Sentenced To Eight Years In Prison....16
Many States Restrict Halloween Activity For Sex Offenders....16
FBI Reports Fewest Police Killed On Duty Since 2001....16
St. Louis Officials Dispute Top Crime Ranking....16

Civil Law:

High Court To Hear Phillip Morris's Appeal Of $79.5 Million Punitive Damages Award....17
6th Circuit Panel Upholds Kentucky Law Requiring Tobacco Payments....18
Tenet To Sell California Hospital....18

Civil Rights:

US Makes Arrests In Arizona Human Smuggling Probe 18
Many Voters To Face New ID Poll ID Requirements 19
Voting Machine Company Denies Links To Venezuelan President 19
Pentagon Said To Ignore Risks Of E-Mail Voting For Troops 19
Michigan Voters Split On Proposition To Ban Racial Preferences 19
8th Circuit Panel Upholds Ban On South Dakota Abortion Warning Law Enforcement 20
Maryland Youth Prison Woes Become Campaign Issue 20
Discord Within ACLU Described 20

Antitrust:

DOJ Probing Sony Electronics Unit 21
SCOTUS Denies Stolt-Nielsen Appeal On Antitrust Amnesty Issue 21
Merck To Buy Sima Therapeutics For $1.1 Billion 21
Google Urges Microsoft To Allow Users' Search Choices 22
Microsoft Withdraws From Efforts To Limit AT&T-BellSouth Deal 22
Schneider Electric To Buy American Power Conversion For $6.1 Billion 22
EU To Probe Qualcomm Royalties 23
NYTimes Claims US Patent System Is "Broken." 23

Environment:

Two Questioned In Probe Of California Wildfire 23
Federal Investigation Finds Cost Cutting Contributed To BP Texas City Blast 24

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Former FBI Agent Sentenced For Giving Information To Suspected Spy 24
Record Number Of Marijuana Plants Seized This Year In California 24
Law-Enforcement Official's Son Remains Free Despite Pleading Guilty To Marijuana Charge 25
Modern Trends Seen As Aiding Narcogangs 25
Pennsylvania Man Accused Of Impersonating DEA Agent 25
White House Criticized For "Campaigning" Against Marijuana Initiatives 25
In California, Court Ruling Keeps County From Joining Medical Marijuana Lawsuit 26
Chargers Linebacker Accused Of Violating NFL Drug Policy May Drop Appeal 26
Armed Pennsylvania Man Shot By Police Had Previous Gun Conviction 26
Federal Agents Arrest Salt Lake City Pipe Bomb Suspect 26

Immigration:

Border Arrests Down 8.4% 26

Congress-Administration:

Treasury To Pare Note Offerings After Drop In Budget Deficit 27
Growing Influence Of Inspectors General Examined 27
House Democrats Face The Prospect Of Divisive Leadership Contests 27
NASA Creates Venture Capital Firm To Finance Innovations 28
Fate Of Hubble Telescope To Be Announced Today 28
DHS, DOD Workers Brace For New Pay-For-Performance Systems 28
Federal Government Decisions Said To Exacerbate DC Region Sprawl 29

Other News:

Incomes, Savings Up Last Month 29
Banking Group Urges Simpler Credit Card Disclosure Rules 30
Bush Says "Terrorists Win And America Loses" If Democrats Have Their Way 30
Cheney Predicts A Democratic Victory Would Result In A "Massive" Tax Increase 32
Bush Family Takes Increasingly Prominent Role In GOP Campaigns 33
Hastert Has Made Few Campaign Appearances Since Foley Scandal Broke 33
GOP Claims Turnout Success In Early Voting In Several Tight Races 33
Generic Ballot Edge Suggests Democrats Will Win House Seats 34
Network News Coverage Of Campaigns Said To Have Favored Democrats 35
Midterm Campaign Ads Seen As "Most Negative" In Modern Times 35
Republican Defectors Running In Key Races Against Former Colleagues 36
New Jersey Gay Marriage Ruling Could Benefit Republicans 36
Voters Disillusioned With Both Parties In Indiana 36
AFL-CIO Targeting Southern Races 37
Snow Campaigns For Talent In St Louis 37
Webb Leads Allen In Two New Polls 37
Coalition Of Black Political Leaders Endorse Steele 37
Santorum Aides Blame Predicament On National Climate 38
Kean, Menendez Seek To Rally Base In Final Campaign Stops 38

DOJ_NMG_0088755

Despite Weak Opponent, Hutchison Seeks Strong GOP Turnout In Texas 39
NYPost Endorses Hillary Clinton For Senate, But Not Presidency 39
Harris Writing Book On Those Who Have "Wronged" Her 39
Democrats Could Regain Control Of Majority Of State Legislatures 39
Democrats Poised To Win Majority Of Gubernatorial Races 40
District Attorney Says Probe Into Gibbons Assault Allegation Reopened 40
Win Would Give Ehlich National Profile 40
Schwarzenegger Aides Said To Circumvent Gift Ban 41
Angelides Calls For "Comprehensive" Immigration Reform .. 41
States Seen As Taking Lead On Key Issues 41
Hunter Announces Bid For GOP Presidential Nomination 41
NYC Elite Reportedly Expect Bloomberg Presidential Run In 2008 42
Abstinence Programs To Target Young Adults As Well As Teens 42
Fortieth Anniversary Of Reagan's Election As Governor Of California Marked 42
Barnes Praises Edsall's Book On "Red America." 42
LATimes Reporters' Book Examines GOP Dominance 42
Newspapers Report Dwindling Circulation Numbers 42
Opposition To Gambling And Medical Marijuana Said To Cost GOP Votes 43
US Cotton Subsidies Said To Impoverish Africans 43
Ahmadinejad Vows "Appropriate And Firm Response" To Any UN Sanctions 43
US Leads Anti-Proliferation Maneuvers In Persian Gulf 44
Bush Opposed To Japan, South Korea And Taiwan Getting Nuclear Weapons 44
US, Allies Launch Global Initiative To Combat Nuclear Terror Threat 44
Bolton Says Syria, Iran Trying To Destabilize Lebanese Government 45
Olmert Says Israel May Expand Gaza Military Operations 45
Middle East Governments Await Post-Election Changes To US Policy 45
Natsios To Brief Bush This Morning On Darfur 45
Washington, Moscow Sign Agreement On Joint Military Operations 45
European Commission Criticizes Turkey On Human Rights, Role Of Military 46
UK To Regulate "Islamic Bonds." 46
British Government Report Says Global Warming Could Devastate Global Economy 46
Mexican Protests Seen As "Morphing" Into Political Movement 47
No Progress Reported In Sri Lanka Peace Talks 48
German-Polish Relations Worsen 48
Berlusconi Indicted For Corruption 48
Pinochet Put Under House Arrest, Indicted On Torture Charges 48
World Bank Urges Caution Regarding Migrants' Remittances 48
Edwards Urges Strong US Role In Uganda 49
WPost Urges Lula To Tackle Reforms, Step Away From "Ruinous Populism." 49

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 49

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 50

Online Version

Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

US Unable To Secure Pakistani Arrest Of Al Qaeda Anthrax Expert. In a front-page story, the Washington Post (10/31, Warrick, 748K) reports that in December 2001, coalition troops in Afghanistan found al Qaeda documents which "told of a singular mission by a scientist named Abdur Rauf," a Pakistani who "traveled through Europe on a quest, officials say, to obtain both anthrax spores and the equipment needed to turn them into highly lethal biological weapons." But "precisely what Rauf achieved may never be known with certainty. That's because U.S. officials remain stymied in their nearly five-year quest to bring charges against a man who they say admitted serving as a top consultant to al-Qaeda on anthrax." Rauf "has been under scrutiny in Pakistan since he was detained there for questioning in late 2001, according to U.S. and Pakistani officials who agreed to talk about the case for the first time. But officially he remains free, and Pakistan now says it has no grounds for arrest. Last year…the FBI officially put the case on inactive status. 'We will never close the door, but the chances of getting him into the United States are slim to none,' said one U.S. intelligence official."

DOJ_NMG_0088756

"Terror Kingpin" To Be Deported From UK To Algeria After US Drops Extradition Request. Time.com (10/30, Crumley) reports 40-year-old Algerian militant Abu Doha "is alleged by counter-terror officials to be a Qaeda-aligned terror kingpin and suspected of involvement in a number of plots around the world, including the 'Millennium Bomb' plot aimed at Los Angeles International airport in 2000. Yet, as things stand, Abu Doha looks set to be freed from prison in Britain and deported on immigration violations, after the U.S dropped its bid to extradite him over the LAX plot." The prospect "of his going free troubles security officials on both sides of the Atlantic, and leaves some bewildered by Washington's decision to drop its case against him." British authorities "say they don't have sufficient evidence to try Doha, and plan instead to deport him to his native Algeria." In "light of Algeria's traditionally ruthless treatment of Islamist militants, Amnesty International warns that Britain may be sending him home to face abuses."

Padilla Seeks Dismissal Of Charges Claiming Torture While In Detention. In a story distributed by McClatchy, the Miami Herald (10/31, Weaver, 310K) reports, "Jose Padilla, the former enemy combatant now accused of joining a suspected South Florida terror cell, says a federal judge should throw out an indictment against him because he was 'tortured by the United States government without cause or justification.' … On Monday, the U.S. attorney's office was given until Nov. 13 by the presiding judge to respond to Padilla's allegations." The Herald notes, "Padilla provides no evidence to support the allegations contained in a federal court motion filed this month, though his legal team has gathered details of his military detention."

Judge Refuses To Dismiss NYC Material Support Of Terrorism Trial. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/31, Neumeister) reports, "A judge on Monday refused to toss out charges against a musician, a doctor and two other men accused of supporting terrorists, even though defense lawyers argued they had been unfairly targeted for prosecution. U.S. District Judge Loretta A. Preska rejected claims that the men were snared through entrapment and outrageous conduct by an overzealous government beginning in late 2001." The AP adds, "The judge said a trial will begin in April or June for Dr. Rafiq Abdus Sabir, of Boca Raton, Fla., jazz musician and martial arts expert Tarik Shah, of New York, bookstore owner Abdulrahman Farhane, of Brooklyn, and Washington, D.C., cab driver Mahmud Faruq Brent, of Gwynn Oak, Md. An indictment in the case accuses Farhane and Shah of conspiring in 2001 to help an FBI cooperating witness send money to aid Islamic militants fighting Americans in Afghanistan."

Under the headline "Doctor's Alleged Pledge Is Crux of Terror Case," the New York Sun (10/31, Goldstein) Sabir "has been kept in solitary confinement since he was arrested last year on charges that he swore fealty to Osama bin Laden in the presence of an undercover FBI agent. Yesterday…attorneys debated whether the unusual pledge Dr. Sabir allegedly made — an offer to treat wounded jihadists in Saudi Arabia — constituted a crime. The argument covered topics ranging from the Hippocratic Oath to the statute on material support of terrorism." Sabir lawyer Edward Wilford told Preska "that the defendant should not be prosecuted over the alleged pledge because a doctor has a right to help patients recover." Preska "said a ruling on whether to dismiss the charges against Dr. Sabir would come later," but she "did not seem swayed when Mr. Wilford pointed out that the material support of terrorism statute contains a specific exemption for providing medicine."

Colorado Lawmakers Seek Supermax Improvements. The Denver Post (10/31, Emery) reports, "Colorado's two U.S. senators have vowed to seek solutions to understaffing and security concerns at Supermax, home to the nation's most dangerous criminals." The Post continues, "Sen. Wayne Allard visited the prison Monday, and Sen. Ken Salazar visited Saturday. Both agree that increases in staffing and security measures are needed at the prison, which holds such notorious criminals as al-Qaeda member Zacarias Moussaoui and Oklahoma bombing conspirator Terry Nichols." The Post adds, "Salazar said he plans to talk this week to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, and Allard said he will talk to Bureau of Prisons Director Harley Lappin on Nov. 13 about the need for more funding for security upgrades. … 'The key issues are No. 1 staffing and whether or not the staffing levels are as high as necessary in order to ensure the public safety as well as the security of the guards working in the prison,' Salazar said. … Salazar said the federal government should also look at technology upgrades and building a perimeter fence to deter people from approaching the prison from the outside, which he said was a bigger threat than escape." The Post notes, "Earlier this month, the Department of Justice's inspector general reported that the federal prison system does not read all the mail or effectively monitor phone calls of prisoners. … Allard said the notorious criminals and terrorists housed at Supermax who are in isolation are not communicating with outsiders. The inspector general report addresses those criminals who have certain privileges, and not all of their communications are monitored, he said. … Also this month, a federal arbitrator found that job hazards at Supermax had increased because of low staffing. Joseph Lazar ordered the Federal Bureau of Prisons to boost safety for correctional officers at the prison."

DOJ_NMG_0088757

Distribution Of DHS Firefighting Grants Criticized. The AP (10/31, Ben Evans) reports, "Georgia has twice the population of neighboring Alabama, yet Alabama agencies received more than double the amount of federal firefighting grants last year for trucks, gear and uniforms. The disparity was not an aberration. Alabama has been among the top grant winners in the Homeland Security Department's program for several years — apparently because it does a good job asking for the money. Statistics for the Assistance to Firefighters Grant program — the nation's largest firefighting grant initiative — show that states get widely varying shares of a $600 million federal pool. States that submit applications in large numbers, rather than those with the largest populations or highest risk factors, have more success in winning federal dollars.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI Confirms Search Of Student's House Over Fake Boarding Pass Site. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/31, Lenz) reports, "FBI agents searched the home of an Indiana University computer security student over the weekend after learning his Web page included a feature to print fake Northwest Airlines Corp. boarding passes, officials said Monday. Wendy Osborne, a spokeswoman for the FBI's Indianapolis office, said agents on Saturday searched the apartment of Christopher Soghoian, a 24-year-old doctoral student, in Bloomington, Ind. Osborne would not discuss what, if anything, was uncovered or taken as evidence." The AP notes, "Soghoian, who has not been charged or detained, declined to comment on the FBI investigation when reached by The Associated Press by e-mail Monday, but referred to his Web journal for information on the case."

CNET News.com (10/30, Evers) reported agents "raided" Sochoin's house, "seizing computers and other equipment, Soghoian wrote on his blog," and Osborne "confirmed that agents had searched Soghoian's home as part of a joint investigation with the Transportation Security Administration. 'We will conduct a thorough and complete investigation,' Osborne said. 'We are certainly concerned with any potential breach in security, particularly at the airports.'" CNET added, "The FBI will present the findings of its investigation to the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Indiana, which will determine whether Soghoian violated any federal laws, she said. At this point, the student has not been charged and he has not been arrested, Osborne said."

JetBlue Flight Diverted Over Unruly Passenger. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/31) reports, "JetBlue flight from Boston to Fort Lauderdale was diverted to Orlando after a passenger became disruptive, authorities said." David Collyer "was taken off flight 457 and into FBI custody Sunday after a 'possible altercation with flight crew,' FBI spokesman Kevin Farrington said. Collyer, of Sharon, Mass., had to 'be physically restrained by flight crew and passengers' a JetBlue employee told an officer who arrived on scene, according to an Orlando Police Department report. Neither Collyer nor the 156 passengers and 6 crew members were injured." The Orlando Sentinel (10/31, Gutierrez, 246K) reports, "Magistrate James Glazebrook ordered…Collyer released from custody on a $10,000 unsecured bond. … Collyer said he was 'sorry' and then had no more comment as he left the federal building." The Sentinel notes, "An FBI agent arrested Collyer after an 'altercation with flight crew,' FBI spokesman Kevin Farrington said."

DOJ_NMG_0088758

Democrats Plan Homeland Security Investigations Should They Win A Majority. The Washington Times (10/31, Hudson, 88K) reports Democrats plan to "immediately address fraud and waste at the Department of Homeland Security. Democrats vow to flex their subpoena and investigative muscles if elected to lead Congress next month and will take on President Bush's use of wiretaps. 'We have not had significant issues addressed from an oversight standpoint -- we've not issued one subpoena,' said Rep. Bennie Thompson, the Mississippi Democrat who as ranking member of the House Homeland Security Department is in line to lead the panel. … Both of the Democratic Capitol Hill leaders, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California, have said Mr. Bush is threatening civil liberties in the name of war and pledged to force the administration to obtain court orders before issuing wiretaps of terror suspects. Democrats say that Mr. Bush's wiretaps without court orders violate the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) -- created in 1978 to ensure court oversight -- and that they will legislate allowances to obtain the subpoenas in a speedy manner."

WAR NEWS:

Cheney Suggests Terrorists Increasing Iraq Violence To Affect Outcome Of US Election. The AP (10/31) reports, "Vice President Dick Cheney said Monday the increase of violence in Iraq is linked with efforts to influence the outcome of midterm elections in which Republicans are struggling to keep control of Congress. 'It's my belief that they're very sensitive of the fact that we've got an election scheduled and they can get on the Web sites like anybody else,' Cheney said. He said al-Qaida and other elements were trying to 'break the will of the American people' because 'they think we don't have the stomach for the fight long-term.'" Asked "if the attacks were timed to influence the US elections, Cheney said, 'That's my belief.'" USA Today (10/31, 2.27M) runs a brief summary of the AP story under the headline "Cheney: Iraq Violence Tied To US Elections."

Hadley Meets With Maliki During Unannounced Iraq Visit. The Washington Times/AP (10/31, Hurst) reports National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley "huddled with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and his security chief, Mouwafak al-Rubaie, during an unannounced visit to Baghdad, telling them he 'wanted to reinforce some of the things you have heard from our president.' Mr. al-Rubaie said last night that Mr. Hadley had discussed the work of a five-man committee that Mr. al-Maliki and Mr. Bush agreed to set up during a telephone conversation on Saturday. Mr. Hadley also presented proposals concerning the training and equipping of Iraqi security forces as well as security plans." The CBS Evening News (10/30, lead story, 2:30, Couric, 7.66M) reported Maliki, "according to US intelligence, is telling his inner circle the situation is nearly out of control."

The New York Times (10/31, Sanger, Burns, 1.21M) reports, "Though American officials would describe Mr. Hadley's talks only in the vaguest of terms, one option widely discussed in Washington and Baghdad in the days before his arrival, according to American and Iraqi officials, is a substantial increase in the number of American and Iraqi troops patrolling Baghdad. It would signal yet another effort to reassert control over the Iraqi capital, which officials in both governments said remains their top priority." Deputy national security adviser J. D. Crouch said Hadley "was in Iraq to express support for the Iraqi government and warned, 'He is not preconfiguring military options.' Mr. Crouch added that he was 'not aware' of anyone proposing an increase in American troops." The Times adds, "Other proposals now being discussed inside and outside the two governments range from how to permit greater autonomy for Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish sections of the country without splitting the country apart; how to share oil revenues among Iraq's population; and an amnesty for those who attacked Iraqi or American troops."

Casey Reportedly Recommending Iraq's Military Add 100,000 More Troops. The CBS Evening News (10/30, lead story, 2:30, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The day everyone is hoping for, the day American forces can finally come home from Iraq, seems more and more elusive. Just as the military announced that more than 100 US troops have died this month alone, our David Martin uncovered some exclusive information at the Pentagon today, information that's likely to keep Americans in Iraq longer than anyone expected. … CBS News has learned General George Casey, the US commander in Iraq, is expected to recommend the size of Iraqi security forces be increased by up to 100,000. This comes just as the US military is about to reach its long-stated goal of training and equipping 325,000 Iraqis to take over the fighting from American troops. Officials say the explosion of sectarian violence -- which General Casey calls a fundamental change in the nature of the threat -- now makes that number look inadequate. On top of that is the fact that any given day one quarter of the Iraqi army is on leave. Increasing the size of the Iraqi security forces would also mean more American soldiers would be needed to train and advise them. The US is also considering doubling from 12 to 25 the number of American advisors embedded in each Iraqi unit. General Casey is also expected to recommend equipping Iraqi security forces with more heavily armored vehicles…and heavier weapons."

DOJ_NMG_0088759

US Officers Said To Support Hard Deadline For Withdrawal From Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (10/31, Barnes, McManus, 918K) reports, "Growing numbers of American military officers have begun to privately question a key tenet of U.S. strategy in Iraq — that setting a hard deadline for troop reductions would strengthen the insurgency and undermine efforts to create a stable state. The Iraqi government's refusal to take certain measures to reduce sectarian tensions between Sunni Arabs and the nation's Shiite Muslim majority has led these officers to conclude that Iraqis will not make difficult decisions unless they are pushed. … Former Pentagon official Kurt Campbell said more officers are calling for deadlines after concluding that the indefinite presence of U.S. forces enables the Shiite-run Iraqi government to avoid making compromises. 'There is a new belief that the biggest problem that we face is that our forces are the sand in the gears creating problems,' said Campbell, coauthor of a book on national security policy. 'We are making things worse by giving the Iraqis a false sense of security at the governing level.'"

Trainers Fear Militia Infiltration Of Iraqi Police Could Delay Handover For Years. In a front page article, the Washington Post (10/31, Paley, 748K) reports, "Visitors to this violent neighborhood [Sholeh] in the Iraqi capital whisper that nearly all the police officers have split loyalties. ... And then one rainy night this month, the Sholeh police set up an ambush and killed Army Cpl. Kenny F. Stanton Jr., a 20-year-old budding journalist, his unit said. ... The top U.S. military commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., predicted last week that Iraqi security forces would be able to take control of the country in 12 to 18 months. But several days spent with American units training the Iraqi police illustrated why those soldiers on the ground believe it may take decades longer than Casey's assessment. Seventy percent of the Iraqi police force has been infiltrated by militias, primarily the Mahdi Army, according to Shaw and other military police trainers." Several disheartened US soldiers and Iraqi police officers are quoted.

US Death Toll For October Tops 100 As Sectarian Violence Continues In Iraq. ABC World News (10/30, story 3, 0:35, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There is a grim milestone to report from Iraq. The deaths of a Marine in Al Anbar province and a military policeman in Baghdad pushed the US toll in October to 101. That is only the fourth time that more than 100 US troops have been killed in one month. At least 81 Iraqis were killed today, including 33 that died in Baghdad's Sadr City, when a bomber to tore through a group of poor Shiite men seeking work."

In a similar report, NBC Nightly News (10/30, story 2, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Military announced the death of another military Marine. That brings the number of U.S. Military service members to 101. Also today, more than 80 Iraqis killed in attacks around that country. A bomb killed at least 26, wounded 60 in a crowded market in Baghdad."

The CBS Evening News (10/30, story 2, 1:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Here's how bad it was today. More than 80 Iraqis were killed, including 33 in just one bomb attack as lay laborers arrived for work in Sadr City. It's been an especially deadly month for US troops who are constantly facing new dangers." CBS (Logan) added, "US leaders have said their troops won't get involved in a civil war in Iraq, but American soldiers on the ground here now are already caught in a conflict between this country's two main ethnic grows more violent and more bloody everyday. For the soldiers left behind, memorial service are the last to say good-bye to fallen comrades. A brief moment to mourn before heading back out to continue the fight."

Reporting on the continuing violence, the Los Angeles Times (10/31, Ellingwood, Rifai, 918K) says it has "fed widespread misgivings about the Bush administration's handling of Iraq as Americans prepare to vote in midterm congressional elections next week. At the same time, US and Iraqi leaders have sought to smooth differences over how to cope with the back-and-forth violence by Sunni Arab insurgents and Shiite militias, including Sadr's Al Mahdi army, believed responsible for many of the hundreds of killings and kidnappings in recent months." The New York Times (10/31, Tavernise, 1.21M) reports "the violence…has radicalized many Iraqis, and moderates who refuse to yield to the militants are either being killed or driven out of the country."

DOJ_NMG_0088760

The Washington Post (10/31, A17, Anderson, 748K) reports "US and Iraqi forces had previously established a cordon around the teeming slum," Sadr City, "which is controlled by the Mahdi Army militia, in an attempt to find a kidnapped US soldier and a man known as Abu Deraa, who is considered Iraq's most notorious death squad leader. Shiite leaders seized on that US operation Monday to accuse the Americans of complicity in the market blast, saying that because they were in charge of searching all vehicles going in and out of the area, they must have allowed in the bomb that was detonated at the market. … Some residents of Sadr City, home to 2.5 million Shiites, also blamed US forces for the carnage, saying that the search for the missing soldier -- which began six days ago -- has forced the Mahdi Army underground, weakening the area's defenses." But "this week, some Mahdi Army members were visible with weapons on the streets." McClatchy (10/31, Price), the AP (10/31, Hurst) and Financial Times (10/31, Sevastopulo, Negus), among other sources, run similar stories this morning.

Warner Says Iraqis Need Time To Curb Violence. The Norfolk Virginian Pilot (10/31, Holden) reports, "Sen. John Warner said Monday that Iraqi leaders need more time to contain worsening violence in their country, but that 'every single day counts' when measured against the loss of American lives." Warner urged giving Prime Minister Maliki an opportunity to prove that "violence can be contained through continued diplomacy and not escalating military force," which Maliki purports. Warner "has visited Iraq eight times and has become increasingly measured in his assessment of the situation."

Pentagon Rushes IED-Resistant Vehicles To War Zones. USA Today (10/31, Vanden Brook, 2.27M) reports, "The military is rushing armored vehicles with specially designed hulls to Iraq and Afghanistan to limit the damage from roadside bombs, the No. 1 killer of U.S. troops. ... The new vehicles have a V-shaped hull, which disperses the force of an explosion and helps keep the vehicle from flipping over." A manufacturer, Force Protection, "says nobody inside a Buffalo [its product] has been killed in Iraq or Afghanistan despite encountering thousands of IED blasts." Senator Lindsey Graham "said the Pentagon has acted quickly to deploy the vehicles, without the kind of delays seen in sending body armor and armored Humvees to Iraq."

US Auditor Recommends Iraq's Government Meet "Milestones" Before Receiving Aid. The AP (10/31, Baldor) reports, "Federal auditors are recommending that the Iraqi government meet specific milestones of progress to receive any future aid for reconstruction, according to a report released Monday that echoes a message the Bush administration has delivered to Iraqi leaders. The study, issued by the special inspector general who audits U.S. work in Iraq, also concluded that reconstruction is being blocked by violence, and efforts to empower Iraqis to do more are fraught with problems 3 1/2 years after the U.S. invaded the country. The Iraqis should 'meet concrete milestones and political and economic benchmarks as a condition of future aid,' the report recommended. It said U.S. relief and reconstruction aid could be provided through conditional loans and be tied to specific actions by the Iraqi government." The AP notes the report also states, "The U.S.-funded phase of Iraq's relief and reconstruction has entered its concluding stages. The government of Iraq's success in building on the foundation established by the U.S. relief and reconstruction program will now depend in part on (Iraq's) ability to attract more support from other donors and the private sector.'"

The Washington Post (10/31, A17, Witte, 748K) reports that the US "has devoted more than $38 billion to relief and reconstruction in Iraq since the 2003 invasion, and yesterday's report does point to some successes. Electric capacity nationwide passed prewar levels in recent months, though in Baghdad it remains lower than before the war. Oil exports, at 1.66 million barrels a day, met Iraqi goals. Overall, 88 percent of U.S. projects have been completed, with only a small minority yet to begin. Out of the $18 billion reconstruction package Congress passed in November 2003, about three-quarters has been spent."

Thousands Of US Weapons Meant For Iraq's Military Are Missing. NBC Nightly News (10/30, story 3, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "there is new evidence that US tax money for rebuilding Iraq has been badly mismanaged and that thousands of American weapons might have fallen into the wrong hands." NBC's Lisa Myers added, "The US has not properly tracked a half million weapons bought for Iraqi security forces. In a new report reveals that 14,000 weapons are now considered missing. Government watchdogs say more than 13,000 glock semiautomatic pistols, 751 assault weapons and almost 100 machine guns cannot be accounted for in Iraq -- raising the possibility that they fell into the hands of insurgents. … Hundreds of thousands of weapons couldn't be tracked because the military failed to properly record serial numbers another report says that less than half the budget for some projects actually went to rebuild Iraq." NBC notes, "Investigators mostly blame the government's poor planning. But they also single out a Halliburton subsidiary, KBR. In this 2004 letter obtained by NBC news, a US official criticizes KBR for accruing indirect costs at a rapid paste and for failing to provide adequate cost information. Government watchdogs now say Halliburton tried to hide data from auditors."

DOJ_NMG_0088761

NYTimes Praises The Work Of The IG For Iraq Reconstruction. The New York Times (10/31, 1.21M), in an editorial, writes that the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction "has distinguished itself as the most vigilant agency monitoring the money spent on the Iraq conflict. The agency, led by a Republican lawyer who once worked in the Bush White House, has previously reported on the contracting lapses and failures of supervision that allowed billions of taxpayer dollars to be wasted instead of being used to rebuild Iraq."

Britain Evacuating Civilians From Basra. The Los Angeles Times (10/31, Ellingwood, 918K) reports the British government "said Monday that it was moving most civilian staff members out of its compound in the southern Iraqi city of Basra because of rocket and mortar attacks by militias. Officials said the move was temporary. But the decision underscored the fraying security climate in southern Iraq, a largely Shiite Muslim region under the sway of various militias, such as that controlled by anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr. … A spokesman for the British Foreign Office said the consul general would remain in Basra with a small support staff."

American Soldier Missing In Baghdad Left Base Without Permission. ABC World News (10/30, story 5, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "new details about the American soldier who was abducted in Baghdad last week. He served as a translator for the military. He was born in Iraq, spoke Arabic. The military acknowledges she was married to an Iraqi woman. He left his base without permission to visit her family when he disappeared. And a massive military manhunt continues."

Schools Offer Some Respite For Iraqi Children. ABC World News (10/30, story 4, 2:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The violence changes Iraqis so many ways. But we have a story tonight about an oasis from the violence a place where children can be children." ABC added, "Being fine, in Baghdad's violence, is a relative concept. During the first period this morning, a bomb went off just a block away from this school. These children are so used to it, though, they quickly got back to work. They got scared, their family started calling on the phone, says this teacher. But after ten minutes, we calmed them down. Even though the danger is so close that the bomb shook the windows, this school is a daily refuge for the children. At least here, behind a locked gate, they are reasonably safe. Between classes, they can play in the yard. 'At home, we're afraid to go outside,' she says."

Robinson Blasts Rumsfeld, Says Bush Team, GOP At Fault For Iraq "Mistakes." In his Washington Post (10/31, 748K) column, Eugene Robinson writes, "Go ahead, people, you have your orders from Napoleon Bonaparte, I mean Donald Rumsfeld. 'Back off' and 'relax.'" Robinson charges, "Alexander the Great, I mean Donald Rumsfeld, may have authored the mistakes that have cost nearly 3,000 American lives, including more than 100 in October alone -- sending too few troops, disbanding the Iraqi army, failing to plan for an extended occupation, training Iraqi 'security forces' that promptly turned into sectarian militias. But George W. Bush, Dick Cheney, Condoleezza Rice and the rest of the Vulcans were with him every step of the way, and the Republican majority in Congress sang hosannas of praise like an amen chorus."

Pakistani Forces, CIA Predator Prone Destroy School Used As Al Qaeda Training Center. The AP (10/31, Khan) reports, "Pakistani troops and helicopters firing missiles killed as many as 80 militants training at a religious school used as an al-Qaida training center near the Afghan border, officials said. Local leaders said all those slain when the school, or madrassa, was destroyed were civilians." Army spokesman Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan "said initial estimates based on intelligence sources on the ground indicated that the attack killed about 80 suspected militants, who appeared to be in their 20s and were from Pakistan and other countries. 'These militants were involved in actions inside Pakistan and probably in Afghanistan,' Sultan told The Associated Press."

DOJ_NMG_0088762

ABC World News (10/30, story 6, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that among those killed was "a cleric associated with al Qaeda's top deputy. Pakistan said all the dead were militants. Villagers claim that innocents were killed. Islamic leaders blame the US, but Pakistan denied any American involvement."

However, NBC Nightly News (10/30, lead story, 3:55, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) added, "NBC News has learned that the US had a major role in this operation and with 80 dead that makes this the largest number of suspected militants ever killed in a single counterterrorist attack. US officials tell NBC News the attack was carried out by a CIA Predator drone armed with Hellfire missiles and nearly a dozen Pakistani attack helicopters." NBC added, "The attack brought out thousands of protesters throughout Pakistan burning the American flag, shouting down with America. Down with Musharraf. The assault was similar to Predator air strikes that tried to kill Zawahiri in January."

The Washington Times/AP (10/31, Garwood) says "the raid threatens efforts by President Gen. Pervez Musharraf to persuade deeply conservative tribespeople to back his government over pro-Taliban and al-Qaida fighters, who enjoy strong support in many semiautonomous regions in northern Pakistan." The New York Times (10/31, Masood, 1.21M) says the attack also "threatens to disrupt a peace deal that was expected to be signed today between Bajur tribal leaders and the military. The agreement is meant to control the flow of weapons and militants into Afghanistan. A similar accord was signed with tribal leaders this year in neighboring North Waziristan." The Christian Science Monitor (10/31, Montero, 58K) runs a similar report under the headline "Pakistan Attack A Setback To Border Peace."

The Washington Post (10/31, A15, Constable, Khan, 748K) reports, "Osama bin Laden and his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri, are widely believed to be hiding in the rugged Afghan-Pakistani border region, home to fiercely independent tribal peoples . Afghan officials also contend that Pakistan's side of the border is serving as a sanctuary for newly aggressive Taliban insurgents in Afghanistan." The attack "seemed to represent an abrupt shift from the Musharraf government's recent policy of seeking peaceful negotiations with extremists in the border regions. In the past several months, two peace deals were signed in the tribal areas of North and South Waziristan after sustained attacks there by the Pakistani military drew strong local opposition and caused heavy casualties on both sides."

Pentagon Mounts Public Affairs Operation. AFP (10/30, Mannion) reports, "The Pentagon is expanding its public affairs operations to counter 'inaccurate' news stories and editorials and exploit 'new media' to get its message out, its chief spokesman said, denying the effort was linked to the US elections." Eric Ruff "insisted that the new public affairs program was not prompted by either the elections or polls showing that only about 37 percent believe the war is going well." He "disclosed the expanded operations after questions were raised about a wall being built in the Pentagon press operations center." AFP states, "Dorrance Smith, the assistant secretary of defense for public affairs, has written a torrent of letters to editors in recent weeks seeking corrections or rebutting articles and editorials. ... US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, a strident critic of media coverage of Iraq, also has pushed for a sweeping overhaul in the way the military communicates with the public."

The AP (10/31) reports, "A memo obtained by The Associated Press shows the Defense Department is adding to its public relations staff. It plans to set up teams to quickly answer opponents' claims, develop messages for news cycles and coordinate officials or politicians to speak out on issues. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has said the thing that keeps him up at night is his belief that terrorists have been able to manipulate the media, while the Pentagon's communications efforts have been lacking."

Another AP (10/31) article reports, "In a memo obtained by The Associated Press, Dorrance Smith, assistant secretary of defense for public affairs, said new teams of people will 'develop messages' for the 24-hour news cycle and 'correct the record.'" Like AFP, the AP writes that spokesman Ruff "denied that the effort was set up to respond to the eroding public support for the war, or that it was aimed at helping in next week's elections."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Monster Worldwide Founder Resigns Amid Options Probe. The Wall Street Journal (10/31, A3, Bandler, Maremont) reports, "Monster Worldwide Inc.'s founder, Andrew McKelvey, resigned from the company's board after declining to be interviewed by lawyers conducting an internal investigation into backdating of stock options at the company." The Journal continues, "Mr. McKelvey, who founded the company that was the precursor of Monster 39 years ago, had been the company's chairman and chief executive until earlier this month, when he stepped down from both posts, citing the demands of dealing with the options probe. Yesterday, he resigned his remaining positions as director and chairman emeritus. Monster is the parent of the popular Monster.com job-search Web site." The Journal adds, "The broadening options-backdating scandal so far has focused on more than 150 companies, and white-collar attorneys say executives increasingly are refusing to cooperate with in-house probes for fear that their statements will be used against them by the government. But failure to cooperate makes it difficult or impossible for the executive to stay in his or her position. Nearly all of the companies involved are conducting internal probes, and typically turn over the results to federal investigators."

DOJ_NMG_0088763

USA Today (10/31, Iwata) reports, "McKelvey was scheduled to meet Monday with a Monster special committee investigating the company's stock-option grants, but he changed his mind. … The company said in a statement that 'Mr. McKelvey had declined to be interviewed' and 'would not provide assurance that he would appear at a later date.'" USA adds, "McKelvey's attorney, Steven Reich of Manatt Phelps & Phillips, said in a letter Sunday to Monster's private attorneys that 'we need a good deal more time to get up to speed on this fact-intensive matter that covers a period of many years.' … The letter, addressed to attorney James Benjamin at law firm Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, also said that McKelvey was ill, was suffering from jet lag and lacked legal representation during a key meeting with the committee last July on the stock-option scandal. … When questioned, McKelvey did not understand the legal and accounting implications of stock-option backdating, or whether Monster engaged in improper practices, according to the letter filed Monday with the Securities and Exchange Commission."

The AP (10/31, Tong) reports, "Monster has received a subpoena from the U.S. attorney's office in the Southern District of New York over stock options and has said it wants to complete its own investigation by the end of the year." The AP adds, "McKelvey's full resignation from the board comes weeks after he stepped down from the posts of chairman and chief executive on Oct. 9. At that time, he retained a spot on the board and was named as a chairman emeritus. … Top executives who have recently resigned from other companies over options investigations include: UnitedHealth Group Inc. Chief Executive William McGuire, KLA-Tencor Corp. Chairman Kenneth Levy, CNET Networks Inc. Chief Executive Shelby Bonnie and McAfee Inc. CEO George Samenuk. McGuire quit as chairman earlier this month and will resign as CEO by Dec. 1. … So far, federal authorities have filed charges against former officials of two technology companies. And Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox said on Monday that he expected more such charges in the coming days."

SEC Head Sees More Options Cases. The AP (10/31, Gordon, Tong) reports, "With about 100 companies under investigation, new cases will be brought on suspicious timing of stock options grants in the near future, the head of the Securities and Exchange Commission said Monday. … Meanwhile, there have been an 'unprecedented' number of companies that have voluntarily reported irregularities in stock options awards to the authorities -- a cooperation that will be taken into account by the SEC in those cases, Chairman Christopher Cox said." The AP continues, "Federal authorities have filed charges so far against former officials of two technology companies. … 'I'd expect that we'll see more as a result of that process in the days ahead,' Cox told reporters. … His remarks came amid news that the former chief executive of Monster Worldwide Inc., parent of the world's largest job-search site, had resigned from its board after refusing to be interviewed about the company's past options practices." The AP adds, "Andrew J. McKelvey's resignation came weeks after he stepped down from the posts of chairman and chief executive on Oct. 9. At that time, he retained a board seat and was named chairman emeritus. … To date, at least 135 public companies have disclosed internal inquiries over options grants or investigations by the SEC or the Justice Department, and at least 39 executives and directors at 19 companies have been fired or resigned."

Report Finds Hundreds Of Missed Options Disclosure Deadlines. The San Jose Mercury News (10/31, Poletti) reports, "Hundreds of companies have missed the regulatory deadlines to disclose how many stock options they have granted to insiders, raising questions about whether more options grants may have been backdated even amid new tougher securities laws, according to a report by Glass Lewis." The News continues, "In an Oct. 20 report called

DOJ_NMG_0088764

'The Backdating Scandal's Second Act?' Glass Lewis, an institutional shareholder advisory firm in San Francisco, noted that its research has identified hundreds of companies with late filings to the Securities and Exchange Commission. Those filings, called Form 4s, are now required within two days of the grants, per new securities laws as a result of Sarbanes-Oxley legislation. … 'This suggests backdating continued to occur after the adoption of new disclosure rules,' wrote Todd Fernandez, a senior research analyst at Glass Lewis, in the report. He noted there are many examples of companies that were late in disclosing grants to insiders and the stock price rose materially from the purported grant date to the disclosure date." The News adds, "Some examples Glass Lewis sited include Silicon Image of Sunnyvale, Hansen Natural of Corona, Calif., O'Reilly Automotive of Springfield, Mo., Digital River of Minneapolis, Websense of San Diego, and Medis Technologies of New York. … Glass Lewis said it reviewed hundreds of thousands of insider transactions from January, 2004 to June 2006, for its report."

Congress To Review SEC Oversight Of Hedge Funds. The Deal (10/31, Orol, Block) reports, "Congressional investigators are examining whether stock exchanges and the Securities and Exchange Commission are equipped to police trading activity ahead of market-moving deals, particularly as hedge funds become an increasingly large presence in the financial markets." The Deal continues, "At the request of Sen. Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, the Government Accountability Office earlier this month agreed to examine whether the SEC had adequate procedures in place to oversee stock exchange regulators, including the New York Stock Exchange and NASD. … Ostensibly, those exchanges are self-regulatory organizations, but the SEC ultimately is charged with ensuring that the public markets are carrying out their obligations to root out insider trading, fraud and other abuses." The Deal adds, "Financial industry sources say Grassley is right to suspect some fire behind the smoke of suspicious trading and that the SEC appears to suffer a backlog of referrals of suspected improper trading from the exchanges. … With the advent of decimalization, increased domination by institutional trading, short-term trading strategies by hedge funds, and the move to a for-profit model of the major trading venues, it's unclear whether the SRO's market surveillance budgets, staffing levels and computer technology are keeping up."

WSJournal Criticizes Politicians' Eagerness To Tighten Regulations On Hedge Funds. The Wall Street Journal (10/31, 2.03M) reports Senate Finance Chairman Charles Grassley "is circulating a letter to regulators looking for suggestions on how to regulate hedge funds. He's far from the only one. Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal is bidding to become the next Eliot Spitzer by doing to hedge funds what New York's AG did to the insurance industry. … So, just what is driving this push to regulate? First, until recently hedge funds have been growing like Topsy, and the 1998 meltdown of Long-Term Capital Management did little to diminish wealthy investors' appetite for new funds. Today there are more than 3,000 hedge funds, managing more than $1 trillion in assets. This growth has made them an increasingly attractive target for imperialist bureaucrats and rent-seeking politicians."

Delphi Settles Civil Fraud Charges With SEC. The Washington Post (10/31, D1, Freeman) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission said yesterday that it settled civil fraud charges against embattled auto parts supplier Delphi Corp. and some of its former officials, while others vowed to fight." The Post continues, "The SEC named 13 individuals in the case, which alleges that officers at the company's highest level engaged in accounting schemes to mask Delphi's declining financial condition from 2000 to 2004. In one effort, the SEC said executives misrepresented warranty claims as pension costs to improve financial results. … Under terms of the settlement, Delphi faces no financial penalties." The Post adds, "The SEC said six individuals in the case agreed to settle the charges without admitting wrongdoing and will pay a total of $1.4 million in fines and other payments. The largest amount will be paid by Alan Dawes, Delphi's former chief financial officer, who agreed to pay $687,000."

The AP (10/31, Thomas) reports, "Delphi, the nation's largest auto supplier, filed for bankruptcy protection in October 2005. Resolving the SEC investigation could help the company move closer to emergence from bankruptcy next year." The AP continues, "The government said in a statement that the Troy, Mich.-based company had settled its charges and will not face penalties because of its cooperation with investigators. … Delphi Chairman and CEO Robert S. 'Steve' Miller said the auto supplier had 'cooperated fully with the commission's investigation and will continue to do so. We are pleased to put the SEC investigation behind us and consider this settlement an important step in our transformation process.'"

DOJ_NMG_0088765

USA Today (10/31, Carty) reports, "Delphi's former CEO says he'll fight a lawsuit by the Securities and Exchange Commission that charges him and six other former Delphi employees with incidents of fraud from 2000 to 2004." USA continues, "J.T. Battenberg, Delphi's founding chairman and CEO from 1999 (when the supplier was spun off from General Motors) until he retired in June 2005, insists the actions he took were 'entirely lawful and proper.' … 'I fully cooperated with Delphi and the SEC in their investigations of this matter both before and after my retirement, and am disappointed — to say the least — that this lawsuit has been filed,' he said in a statement."

The Detroit News (10/31, Shepardson) reports, "n March 2005, following a 10-month internal investigation led by an outside law firm, Delphi ousted Dawes and then-chief accounting officer Paul Free, who was also charged in Monday's filing, and said many of the company's financial statements were inaccurate. It also removed at least four other officials. … The investigation into Delphi began in July 2004 after EDS, another former GM subsidiary, told the SEC in June 2004 about a $20 million loan in 2001 that Delphi booked as income. The SEC upgraded its probe into a formal investigation in August 2004. … The 79-page complaint filed in U.S. District Court in Detroit Monday was assigned to Judge Avern Cohn, who must approve the settlements."

Pickens Pleads Guilty To Securities Fraud. The Wall Street Journal/AP (10/31, C4) reports, "The son of billionaire oil tycoon T. Boone Pickens pleaded guilty to securities fraud Monday, admitting his role in a scheme to inflate the stock value of three companies so he could make hundreds of thousands of dollars illegally." The AP continues, "Michael O. Pickens, of Nocona, Texas, entered the plea in U.S. District Court in Manhattan after signing an agreement calling for him to be sentenced to as little as four years and nine months in prison or as much as five years and 11 months." The AP adds, "Judge Loretta A. Preska set sentencing for Jan. 30 after Mr. Pickens, 52, entered the plea to three charges of securities fraud. The charges carry a potential fine of $3 million. … Mr. Pickens was arrested July 18, 2005, and was accused of sending hundreds of thousands of hoax faxes throughout the U.S. in December 2004 to fraudulently induce investors to buy three stocks. … Prosecutors said each fax purported to be a handwritten note conveying a stock tip to a person, suggesting it had been mistakenly sent to each recipient. An indictment said the fake faxes caused the trading values and market prices of the stocks to increase dramatically. It said one stock's value almost doubled in one day."

Canadian Court Freezes Publisher's Assets In Hollinger Dispute. Bloomberg (10/31) reports, "The assets of F. David Radler, the former publisher of The Chicago Sun-Times, were recently frozen by a Canadian court at the request of Hollinger Inc., Conrad M. Black's former holding company, which is suing Mr. Black and Mr. Radler to recover management fees." Bloomberg continues, "A British Columbia Supreme Court judge in Vancouver granted the order on Oct. 25. Hollinger is suing Mr. Black and Mr. Radler to recover management fees and noncompetition payments. … The injunction, which applies worldwide, prohibits Mr. Radler and his company, F. D. Radler Ltd., from disposing of, mortgaging or transferring any assets, and freezes their bank accounts while the suit remains before the courts." Bloomberg adds, "Mr. Radler is allowed to spend up to $22,255 a month for living expenses and legal fees. The order will remain in effect until Nov. 9, unless the court agrees to extend it, the judge, Deborah Satanove, said in a three-page ruling. … Mr. Black's assets were frozen Aug. 18 at Hollinger's request by the order of an Ontario Superior Court judge. Mr. Black and his wife were limited to a monthly allowance of 50,000 Canadian dollars. Mr. Black and Hollinger agreed on Sept. 29 to replace the judge's order with a confidential settlement. … Hollinger, the holding company that Mr. Black used to control the newspaper publisher Hollinger International, is seeking 636 million Canadian dollars in damages. In July, Hollinger International changed its name to the Sun-Times Media Group. … In Chicago, Mr. Black faces 12 charges of racketeering, money laundering, wire fraud and obstruction of justice. He is accused of moving $92 million from Hollinger International through other companies and using Hollinger Inc. to enrich himself at shareholder expense. Mr. Black has denied any wrongdoing. His trial in Chicago is scheduled to start in March."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Fitzgerald Seeks To Avoid Armitage Issue During Libby Trial. The AP (10/31, Apuzzo) reports Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald "told a federal judge

DOJ_NMG_0088766

Monday that he shouldn't have to explain during the upcoming trial of" Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby "why nobody was charged with leaking the identity of a CIA operative." The AP notes Libby's supporters "have accused Fitzgerald of singling out Libby while not charging the source of the leak, former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage. In court documents, Fitzgerald said he shouldn't have to address that issue at Libby's trial. While never addressing Armitage by name, Fitzgerald said it would be irrelevant to discuss other officials. 'If Mr. X was investigated for leaking classified information, the government's decision not to charge Mr. X should have nothing to do with the jury's role as the finder of fact in Libby's case,' Fitzgerald wrote. If jurors disagree with his decision not to charge anyone else, they might be less likely to convict Libby, Fitzgerald wrote."

Florida Prison Guards Stand Trial In Contraband-For-Sex Case. The AP (10/31, Kaczor) reports, "Lawyers for two prison guards charged in a contraband-for-sex scandal that ended in a deadly shootout told a jury Monday that the government's case relies on the testimony of inmates who are willing to lie in exchange for reduced sentences." The AP continues, "Gregory Dixon and Alan Moore, who both work at a federal prison for women, are accused of participating in a scheme to swap sex with female inmates for such commonplace items as gum, cigarettes and perfume. Both are charged with conspiracy and bribery. Dixon also is accused of witness tampering. … 'You will hear a lot of nonsense from inmates all trying to punch their tickets home,' said Thomas Findley, Dixon's lawyer, as the trial opened." The AP adds, "Authorities said the suspected plot ended June 21 in a shootout after prison guard Ralph Hill smuggled a gun into the Tallahassee Federal Correctional Institution and opened fire when FBI and Justice Department agents arrived to arrest him and other defendants. Hill and an FBI agent were killed. … Three guards have since pleaded guilty in the scheme, but none have been implicated in the shootout. Dixon and Moore have been suspended from their jobs. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Alan Sprowls acknowledged his key witnesses are convicted felons but promised the jury that the government will introduce sufficient evidence to show the guards abused their authority for personal benefit."

Judge Sets Date For Hawaii Death-Penalty Trial. The Honolulu Advertiser (10/31, Kobayashi) reports, "The first death penalty trial here since Hawai`i abolished capital punishment in the 1950s is scheduled to begin in October of next year." The Advertiser continues, "Army Spc. Naeem Williams pleaded not guilty today to a charge of murdering his 5-year-old daughter Talia Williams, who died July 16 last year. He faces the death penalty, which was authorized earlier this year by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales." The Advertiser adds, "Federal Magistrate Judge Leslie Kobayashi today set Williams' trial for Oct. 16, which is later than usual because of legal issues that may arise because the charge carries the death penalty. … Williams' wife Delilah Williams is also scheduled to go on trial with her husband on a charge of murdering Talia Williams, but the attorney general did not authorize the death penalty prosecution for her. Delilah Williams earlier pleaded not guilty. If convicted, she faces a maximum sentence of life in prison."

Florida Man Faces Federal Pornography Charges. The Bonita (FL) News (10/31, Zambo) reports that a Florida man claims "he was the real victim in the child pornography case he accused the federal government of manufacturing." Donald Deverso, a former Lee County (FL) school bus driver, "staunchly maintained his innocence Monday, telling a federal judge during his sentencing hearing that he was taken advantage of by a girl from the Philippines. … 'To keep calling these women victims — I didn't have any victims, your honor,' Deverso said before U.S. District Judge John E. Steele sentenced him to 16 years behind bars. 'I didn't write to them. They wrote to me.'" The News continues, "Deverso, 59 and of Cape Coral, was convicted on May 19 in the high-profile case. He was accused of keeping child porn on his home computer from May 11, 2002, through April 15, 2005. He also was charged with transporting child pornography in October 2004, and manufacturing it while he vacationed in the Philippines. Deverso photographed underage girls he met online through Asian dating Web sites, one victim and investigators testified in spring during his weeklong trial." The News adds, "Prosecutors said Deverso chatted with numerous women online, proposing marriage to them. Deverso remains married to his third wife, Zong Yu Deverso, whom he met on a Chinese brides Web site. Deverso countered that he never promised these others marriage, just that it was possible if they got along well. … Based on federal sentencing guidelines, Steele had to sentence Deverso to a minimum of 15 years in prison. He could have been sentenced to 20 years. … 'What kind of person flies around the world to take advantage of poor and desperate women?' Chief Assistant U.S. Attorney Doug Molloy asked. 'One who deserves the maximum penalty of incarceration this court can impose.'"

DOJ_NMG_0088767

Florida County Commissioner Will Plead Guilty To Corruption Charges. The Palm Beach Post (10/31, Dubocq) reports, "Former Palm Beach County Commission Chairman Tony Masilotti faces up to five years in prison and forfeiture of $9.5 million in cash and real estate for his leading role in a land deal conspiracy that stretched from 2000 to this past June, federal prosecutors said Monday. Masilotti, who in a sorrowful resignation letter said he will plead guilty, is expected to surrender Friday," but "still to be determined: when Masilotti formally will plead guilty and when he'll be dispatched to prison." US Attorney R. Alexander Acosta yesterday "hinted that more defendants could be charged in the case but declined to elaborate." The Post notes, "The investigation of Masilotti was triggered by an April report in The Palm Beach Post," and "within weeks of the report, the FBI and IRS swooped in and a grand jury was impaneled." FBI Miami SAC Jonathan Solomon "credited The Post. 'I'd just like to recognize them for their investigative reporting,' Solomon said at Monday's news conference. 'They did an outstanding job.'"

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (10/31, Hafenbrack, Franceschina, 265K) reports, "In one Palm Beach County deal, Masilotti is accused of receiving between $40,000 and $50,000 for his assistance in helping a developer solve traffic problems concerning land the Diocese of Palm Beach County was selling in the town of Royal Palm Beach. In another deal, Masilotti and family members allegedly got $100,000 in free air travel from a developer who did business with county in purchasing a former public horse riding area near Wellington." The Sun-Sentinel notes that in his letter indicating his intention to plead guilty, Masilotti "pledged to cooperate with the FBI, Internal Revenue Service and U.S. Attorney's Office, which have been investigating for six months his potential abuse of power."

Louisiana Police Chief Sentenced To Probation, Restitution For False Claim. KATC-TV Lafayette (10/30) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "Former Opelousas Police Chief Larry Caillier, who had a stellar career in law enforcement, was sentenced Monday in federal court for filing a false claim. His department was paid for bike patrols that never happened." US District Judge Richard Haik "sentenced him to five years probation, 10 months of house arrest and he must pay restitution to the U.S. Clerk of Court. The FBI determined Caillier owes $26,300." The Opelousas Daily World (10/31, Cochran) notes, "The conviction is the first and only found against the former chief, though the state remains poised to proceed with another 26 separate charges" against Caillier for "allegedly ordering OPD officers not to respond to disturbance calls and several other charges ranging from forgery to money laundering. Also still facing both federal and state charges in connection with the patrols is former OPD Maj. Ronnie Trahan," who was "charged last week in federal court with aiding and abetting Caillier in the filing of a false claim for reimbursement on the patrols."

The Baton Rouge Advocate (10/31, Burgess) reports Caillier and Trahan "were accused in a federal investigation that focused on a $225,000 U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development grant for bicycle patrols at public housing projects in Opelousas from 2000 to 2003. … Trahan told investigators that Caillier directed him to falsify time sheets to ensure that the Police Department billed $3,000 every two weeks, regardless of whether the money was earned by patrolling officers."

US To Retry Pellicano-Related Perjury Case. The Los Angeles Times (10/31, Krikorian, 918K) reports, "Federal authorities announced Monday that they will retry a former phone company employee acquitted last month of four of five charges in the first trial resulting from the wiretapping investigation of indicted private investigator Anthony Pellicano and others. Citing 'compelling' new evidence in the case, Assistant U.S. Atty. Daniel Saunders told U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer that the government would again prosecute Joann Wiggan for perjury for allegedly lying to a federal grand jury last October when she said she never retrieved a single message from her voicemail account at work. … Additionally, Saunders said, he expects a superseding indictment with additional charges against Wiggan to be returned in two weeks." The Times notes, "Though separate from the larger Pellicano case, the prosecution of Wiggan arose from the same FBI probe of the former private eye and allegations that he and others used a variety of illegal means, including wiretaps, to benefit his clients."

DOJ_NMG_0088768

California Energy Company CEO Sentenced To Eight Years In Prison. The Orange County Register (10/31, Hammill) reports, "The former CEO of a defunct Los Angeles energy company who participated in a fraudulent investment scheme was sentenced to eight years in federal prison at the United States District Court in Los Angeles on Monday." Illya Bond "was also ordered by District Court Judge Percy Anderson to pay over $2.4 million in restitution to victims of fraud involving the PowerSource Corporation, a fraudulent company he formerly helmed. A federal jury convicted Bond on charges of conspiracy, mail fraud, wire fraud and making a false statement to special agents with the FBI in a January decision. He is the last in a series of seven defendants with ties to the company to be convicted and the sixth sentenced." KCAL-TV Los Angeles (10/30) noted, "Bond, who also used the name Frank Akberry, was convicted in January of conspiracy, mail fraud, wire fraud and lying to FBI agents."

Many States Restrict Halloween Activity For Sex Offenders. USA Today (10/31, Koch) reports, "Many sex offenders, limited in where they can live or work, are under another restriction today: no costumes, no candy giving, no jack-o'-lanterns, no welcoming front-porch lights." USA continues, "Some states go further to protect children on the holiday. At least 10 states keep a special eye on sex offenders via house arrest or required meetings, through such programs as Operation Boo in California and Operation Trick No Treat in Virginia." USA adds, "In New Mexico, a convicted pedophile or violent sex offender who lives alone has, for the first time this year, a sign outside his door today that notifies the public of his offense, says Tim Olsen, a regional manager of the New Mexico Corrections Department. He says offenders must stay inside and keep outside lights turned off. … New Mexico, New Jersey, South Carolina and Tennessee are into their second year of precautions, although Tennessee only recently announced its restrictions after phone calls from anxious parents." USA notes, "In Virginia, which began its Halloween program in 2002, high-risk sex offenders on parole or probation must report to offices where they are held for several hours while kids go trick or treating. … Some states have had Halloween restrictions for years but are increasing surveillance. New York, which requires offenders to stay home between 3 p.m. and 6 a.m., is making checkup calls and unannounced visits. … Other states with Halloween restrictions include Illinois, North Carolina and Wisconsin."

FBI Reports Fewest Police Killed On Duty Since 2001. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/31, Jordan) reports, "The number of police officers nationwide who were killed by criminals while on the job in 2005 dipped slightly from a year earlier, FBI data released Monday show. An estimated 1,800 fewer cops were assaulted during the same time period – the lowest total since 2001." The AP notes, "Traffic duty proved to be the most lethal assignment for the officers, the report shows. Fifteen cops were killed during traffic pursuits or on traffic stops, compared with eight slain while making arrests and another eight who were ambushed."

St. Louis Officials Dispute Top Crime Ranking. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (10/31, Kohler, 300K) reports, "Here we go again: A publisher in Kansas, using a formula decried by criminologists, says St. Louis is the most dangerous city in the United States. And city officials are fuming. … 'This thing is bogus,' grumbled Jeff Rainford, chief of staff to Mayor Francis Slay. But bogus or not, Rainford said, there is good reason to worry the ranking could hurt St. Louis. Nancy Milton, spokeswoman for the St. Louis Convention & Visitors Commission, said she fielded phone calls Monday from convention planners concerned about what they were hearing." The Post-Dispatch notes, "Morgan Quitno's assessment is based on a given city's rates last year in six crime categories…as reported to the FBI. … Richard Rosenfeld, a criminologist at the University of Missouri at St. Louis, said Morgan Quitno's methodology is flawed because it compares places like Memphis, which includes miles of outlying areas, to St. Louis, where the city limits barely extend from the urban core."

The AP (10/31, Leonard) reports, "Mayor Francis Slay makes no bones about it: Morgan Quitno Press is dead wrong to call St. Louis the most dangerous city in the United States. … 'To suggest that St. Louis is more dangerous than Miami, New Orleans, Los Angeles and Chicago - it just doesn't make any sense.'" The AP notes, "Slay took issue with the study's methodology. He said the group used population figures from the U.S. Census Bureau that were too low, exaggerating the crime statistics. … Scott Morgan, president of Morgan Quitno, said he used a population estimate of 346,000 derived from an FBI report. Changing the figure to 353,000 doesn't change St. Louis's ranking, Morgan said."

DOJ_NMG_0088769

Rankings Widely Noted In Local Media. Meanwhile, the Morgan Quitno rankings – officially released yesterday – garnered extensive local media across the country, with the stories all noting that the report was based on FBI crime statistics. Some examples: The Knoxville News Sentinel (10/31) reports Knoxville ranked "297th on a list of 371 cities," but "KPD spokesman Darrell DeBusk said the study appears flawed as far as Tennessee numbers are concerned." DeBusk noted, "All Tennessee law enforcement agencies use an incident based reporting system, versus the Uniform Crime Report system that most law enforcement agencies in the county use." The News Sentinel adds, "The FBI has recommended the incident based system as more accurate, but only a few states have adopted it so far, DeBusk said. … Visiting St. Louis on Thursday, FBI director Robert Mueller said it was too early to tell why some types of crime were rising faster in the Midwest. Mueller said the FBI is working harder to form partnerships with police departments to launch programs like St. Louis' Safe Streets task force, which focuses police efforts on problematic neighborhoods."

WAVE-TV Louisville (10/30, MacDonald) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "Louisville made the list of the 10 safest large cities for the second year in a row. … But like so many things right now, the ranking has turned in to a political issue, with some saying it proves crime fighting efforts are working here, and others saying just the opposite." WAVE noted, "Shortly after visiting with school children Monday morning, Louisville Mayor Jerry Abramson said the ranking is proof things are working here in the River City." However, "Councilman Kelly Downard has made crime a major part of his own campaign for mayor and he disagrees with the Louisville's ranking, calling it a 'fluke.'"

WLNS-TV Lansing (10/30, Arla) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "Two Michigan cities follow" St. Louis – "Detroit at #2, and Flint ranks third. Lansing ranks as the 96th most-dangerous city. The new list gives the perception Lansing isn't that safe, but the Lansing Police Department says their numbers tell a different story. … The Lansing Police Department says the company omitted many other crimes for its list, like arson or drug arrests. Therefore, the department doesn't believe the numbers give an accurate picture."

WSOC-TV Charlotte (10/30) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "Charlotte has been named one of the most dangerous big cities in the country, but police say the ranking is wrong. … Morgan Quitno Press used Federal Bureau of Investigation numbers to determine how safe the cities are," ranking Charlotte eighth. "Charlotte-Mecklenburg police, however, say the group shouldn't compare cities using that method, and it's misleading." C-MPD Chief Darrel Stephens "also said not all of the FBI numbers are used in the ranking, so the data is selective."

The Newark Star-Ledger (10/31, Spoto) reports, "The day after it was named the safest place in the nation, Brick Township was soaking up the good press. Residents flagged down police officers to praise them for their hard work, and neighbors, friends and business people congratulated themselves on their good fortune. … But some were more than a little suspicious," and the report "does have a few quirks." Morgan Quinto "looks only at municipalities of 75,000 people or more. Brick Township is on the low side of that cutoff with an estimated population of 80,000. It joined only 11 other communities in the state." Therefore, "554 of New Jersey's 566 towns were excluded."

CIVIL LAW:

High Court To Hear Phillip Morris's Appeal Of $79.5 Million Punitive Damages Award.

The Christian Science Monitor (10/31, Richey, 58K) reports, "Jesse Williams smoked two packs of cigarettes a day for 45 years. Following his death in 1997 after being diagnosed with lung cancer, his wife, Mayola, sued the Philip Morris tobacco company seeking $100 million in punitive damages. The Oregon jury that heard her case rejected the $100 million request. Instead, it awarded her $79.5 million. Tuesday, the case arrives at the US Supreme Court where lawyers for Philip Morris are asking the justices to strike down the punitive damage award as constitutionally excessive and fundamentally unfair. The case, Philip Morris v. Mayola Williams, is being closely watched to see whether a majority of justices are willing to issue strict guidelines to identify when a punitive damage award is unconstitutionally excessive."

The AP (10/30) reports, "Jesse Williams, according to his widow, never gave any credence to the surgeon general's health warnings about smoking cigarettes. … Nine years after Williams' death, the Supreme Court is considering this question: Can Williams' widow collect $79.5 million in punitive damages for fraud from the cigarette company Philip Morris USA?" The AP continues, "To the dismay of anti-smoking groups, the Supreme Court agreed to hear the company's appeal of a jury verdict in Oregon. … Philip Morris, the maker of Marlboros, is struggling to turn back unfavorable rulings by Oregon state courts in the Williams case. One ruling upheld the jury award after the Supreme Court sent the case back to Oregon once before to make sure it conformed to a 2003 high court opinion limiting punitive damages." The AP notes that "the Williams family is counting on justices to find that Philip Morris' conduct was so reprehensible that it justifies exceeding guidelines the court has laid out in two rulings in the past 10 years that struck down large awards. … One difference is that the earlier cases did not involve physical injuries. … The company doesn't deny making public statements rejecting a link between smoking and cancer; rather, it says there's no evidence Williams ever heard the statements or ever read them. … The court also will be looking at the decision of the state courts that declared it acceptable for the jury in the Williams case to consider harm by Philip Morris to other smokers for conduct similar to that which allegedly injured Williams."

DOJ_NMG_0088770

The New York Times (10/31, 1.21M), in an editorial, notes the Supreme Court "has already indicated that at some point punitive damages become so large that they violate due process. But it has done a poor job of identifying that point. Originally, it laid down some reasonable factors for lower courts to consider, including how reprehensible they considered the defendant's conduct. But in 2003, the court put forth the dubious proposition that punitive damages should generally be in a 'single digit' ratio to actual damages — so with actual damages of, say, $100,000, punitive damages should be under $1 million. Constitutional principles can seldom be boiled down to a formula, and it is difficult to see why the court should rein in juries so tightly."

6th Circuit Panel Upholds Kentucky Law Requiring Tobacco Payments. The AP (10/31, Barrouquere) reports, "Kentucky can continue to enforce laws requiring small cigarette companies to make payments to help cover smoking-related health costs, a federal appeals court ruled Monday." The AP continues, "The ruling means the state can continue collecting escrow payments from small cigarette companies that did not participate in the 1998 master settlement agreement between tobacco companies and 52 states and U.S. territories. Attorneys said it was the first ruling by a federal appeals court addressing the issue of whether states can force smaller companies to make the payments." The AP adds, "The landmark agreement in 1998 required payments to be made over 25 years and settled all of the state's lawsuits over the public costs of treating sick smokers. More than 30 states passed laws requiring nonparticipating cigarette-makers to make escrow payments. .. A three-judge panel from the 6th Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati turned away a challenge from three companies that said Kentucky laws effectively barred the businesses from selling tobacco in the state."

Tenet To Sell California Hospital. The Memphis Business Journal (10/31) reports, "The hospital that helped launch Tenet Healthcare Corp. on a painful four-year odyssey with the Department of Justice now has a new owner." The Journal continues, "Tenet announced late Friday that it had reached an agreement with a physician-owned company to take over the 306-bed Alvarado Hospital Medical Center in San Diego. The new owner, Plymouth Health, will pay $36.5 million for Alvarado, with the money going into Tenet general funds. The sale is expected to be completed by Dec. 31." The Journal adds, "Alvarado came under scrutiny four years ago when the Justice Department looked into the hospital's physician recruitment efforts, including the payment of some physician relocation expenses. The law is vague on the subject and two California juries were unable to reach a verdict in a case that was filed in 2003. … Tenet agreed to sell Alvarado as part of a deal to drop the case."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

US Makes Arrests In Arizona Human Smuggling Probe. The AP (10/31, Rotstein) reports from Tucson, AZ, "More than 40 people were arrested Monday in connection with a family-run smuggling ring that brought hundreds of illegal immigrants into the country, officials said." The AP continues, "The 44 arrests came after a two-year investigation into the ring, which operated out of the southern Arizona town of Bowie, officials said. Many of those arrested are American citizens, officials said. Eleven more suspects, including at least five Mexican nationals, remained at large Monday." The AP adds, "The ring recruited young women to smuggle migrants' infants through ports of entry, posing as their mothers, while the parents were smuggled through the desert separately, said John Lewis, the FBI special agent in charge in Arizona. … The operation smuggled people from Mexico into the U.S. for more than 10 years — most from Mexico, but also from El Salvador and the Dominican Republic, Lewis said. … 'This network organized, housed, fed, guided and transported large numbers of illegal aliens across the border,' said Paul K. Charlton, U.S. attorney for Arizona." The AP notes, "The suspects were named in an indictment this month. They included the suspected ring leader, Pablo Esteban Juarez, 31; his wife, Lori Gutierrez Juarez, 30; guides who walked people across the border; drivers who transported illegal immigrants; and 'money runners' who picked up smuggling fees."

DOJ_NMG_0088771

The Arizona Republic (10/31, Wagner) adds, "Although the so-called Juarez Alien Smuggling Organization is based in Bowie, federal agents also made arrests in nearby Willcox and in New Mexico, California, Minnesota and Ohio. 'This is not just a couple of coyotes,' said Deb McCarley, an FBI spokeswoman. 'This was the entire organization from top to bottom that we took down.'"

Many Voters To Face New ID Poll ID Requirements. The Wall Street Journal (10/31, D1, Conkey, 2.03M) reports many Americans used to being asked for IDs at airports and in bars "will also hear it when they go to the polls. That's because nearly half of the states have passed laws -- many since widely publicized irregularities in the 2000 presidential race in Florida -- requiring voters to prove their identity before they're allowed to cast a ballot." But the laws 'are sparking confusion, partisan rancor and a frenzy of legal challenges in the days leading up to the midterm election." And "any voter in any state is entitled to cast a provisional ballot if he or she encounters a problem at the polling place. States do, however, vary on how they determine whether a provisional ballot is later counted and how long a voter has to come back and prove his identity."

Voting Machine Company Denies Links To Venezuelan President. The Wall Street Journal (10/31, A4, Davis, 2.03M) reports Smartmatic Corp., "whose voting machines will be used in midterm elections next week, says it adopted a complicated ownership structure to minimize taxes and protect intellectual property, and not to mask any control by Venezuela's government." Smartmatic, which is "owned by Venezuelan entrepreneurs who split their time between Boca Raton, Fla., and Caracas, has been caught up in a government probe over foreign ownership. On Election Day, Smartmatic equipment will be used in 16 states, including Florida and California, and the District of Columbia." The actions "of the voting-machine company are being reviewed by the Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S. The committee reviews foreign acquisitions to see if they pose national security concerns."

The Washington Post (10/31, A4, Goldfarb, 748K) reports Smartmatic, the "nation's third-largest supplier of electronic voting machines said yesterday that it asked the federal government to review its purchase by a company controlled by Venezuelans to allay concerns that it is influenced by Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez." Smartmatic representatives "said that the Venezuelan government does not own and has never owned any part of the company."

Pentagon Said To Ignore Risks Of E-Mail Voting For Troops. The Washington Post (10/31, Nakashima, 748K) reports, "This year, thousands of soldiers around the world have the opportunity to vote in the Nov. 7 elections by e-mail." But computer security experts "inside and outside the government warned that the Pentagon's Federal Voting Assistance Program ignores the risks associated with unencrypted e-mail: interception, hacking and identity theft." The coauthor of a critical report, computer science professor David Wagner, said of the combination of faxing and e-mail options, "It's got all of the problems with unencrypted e-mail, plus your ballot is being routed through the Department of Defense. Will soldiers feel free to vote their conscience when they know that the DOD may be able to see how they voted? How do we know that the DOD or their contractors haven't modified soldiers' ballots in transit?"

Michigan Voters Split On Proposition To Ban Racial Preferences. The New York Times (10/31, Lewin, 1.21M) reports, "Three years after the Supreme Court heard Jennifer Gratz's challenge to the University of Michigan's affirmative action policy, she is still fighting racial preferences, this time in a Michigan ballot initiative." Gratz, a "white applicant who was wait-listed 11 years ago at the state's flagship campus here," said, "We have a horrible history when it comes to race in this country. But that doesn't make it right to give preference to the son of a black doctor at the expense of a poor student whose parents didn't go to college." The Times adds the ballot initiative, Proposition 2, "which would amend Michigan's Constitution to bar public institutions from considering race or sex in public education, employment or contracting, has drawn wide opposition from the state's civic establishment, including business and labor, the Democratic governor and her Republican challenger. But polls show voters are split, with significant numbers undecided or refusing to say where they stand."

DOJ_NMG_0088772

8th Circuit Panel Upholds Ban On South Dakota Abortion Warning Law Enforcement. The AP (10/31, Brokaw) reports, "South Dakota cannot enforce a 2005 law that would require doctors to give additional warnings to women who seek abortions, a federal appeals panel ruled Monday." The AP continues, "In a 2-1 ruling, the panel of the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld a lower court's ruling that has prevented the state from enforcing the law. Planned Parenthood, which challenged the measure, has demonstrated a likelihood it will win in its argument that the law violates the U.S. Constitution, the panel said." The AP adds, "The law, passed by state lawmakers in 2005, would require doctors to tell women that abortions end human lives and may later cause serious psychological problems for women who have abortions. A woman also would have to be told she has a legal relationship with her unborn child and that the relationship would be terminated by an abortion that would end the child's life. … U.S. District Judge Karen Schreier of Rapid City issued an order preventing the state from enforcing the law while the lawsuit proceeds. The judge said Planned Parenthood has a fair chance of succeeding on its claim that the law violates the free-speech rights of doctors. … The state argues that the required information is medically accurate and supported by science. State lawyers contend the law would not curb reasonable access to abortion in South Dakota."

South Dakota Abortion Ban Initiative Seen As Likely To Fail. The Washington Times (10/31, Wetzstein, 88K) reports a South Dakota ballot "measure to ban almost all abortions in the state is likely to fail by a wide margin, a new poll says." Fifty-two percent "of 800 likely voters said they would vote 'no' next week on a law banning all abortions except to save the life of a mother, according to the poll, conducted for the Argus Leader newspaper in Sioux Falls, S.D." Forty-two percent of voters "said they would vote 'yes' for the ban, and 6 percent were undecided, according to the survey, which had a margin of error of 3.5 percent and was released in the newspaper's Sunday edition."

Maryland Youth Prison Woes Become Campaign Issue. The Washington Post (10/31, B02, Otto) reports, "When the $60 million Baltimore City Juvenile Justice Center opened in 2003, it was hailed as the kind of solution Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) had promised when he campaigned for office. … Within a year, independent monitors were describing conditions there as bad as those in the state's most notorious juvenile jails. A U.S. Justice Department report this summer found that the center has failed to 'adequately protect children from youth violence.'" The Post continues, "When Cheltenham Youth Facility shut down several of its dilapidated cottages in January 2004, advocates heralded a move toward smaller, more specialized centers. But today, some of the state's jails remain so crowded that teenagers sleep on the floor. … As Ehrlich faces a tough fight for reelection this fall, his bold promises to fix one of Maryland's most troubled systems have vexed his campaign. … 'The system has gotten worse in the last four years,' Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, Ehrlich's Democratic challenger, said in a recent interview. 'We're writing off too many young lives.'" The Post adds, "The governor defends his efforts, saying in a recent debate, 'We have made great strides on our juvenile justice system. We've changed the whole paradigm there.' … Ehrlich did not mince words about the troubled system when he ran for governor four years ago and laid the blame squarely on his Democratic opponent, Kathleen Kennedy Townsend. As lieutenant governor, Townsend had taken on juvenile justice as a priority. … But problems with violence and mismanagement ran deep in many of the nearly two dozen state-run facilities entrusted with more than 2,000 young offenders. The state's juvenile boot camps had been shut down because of brutality."

Discord Within ACLU Described. In an op-ed for USA Today (10/31, 2.27M) Nat Hentoff, former member of the ACLU's national board, writes the ACLU "is in crisis, and impassioned supporters of its mission want change now. It's up to the national leadership to listen — and to resign. … ACLU members, donors, former staffers and board members, as well as civil liberties activists," are "supporting a website called SavetheACLU.org. The board of the South Carolina ACLU has also signed on. All are opponents of the present leadership — Executive Director Anthony Romero and President Nadine Strossen. … Particularly providing momentum to this rebellion was the decision of Romero's longtime predecessor as executive director, Ira Glasser, to become a leader of the opposition after initially remaining silent."

DOJ_NMG_0088773

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Probing Sony Electronics Unit. The AP (10/31) reports, "Sony Corp. said Tuesday that the U.S. Justice Department is probing its electronics unit." The AP continues, "The company received a subpoena from the Justice Department's antitrust division seeking information about Sony's static random access memory, or SRAM, business, company spokesman Atsuo Omagari said. … Sony intends to cooperate with the investigation, which it described as an industrywide inquiry." The AP adds, "Earlier this month, U.S.-based chipmaker Cypress Semiconductor Corp. said its SRAM operations were also under investigation by the U.S. Department of Justice. … A separate U.S. Justice investigation into price-fixing among DRAM companies has so far resulted in more than a dozen charges against individuals and more than $731 million in fines against Samsung Electronics Co., Elpida Memory Inc., Infineon Technologies AG and Hynix Semiconductor Inc."

SCOTUS Denies Stolt-Nielsen Appeal On Antitrust Amnesty Issue. The Wall Street Journal (10/31, A11, Anderson) reports, "The U.S. Supreme Court on Monday rejected Stolt-Nielsen S.A.'s last-ditch appeal to derail a federal indictment against it for price-fixing and other illegal cartel activities in the market for deep-sea chemicals shipping." The Journal continues, "The decision by the justices, announced with a brief order, clears the way for federal prosecution of the company on an indictment issued by a Philadelphia grand jury in September. Justice Samuel Alito, who worked on the case as an appeals court judge, recused himself." The Journal adds, "Stolt-Nielsen in 2004 became the first company to have amnesty revoked under the Justice Department's 13-year-old program. The company has waged an intense campaign to thwart Justice Department prosecution, arguing federal authorities wrongly canceled the amnesty agreement they had struck with the company that prevented its prosecution. Justice Department prosecutors, however, have argued in federal court that Stolt-Nielsen violated the terms of that agreement. … The Supreme Court in July and August twice turned away emergency appeals from the London-based shipping company before the indictments were announced. Stolt-Nielsen had asked the Supreme Court to review the ability of Justice antitrust officials to nullify the agreement without interference from federal courts."

The Financial Times (10/31, Waldmeir) reports, "Stolt-Nielsen volunteered information about antitrust violations in the parcel tanker market, in exchange for amnesty from the Justice Department. … But federal prosecutors later withdrew the amnesty and indicted the company, saying it breached its duty to co-operate. … 'These kinds of government [amnesty] programmes are not going to be worth anything if companies continue to be treated like this company was in this case,' says Robin Conrad of the National Chamber Litigation Center, legal arm of the US Chamber of Commerce, which argued that courts should have more power to enforce leniency deals."

Merck To Buy Sima Therapeutics For $1.1 Billion. The AP (10/31) reports, "Pharmaceutical company Merck & Co. said Monday it agreed to buy Sirna Therapeutics Inc., which is creating a new way to develop therapies based on RNA interference, for $1.1 billion in cash." The AP continues, "Merck's $13-per-share bid offers almost a 102 percent premium over Sirna's closing price of $6.45, down 5 cents, on the Nasdaq. Sirna shares surged $6.10, or 94.5 percent, to $12.55 in aftermarket electronic exchange trading. The stock's 52-week high is $8.52, set in April." The AP adds, 'Sirna's RNA interference technology offers a new way to develop medicines and shows great promise in cancer research, Merck said. Sirna's operations would complement RNA work Merck has been doing since its 2001 acquisition of Rosetta Inpharmatics Inc., the company said. … Sirna's leading clinical development candidate is for the treatment of the wet-form of age-related macular degeneration, part of a broad collaboration with Allergan Inc. in ophthalmic diseases."

The Wall Street Journal (10/31, A16, Johnson) reports, "The deal moves Merck into a leading position in the field, coming on the heels of its 2001 purchase of Rosetta Inpharmatics. That acquisition gave the Whitehouse Station, N.J., drug maker the tools to look closely at the genes in a genome. With Sirna, Merck will have the ability to target -- instead of just locate -- certain parts of a cell for destruction, said Mervyn Turner, Merck's senior vice president of world-wide licensing and external research." The Journal adds, "Merck believes RNAi technology holds particular potential in cancer research because it could home in on genes that control cancerous cells, destroying them without harming surrounding normal cells. … Sirna only has a handful of drugs in development. Its most advanced treatment, which is in the second of three phases of human testing, is targeted at the wet form of age-related macular degeneration, a leading cause of blindness in the elderly."

DOJ_NMG_0088774

Google Urges Microsoft To Allow Users' Search Choices. The AP (10/31) reports, "Google Inc. said Monday that it wants Microsoft Corp. to make sure users can easily choose Internet search engines in future products — but Google refused to say if changes Microsoft has already made to its upcoming operating system, Vista, have gone far enough." The AP continues, "David C. Drummond, Google's senior vice president of corporate development, spoke to reporters after meeting with European Union antitrust regulators but refused to give details on those talks, beyond saying there had been no particular agenda. … 'It's been our view that any new version of Microsoft products that include search, that that be done in a way that preserves user choice for search and other applications,' Drummond said. He said that Google would monitor the situation but that it was 'too early to tell' if there were would be any antitrust allegations arising from Vista." The AP adds, "Vista is Microsoft's first major update to the company's flagship operating system since Windows XP was released in late 2001. … Microsoft said this month it had changed Vista in several key sectors — including its search service — in an attempt to soothe European antitrust worries. Regulators had said they were concerned that computer manufacturers or consumers might be prevented from having a proper choice between different software packages."

Microsoft Withdraws From Efforts To Limit AT&T-BellSouth Deal. Bloomberg (10/31, Peterson) reports, "Microsoft Corp. distanced itself from a group lobbying for restrictions on AT&T Inc.'s proposed acquisition of BellSouth Corp., saying it won't seek to influence regulators weighing the purchase." Bloomberg continues, "The company, a founder of the It's Our Net Coalition, pulled its name from the member list after deciding not to weigh in on the $82 billion deal, spokeswoman Ginny Terzano said Monday. The group wants net neutrality rules to bar telephone and cable providers from charging new priority-access fees. … The 172-member coalition last week urged the Federal Communications Commission to impose 'meaningful and effective net neutrality safeguards' on the BellSouth deal. The group wants the FCC to bar AT&T, the biggest U.S. phone company, from favoring some companies over others that offer the same type of Web content or services, depending on how much they pay. … 'Microsoft has withdrawn its name from the It's Our Net Web site' while the FCC considers the deal, Terzano said in an e-mailed statement. 'However, we continue to support and will pursue other opportunities to obtain meaningful network neutrality policies.'" Bloomberg adds, "Terzano declined to comment on whether Microsoft will restore its name to the site after the FCC rules on the BellSouth purchase or say if the company has quit the group. The commission is scheduled to vote on the deal Friday."

Schneider Electric To Buy American Power Conversion For $6.1 Billion. The Financial Times (10/31, Strauss, Cameron) reports, "Schneider Electric, the French electrical equipment group, on Monday agreed to pay $6.1bn cash for American Power Conversion of the US to boost its capacity in back-up supply systems for the IT sector." The Times continues, "Marking a bold start for Jean-Pascal Tricoire in his first year as chief executive, the deal will be Schneider's first big acquisition since the failed merger in 2001 with Legrand, a domestic rival, which the European Commission overturned on antitrust grounds." The Times adds, "Mr Tricoire said the APC deal was 'a significant strategic move' that would strengthen Schneider's position in the electrical distribution sector, the fastest-growing segment of its core business. … However, analysts questioned the timing and price, given the uncertain outlook for IT spending in the US market, which accounts for close to half of APC's sales."

The Wall Street Journal (10/31, C6, Levitz) reports, "Both companies specialize in the critical-power market, making gear that helps firms withstand blips and outages. APC's bread and butter is smaller power systems, while Schneider's domain is with bigger entities. APC, however, has been migrating into the larger market." The Journal continues, "The French company is trying to quickly eliminate 'one of its key competitors' and break into the North American small-company critical-power market dominated by APC, says Boston analyst John Quealy, of Canaccord Adams, adding that 'my guess is that they struck first with a knock-out-punch type take-out price.'" The Journal adds, "Schneider and APC, of West Kingston, R.I., have benefited from a trend of corporate spending to protect computerized data from the effects of even small interruptions. The trend is being driven by several factors. New York's 2003 blackouts caused many firms to realize they couldn't afford to be out of commission for several hours, while new federal health-care privacy laws have prompted medical centers to add to data capabilities, creating more need for protection."

DOJ_NMG_0088775

EU To Probe Qualcomm Royalties. Bloomberg (10/31, Newman) reports, "Qualcomm Inc., the world's second- largest maker of mobile phone chips, will be investigated by the European Union over allegations it overcharges Nokia Oyj, Ericsson AB and other handset manufacturers, people with knowledge of the situation said." Bloomberg continues, "The European Commission, the EU's Brussels-based antitrust authority, has told Qualcomm and phonemakers that it will open a formal probe of complaints over royalty rates in the next few weeks, said two people who declined to be identified because the decision isn't public. An EU probe could lead to Qualcomm being forced to lower its rates or fined as much as 10 percent of sales. … 'The impact on royalties would be significant and the impact on finances would be catastrophic,' said Richard Windsor, a mobile phone analyst at Nomura Securities in London. If the EU forces the company to cut the rate in half, Qualcomm's pretax profit in 2007 would drop by a third to $3.3 billion, he said. … The case focuses on how rewards are shared in the $200 billion industry to supply equipment for third-generation mobile phones, which allow users to access the Internet and play videos. Qualcomm contends it's owed royalties on all of the newest 3G handsets because it holds essential patents. Rivals say Qualcomm has fewer patents on 3G phones than on earlier generations and should lower its rates."

NYTimes Claims US Patent System Is "Broken." The New York Times (10/31, 1.21M), in an editorial, writes, "The broken American patent system has a knack for sanctioning the ridiculous. In the latest example, businesses are receiving patents for devising ways to obey the law — the tax code, to be more specific. What's next, a patented murder defense? As Floyd Norris reported recently in The Times, the broad category known as business-method patents (like patenting the idea of pizza delivery rather than the pizza itself) has expanded once again. Now it includes the legal ways that accountants and lawyers help their clients pay less tax. … Patents are supposed to encourage innovation, rewarding the individual for the greater good of society. But excessive or overly broad patents can slow business activity to the pace of cold molasses."

ENVIRONMENT:

Two Questioned In Probe Of California Wildfire. The Los Angeles Times (10/30, Willon) reports, "Investigators today questioned two 'people of interest' in the deadly Esperanza arson fire that killed four federal firefighters in Riverside County last week, a Riverside County sheriff's spokesman said. … No arrests were made and the people are not in custody." The Times continues, "The latest steps in the investigation came as firefighters expect to contain the blaze later tonight, the fifth day that the fire has burned. … Because four firefighters died, suspects could be charged with murder in connection with the arson. … 'We have two people we have questioned that are people of interest,'' Riverside County spokesman Tom Freeman said. 'Sheriff's personnel have not placed them under arrest.... We continue to work the case aggressively.' … The pool of reward money has reached $500,000." The Times adds, "Freeman did not provide any details about what led investigators to the two people, who were not identified. He said law enforcement and fire officials are investigating more than 250 leads that have been called into a special arson tip line. … Sheriff's officials cautioned that they may question many people in the ongoing investigation. … More than 50 investigators from the Riverside County Sheriff's Department, California Department of Forestry and Fire Protection, U.S. Forest Service and Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms are working on the arson case."

The AP (10/31, Hoffman) reports, "Sheriff's deputies took two men and three bags of material from a house in Cabazon, said neighbor Robert Dunham, 70, who lives three doors down from the residence a quarter-mile from where the fire started." The AP continues, "Authorities released little information about the two people who were interviewed at a sheriff's station and later released. No arrests had been made. … Authorities said the fire was deliberately set at the base of a slope in Cabazon, west of Palm Springs. Cabazon residents have said they saw two young men leaving the area where the fire began." The AP adds, "Since it started around 1 a.m. Thursday, the fire has burned 63 square miles, or 40,200 acres, as fierce Santa Ana winds swept through the region and fanned the flames. It was about 90 percent contained, and authorities expected full containment Monday night. It has destroyed 54 structures - 34 homes and 20 other buildings."

DOJ_NMG_0088776

Federal Investigation Finds Cost Cutting Contributed To BP Texas City Blast. The Wall Street Journal (10/31, A3, Cummins) reports, "Cost-cutting efforts by senior management at BP PLC contributed to a deadly explosion at a refinery in Texas last year, federal investigators said, a finding that ratchets up the legal stakes for the London-based oil giant." The board "alleged for the first time that high-level decisions to defer overhauls, cut staff and rein in costs at the Texas City, Texas, plant helped cause the accident, which killed 15 people and injured 180." The Journal says, "BP already faces a criminal probe into the accident as well as civil claims from victims and survivors' families. Though the board hasn't any regulatory role or prosecutorial powers, its findings could be taken up by civil litigants or by other agencies probing the disaster."

The Financial Times (10/31, McNulty) reports, "BP's global management was aware of 'significant safety problems' at the Texas City refinery and 34 other locations around the world well before last year's deadly explosion at the US plant, investigators said on Monday." The Times says, "The US Chemical Safety Board, an independent federal agency charged with investigating industrial chemical accidents, said internal BP documents prepared between 2002 and 2005 revealed knowledge of those problems before the March 2005 explosion killed 15 and injured 500 people in and around BP's biggest refinery." The CSB "report will also likely be used by the federal grand jury investigating whether to bring criminal charges against BP and its executives for the Texas explosion."

The Washington Post (10/31, D01, Mufson) reports, "The company said it has settled with the families of all but one of the workers killed in the Texas City, Tex., incident and with hundreds injured. But Brent Coon, the lead plaintiffs' lawyer in the refinery case scheduled to start next week, said that the Justice Department had been asking for documents for its own investigation. 'It's a good report,' Coon said. 'It says many of the things we've said all along.' … Merritt said that 'BP implemented a 25 percent cut on fixed costs from 1998 to 2000 that adversely impacted maintenance expenditures and infrastructure at the refinery.' She said maintenance spending had declined throughout the 1990s, when the refinery belonged to Amoco Corp. Once Amoco merged with BP, she said, further cuts were imposed. … In the 30 years before the explosion, a worker had died in an accident at the Texas City refinery on average of once every 16 months. … BP, while conceding responsibility, disputed Merritt's conclusions."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Former FBI Agent Sentenced For Giving Information To Suspected Spy. The Los Angeles Times (10/31, Krikorian) reports, "Seven years after she was suspended for allegedly disclosing classified material to a suspected Chinese spy, former FBI agent Denise K. Woo was sentenced Monday to probation and a $1,000 fine for improperly sharing confidential information, a misdemeanor." The Times continues, "Woo, 47, of Redondo Beach was transferred from white-collar investigations to a counterintelligence squad pursuing Chinese intelligence agents after her bosses learned in 1999 that she was friends with Jeffrey Wang, a Torrance engineer suspected by the FBI of committing espionage for China. Wang was never charged with a crime. … After her transfer, interviews show, she became convinced that Wang was innocent of wrongdoing and had been falsely accused of espionage by an FBI informant." The Times adds, "Though no charges were filed against Wang, Woo was accused by the FBI of inappropriately disclosing information about the probe to Wang. Suspended and later fired, Woo was then indicted two years ago for allegedly disclosing the existence of a national security wiretap on Wang's home telephone, revealing to Wang the identity of the FBI's confidential informant and lying to FBI agents. … Those felony charges, which carried a minimum 10-year prison sentence, were subsequently dismissed when Woo acknowledged in June that she had improperly passed along information about the FBI's confidential operative to Wang in October 1999." The Times notes, "Though authorities had no comment about the plea agreement, Woo said she had been unjustly accused at great personal expense to her and her family. … 'This is kind of a bittersweet ending to a long and continuing tragic injustice,' Woo said minutes after U.S. District Judge Gary Klausner imposed the sentence. 'I am relieved that after years of false allegations, my family and I can finally get on with our lives.'"

Record Number Of Marijuana Plants Seized This Year In California. The AP (10/31) reports,

DOJ_NMG_0088777

"California authorities seized a record number of marijuana plants this harvest season, uprooting nearly 1.7 million plants they valued at more than $6.7 billion, the state Department of Justice said Monday." The AP continues, "The 1,675,681 plants seized under the Campaign Against Marijuana Planting program beat last year's record of 1.1 million plants." The AP adds, "The state Justice Department's Bureau of Narcotic Enforcement, which leads the program, said the increase is largely due to more eradication teams, better aerial surveillance and air transport of law enforcement officers to the illegal plots. Gardens also are getting bigger, it said. … The program includes local, state and federal agencies that conducted 477 raids in 34 counties between late July and early October. Authorities said they made 27 arrests and seized 29 weapons. … Lake County had the most plants seized, with 314,603. It was followed by Shasta County (227,488), Mendocino (135,736) and Fresno (102,814)."

Law-Enforcement Official's Son Remains Free Despite Pleading Guilty To Marijuana Charge. The New York Post (10/30, Alpert) reports a nationally known law-enforcement official's son, who "pleaded guilty nearly a year ago to trying to buy 400 pounds of pot from an undercover agent, is still free, while his co-defendant languishes in federal prison. Sean Timoney, 26, pleaded guilty on Dec. 21, 2005, to conspiring to possess with intent to distribute marijuana. Since then, his sentencing date has been postponed twice, allowing him to work and undergo drug counseling, his lawyer said." The younger Timoney "was busted Nov. 1, 2005, along with Jae Seu, 23, after they handed over a duffel bag stuffed with nearly $450,000 cash to a undercover Drug Enforcement Administration agent in a Rockland County motel room as a down payment for the marijuana. But the whole episode was a sting captured on tape, and Timoney and Seu were arrested as they left the motel."

Modern Trends Seen As Aiding Narcogangs. In the San Antonio (TX) Express (10/30), Henry Catto writes, "Modern trends in agriculture and communications and an insatiable desire among North Americans and Europeans for cocaine and heroin led to the growth of today's criminal narcogangs, which are prepared to do whatever it takes to supply these deadly habits. The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration estimates that 90 percent of the cocaine powder smuggled into the United States comes from Colombia. … Democracy seems to have provided some hope of solving these problems. Two good presidents in a row, Andres Pastrana and Alvaro Uribe, have made a difference."

Pennsylvania Man Accused Of Impersonating DEA Agent. The Pittsburgh (PA) Tribune-Review (10/31) notes that a Greensburg man "is in the Westmoreland County Prison after allegedly impersonating a federal Drug Enforcement Administration agent and choking a man at a Donegal Township bar." According to the Tribune-Review, Richard McCormick told police he was a DEA agent and was attempting to get another man to comply with his instructions.

White House Criticized For "Campaigning" Against Marijuana Initiatives. In the New York Times (10/31), op-ed columnist John Tierney writes, "This year the White House drug czar, John Walters, and his minions have been out campaigning in Nevada, Colorado and South Dakota, which have marijuana initiatives on the ballot. The drug warriors are still sounding the discredited alarms about youths turning into potheads. Their fervor's not surprising — they may even believe their own hype. What's surprising is the political stupidity of the meddling. Westerners, no matter what they think of marijuana, don't appreciate sermons from federal officials on how to vote." According to Tierney, in 2002, when the White House "campaigned against another marijuana ballot initiative in Nevada, the state's attorney general said it was 'disturbing' to see the federal interference in a state election."

SAFER Campaign Manager Seen As Fueling Colorado Marijuana Movement. According to the Washington Times (10/31, Richardson), if Coloradans "vote to legalize marijuana statewide next week, it will be almost entirely because of the efforts of a pudgy, clean-shaven 24-year-old University of Richmond graduate. Mason Tvert, campaign manager for Safer Alternatives for Enjoyable Recreation, has pushed Colorado to the forefront of the marijuana movement, first with his successful 2004 Denver campaign and now with the statewide Amendment 44. … Federal drug czar John P. Walters visited Colorado three times this year to denounce the effort, which almost every state lawmaker opposes. What Mr. Tvert brings to the table are energy, imagination, a knack for attracting free press and relentless tactics."

DOJ_NMG_0088778

In California, Court Ruling Keeps County From Joining Medical Marijuana Lawsuit. The Desert Sun (10/30) reports Riverside County "will not join a legal challenge to California's medical marijuana law, scheduled to be heard in San Diego Superior Court Nov. 16. The county Board of Supervisors voted earlier this month to join the suit originally filed by San Diego, San Bernardino and Merced counties, but the court ruled Friday that Riverside would not be allowed to join the case. 'The court felt it was too late to intervene in the pending action in San Diego,' said Pam Walls, assistant county counsel." The suit "seeks to overturn state requirements that counties issue medical marijuana identification cards to patients with a doctor's recommendation to use the drug."

Chargers Linebacker Accused Of Violating NFL Drug Policy May Drop Appeal. The New York Times (10/31, Schmidt) reports San Diego Chargers linebacker Shawne Merriman "plans to drop his appeal of the four-game suspension he has received for testing positive for a performance-enhancing substance. A deal between Merriman's lawyer and officials from the National Football League over when the suspension would take effect was being worked out last night. … If Merriman does not drop the appeal by noon today, he must proceed with the appeal hearing that is scheduled for Nov. 7 in New York. The N.F.L., which has not commented directly on Merriman's case, is expected to announce the suspension as soon as Merriman drops the appeal."

The San Diego Union-Tribune (10/30) reports Merriman, who "tested positive for the banned steroid Nandrolone earlier this month, maintains he was the victim of a tainted supplement. But he also knows he is unlikely to win his appeal based on the NFL's clearly stated policy that players are responsible for what they put in their body."

The AP (10/30) reports that if the appeal process "drags out and he loses, he could miss both of the Chargers' games against AFC West rival Denver, on the road Nov. 19 and at home on Dec. 10. The Chargers and Broncos are tied for the division lead at 5-2."

Armed Pennsylvania Man Shot By Police Had Previous Gun Conviction. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (10/30, Ove) reports, "The man shot by a Pittsburgh police sergeant in Beltzhoover yesterday after police said he pointed a gun at them is a felon who wasn't allowed to have a weapon and had already spent time in prison for carrying an illegal gun." The Post-Gazette continues, "Court records indicate Jamaar A. Blakey, 22, was on probation following a gun conviction in U.S. District Court in 2004. … Mr. Blakey, who is in serious condition at Mercy Hospital with a wound to his chest, was indicted in June 2004 under Project Safe Neighborhoods, a U.S. Justice Department initiative to combat gun violence that has sent many Pittsburgh-area felons to federal prison in recent years. Under federal law, felons can't have guns or ammunition." The Post-Gazette adds, "Mr. Blakey, who also has several drug convictions, was sentenced in November 2004 to 30 months in federal prison for possession of a handgun and ammunition on Feb. 28 of that year. He was released on Aug. 24 of this year and was serving three years of supervised release, the federal version of probation. … Pittsburgh police shot Mr. Blakey after they said he pointed a gun at an officer following a brief car chase.

Federal Agents Arrest Salt Lake City Pipe Bomb Suspect. The Salt Lake Tribune (10/31, Bergreen) reports, "Federal authorities have arrested a former Utah resident with possession of an unregistered destructive device stemming from a bomb explosion in September that caused the evacuation of the Salt Lake City Main Library. The single federal charge against Thomas James Zajac, formerly of Salt Lake City and Provo, was filed Friday and unsealed Monday after a joint investigation by the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, the Salt Lake City Police Department and the FBI." The Tribune notes, "The bomb…exploded on the third floor, destroying a large, double-paned window, but it caused no injuries."

IMMIGRATION:

Border Arrests Down 8.4%. The AP (10/31, Yen) reports, "US Customs and Border Patrol agents made fewer arrests of illegal immigrants trying to enter the country last year, the government said Monday in a report that credits stronger enforcement. Arrests fell 8.4 percent from 1.2 million in fiscal year 2005 to 1.1 million last year. It was the first decrease since 2003, the Homeland Security Department said in releasing its annual statistics on illegal immigration." The AP adds, "Statistics released Monday also show the government: Removed a record 186,600 illegal immigrants from the United States in the past year. That's a 10 percent increase from 2005. … Bearly tripled the number of fugitive operations teams, from 18 to 50, as part of efforts to locate, apprehend and remove criminal aliens."

DOJ_NMG_0088779

The Washington Post (10/31, A5, Hsu, 748K) reports DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff "credited the drop of nearly 100,000 apprehensions largely to the Bush administration's strategy of deporting virtually all non-Mexican border crossers as fast as they are caught, deterring them and others in what had been the fastest-growing group of illegal immigrants. After quadrupling the previous four years, apprehensions of "other than Mexican" border crossers fell 57,144, or 35 percent, to 108,026 last year." However, "analysts immediately disputed Chertoff's claim of an unprecedented decline in arrests. … Experts instead called yesterday's announcement the administration's latest effort to walk a political tightrope in its handling of illegal immigration heading into the Nov. 7 congressional elections."

The Washington Times (10/31, Seper, 88K) notes Chertoff also "said a guest-worker program was needed to slow the flow of illegals into the United States, although conservative House Republicans have blocked efforts by the Bush administration to pass a temporary-worker bill. He said getting control of the border without such a program would be 'very, very difficult.'"

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Treasury To Pare Note Offerings After Drop In Budget Deficit. The Wall Street Journal (10/31, C7, 2.03M) reports, "The Treasury is expected to pare its three-year note offerings in this quarter's refunding, a move analysts say is a minor adjustment after the drop in the budget deficit." The Treasury "is likely to announce tomorrow the sale of $33 billion in debt securities, comprising $20 billion in three-year notes and $13 billion in 10-year notes, according to the median estimate of eight dealers surveyed by Dow Jones Newswires. That amount of three-year notes would be $1 billion less than last quarter's sale." The Treasury "yesterday reduced its estimate of the quarter's borrowing needs by 39% to $63 billion, citing a surge in corporate-tax receipts that left it with more cash than expected. But it also said borrowing needs would rise to a quarterly record of $175 billion in the January-March period."

Growing Influence Of Inspectors General Examined. The Federal Times (10/31, Friedman) reports, "Under a cover that includes an image of a woman's midriff, a report released last month by the Interior Department's inspector general sums up thousands of employee visits to pornographic and gambling Web sites on office computers. … An Oct. 11 report by the Justice Department IG details a former Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives Bureau director's request for a lavish office with features like remote-controlled doors. … And at the Education Department, a September IG report describes officials' efforts to steer purchases away from disfavored textbook makers. The report quotes an e-mail in which a program director wrote, 'They are trying to crash our party and we need to beat the [expletive] out of them.'" The Times continues, "The spate of headline-grabbing revelations underscores a trend. With the explosion of government procurement and more contracts to audit, and with an expanded law enforcement role in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks, inspectors general have more work and responsibilities, observers of the oversight community say. … 'The mission of the inspector general has broadened very substantially over the years,' said former Transportation Department IG Kenneth Mead. … And more responsibility may mean more clout. The Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction got expanded budgetary purview through legislation signed Oct. 17 by the president. Earlier this month, the Justice Department announced the formation of a task force, composed mostly of IGs, to investigate procurement fraud. A House bill, currently before the Government Reform Committee, would make IGs harder to fire and allow them to submit budgets straight to Congress and the Office of Management and Budget, instead of agency heads. The legislation could include steps to increase coordination among IGs and other oversight organizations. The measures are intended to increase IGs' independence, which some think is lacking at agencies where IG budgets are controlled by management."

House Democrats Face The Prospect Of Divisive Leadership Contests. The Washington Post (10/31, A3, Romano, Weisman, 748K) reports, "As Democrats enter the final days of their push to take back control of the House in next week's election, two divisive backroom leadership fights are brewing within the party, raising fears that Democratic unity could be fraying even before the first votes are cast. For some Democrats, the battle between Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (Md.), the minority whip, who had been expected to ascend to majority leader without opposition, and Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.) threatens the party's efforts to appear ready to govern. In what could be another high-profile showdown, Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), the ambitious former White House aide who runs the Democratic campaign arm of the House, may seek the third-ranking post of majority whip, pitting him against Democratic Caucus Chairman James E. Clyburn (S.C.), the only African American in a leadership position." The Post notes, "This could exacerbate racial strains in the House, since both the Congressional Black Caucus and the Congressional Hispanic Caucus have complained that Emanuel is insensitive to minority concerns.

DOJ_NMG_0088780

Democrats' Chairpersons Would Be Older, More Diverse. USA Today (10/31, Kiely, 2.27M) reports, "A Democratic takeover of the U.S. House would put more women and minorities in positions of power, as well as more senior citizens." House minority leader Nancy Pelosi "already has signaled that she will name committee chairpersons based on seniority. Republican Speakers Newt Gingrich and Dennis Hastert sometimes did not do so. The gavel would go to at least four African-Americans, including John Conyers of Michigan at the Judiciary Committee helm and three women, including California's Juanita Millender-McDonald and New York's Nydia Velázquez, who would be the only Hispanic committee leader. Barney Frank of Massachusetts, who is openly gay, would lead a committee. Currently, all of the House GOP committee chairmen are white and male. It would also increase the age of House chairpersons. In January 2005, 11 Republican committee leaders were younger than 60. Seven prospective Democratic chairpersons will be over 70 when the 110th Congress convenes in January."

NASA Creates Venture Capital Firm To Finance Innovations. The Washington Post (10/31, A19, Kaufman, 748K) reports, "Hoping to tap the innovation and daring of small aerospace and biomedical companies, NASA has created and funded a nonprofit venture capital firm that will invest government money in promising but underfinanced companies. The fund, called Red Planet Capital, is the government's third experiment with venture capitalism, after similar efforts sponsored by the CIA and the Army. Red Planet marks the first time that the federal government has started a venture capital fund for civilian purposes, but it is hardly a stretch. That is because a former president of the CIA-sponsored venture fund is Michael D. Griffin -- now the administrator of NASA." According to the Post, Lisa L. Lockyer, NASA program manager for the project, "said the fund will not only invest on its own in cutting-edge companies but will also join private venture capital firms to form investment syndicates. Together, she said, those partnerships will be able to invest far more money in selected companies than the government could. The NASA fund, which will be managed by three venture fund veterans selected by the agency through a competitive process, will receive $75 million in taxpayer funds over five years." NASA is interested in new rocket technologies, but "the agency is also looking for strategies and products related to keeping astronauts safe and healthy in space for long periods of time, Lockyer said."

Fate Of Hubble Telescope To Be Announced Today. USA Today (10/31, 5A, Watson, 2.27M) reports that NASA Administrator Michael Griffin will announced today "whether the space shuttle will pay a service call to Hubble. If Griffin says yes, a flight to install two new scientific instruments, fix a third and upgrade telescope systems could launch as early as next winter. Despite the uncertainty, NASA engineers and astronauts have been quietly toiling on a plan to rescue the telescope. Space agency personnel have created new Hubble repair tools. They have outlined a rough mission schedule. And they have developed new repair techniques in hopes of fixing one of America's most cherished scientific instruments." The repair work itself is extremely delicate. Also, NASA "has added new safety precautions to every shuttle flight since shuttle Columbia disintegrated in 2003. Now every shuttle crew must spend an entire day in orbit inspecting the ship's thermal shield, a procedure that demands precious time and fuel. 'The biggest challenge … (is) how do we pack everything we need to do to assure a safe vehicle into a typical Hubble mission?' says astronaut Joseph Tanner, whose four shuttle flights included one to Hubble in 1997. 'It's not business like it used to be.'"

DHS, DOD Workers Brace For New Pay-For-Performance Systems. Under the headline, "Transition To Pay For Performance Makes Some Anxious," the Washington Post's (10/31, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "Many federal employees fear that as many tricks as treats lie ahead with their new pay systems." Bush

DOJ_NMG_0088781

"administration officials acknowledge that changes planned for two large departments, Defense and Homeland Security, have created a fair share of anxious employees. Some of that anxiety appears based on concerns that the new pay-for-performance systems could be manipulated to lower the government's payroll" and "pension costs" though the OPM, "which had a hand in designing the new systems" for DoD and DHS says, "that should not happen." The Post adds, "Under the new approach, the decades-old General Schedule, which provided predictable pay raises, will be replaced with the National Security Personnel System," and instead "of providing an across-the-board raise to all employees, as the General Schedule permits, the two departments will provide higher raises to their best workers and smaller or no raises to their low-rated employees."

Federal Government Decisions Said To Exacerbate DC Region Sprawl. The Washington Post (10/31, A1, MacGillis, 748K) reports, "As they battle sprawl, Washington area leaders say they face a stubborn foe, and it's not greedy developers or the tyranny of the automobile or the desire for big houses. It is the United States government. In scattering employees to the region's outer edges, local officials and planners say, the federal government has undermined efforts to concentrate growth near public transit and the area's urban core -- the strategy local officials see as key to reducing traffic and conserving resources in a booming region. The U.S. government, they say, has become a kind of master planner, making decisions, with little local input, that will shape Washington's commuting and development patterns for years."

OTHER NEWS:

Incomes, Savings Up Last Month. The New York Times (10/31, Peters, 1.21M) reports, "Americans' incomes rose last month at the quickest pace since June, but consumers did not respond by rushing out to splurge as gasoline prices fell from their summer peak. Instead, they spent at about the same pace and put more money aside. As a result, the nationwide personal savings rate came the closest it has in a year and a half to climbing out of the red." The Commerce Department "reported yesterday that personal income in September increased at a seasonally adjusted annual pace of 0.5 percent, compared with 0.4 percent in August. Personal consumption spending, meanwhile, rose 0.1 percent in September after a 0.2 percent increase in August." The net personal savings figure "improved in September to a seasonally adjusted annual pace of minus $15 billion, compared with minus $49 billion in August. And while Americans are still living richer lives than their paychecks can sustain, savings have not been healthier since May 2005. They have been in the red since the month before, in April 2005."

"Slowing Economy" Said To Have Pushed Oil Prices Lower. NBC Nightly News (10/30, story 6, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There is news on the economy tonight. It turns out a slowing economy had a big impact on the price of oil today. Crude dropped $2.39 today to $58.36 a barrel."

Gasoline Prices Rise Slightly After Sustained Drop. USA Today (10/31, Healey, 2.27M) reports, "Gasoline prices are creeping back up after declining steadily for about three months. But there's disagreement about where prices go now. The U.S. average for a gallon of regular is $2.218, the U.S. Energy Information Administration said Monday, up 1 cent from last week." Fred Rozell of the Oil Price Information Service said, "I don't think we'll see any major increases until at least late February or early March. Numbers will hold steady or bounce between a fairly narrow range for a few weeks." But "EIA's latest fuel price outlook, published Oct. 10, isn't as optimistic. It forecasts an average of $2.29 for the current quarter. That means prices would drift back up about a nickel from the average $2.245 so far this quarter."

Economists Said To Be "Sharply Divided" On Whether Economy Is Recession-Bound. Under the headline ""Economists Sharply Divided On Where Economy Goes From Here," USA Today (10/31, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) reports, "November marks the five-year anniversary of the end of the last recession and the beginning of the latest US economic expansion." But whether the USA will have another five years of economic growth without sliding into recession -- at least matching the record 10-year expansion that ended in 2001 -- is an issue that sharply divides economists." In a USA TODAY "survey of economists conducted Oct. 13-18, 24 said the economy will continue to expand for at least another five years. But another 24 said the expansion will likely be truncated by a recession sometime before November 2011."

Core Inflation Data Expected To Keep Fed From Raising Rates. The Wall Street Journal (10/31, Conkey, Walsh, 2.03M) reports, "A closely watched measure of consumer prices eased somewhat last month, but inflation remains a big question for Federal Reserve policy makers and the economy. The Fed's preferred inflation measure -- the price index for personal consumption expenditures excluding food and energy -- rose 0.2% in September after an upwardly revised 0.3% gain in August, the Commerce Department said. Compared with a year earlier, this measure of 'core' inflation was up 2.4% last month, less than the 2.5% pace in August." The Journal adds, "Despite the slight downtick last month, the annual increase in the measure of core inflation remains well above the informal range of 1% to 2% that Fed policy makers would prefer. At the same time, the economy's growth rate in the third quarter was considerably below normal." That combination, economists said, "will continue to keep the Fed from raising or lowering interest rates until it becomes clear which is a more serious threat."

DOJ_NMG_0088782

Banking Group Urges Simpler Credit Card Disclosure Rules. In an op-ed in USA Today (10/31), Ed Yingling, president and CEO of the American Bankers Association, writes, "With credit cards practically a necessity in today's marketplace, it's critical that consumers know how to use them. That's why the credit card industry is engaged in an effort, spearheaded by the Federal Reserve, to simplify and humanize the language we use. More important, this effort won't consist of lawyers and regulators imagining how consumers might react. The new disclosures will be tested with real, live consumers." Yingling continues, "Simpler won't be easy. As a recent study by the Government Accountability Office (GAO) points out, the legalese in credit card disclosures results from issuers' need to meet statutory requirements and their desire to avoid being sued. … So, there's work to be done on the disclosures — and we're doing it. Credit card lenders fully support the Federal Reserve's effort to make disclosures easier to read and understand so that consumers can make informed decisions." Yingling concludes, "Credit card customers have never had more choices or lower interest rates than they do today. … Broader access to credit for more people at lower rates — we think that's progress."

Bush Says "Terrorists Win And America Loses" If Democrats Have Their Way. Media reports on President Bush's campaign visits to Georgia and Texas emphasize the enthusiasm of the crowds, and what analysts are portraying as rather abrasive Bush rhetoric intended to fire up the GOP base. AFP (10/31, Lozano) reports Bush "charged that 'terrorists win and America loses' if opposition Democrats win November 7 legislative elections dominated by the unpopular Iraq war." Said Bush, "If you listen carefully for a Democrat plan for success, they don't have one. Iraq is the central front in the war on terror, yet they don't have a plan for victory. … The Democrat approach in Iraq comes down to this: The terrorists win and America loses. That's what's at stake in this election. The Democrat goal is to get out of Iraq. The Republican goal is to win in Iraq." The Los Angeles Times (10/31, Gerstenzang, 918K) says Bush unleashed "some of his toughest campaign attacks this political season," as he "listed several key anti-terrorism measures opposed by Democrats, noting that when it came to eavesdropping on suspected terrorists, detaining them or trying them, members of that party 'just say no.'"

The New York Times (10/31, Stolberg, 1.21M) quotes Bush saying, "We will not run from thugs and assassins." It was "a moment when the president could defend his record in Iraq to thunderous applause." The Times adds, "The back-to-back rallies created just the image White House strategists are seeking for the president in the waning days of the campaign: that of a confident leader, surrounded by adoring supporters. The intent is to fire up the party faithful and push them to the polls to vote, but at times it seemed as if Mr. Bush was the one getting fired up. The president seemed to relish playing the game of political expectations, as he tweaked Democrats for measuring for new curtains in Washington too soon." Said Bush, "You might remember that around this time in 2004, some of them were picking out their new offices in the West Wing." Bush "paused to absorb the laughter and applause, then added dryly, 'The movers never got the call.'"

Bush also noted the recent gay marriage court ruling in New Jersey. The AP (10/31, Loven) reports Bush "has for months cast the midterm elections as a choice about just two issues: taxes and terrorism. Now, with polls predicting bleak results for Republicans, he is trying to fire up his party by decrying gay marriage." Said Bush, "For decades, activist judges have tried to redefine America by court order. … Just this last week in New Jersey, another activist court issued a ruling that raises doubt about the institution of marriage. We believe marriage is a union between a man and a woman, and should be defended." The line, says the AP, "earned Bush by far his most sustained applause at a rally of 5,000 people" in Georgia, "aimed at boosting former GOP Rep.

DOJ_NMG_0088783

Max Burns' effort to unseat a Democratic incumbent." A summarized version of the AP story on Bush's remarks on marriage appears on USA Today (10/31, 2.27M).

Like the AP, the Atlanta Journal-Constitution (10/31, Baxter, 399K) also says Bush "got his biggest response when he criticized the New Jersey Supreme Court for its decision last week opening the door to gay marriage or civil unions in that state." With Republicans "invoking Halloween images of what could happen if Democrats take over the House," Bush yesterday "focused on a section of the country that could help stave off a GOP nightmare Nov. 7: Georgia." Burns "faces Democratic Rep. John Barrow of Savannah in a district redrawn by the legislature last year to increase the odds for a GOP victory. Bush, who flew to Texas for more campaigning after the rally, will return Tuesday to Georgia, where he will speak at the Georgia National Fairgrounds and Agricenter in Perry for 8th District candidate Mac Collins." Democratic Rep. Jim Marshall "is the target in that race -- another where the lines were redrawn."

The Washington Times (10/31, Dinan, 88K), in a story titled "GOP Staples Restored To Bush Campaigning," says Bush "has started campaigning on conservative staples such as judicial nominees, border security and defining marriage as between a man and a woman -- themes that have been absent for most of the election season, but which he is now using to energize the party's base." Fox News' Special Report (10/30, Hume) said it was "a rare sight this campaign season, President Bush on the offense against a House Democrat" in Georgia.

NBC Nightly News (10/30, story 4, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) briefly mentioned Bush's stop, "along with Sen. Kay Hutchinson, for the write-in candidate who is trying to replace delay who resigned earlier this year." The CBS Evening News did not report on Bush's appearances, but ABC World News (10/30, lead story, 3:10, Gibson, 8.78M) led its broadcast with the story, reporting Bush "will be out almost every day until election day, campaigning." ABC (Raddatz) added, "They are calling this a Texas victory rally. It would be hard to tell, given the enthusiasm of this crowd, that the President's poll numbers are so low. In Georgia this morning a crowd ecstatic to see the President. And the President pumped to deliver votes." Bush was shown saying, "We will win this election, because our priorities and our values do not shift with the latest political opinion poll or focus group." ABC also reported, "The President's stop in Georgia was in one of those rare spots around the country where a Republican…has a chance to take back a Democratic seat. And…in Sugarland, Texas, the district where Tom DeLay once ruled, Republicans write-in Republican candidate Shelley Sekula-Gibbs is in a fight to the finish with Democrat Nick Lampson. Tomorrow, the President travels to Georgia again, and later in the week, Montana and Nevada, where the strategy is the same. … In every one of these places, the President will deliver his new rallying cry, 'just say, 'no' to Democrats.' … But there are plenty of Republican candidates who have said, 'no' to George Bush, felling his presence, with the black cloud of Iraq hanging over him, can only hurt their chances. In Indiana, Representative John Hostettler, whose seat is vulnerable, is touting his opposition to the war."

The Houston Chronicle (10/31, Mack, Hanson, 535K) reports that in Sugar Land, Bush told "2,000 cheering Republicans…that they should 'bring your pencil' to the polls and write-in the name of Shelley Sekula-Gibbs to succeed Tom DeLay in the U.S. House." The Chronicle adds, "Most voters won't really need a pencil to cast write-in votes because they'll use electronic voting machines. If they write in the councilwoman's name, they'll turn a dial selecting the 18-letter name a character at a time."

Bush followed up his campaign appearances with an interview with Sean Hannity on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (10/30). The President said he is confident Republicans will hold both houses because "most people, when they take a look at the candidates, and the positions of the candidates, realize that protecting this country and keeping this economy going are the two most important issues. And you can't protect the country if you retreat from overseas and you can't keep the economy growing if you raise taxes and that's exactly what the Democrats in the house would like to do."

Hannity asked him if a Democratic victory would "make the country more vulnerable, more susceptible." Bush responded, "I think if you don't think we are in a war, that you can't win the war. And I think a lot of the national Democrats believe that…Iraq is a distraction and not part of the war on terror. They have said so. And I strongly disagree. One reason I disagree is because Osama bin Laden feels like Iraq is a part of this war on terror. He has made it clear that he would like for us to leave before Iraq can defend itself or govern itself and sustain itself, so that he can have a safe haven from which to launch further attacks."

DOJ_NMG_0088784

In the course of the interview, Bush also said, "The thing that amazes me is the Democrat party used to be the party of you know Harry Truman and John Kennedy and Franklin Roosevelt. People who understood that you need to confront problems so a generation of people could grow up in peace. You know, it sounds hike to me some of their leaders are becoming isolationists and that's dangerous. Some of our people are isolationist, by the way."

Under the headline "Bush Says 'America Loses' Under Democrats," the Washington Post (10/31, A1, Abramowitz, 748K) reports "Democrats reacted sharply to the latest White House attacks. Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) said Bush 'resorted to the same tired old partisan attacks in a desperate attempt to hold on to power.' House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) said Bush is looking to retain a 'rubber-stamp Republican Congress that has done nothing to change our failed Iraq policy.'"

Poll Finds Race For DeLay's Old Seat Now A Statistical Tie. The Houston Chronicle (10/31, Mack, 535K) reports, "The Republican write-in effort to hold former Rep. Tom DeLay's congressional seat, once viewed as a long shot, has created a tight race, according to a Houston Chronicle-11 News poll. Thirty-five percent of respondents said they would vote for a write-in candidate, a statistical tie with the 36 percent support for Democrat Nick Lampson, according to the poll of more than 500 likely voters in the 22nd Congressional District. … One voter in four is still undecided." Libertarian Bob Smither, "the only person besides Lampson on the general election ballot, drew 4 percent support."

Democrats Seen As Unlikely To Radically Change US Policy On Iraq. The Christian Science Monitor (10/31, LaFranchi, 58K) reports, "In poll after poll, prospective voters name Iraq as the No. 1 issue in the upcoming midterm elections. So if voters tip one or both Houses of Congress out of Republican control, what impact would that have on the US war effort in Iraq and, more generally, on American foreign policy? … Don't expect too much, most experts say. For one thing, Democrats are not of one mind on what to do about Iraq. And while committees chaired by Democrats might hold more meetings and call more testifiers critical of some White House policies, Mr. Bush would still retain the power of the presidential bully pulpit. In addition, Bush's foreign policy in the second term has already evolved in a direction - away from unilateralism and toward greater cooperation - that suits both Bush's political opponents and moderates in his own party, some analysts say. For others, the differences between Bush and the Democrats on the big foreign-policy issues are really a matter of details and not starkly black and white."

Morris Urges Bush To Talk Less About Iraq, More About North Korea. Political analyst Dick Morris, during an appearance on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (10/30) said President Bush "made a big mistake last week on Wednesday when he had that press conference about Iraq. What he needed to do was to focus attention on national and homeland security, and by talking about the war in Iraq, which would seem to be closely related issue, and he sees them as merged, he ultimately was talking about a thing people think he has failed on rather than something he succeeded on. The other thing that I think he has not done, which he should do in the next eight days, is talk about North Korea, North Korea, North Korea. Nobody thinks he is winning in Iraq. You have to realize that he is winning in North Korea."

Cheney Predicts A Democratic Victory Would Result In A "Massive" Tax Increase.

Vice President Cheney, during an appearance on Fox News' Your World with Neil Cavuto (10/30), was asked to predict what will happen if a Democratic majority in congress fails to renew President Bush's tax cuts, Cheney responded, "Remember the way the law is written. The cuts that we put in -- we cut the rate on capital gains and dividends to 15%. We reduced the marriage penalty and increased the child credit, phase out the death tax. … Those will automatically go back again -- the higher rates will automatically kick backing…around 2010 in most cases. So, if congress does nothing…rates are going up." Cheney added that if the Democrats become the majority party there will likely be "a massive tax increase, and I think that would do a lot of damage to the economy…it would raise the taxes on the average American family by a couple thousand dollars a year." Cheney also said, "I think the economy is in great shape. I look at where we have come when you think that we had to weather a recession, followed by 9/11, followed by Katrina – one of the worst natural disasters in history. The economy has come through all of that in great shape. …. I am hard put to think how the economy could be much better. … Housing is a little soft right now. But I think the economy is in great shape and a lot of that is due to the policies that the president and the Republican congress put in place, specifically the tax cuts."

DOJ_NMG_0088785

Larry Kudlow, on CNBC's Kudlow & Company (10/30) interviewed Cheney last night regarding issues of special interest to the investor class. During the interview Cheney noted that Republicans "have been very clear that we want to extend the tax cuts we put into place, and the 15% rate on dividends and capital gains, is absolutely crucial to the economy. And reducing the marriage penalty, increasing the child credit and reducing the death tax, all those things have been a vital part of our program. … My vote in the Senate is what passed the '03 tax package because it was in fact a tie vote and the Democrats overwhelmingly opposed the measures and we supported them. And as long as we're here you won't see legislation pass to raise those taxes. The fact of the matter is if we were not here and the Democrats were in control, then there would be a very real increase and a very real prospect of increased taxes."

Also during the Kudlow & Company (10/30) interview Cheney was asked why Republicans don't seem to benefiting from the recent stock market rally, and whether this reflects investors' preference for divided government, or, as Kudlow phrased it, "gridlock." Cheney replied that he believes the stock market "reflects the overall health of the economy and I like to remind people it is a Republican president and a Republican congress that put in place those tax cuts that, frankly, are at risk in this election. And if Charlie Rangel ends up as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, he said as much, he doesn't believe there is a single one of the Bush tax cuts that ought to be extended. And I think would be bad for the economy. And I don't know if the stock market would like it. I don't think it would."

Bush Family Takes Increasingly Prominent Role In GOP Campaigns. McClatchy (10/31, Montgomery) reports President Bush's "wife, father, mother, at least two of his siblings and a nephew have all become surrogate campaigners in the runup to the Nov. 7 midterm elections. … 'They're getting to seem more like the Kennedys,' said Stephen Hess, a professor of media and public affairs at The George Washington University, recalling the election-time activism of another famous political clan. 'There is no question that, on any particular day, they're all out campaigning for somebody.'" McClatchy adds, "the most visible family member on the campaign trail is first lady Laura Bush, who's shed any remaining vestiges of her reluctance about campaigning to plunge headlong into the 2006 political season. As of late last week, the first lady had appeared at 51 political events and helped raised $16 million. … Similarly, Bush's parents, former President George H.W. Bush and former first lady Barbara Bush, have repeatedly ventured out of their hometown of Houston to help their party's cause. The president's brother, Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, is also working on behalf on GOP candidates. Others have offered more limited assistance. George P. Bush, the son of Jeb Bush and the president's nephew, has appeared on behalf of several Hispanic Republicans."

Hastert Has Made Few Campaign Appearances Since Foley Scandal Broke. The New York Times (10/31, Leibovich, 1.21M) reports House Speaker Dennis Hastert "is spending a lot of time in his district these days." Hastert "had planned to be on the road in October, campaigning for Republican House members. But most of those events were canceled after Representative Mark Foley's sexually explicit e-mail messages to House pages became public and Mr. Hastert was criticized as not doing more to stop them. 'Sure, it bothers you,' Mr. Hastert said in an interview in his headquarters. 'But I understand, if I've got 15 television trucks sitting outside my house, and I've got a helicopter looking in the window, you probably don't want to bring that into somebody else's district.'" The Times notes Hastert "still makes a few carefully selected visits. He traveled Thursday to northeastern Tennessee, where he campaigned for the Republican candidate in a district no Democrat has carried in more than a century. On Monday, he was in Texas and Oklahoma City, where he attended a fund-raiser for a Congressional candidate whose Democratic opponent promptly accused her of aligning 'herself with the disgraced leadership of the Republican Party.'"

GOP Claims Turnout Success In Early Voting In Several Tight Races. The Wall Street Journal (10/31, McKinnon, Lovley, 2.03M) reports Republicans "say they have some good news in early-voting statistics that suggest their voter-turnout machine is providing an edge in some tight races." If the "trend holds, it could mean that early voting is growing -- and continuing to benefit Republicans, who exploited the practice in the 1990s." But Democrats "contend that Republicans are exaggerating their successes so far, by highlighting a few races, while ignoring problems they are having in motivating their troops around the country. Democrats also questioned several specific Republican claims, while noting their own early-voting numbers show they are starting to catch up with their rivals in early get-out-the-vote efforts in battleground states such as Iowa." Several of the examples Republicans "cite are coming from states and congressional districts where they have some of their strongest local organizations. And despite the strength of the Republican turnout machine in the past few election cycles, it's yet to be seen whether Republicans can replicate isolated success stories across the electoral map in a tight election year." The Journal reports the races cited by the GOP include NM1, the Ohio Senate race, FL13 and FL16, and GA3. Democrats "questioned the Republicans' claims, particularly regarding New Mexico's 1st District. They said Democrats are almost even with Republicans in the number of absentee ballots cast so far in the area, suggesting that the incumbent party is struggling even in a district where its volunteer organization is regarded as one of the best in the country."

DOJ_NMG_0088786

Democrats Play Catch Up In Microtargeting Strategy. The Wall Street Journal (10/31, A1, Dreazen, 2.03M) reports that in the "final week before the election, Democrats pushing to convert their lead in the polls into control of Congress are pinning their hopes of success on an increasingly common tactic for pumping up voter turnout: microtargeting." The technique "aims to identify potential supporters by collecting and analyzing the unprecedented amount of information now readily available -- from census data to credit-card bills -- to profile individual voters. Political strategists then tailor messages to entice those prospects to the polls, using the same methods marketers use to sell autos or aspirin to consumers." Microtargeting "could make the difference in important House and Senate races in states such as Minnesota, Ohio and Pennsylvania." Alexander Gage, "president and founder of TargetPoint Consulting, an Alexandria, Va., microtargeting firm that works for the Republican Party, estimates that successful microtargeting can bring congressional campaigns an additional 5,000 to 10,000 votes, a number that could be decisive in a House race." Democrats are "playing catch-up to Republicans, whose use of microtargeting in 2004 energized millions of new voters who backed President Bush." A "key player for Democrats is Copernicus Analytics, a small and little-known firm based here that made its name last year by helping to propel Democrat Timothy Kaine to victory in the Virginia governor's race. Big-money, Democratic-leaning clients from the AFL-CIO to Emily's List, a group that backs pro-choice female candidates, have enlisted Copernicus this election year." Focusing "on 29 races, Copernicus says it already has helped campaigns identify more than a million potential new supporters, a significant number given that many races in the closely divided nation are likely to be decided by thin margins."

Generic Ballot Edge Suggests Democrats Will Win House Seats. In an AP news analysis (10/31), Liz Sidoti says the Democrats' advantage on the generic ballot test in many polls suggests "Republicans are likely to lose House seats on Nov. 7," but "just how many seats — and whether the GOP sustains enough losses for Democrats to rise to power — is less clear." The "latest AP-AOL News poll showed 56 percent of likely voters said Democrats, while 37 percent said Republicans, a 19 percentage-point advantage less than two weeks before voters choose a new House. The gap was 10 percentage points in early October." Andrew Kohut of the Pew Research Center said, "The question traditionally has done a good job of measuring the popular vote, and the popular vote is a good predictor of the number of seats each party will win." The AP adds, "However, he and other analysts say, because congressional seats have been redistricted through the years to make Republican districts more GOP and Democratic districts more Democratic, there's less of a relationship between the popular vote and the exact number of seats won, which makes for somewhat unreliable forecasts." The AP report does not include a forecast of how many seats the GOP may lose.

Barone Says Midterm Outcome Unlikely To Create Long-Term Partisan Consequences. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (10/31, A18), Michael Barone says, "If the Democrats are justified in preparing to change the drapes today, the questions to ask are: How enduring will be such a partisan switch? How much change in public policy will it accomplish? To the first question, the likelihood of an enduring partisan switch is not high -- if you believe the polls showing the leading Republicans, Rudy Giuliani and John McCain, walloping the best-known Democrats, Hillary Rodham Clinton and Al Gore, in 2008. Changes in public policy? Well, the lead item on the Democrats' wish list is to raise the minimum wage, a law first passed in 1938. Not exactly a new idea. I don't know what the results of the midterm elections of 2006 will be. But I doubt that they will have the sweeping partisan or policy consequences of the midterm elections of 1874 and 1894, or 1938 and 1994."

DOJ_NMG_0088787

Network News Coverage Of Campaigns Said To Have Favored Democrats. In USA Today's "Media Mix" column (10/31), Peter Johnson reports, "Network news coverage has favored Democratic candidates in the midterm election, and the page scandal involving former congressman Mark Foley has been the main story line, drawing almost as much coverage as Iraq and terrorism combined, a new study finds." An analysis by the Center for Media and Public Affairs "of midterm election stories aired on the ABC, CBS and NBC evening newscasts Sept. 5-Oct. 22 found that 2006's coverage has been almost five times as heavy as in the 2002 midterm elections: 167 stories, compared with 35 four years ago." The study "found that three out of four evaluations of Democratic candidates' chances of winning — such as sound bites — were positive, compared with one out of eight for Republicans. Coverage has been dominated by two major themes: the effects of the Foley scandal, and the impact the Bush presidency is having on the party's congressional candidates." The Foley scandal "produced 59 stories alone, compared with 33 on Iraq and 31 on terrorism/national security issues." Director Robert Lichter said, "What's hurting Republican candidates is the media's focus on two non-candidates: Mark Foley and George W. Bush."

Midterm Campaign Ads Seen As "Most Negative" In Modern Times. The Christian Science Monitor (10/31, Feldmann, 58K) reports "experts say" the midterm election "is probably the most negative US election campaign in modern times. Nasty, misleading ads have been around for decades, and it's impossible to prove empirically that the 2006 campaign tops them all, but the wave of over-the-top claims has caught the attention of both casual observers and professionals." Evan Tracey, a campaign ad analyst at TNS Media Intelligence in Arlington, Va., said, "Politics has always been a contact sport, but it really does feel like the rhetoric has crossed a line. We've had ads with baby-crying noises from dumpsters, Playboy mansions, criminals coming over the border creating crime and mayhem. And that's the tame stuff." The Monitor adds, "Perhaps the most talked-about ad of this cycle took shots at Rep. Harold Ford (D) of Tennessee, who is running for the Senate. The ad - which ended with a blond, scantily clad woman saying, 'Call me' - was perceived by some viewers as racially motivated, since Mr. Ford is black and the woman in the ad is white." But as "distasteful as negative ads can be to the viewing public, many campaign experts defend them for their ability to provide useful information to voters." Brooks Jackson, director of the Annenberg Political Fact Check project, said, "There's nothing inherently wrong with negative advertising, if it's accurate." The Monitor adds, "Often, though, negative ads contain a kernel of truth that is distorted beyond the point of fairness." Between the "two House campaign committees, the Republicans are beating the Democrats in the race to the bottom. According to a report released last week on Factcheck.org, the NRCC so far this cycle has spent $41.9 million attacking Democrats and $5 million supporting Republicans - about 8 to 1 negative versus positive advertising. The DCCC has spent $18 million on attacks and $3.1 million on positive ads - a 5 to 1 ratio."

Each Of "Seven Worst Immigration Campaign Ads" Said To Come From Republicans. The Wall Street Journal (10/31, Rutkoff, Johnson, 2.03M) devotes its entire "Border Lines" column to the illegal immigration issue's impact on this year's midterm elections. The Journal notes that the New Republic Online features a "list ranking 'the seven worst immigration campaign ads,' which coincides with an editorial excoriating" the GOP, which is "the party behind each and every one. … 'The genre has several hallmarks,' TNR's editorial explains. 'It evokes a fear of lawlessness and a sense of growing social decay; it impugns opponents with a lack of patriotism (MITCHELL AGAINST ENGLISH LANGUAGE, reads the bottom of the screen in one of Representative J.D. Hayworth's ads3).'" Meanwhile, "All but the Hayworth ad, from Arizona, originate from states that are located far from the Mexican border."

Republicans Accused Of Debasing Political Campaigns. The Washington Post's E. J. Dionne (10/31, A21) writes, "this year's campaign will mark the moment when Republican leaders who govern in the name of conservatism turned definitively away from hope and waged one of the most trivial and ugly campaigns in our country's history. … My hope is that principled conservatives will rebel against those who are dragging their once forward-looking movement through the mud."

USA Today's DeWayne Wickham (10/31) claims Republicans "have dusted off their Southern strategy playbook" and are employing "subtle racism" as "a new twist on the more blatant appeals the GOP used to make to whites who were angered by the Democratic Party's embrace of the civil rights movement."

DOJ_NMG_0088788

Republican Defectors Running In Key Races Against Former Colleagues. The Washington Times (10/31, Hurt, 88K) reports, "Call it the year of the former Republican. At a time of widely expected Republican losses in both chambers of Congress, a new breed of politician has emerged: former Republicans challenging Republican incumbents." Virginia Democratic Senate candidate James Webb is "most famous," but then "there's Tim Mahoney, a Florida Republican-turned-Democrat running for the seat of disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley." In New York, "former Republican Jack Davis is giving Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds one of the biggest challenges of his career. Mr. Davis, a multimillionaire businessman, says he wants to end illegal entry without granting amnesty, opposes higher taxes and wants to kill the death tax." In Florida's 13th CD, "former banker and former Republican Christine Jennings is running as a Democrat for the seat being vacated by Rep. Katherine Harris. She, too, is running on tax cuts and greater fiscal responsibility in Washington." All are "the kind of Democrats that Republicans have a difficult time hating. Hearing them explain why they left the Republican Party is like listening to voters today talk about why a growing number of them are tired of Republicans in Washington."

New Jersey Gay Marriage Ruling Could Benefit Republicans. McClatchy (10/30, Thomma) reports, "In the final stretch before Election Day, embattled Republicans feel as if they've received a gift from an unlikely donor: advocates of gay marriage." Republicans "think that last week's ruling by New Jersey's Supreme Court ordering equal rights for gay couples - seven of whom had sued for the right to marry - is re-energizing Christian conservatives, who had been losing interest in and passion for politics. Republicans predict that could draw more conservatives to the polls next week, especially in the eight states that will vote on proposed amendments to their state constitutions to ban gay marriage." The eight states "comprise Virginia, Tennessee - coincidentally two states with razor-close Senate races that could decide which party controls the Senate next year - Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota and Wisconsin." Turnout among conservative Christians could also help the GOP candidate in Virginia's 2nd CD.

Democrats Making Inroads Among Evangelicals In Ohio. The New York Times (10/31, Kirkpatrick, 1.21M) reports Rep Ted Strickland, Ohio Democrat gubernatorial candidate "and former Methodist minister, opened his campaign…with a commercial on Christian radio vowing that 'biblical principles' would guide him in office. In his first major campaign speech, Mr. Strickland said 'the example of Jesus' had led him into public service. He has made words from the prophet Micah a touchstone of his campaign. Ohio, where a groundswell of conservative Christian support helped push President Bush to re-election two years ago, has become the leading edge of national Democratic efforts to win over religious voters, including evangelicals." The Times notes, "In 2004, 76 percent of white evangelical Christians in Ohio voted for" President Bush, but "in a recent New York Times/CBS News poll, 53 percent of the same voters approved of the president's performance, and 42 percent disapproved. … Strickland faces a Republican opponent, J. Kenneth Blackwell, who speaks just as openly about his evangelical faith, staunchly opposes abortion rights and same-sex unions and carries the endorsement of several nationally known Christian conservatives. But in a recent Quinnipiac University poll, Mr. Blackwell led Mr. Strickland among white evangelical voters by only three percentage points, which is within the margin of error."

Voters Disillusioned With Both Parties In Indiana. ABC World News (10/30, story 2, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "One of the earliest indicators" of how Democrats will fare in their effort to pick up 15 House seats to win a majority "will be Indiana. The polls close there early, and Republican incumbents are fighting to hold three seats there against strong Democratic challenges." ABC (Reynolds) added, "The voters' vocabulary in this Republican stronghold should give any incumbent pause. President Bush won the district by 13 points two years ago, but today," you "hear about Iraq all over." Worse for "the GOP is when Iraq isn't topic number one, corruption in the Congress is." Speaking with disillusioned Republican voters "all sounds practically like a commercial for the Democrats. Until you talk to a Democrat." A "bipartisan lack of answers, and an avalanche of attack adds. So no wonder why so were out here on a wet night to watch a high school football game. It's one contest they can cheer about."

DOJ_NMG_0088789

AFL-CIO Targeting Southern Races. Bloomberg (10/31, Chipman) reports the AFL-CIO "is pushing into unfriendly territory -- the South -- in an effort to gain new political friends and help its Democratic allies win control of Congress." The labor group "has included contests in at least five states in the largely non-union South on its list of targeted races in the Nov. 7 midterm election, one that it says is vital to the future of organized labor." The AFL-CIO "says it's spending a record $40 million this year to defeat Republicans nationwide. The money is being used to mobilize some 13.5 million union members, affiliated workers and their families through door-to-door visits, phone calls, direct mailings and leafleting." But some political experts "as well as Republican critics, eying organized labor's shrinking membership and declining clout, question whether the AFL-CIO can deliver enough votes to make a difference." Dick Wadhams, "campaign manager for Senator George Allen, a Virginia Republican who is one of the AFL-CIO's targets," said, "Union leadership is so oftentimes out of touch with its members that it's actually immaterial what union leaders do."

Snow Campaigns For Talent In St Louis. The AP (10/31, Kabel) reports that Sen. Jim Talent "was in the St. Louis area Monday night for a fundraising event that featured White House spokesman Tony Snow. The stop at the St. Louis Hilton Frontenac was one of more than a dozen Snow is making for Republican candidates around the country ahead of the Nov. 7 elections." Snow said, "There's no reason to do politics unless it's to make a difference. … If you've got the right attitude, you can get a lot of stuff done. Jim's done that." Snow "spoke on topics ranging from energy policy to the war in Iraq and how the nation has changed since Sept. 11, 2001. He said the U.S. operation in Iraq is a chance to spread democracy."

Webb Leads Allen In Two New Polls. The AP (10/31, Lewis) reports a "new statewide poll Monday showed Democrat Jim Webb with a slight lead in next week's close Senate race against Republican incumbent George Allen." Among likely voters, "the former Republican was the choice of 50 percent of those surveyed while 46 percent favored Allen and 4 percent were undecided." The poll of 597 likely voters (+/- 4%), was conducted by Opinion Research Corp. for CNN over October 26-29. Among the 'larger sample of 904 registered voters, the results were about even, with 48 percent of the respondents backing Webb, 46 percent for Allen and 5 percent undecided." The poll is "the first to show Webb with an advantage in a mean and expensive campaign in once reliably Republican Virginia whose outcome could be pivotal in determining whether an embattled GOP can retain control of the Senate." While Webb supporters "crowed over the results, longtime Allen adviser Christopher J. LaCivita said the poll was skewed because half of it was conducted over the weekend." The AP adds the "latter two days of the survey, however, reflect two intensive days of news coverage of Allen's claim that selected sexually explicit passages in some of Webb's six gritty novels about war are demeaning to women."

The Washington Times (10/31, Bellantoni, 88K) reports that in a Rasmussen Reports poll, Webb leads Allen "for the first time." The poll of 500 likely voters (+/- 4.5%), conducted on October 29, shows 48% would vote for Webb and 46% would vote for Allen. Webb "leads with 51 percent to 46 percent for Mr. Allen when the results include 'leaners,' or undecided voters who are leaning toward one candidate. When leaners are included, 3 percent remained undecided."

Coalition Of Black Political Leaders Endorse Steele. The Washington Post (10/31, B1, Wiggins, 748K) reports on the front page of the Metro section that a "coalition of black Democratic political leaders from Prince George's County led by former county executive Wayne K. Curry endorsed Republican Michael S. Steele's bid for the U.S. Senate yesterday." The support "from Curry, five County Council members and others barely a week before Election Day reflects their continued disappointment that the Democratic Party has no African American candidates at the top of the ticket and a sense that the county is being ignored, officials said." Ron Walters, "a political science professor at the University of Maryland, said the endorsements could be significant." Walters said, "This is going to go through the black community like a rocket. It's going to be the talk of the county, the state, maybe even the nation." The Post adds the "politicians were joined at a news conference in Largo by about a half-dozen business leaders, including Ron Lipscomb, a trustee of the state Democratic Party."

The Washington Times (10/31, A1, Miller, Ward, 88K) reports the story on the front page, noting Curry said, "The [Democratic] Party acts as though when they want our opinion, they'll give it to us. It's not going to be like that anymore." Curry "and the lawmakers said Democratic leaders repeatedly have snubbed the black community and their county, noting the lack of party support for the Senate campaign of former National Association for the Advancement of Colored People chief Kweisi Mfume, who lost the Democratic primary to Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin." The Democratic ticket "lacks black candidates, they said, and candidates from Prince George's County, which is home to more than 320,000 registered Democrats -- the most of any jurisdiction in Maryland."

DOJ_NMG_0088790

Santorum Aides Blame Predicament On National Climate. The New York Times (10/31, Toner, 1.21M) reports, "There is no better snapshot of the brutal political climate facing many Republicans in these final days than this: Senator Rick Santorum, the third-ranking Republican in the Senate, stubbornly behind in the polls, warning with anger and growing frustration that voters should not — must not, for their own good — reject him for his Democratic opponent, Bob Casey, the state treasurer." In a critique of "Casey's national security credentials, the Santorum campaign has run a television commercial that shows a mushroom cloud, missiles streaking through the air and the faces of North Korean, Iranian and terrorist leaders. It concludes, 'We just can't take a chance on Bob Casey.'" Santorum kicked off "the final stretch of his campaign with a series of speeches on 'The Gathering Storm,' offering a dark, Churchillian vision of the threats facing the United States — like the threats, he said, that faced England in the years leading up to World War II." But he "all but acknowledges that the national security issues that proved such a fundamental strength for the Republicans in 2002 and 2004 are far riskier for his party this year." Santorum's advisers "blame the national climate for his difficulties; in a state like Pennsylvania, which often leans Democratic, the plummeting popularity of President Bush and the Republican-led Congress was bound to hit hard. In fact, several Republican House incumbents are also fighting for their political lives in Pennsylvania this year." But Santorum's "own personality and political style have also played a role, political strategists and analysts say."

NBC Nightly News (10/30, story 5, 2:20, Reid, 9.87M) reported Santorum is "one of the Senate's most combative conservatives, leading the charge against abortion. Pushing Congress to intervene in the Schiavo case and nearly always supporting President Bush. This is a tough year for Republicans, largely because of the war in Iraq. That's why so many of them have put distance between themselves and President Bush on that issue. Not Rick Santorum. The war is too important, he says, to put politics ahead of principle." Sen. Rick Santorum: "You don't walk away from people because it's smart politically to do it. It offends me. I believe you stand up for what you believe in." Reid: "Democrats were so eager to beat Santorum, they tapped Bob Casey Jr., son of a popular former governor and an abortion opponent like Santorum. Casey's cultural conservatism has helped him maintain a lead of more than 10 points in the polls." Bob Casey: "This crowd is ready for a new direction." Reid: "Casey says Santorum's harsh partisanship has been his undoing." Casey: "What he has done is judge people and finger point and frankly lecture people. We don't need that any longer. We're tired of that."

Kean, Menendez Seek To Rally Base In Final Campaign Stops. The New York Times (10/31, Chen, Jones, 1.21M) reports Republican Thomas H. Kean Jr. "began the last full week of his campaign for the United States Senate by getting on his knees to be blessed by Korean-American pastors in Cliffside Park on Monday. Hours later and just eight miles away in another Bergen County town, he mingled with Italian-American firefighters and community leaders at Lodi Hose Company 2." Meanwhile, Sen. Robert Menendez "attended two events in the Democratic stronghold of Camden County. On Tuesday morning, he planned to be back in the same area for a breakfast with veterans accompanied by former Senator Max Cleland of Georgia, a Vietnam veteran who lost his legs in the war." With just "eight days until the election, this is the time when candidates in New Jersey pack their schedules with appearances all over the state, often from dawn until the dinner hour. And with most polls showing Mr. Menendez, the Democratic incumbent, holding a slight lead over his Republican opponent, both he and Mr. Kean are frequently hurrying through their lengthening schedules by sticking to the same issues and repeating accusations." But there is "a purpose in the seemingly frantic game of hopscotch from Camden to Lodi or Somerset to Asbury Park hinting at the strategy shaping the final days of the campaign. And geography, not surprisingly, is a major factor." For Kean, "that means a lot of time in such Republican strongholds as Morris County and some communities along the Jersey Shore as well as repeated forays to Bergen County, the state's wealthiest and most populous region, which is viewed as a battleground area." For his part, Menendez "plans to adhere to classic

DOJ_NMG_0088791

Democratic strategy by zeroing in on such urban areas as Camden, Essex and Hudson Counties, and appealing to ethnic minorities and organized labor, core party constituencies."

NYTimes Corrects Editorial On Timing Of Kean Donations. The New York Times (10/31, 1.21M) reports, "An editorial yesterday about the New Jersey Senate race incorrectly described the timing of donations to the campaign of Thomas Kean Jr. by executives of Horizon Blue Cross and Blue Shield of New Jersey. The checks were written for a fund-raiser for Mr. Kean that took place before the submission of legislation that maintained a tax exemption for the companies. Mr. Kean did not receive the money on the same day that he voted for that legislation. The reference was based on an article in The Star-Ledger of Newark that the newspaper subsequently corrected."

Despite Weak Opponent, Hutchison Seeks Strong GOP Turnout In Texas. The Dallas Morning News (10/31, Gillman, 500K) reports that for Republican Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, Texas "is a line in the sand. The nightmare isn't so much that she'll lose her own re-election bid, it's that the ill national mood will flip control of Congress." Hutchison said, "It is a tough year. It is a tough year because times are tough. Because you've got boots on the ground. As Margaret Thatcher once said to George Bush 41, now is not the time to go wobbly." The Morning News adds that although "most analysts expect her to cruise to a third term," Hutchison is "running hard, dashing across West Texas one day last week, exhorting Republicans in one city after another to get out and vote." It's a "message meant to fire up Republican loyalists, though it also seemed to validate their anxieties. Sure, they'll keep the Texas seat, but what about the House and Senate?" On the way to Midland, "an aide hands her a faxed copy of a Kerrville Daily Times story. Kinky Friedman voted for her. 'She is not without charms,' the independent candidate for governor told the paper." Hutchison will "write a thank-you, but her ballot will go to Gov. Rick Perry, her fellow Republican, whom she had thought about challenging instead of running for re-election."

NYPost Endorses Hillary Clinton For Senate, But Not Presidency. The New York Post (10/30, 608K) endorsed Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "for re-election to the United States Senate. Surprised? Well, so are we - a little. But, then, there really isn't much of a choice in this race." Clinton has "been a pretty good senator - popular with her colleagues and as productive as a first-term legislator from the minority party probably can be. Think of her as Sen. Pothole Redux (apologies to Alfonse D'Amato). Meanwhile, her positions on numerous issues - particularly involving national security - have been much closer to the political center than we would have expected." But "what about the White House?" We "think she's done such a good job these last six years that she'd do well to serve six more. If not 12. Re-elect Hillary. In 2012."

Harris Writing Book On Those Who Have "Wronged" Her. The Washington Post (10/31, C1, Copeland, 748K) reports Florida Senate candidate Katherine Harris "says she is writing a tell-all about the many people who have wronged her. This includes, but is not necessarily limited to: the Republican leaders who didn't want her to run, the press that has covered her troubled campaign, and the many staffers who have quit her employ, whom she accuses of colluding with her opponent. She is vague about what, precisely, makes her a victim, but she says she has it all documented." Harris said, "It's going to be a great book." The Post adds, "If it is, it may be one of very few things that go well for the two-term Republican congresswoman. Once beloved by the Republican leadership for her role in overseeing the 2000 recount that delivered the presidency to George Bush, Harris was snubbed by those old friends before the primary. Republican chieftains, considering her too polarizing to win a statewide race, tried to recruit others, and Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R) said publicly that she could not win." The "way Harris sees it, a vast left- and right-wing conspiracy, encompassing both the 'liberal media' and the Republican 'elite,' is attempting to keep her out of the Senate."

Democrats Could Regain Control Of Majority Of State Legislatures. The New York Times (10/31, Johnson, 1.21M) reports, "More than 6,000 state legislative seats in 46 states are on the Nov. 7 ballot, and like the seismic state elections in 1994 and 1974 the cumulative impact of the outcomes could be immense, with Democrats possibly gaining control of a majority of state capitols for the first time in a decade." Most "significantly, the groundwork for redrawing Congressional districts after the 2010 census will be done under the 50 capitol domes, and the party in power will set the table for those discussions in ways favorable to its interests. Gains made this year, analysts say, will help give incumbents a leg up in the final elections leading up to the redistricting." If the Democrats "take control of a majority of the legislatures, which polls indicate could happen, women could also attain leadership positions in greater numbers, since Democratic women in state capitals outnumber Republican women by nearly two to one." One indication "of both parties' interest in the local races is the money that has been flowing into them." The Democratic Legislative Campaign Committee "plans to spend $9 million to $10 million on legislative races, up from $6 million to $7 million in 2004. Its counterpart, the Republican State Leadership Committee, has nearly doubled spending on state races, including for legislators, to $20 million." Republicans 'control both chambers in 20 states, Democrats in 19. One state, Nebraska, has a nonpartisan legislature, while the parties split control in the remaining 10 states." States to watch "on Election Day include Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, Nevada, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Tennessee and Wisconsin, where Republicans have narrow majorities in the lower house or senate. Democrats have narrow majorities in Colorado, Maine and Montana."

DOJ_NMG_0088792

Democrats Poised To Win Majority Of Gubernatorial Races. The CBS Evening News (10/30, story 6, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "While the polls indicate" California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "will be back, in other states, some Republican candidates may, in fact, be on their way to getting terminated." CBS (Borger) added, "It may not be as sexy as regaining control of the House or the Senate, but for Democrats, winning a majority of governorships could be just as important. Right now, Republicans have the advantage with control of 28 states. The Democrats have 22. They need just four more to reach a majority. That's a real possibility with at least nine Republican states up for grabs." Gov. Bill Richardson, Chairman of Democratic Governors Association: "It's going to be probably a bigger loss for President Bush losing a majority of governorships than it is either the House or Senate." Borger: "Consider the battleground state of Ohio. In the last presidential election Republicans controlled the state's voting process. Democrats charged they didn't get an accurate count." Gov. Richardson: "This is why it's so important to win in these states and in big states like Ohio, like Pennsylvania, like Wisconsin."

District Attorney Says Probe Into Gibbons Assault Allegation Reopened. The AP (10/31, Nakashima) reports District Attorney David Roger said "authorities have reopened their investigation into a cocktail waitress' claim that a Republican congressman running for governor assaulted her in a parking garage after a night of drinking." Roger said "the case involving Rep. Jim Gibbons — which had been closed after the woman, Chrissy Mazzeo, dropped her complaint — is under investigation again." Mazzeo, "a Las Vegas Strip casino waitress, accused Gibbons, 61, of pushing her up against a wall Oct. 13 and propositioning her. Mazzeo, 32, said she had been pressured and offered cash from people linked to the Gibbons campaign to drop the complaint." Gibbons, who is "in a close race with Democratic state Sen. Dina Titus for Nevada's open governor's seat, has denied wrongdoing and sued Monday to force police to release surveillance videos he said would disprove Mazzeo's claim." Gibbons "led Titus 47 percent to 41 percent in a poll released Friday. Most of the polling took place after the allegations were reported but before Mazzeo held a news conference Oct. 25 to recount her version of the events."

Win Would Give Ehlich National Profile. The Washington Post (10/31, A1, St. George, 748K) reports after "20 years of pulling out victories at the ballot box -- young and on the rise in the state House and in Congress before his election as governor at age 44," Republican Gov. Bob Ehrlich "is now trailing his opponent, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley (D), in an array of polls. But Ehrlich has come from behind before. This is the 16th contest of his political career. He has never lost." Matthew Crenson, a political science professor at Johns Hopkins University, said if Ehrlich wins, "his political profile will change markedly." As a "two-time Republican victor in a predominantly Democratic state, 'he will emerge as a figure in national Republican politics.'" The Post adds that if Ehrlich "loses, he will be thrust out of elective office for the first time since he was 28." Even "many of his critics say the 48-year-old governor is likable -- affable and unpretentious, the kind of guy who slaps backs, cracks jokes, talks sports. He has a strong streak of the Everyman." But they "also say the competitive edge that has helped him win football games and political campaigns has sometimes worked against him during his four years as governor."

DOJ_NMG_0088793

Schwarzenegger Aides Said To Circumvent Gift Ban. The Los Angeles Times (10/31, Nicholas, 918K) reports, "After allowing his staff to accept tens of thousands of dollars' worth of gifts from business interests, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger is now worried about the appearance of a conflict of interest and has barred them from taking even a free cup of coffee. But the policy, stricter than state law, hasn't stopped the perks. Schwarzenegger aides over the last year have been given free tickets to Disneyland and San Francisco Giants baseball games; to Rolling Stones concerts and Sacramento Kings basketball games." Schwarzenegger chief of staff Susan Kennedy "sent a memo to the governor's aides in August explaining that by taking gifts, even if the law allows it, they could create a public perception that they have been compromised. … But the Spartan ethic comes with loopholes. Kennedy is scheduled to join lawmakers and state officials on a 12-day trip to South America next month that is sponsored by a tax-exempt group financed partly by energy companies and other businesses that lobby in Sacramento."

Angelides Calls For "Comprehensive" Immigration Reform. In a Los Angeles Times op-ed (10/31), Democratic gubernatorial candidate Phil Angelides says, "On Thursday, President Bush put his signature on a measure authorizing a new fence along 700 miles of the 1,952-mile-long border between the United States and Mexico. Funds for the fence may never be provided, and the fence may never get built. Regardless of its future, the fence legislation alone is no substitute for the kind of comprehensive immigration reform that California and the nation need." Such reform "starts with full funding for the strong border security provisions originally provided in the 2004 Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act in response to the recommendations of the 9/11 commission. The act calls for at least 2,000 new, permanent border agents a year and 8,000 new detention beds a year for five years." Border control, "by itself, is not a solution." Immigration policy "must deal realistically with the major engine of illegal immigration: the economy's demand for immigrant labor. The federal government must enact rational and reasonable guest-worker programs that match immigrant workers with the nation's workforce needs. We need to end the shadow economy in which undocumented workers toil without regulation and without the protection of law."

States Seen As Taking Lead On Key Issues. The CBS Evening News (10/30, story 5, 4:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "California is leading the way in the battle against what's been called -- fairly or not -- a do-nothing Congress. In a CBS News/New York Times poll, two out of three Americans said this Congress has accomplished less than the House and Senate typically do. Now California is starting another trend saying, hey, if you can't handle it, we will." CBS (Hughes) added, "In northern California's Fourth District, Republican Congressman John Doolittle's own name points to his biggest problem. His challenger can't say it enough." Lieutenant Colonel Charlie Brown (RET), California candidate for Congress: "It's been a do-nothing congress and John Doolittle has done very little to change that." Hughes: "But Doolittle's home state has done a lot to change it. Trend-setting California is at it again, leading a host of other states in tackling ground-breaking issues the Federal Government won't touch. It began in 2004. When voters here thumbed their noses at Federal restrictions on embryonic stem cell research and approved a $3 billion initiative." Now, "six more states are following California, funding stem cell research the Feds won't. Here's another example: Global warming. As Washington argues and does little or nothing, California has passed the nation's most restrictive law on greenhouse gas emissions." Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger: "This will lead to us leading the way for other states and for other nations." Hughes: "And the list goes on, from prescription drug discounts to a new minimum wage that will rise to $8 an hour in 2008."

Hunter Announces Bid For GOP Presidential Nomination. The Los Angeles Times (10/31, Perry, 918K) reports Rep. Duncan Hunter, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, "announced plans today to make a longshot bid for his party's 2008 nomination for president. Hunter said his campaign will feature the two issues that are his trademarks: support for the U.S. military and opposition to illegal immigration." The AP (10/31, Spagat) reports, "The declaration to form an exploratory committee allows the 13-term California congressman to begin raising money and organize supporters in early Republican primary states such as Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina. … He had not been on any list of potential 2008 candidates." The Washington Post (10/31, A3, Geis, 748K) reports Hunter "was a leader in the construction of a 14-mile fence along the U.S.-Mexico border south of San Diego, and he cosponsored legislation that President Bush signed last week to build 700 miles of additional fencing along the border."

DOJ_NMG_0088794

NYC Elite Reportedly Expect Bloomberg Presidential Run In 2008. The Washington Post's Richard Cohen (10/31, A21) writes, "If you should happen to go to dinner here, the talk will inevitably turn to any one of the many presidential candidates the Empire State has to offer. … Increasingly…the hum is also about the politically audacious Michael Rubens Bloomberg, 44th on Forbes magazine's list of the richest Americans and, as it happens, the mayor of this fair city. He might also be running. I say 'might' because Bloomberg has gone from the firm 'no' he offered me some months ago to a more intriguing 'I'm considering it' that he offered someone I talked with recently. Indeed, among this city's moneyed, journalistic (not, alas, the same thing), entertainment, financial and other sorts of elites, there are always one or two at the table who say, with great solemnity, that they happen to know Bloomberg will indeed run for president as an independent."

Abstinence Programs To Target Young Adults As Well As Teens. USA Today (10/31, Jayson, 2.27M) reports, "The federal government's 'no sex without marriage' message isn't just for kids anymore. Now the government is targeting unmarried adults up to age 29 as part of its abstinence-only programs, which include millions of dollars in federal money that will be available to the states under revised federal grant guidelines for 2007. The government says the change is a clarification. But critics say it's a clear signal of a more directed policy targeting the sexual behavior of adults." Wade Horn, assistant secretary for children and families at the Department of Health and Human Services, "said the revision is aimed at 19- to 29-year-olds because more unmarried women in that age group are having children. … 'The message is 'It's better to wait until you're married to bear or father children,' ' Horn said. 'The only 100% effective way of getting there is abstinence.'"

Fortieth Anniversary Of Reagan's Election As Governor Of California Marked. The CBS Evening News (10/30, story 10, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "At the hilltop Presidential library where Ronald Reagan is buried and his life is on display, his widow Nancy and political luminaries gathered today to celebrate the beginning. … The day 40 years ago when Reagan was elected governor of California."

Barnes Praises Edsall's Book On "Red America." In an op-ed for the Washington Times (10/31, 88K) the Weekly Standard's Fred Barnes writes, "If Tom Edsall isn't America's greatest political writer, he's close to it. … The first [test] is whether one who analyzes politics is willing to write against preference. Mr. Edsall is, and 'Building Red America' is a perfect example. He is a liberal, especially on social and cultural issues, who persuasively chronicles how Republicans have gained the upper hand in politics today and explains why Democrats, even if they defeat Republicans in the midterm elections on Nov. 7, are not poised to become the majority party again anytime soon."

LATimes Reporters' Book Examines GOP Dominance. The Christian Science Monitor (10/31, Pinkus, 58K) reports, "The new book "One Party Country: Republican Dominance in the 21st Century" examines the nuts-and-bolts of the way Republicans have been building this sturdy foundation aimed at achieving successive election victories. At a time when Republicans have not articulated a clear strategy in the Iraq war and have bungled the aftermath of hurricane Katrina, 'One Party Country' suggests that the immediate priority and long-range plan of the Republican Party is wrapped up in winning elections. With so much of the focus on electoral tactics, the offshoot is that governing the country takes a secondary role. … Written by two investigative reporters for the Los Angeles Times, Tom Hamburger and Peter Wallsten, this book shows the signs of incisive journalistic digging."

Newspapers Report Dwindling Circulation Numbers. The Wall Street Journal (10/31, B2, Steel, 2.03M) reports, "Nearly every major U.S. newspaper suffered circulation declines in the past six months, according to the newspaper industry's twice-yearly report from the Audit Bureau of Circulations, the latest confirmation of the difficulties facing the industry as readers flock to the Web and other outlets for news. Average daily circulation of the 770 newspapers reporting results to the ABC dropped 2.8% on a year-to-year basis during the six months ended Sept. 30, according to an analysis from the Newspaper Association of America, an industry-trade group. … The circulation report, which comes on the heels of several major publishers reporting weaker ad revenue for the third quarter, is likely to reinforce concerns among investors about the industry's prospects." The New York Times (10/31, Seelye, 1.21M) reports it "lost about 3.5 percent of its circulation both daily and Sunday. The Washington Post's declines were nearly the same. The Wall Street Journal's daily paper fell by less than 2 percent but its Weekend Edition, which comes out on Saturday, reported a 6.7 percent drop." The Washington Post (10/31, D3, Ahrens, 748K) reports the Los Angeles Times "lost 8 percent of its daily circulation -- the most of any of the nation's largest newspapers -- over the past six months, potentially lowering its value even as suitors line up to bid on its parent company."

DOJ_NMG_0088795

Opposition To Gambling And Medical Marijuana Said To Cost GOP Votes. The New York Times' John Tierney (10/31) writes, "One of the G.O.P. Congress's few achievements this year was a law to crack down on Internet gambling, an industry that counted eight million American customers last year — about four times the membership of the Christian Coalition. The new law hasn't stopped the online gamblers from betting, but it will give them second thoughts about voting Republican. The Republican war on marijuana — the chief priority of the current drug czar — isn't playing any better in the heartland. More than 40 percent of people over the age of 12 have tried marijuana, and more than three-quarters of Americans support legalizing it for medical purposes. The White House and the Justice Department have had little luck in their attempts to stop states from legalizing medical marijuana, but they have succeeded in alienating voters.

US Cotton Subsidies Said To Impoverish Africans. The Los Angeles Times (10/31, 918K), in an editorial, writes, "A century and a half ago, the U.S. cotton industry fueled a booming trade in African slaves and indirectly helped spark the Civil War. One big difference between then and now is that although American cotton is still afflicting Africa, now the Africans suffer at home rather than here. Cotton is a staple crop for many West and Central African countries, where a difference of a few pennies in the price of a pound of fiber can mean the difference between deprivation and relative prosperity. And an explosion of U.S. cotton exports over the last decade, fueled by one of the most obscene corporate welfare programs this country has ever seen, has increasingly helped tip the scales toward deprivation over there. On Wednesday, trade ministers from four African countries whose economies are being savaged by U.S. cotton subsidies came to Washington to discuss the issue with U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab and Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns. They left with little more than vague promises. President Bush, cowed by powerful congressional Republicans from farm states, has done nothing to stop a surge in agricultural subsidies during his administration."

Ahmadinejad Vows "Appropriate And Firm Response" To Any UN Sanctions. The AP (10/31, Karimi) reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "warned on Monday that his country would respond with an 'appropriate and firm response' to any U.N. sanction over its nuclear program." The "hard-line leader" is quoted saying, "Efforts by the big powers will only incite anger and hatred. Iranian nation will respond to restrictive activities with an appropriate and firm response." Meanwhile, "key [UNSC] members were considering a draft European resolution that would impose punishing measures on Iran over its disputed nuclear program." Moscow and Beijing "have shied away from imposing punitive measures on their trade partner Iran, saying they prefer a diplomatic solution to the impasse. But the United States says the proposed sanctions are not tough enough. Russian President Vladimir Putin told Ahmadinejad [yesterday] that Moscow strongly favors further negotiations on Tehran's nuclear program, the Kremlin said." Also, IAEA head Mohamed El-Baradei "said at the U.N. that his organization has not been able to verify that Iran's nuclear program is peaceful."

Stephens Criticizes "Busheir Exception." Bret Stephens writes in the Wall Street Journal (10/31, A19, 2.03M), "Does the Bush administration seriously mean to give Iran a nuclear bomb? Look carefully at the confidential text of a forthcoming UN Security Council resolution, and the answer, it would seem, is yes. … Through diplomatic efforts spearheaded by Undersecretary of State Nick Burns, the administration is prepared to endorse a European draft of a UN resolution that imposes limited sanctions on the Islamic Republic for flouting its Aug. 31 deadline to stop enriching uranium." Stephens focuses its criticism of the resolution on "the Bushehr exception, so broad the Iranians could drive a truck through it -- or, to be more precise, a truck carrying 330 kilograms of reactor-grade plutonium. That's enough to make about 55 Nagasaki-type atomic bombs." Bushehr "is a lightwater nuclear reactor that Russia began building for Iran in the mid-1990s over the objections of the Clinton administration. Ten years on, the billion-dollar facility is nearly complete: All that remains to make it operable is reactor-grade uranium, which Moscow promises to supply by next October. In a sop to the Russians, the draft resolution specifies that the prohibition on technology transfers to Iran 'shall not apply to supplies of items, materials, equipment, goods and technology, nor to the provision of technical assistance or training, financial assistance, investment, brokering or other services...related to the construction of Bushehr I.'"

DOJ_NMG_0088796

US Leads Anti-Proliferation Maneuvers In Persian Gulf. The New York Times (10/31, Fattah, 1.21M) reports, "More than two dozen countries, including three gulf states, practiced intercepting and searching vessels suspected of trafficking in unconventional weapons in major military maneuvers on Monday that emphasized their coordination and willingness to aggressively block the spread of arms. The daylong exercise, about 20 miles outside Iranian territorial waters, seemed to signal to Iran, too, that a coalition of Western powers and neighboring states was intent on denying it access to nuclear, chemical and biological weapons, even on its doorstep." US "officials insist that the training exercise, planned since January, was not related to tensions over Iran's uranium enrichment activities." The Times says, "Iran warned the exercise's participants on Monday against acts that could destabilize the region. Military officials taking part in the exercise said that Iranian patrol boats came close to coalition ships in recent days, inspecting their activities and positions." Monday's exercise "was the first training maneuver in the Persian Gulf under the Proliferation Security Initiative, an American-led effort that seeks to coordinate and develop procedures for intercepting smugglers of unconventional weapons."

Bush Opposed To Japan, South Korea And Taiwan Getting Nuclear Weapons. The AP (10/31) reports, "President Bush said Monday he would oppose helping Japan, South Korea and Taiwan develop nuclear weapons to guard against any threat from a nuclear-armed North Korea. 'I think the less nuclear armament in the Far East, the better off the world will be,' the president said in an interview." Bush "said the United States should work closely with its allies in Asia on a missile defense system. 'Our missile defense systems are getting better and better because of the money that we have been spending over the past five years,' he said."

US General Says More North Korean Nuclear Tests Expected. The AP (10/31, Herman) reports the top US general in South Korea, Army Gen. B.B. Bell, said Monday that more nuclear tests "can be expected" by North Korea, and "stressed that US and South Korean forces could deter any aggression." Gen. Bell "didn't cite specific intelligence that another test was imminent, but said that could be expected in the future as part of North Korea's weapons program." The Washington Times (10/31, Salmon, 88K) Gen. Bell also "dismissed reports that his forces were preparing a pre-emptive strike on the North."

Report Accuses China Of Aiding North Korean Nuclear Program. The Washington Times (10/31, Gertz, 88K) says "China helped North Korea develop nuclear weapons and in the past year increased its support to Pyongyang, rather than pressing the regime to halt nuclear arms and missile activities, according to a congressional report." The "final draft report of the US-China Economic Security Review Commission also says that Chinese government-run companies are continuing to threaten U.S. national security by exporting arms to American enemies in Asia and the Middle East." The report "is based on public testimony and highly classified intelligence reports made available to its members and staff. It indirectly criticizes the Bush administration for failing to pressure Beijing into joining US-led anti-proliferation programs and calls for Congress to take action to force the administration to do more."

China May Be Using Oil To Press North Korea. The New York Times (10/31, Kahn, 1.21M), meanwhile, reports China "cut off oil exports to North Korea in September during heightened tension over North Korea's nuclear and missile programs," according to Chinese trade statistics. Calling it an "unusual move," the Times says there is "no clear indication that the September figures represent a policy shift by China." China did not announce a reduction in oil exports, and the Times says it "remains possible the statistics are an anomaly or that supplies were cut because North Korea did not need more oil in September." Chinese officials declined to comment.

US, Allies Launch Global Initiative To Combat Nuclear Terror Threat. The AP (10/31, Thorne) reports on the launching of the Global Initiative to Combat Nuclear Terrorism, saying, "the world's five leading nuclear powers and seven other nations kicked off a new program Monday aimed at keeping nuclear weapons beyond the reach of terrorists." Robert Joseph, the US Undersecretary of State for Arms Control and International Security, is quoted saying, "The concern is fundamental -- we must stop terrorists from acquiring nuclear weapons." Washington, Moscow, Beijing, London, Paris, Rome, Tokyo, Ottawa, Ankara, Canberra, Rabat and Astana "signed two agreements on common principles and 'terms of reference' that were not immediately made public after the start of the two-day meeting in Rabat." The AP adds, "While Russia and the United States have been at odds on how to rein in Iran's suspect nuclear program, the two countries combined to provide the impetus for this international effort to keep atomic arms from terrorist groups."

DOJ_NMG_0088797

Bolton Says Syria, Iran Trying To Destabilize Lebanese Government. The AP (10/31, Lederer) reports Ambassador Bolton "accused Syria and Iran on Monday of trying to destabilize Lebanon's democratically elected government by violating a U.N. arms embargo." Bolton stressed that Syria's obligations to respect a UN arms embargo authorized by the Security Council in August "are particularly important as it is the one country other than Israel that borders Lebanon." He also called on Syrian President Bashar Assad "to abide by the commitment he made to Secretary-General Kofi Annan to support the resolution and the arms embargo."

Olmert Says Israel May Expand Gaza Military Operations. The New York Times (10/31, Myre, 1.21M) reports, "Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel said Monday that the Israeli military might expand operations in the Gaza Strip in an attempt to halt Palestinian rocket fire, but that there was no intention to reoccupy the territory." His comments "came on another day of turmoil, in which Palestinian gunmen kidnapped a Spanish aid worker in southern Gaza and held him for several hours before releasing him, and a Palestinian militant was killed in northern Gaza in disputed circumstances."

Middle East Governments Await Post-Election Changes To US Policy. The AP (10/31, Reid) reports, "Arab governments are looking for change in U.S. policy in the Middle East after the midterm elections, hoping a politically weakened President Bush will talk with Iran and Syria, show greater interest in the Palestinians and find a way out of the crisis in Iraq. Israel too is watching for any sign of change in U.S. strategy — especially toward the Palestinians, Syria and Iran. … 'If the U.S. is going to help itself, its policy needs to change in the Middle East,' the Saudi ambassador to the U.S., Turki al-Faisal, said Monday in Washington. He urged the U.S. to start by pressing Israel to relinquish all occupied Arab land — and Jerusalem — to the Palestinians. Many Arab officials question, however, whether the Democrats have better answers to the region's problems. They consider the Democrats traditionally more supportive of Israel than the GOP is. Even as they eye the possible political upheaval in the United States, Arab countries like Egypt and Saudi Arabia are maintaining close ties to the Bush administration."

Faisal Asks Washington To "Push" Tel Aviv Towards Peace Talks. AFP (10/31) reports Saudi Ambassador Prince Turki al-Faisal "firmly urged the Bush administration to push Israel into opening final peace talks with the Palestinians." He told the National Council on US-Arab Relations "that the United States was the only nation with the power to jolt the stalled international roadmap to Middle East peace into motion." AFP adds the Administration "has been less willing than many of its predecessors to engage in nuts and bolts peacemaking between Israel and the Palestinians -- despite calling for the formation of a Palestinian state."

Natsios To Brief Bush This Morning On Darfur. AFP (10/31) says President Bush "will meet his special envoy for Sudan, Andrew Natsios, [today] to get an update on efforts to end violence in Darfur, the White House said." The 9:00am meeting will "discuss the humanitarian crisis in the war-wracked Darfur region amid stalled attempts to bolster an international peacekeeping presence there." AFP says that discussion "comes roughly one week after [NSA Hadley, Secretary Rice and Assistant Secretary Frazer] held talks on Darfur at the White House."

Washington, Moscow Sign Agreement On Joint Military Operations. The AP (10/31) reports Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said his Russian counterpart, Gen. Yuri Baluyevsky, Monday signed a cooperation agreement that "lays out plans for joint activities for the coming year," officials said. Details of the agreement were not disclosed.

DOJ_NMG_0088798

Trade Deadline Missed, But Officials Say Deal Is Close. The Financial Times (10/31, Dinmore) reports the US and Russia are "close" to a bilateral trade agreement that would remove a big hurdle to Russia's entry into the World Trade Organization, "but Tuesday's self-imposed deadline will not be met," US trade officials said Monday. "Both sides believe we are close, and we fully expect to continue our close co-operation to reach an agreement," the USTR's office said. US trade officials, however, "would not say what issues remained unresolved" following a week of talks in Washington with Maxim Medvedkov, Russia's chief WTO negotiator.

European Commission Criticizes Turkey On Human Rights, Role Of Military. The Financial Times (10/31, Dombey, Schmid) reports, "Turkey's bid for European Union membership will be dealt a fresh blow next week when an official report will slate Ankara for failing to make enough progress on freedom of expression, curbing the use of torture and establishing civilian control over the military. The draft European Commission report, obtained by FT Deutschland, the FT's sister paper, comes at a particularly sensitive time, with EU officials struggling to keep the accession talks alive." The Times adds, "Some EU member states, including the UK, fear that the pro-European consensus within Turkey may be fragmenting, and that the debate within the union on future enlargement has had the effect of alienating Turks, rather than encouraged reform."

Rumsfeld Meets Turkish Counterpart. The AP (10/30) reports, "Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld thanked his Turkish counterpart Monday for NATO ally Turkey's support for the anti-terror operation in Afghanistan and the reconstruction effort in northern Iraq, the Defense Department said. ... Other items on the Rumsfeld-Gonul agenda included Turkey's support for the U.S.-sponsored Proliferation Security Initiative against the spread of weapons of mass destruction; the NATO summit scheduled Nov. 28-29 in Riga, Latvia; regional security, including arms sales and defense cooperation; and other NATO issues. Turkey has a major interest in the northern Iraq question, where Iraqis of the Kurdish ethnic group live."

UK To Regulate "Islamic Bonds." The Financial Times (10/31, Tett) reports, "Britain looks set to become the first western country to introduce a regulatory regime to support the domestic issuance of sukuk – so-called 'Islamic bonds', or those which do not pay overt interest." The move "is intended to ensure that companies in London can issue sukuk as easily as traditional corporate bonds, boosting the City of London's role in this fast-growing sector of the global capital markets. … The UK hopes to introduce the new framework to support the issuance of sukuk in London next year, via parliamentary legislation."

British Government Report Says Global Warming Could Devastate Global Economy. The Los Angeles Times (10/31, Murphy, 918K) reports from London, "A major study issued Monday concludes that without rapid and substantial spending, global warming will reduce worldwide productivity on the scale of the Great Depression, devastate food sources, cause widespread deaths and create hundreds of millions of refugees." The report, commissioned by the British government, "warns that failure to act could cost up to 20% a year in lost income worldwide. Acting now, however, could bring about meaningful control of greenhouse gases at an annual cost of 1% of global gross domestic product, it says." The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (10/31, Emling, 399K) notes the "600-page report by former World Bank chief economist Sir Nicholas Stern" predicted that "taking the steps needed now to reduce greenhouse gas emissions would cost about 1 percent of global GDP each year."

The CBS Evening News (10/30, story 7, 0:50, Phillips, 7.66M) reported, "Pay now or pay a lot more later is the report's stark conclusion. World economies, it says, must invest 1% of their GNP now to reduce global warming gases or it warn there is will be a planet wide slow down of 20% due to drought, floods, and general economic collapse. That's a catastrophe on the sale of the Great Depression of the 1930s. The British hope this new economic argument can do what the environmental argument hasn't: Convince skeptical governments in China and the US to act now as well."

The Financial Times (10/31, Adams, Harvey) reports, "Tony Blair, British prime minister, is set to use the review by Sir Nicholas Stern, former World Bank chief economist, to announce a dramatic change to his stance on environment policy by calling for a new treaty that could set binding targets for carbon emissions. In the past two years, Mr Blair has written off the prospect for signing a 'Kyoto II' treaty, acknowledging strong US opposition to any attempt to impose emission targets." But "he will now try and inject fresh life into stalled talks on a post-Kyoto agreement, believing that George W. Bush, US president, could back proposals early next year for an international 'cap and trade' market for carbon trading." Blair "will press Angela Merkel, Germany's chancellor, at a meeting in London on Friday to use her presidency of the Group of Eight richest nations next year to reach agreement on the key recommendations in the Stern report."

DOJ_NMG_0088799

Under the headline "In Britain, All Parties Want To Color The Flag Green," the Washington Post (10/31, A18, Sullivan, 748K) reports Blair "warned Monday that the world is heading toward 'disastrous' and 'irreversible' climate changes. Meanwhile, David Cameron, the popular leader of the opposition Conservative Party, vowed to install a wind-power generator and solar panels at the prime minister's residence if he wins the office." Blair and Cameron "are rivals, but their shared outspoken devotion to fighting global warming…illustrates the unity among leaders across the political spectrum here on the dangers of climate change and, in the absence of US leadership, their apparent determination to make Britain a world leader on the issue." The Post adds, "In a clear reference to President Bush, Blair used a column in the Sun newspaper Monday to say, 'The case for action is the final piece of the jigsaw to convince every single political leader, including those in America, China and India, that this must be top of their agenda.'"

USA Today (10/31, Vergano, 2.27M) reports, "The report moves economic discussion of how humanity should deal with global warming to center stage, says Alden Meyer of the Union of Concerned Scientists in Washington, D.C., a science advocacy group." The report "is endorsed by such economic heavyweights as Nobel Prize winner Joseph Stiglitz of Columbia University." But "critics, such as statistician Bjorn Lomborg of Denmark's Copenhagen Consensus Center, suggest ills such as disease and malnutrition are potentially more costly than global warming."

The Washington Post (10/31, A18, Eilperin, 748K) also reports "some economists questioned the British study's projections," saying they "overestimated the impact of global warming on the world's economies, especially those of developed nations. At the same time, these critics said the report's assertion that it would cost only 1 percent annually of global GDP to curb climate change underestimated how much spending would be required. 'There's just a very small part of GDP" in industrialized nations "that's affected by weather in a direct or indirect way,' said Jerry Taylor, a senior fellow at the libertarian Cato Institute, which accepts some contributions from fossil-fuel companies. 'It's very difficult to sketch out this disaster scenario.'"

UN Data Show CO2 Emissions Still Rising. The Wall Street Journal (10/31, A6, Fialka, 2.03M) reports, "A United Nations agency said most industrial nations continue to increase their emissions of carbon dioxide and other so-called greenhouse gases thought to be warming the Earth's atmosphere, despite pledges under the Kyoto Protocol during the next six years to make a 5% cut." While "the shuttering of heavily polluting factories in the former Soviet Union and its satellites makes it appear as though industrial nations as a group reduced their emissions by 3.3% from 1990 to 2004," the agency "said that without that statistical blip, the US and most other industrial nations have increased their emissions by 11%."

Nicholas Kristof writes in the New York Times (10/31, 1.21M), "We know what is needed: a carbon tax or cap-and-trade system, a post-Kyoto accord on emissions cutbacks, and major research on alternative energy sources. But as the Times's Andrew Revkin noted yesterday, spending on energy research and development has fallen by more than half, after inflation, since 1979." The column concludes, "Melting glaciers and corroding pteropods aren't as sensational as a Congressional page scandal, or as urgent as the Iraq war. But they are just as scandalous. We have no responsibility greater than as stewards of our planet, and we're blowing it."

Mexican Protests Seen As "Morphing" Into Political Movement. The Washington Post (10/31, A15, Roig-Franzia, 748K) reports that after sending 4,500 federal police officers to quell protests in Oaxaca Sunday, Mexican President Vincente Fox Monday declared that "social order and peace has been restored." However, the Post says Fox's declaration "seemed out of sync with events on the ground." Although the standoff "began as a teachers strike, it has morphed into a political movement" as "an umbrella group with an ambitious mission of social and economic reform has taken over." The group, the Popular Assembly of the People of Oaxaca, or APPO, have "voted not to budge until the Oaxaca state governor, Ulises Ruiz, steps down." The AP (10/31, Stevenson), Los Angeles Times (10/31, Enriquez, 918K) and New York Times (10/31, Lacey, 1.21M), among other sources, also report on the situation in Oaxaca.

DOJ_NMG_0088800

No Progress Reported In Sri Lanka Peace Talks. The Financial Times (10/31, Leahy) reports that relations between the Sri Lankan government and the rebel Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, the two sides "have deteriorated so much" that during talks over the weekend in Geneva the two sides "could not agree even on this modest goal" of an "agreement on a schedule for more talks." The Times says that "for the long-suffering people of Sri Lanka, the news could hardly have been worse. There is little to stop the two sides intensifying their slide back towards full-scale hostilities under the guise of the island's four-year-old ceasefire agreement."

German-Polish Relations Worsen. The Washington Post (10/31, A15, Whitlock, 748K) reports, "It had already been a bad year for German-Polish relations, but things really soured this month when naval warfare between the two countries nearly broke out on the Baltic Sea. On Oct. 17, the Polish Coast Guard fired warning shots at a German tourist ship after it tried to evade inspection in the Polish port of Swinoujscie and made a run for the German border with three Polish customs officers on board." Although "[n]o one was wounded or killed," the incident "only added to a string of diplomatic slights, political insults and other indignities that have left Germany and Poland feeling more raw about each other than perhaps at any time since the end of World War II. Poles have been smarting for more than a year over Germany's decision to bypass their energy-dependent country by routing a major gas pipeline to Russia under the Baltic." Poles are also upset about "efforts by some Germans to sue for monetary compensation for property their families were forced to abandon after the defeat of the Third Reich" and "recent historical exhibits in Berlin that highlighted the hardships faced by millions of German refugees after World War II."

Berlusconi Indicted For Corruption. The Financial Times (10/31, Michaels) notes former Italian premier Silvio Berlusconi "and David Mills, his former lawyer, were on Monday ordered to stand trial on corruption charges by a judge in Milan. In a further deepening of the pair's legal woes, the judge accepted the prosecutors' request for a trial into allegations that Mr. Berlusconi paid Mr. Mills at least $600,000 after the lawyer had given favourable testimony at other trials of Mr. Berlusconi in the 1990s." Berlusconi "has been beset by allegations of wrongdoing in his business empire for years," and "has been convicted on some occasions but the convictions have either been overturned on appeal or annulled by statutes of limitations." The Times adds, "Whatever the outcome of the trial, people close to the Milan prosecutors admit that it is very unlikely that a conviction will stand and that either man will go to jail."

The AP (10/31, Barry) adds Berlusconi "has a long history of legal troubles linked to his business interests based in Milan. In past cases, he was either acquitted or cleared of the charges because the statute of limitations had expired. He has always maintained his innocence."

Pinochet Put Under House Arrest, Indicted On Torture Charges. The AP (10/31) reports former Chilean President Gen. Augusto Pinochet "was placed under house arrest and indicted for the first time on torture charges for abuses at a secret detention center where President Michelle Bachelet and her mother were once held, [Judge Alejandro Solis] reported Monday." He is charged "with one homicide, 35 kidnappings and 24 cases of torture at Villa Grimaldi, one of the most infamous detention centers in the early years of his 1973-1990 dictatorship. Pinochet's chief defense lawyer, Pablo Rodriguez, had said he will appeal Solis' ruling 'all the way to the Supreme Court if necessary. We will use all the legal means at our disposal.'" Pinochet "has been indicted on human rights charges several times before, but this is the first time he faces torture charges."

The Los Angeles Times (10/31, 918K), in an editorial, says that "whatever happens in these proceedings, it is clear that Pinochet, at this late stage in his life, is unlikely to be held accountable for his actions. What is more dismaying is the degree to which many in Chile continue to defend the general's brutal actions when he ran the country from 1973 to 1990. Indeed, it has taken accusations of financial improprieties to taint Pinochet, once hailed as an austerity-embracing, selfless anti-communist, in the eyes of Chilean conservatives. … We can only hope that the latest round of proceedings against Pinochet will allow some of his victims to testify against him, and thus may offer up a mirror for all of Chilean society to come to terms with its dark past.

World Bank Urges Caution Regarding Migrants' Remittances. The Financial Times (10/31, Lapper, Editor) reports, "The World Bank will on Tuesday urge policymakers to take a more cautious approach towards the development potential of remittances, the multi-billion dollar financial flows sent home by migrant workers in North America, Europe and Asia." In a report "analysing their significance in Latin America and the Caribbean, bank economists argue that remittances are not 'manna from heaven', that the benefits have been 'overestimated' and that associated social and economic costs in developing countries have not been taken into account."

DOJ_NMG_0088801

Edwards Urges Strong US Role In Uganda. Former Sen. John Edwards writes in the Washington Post (10/31, A21, 748K), "At a moment of tremendous global hardship -- from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan to the killing fields of Darfur -- it is rare to find hope. So when there is the possibility for peace, we must seize it. That's why one of the world's great tragedies, the conflict in Northern Uganda, deserves our attention. It is perhaps the worst humanitarian catastrophe to have gone practically unnoticed by most of the world. … To witness the ravaging of Northern Uganda is searing. But meeting its people inspires hope. During a recent visit, I went to the Palabek-Kal camp, where thousands have been crammed into a makeshift village. Hearing their stories of suffering and survival made two points abundantly clear: They are praying for peace every moment, and they expect the world community to do everything possible to help them achieve it. Their yearning was deeply moving, and their collective intensity and faith to build a better future in the midst of such hardship was powerful." Edwards adds that how the US acts toward Uganda, "and if and how we lead -- will send a message throughout Africa and the rest of the world about what America stands for. We must not sit idly by as Uganda's people strive for peace."

WPost Urges Lula To Tackle Reforms, Step Away From "Ruinous Populism." The Washington Post (10/31, A20, 748K) editorializes, "Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva overcame some formidable negatives to win reelection as Brazil's president on Sunday, including a squalid series of corruption scandals and a lackluster record of growth during the past four years by Latin America's largest economy. But the reasons for his victory are mostly positive. The former metalworker and union leader, universally known simply as Lula, has been able to mobilize millions of Brazil's poor, who previously were largely excluded from the country's developing economy and democracy. Many of those people have seen tangible improvement in their lives thanks to Lula's policies, which have lifted some 8 million people out of poverty in a country of 185 million." The Post urges Lula to "tackle the reform of the state, even while continuing programs for the poor. He has the opportunity to propel himself, and Brazil, into a position of leadership in Latin America by demonstrating how poverty can be addressed by sensible and sustainable policies rather than ruinous populism."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Launching A Journey They'd Never Imagined."
"A bishop's Divided House."
"Living Among The Dead."
"Resistance To Deadlines For Iraq Is Weakening."
"Governor's Ban On Staff Perks Isn't Perfect."
"It was the Joanne And Truman Show."

USA Today:

"Abstinence Message Goes Beyond Teens."
"The Case For D-Wade."
"The Case For LeBron."
"Feds May Mandate Sprinkler Systems."

New York Times:

"Spate of Bombs Sweeps Baghdad; Cleric Faults U.S.."
"Democrats Are Seen To Gain In Statehouse Races."
"U.S. Drops Bid Over Royalties From Chevron."
"A G.O.P. Leader And Star Struggles For Traction."
"In Son's Race, Father Sees Cuomo Comeback."
"Campaign To End Race Preferences Splits Michigan."
"In Boulder, Runners Gather In Guarded Isolation."

Washington Post:

"Bush Says 'America Loses' Under Democrats."
"In Baghdad, A Force Under The Militias' Sway."
"Who's That Pretty Pachyderm?."
"Agencies' Outward Migration Irks Officials."
"A Politician Who Thinks Like A Linebacker."
"Suspect and A Setback In Al-Qaeda Anthrax Case."

Washington Times:

"Black Democrats Support Steele."
"China Cited As N. Korea Backer."
"Raids Kills 80 At Pakistani School."

DOJ_NMG_0088802

"Haunts To Avoid For Scaredy-Cats."
"Highflying Southwest Takes A Dive."

Detroit Free Press:
"Champion For Cause Is Uniting Enemies."
"Frightfully Political."
"U.S. Delphi Deals Phony."
"Battenberg Denies Guilt; Dawes Settles."
"Airport Pick-Me-Up."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Foes In Judicial Contest Go Dirty."
"Georgia Can Preserve GOP Grip, Bush Says."
"Tusk, Tusk, Is That The Way I Look?"
"Beloved Cookbook Regains Its Favor."

Houston Chronicle:
"Hutchinson Leads Radnofsky 2-To-1."
"Bewareed The Tiniest Blood Suckers."
"Truth Stranger Than Fiction."
"For $16 Million, Port Will Get A Makeover."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Bush Hits Campaign Trail; Campaign 2006-Indiana; Iraq-American Death Toll; Iraq Sectarian Violence-Children; Missing American Soldier-Iraq; Al Qaeda Training School; Fast Food Healthier; Banning Transfats-New York; California Wildfires; Gallaudet Student Protest; Explaining The Titanic.
CBS: Iraq Changing Course; Iraq Sectarian Violence; Military Families-California; California Wildfires; States Taking The Lead; Campaign 2006-Governors Races; Global Warming; Fast Food Healthier; Gallaudet School Protest; Reagan's California.
NBC: Al Qaeda Training School Destroyed; Iraq-American Death Toll; Iraq War-Money Mismanagement; Bush Hits Campaign Trail; Bush Hits Campaign Trail; Pennsylvania Senate Race; Oil Prices; Stock Market; Fast Food Healthier; California Wildfires; Premature Babies Increase; Forced To Retire; Fallen Soldiers.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Bush-Midterm Campaigning; Iraq-US KIAs; Pakistan-Al Qaeda-Linked Training Facility, US Intelligence; KFC-Transfats; Iraq-Midterms; Federal Government-Adult Abstinence Training; GA-Bat Infestation.
CBS: Bush-Iraq; General Casey-Iraq; Iraq-US KIAs; Bush-Midterm Campaigning; Midterm Races; CA- Esperanza Wildfire; NASA-Hubble Announcement; VT-Syringe Attacks; Halloween Treats-Calorie Levels.
NPR: Baghdad-Car Bomb; Iraq-US KIAs; Iraq-Missing US Soldier; Pakistan-Protest Of Attack On Al Qaeda-Linked Training Facility; Bush-Midterm Campaigning; US Economy-Interest Rate Hikes; CA-Esperanza Wildfire; Jamaica-Investigation Of Former Pro Boxer's Death; Red Cross-Organizational Changes; Tokyo-Stock Market.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Attends a Georgia Victory 2006 rally. Georgia National Fairgrounds and Agricenter, Perry, Ga.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Speaks at a North Carolina Victory 2006 Rally, Western North Carolina Agriculture Center, Fletcher, NC; speaks at a Tennessee Victory 2006 rally, Meadow View Conference Resort and Convention Center, Kingsport, Tenn.; speaks at a Tennessee Victory 2006 rally, the Factory at Franklin, Franklin, Tenn.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: AFGHANISTAN-BUSINESS _ Representatives of major US corporations, development organizations, and government agencies convene for the US-Afghan Business Matchmaking Conference, kicking off the second Afghanistan Investment Support Agency U.S. promotional road show, ``Investing in Afghanistan: the Heart of Asia." Highlights: 10:30 a.m. Commerce Secretary Gutierrez speaks on US-Afghan commercial relations. Location: Four Seasons Hotel, 2800 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

US-ARAB RELATIONS _ The National Council on U.S.-Arab Relations sponsors the 15th annual Arab-U.S. Policymakers Conference. Highlights: 9:15 a.m. Panel on the Gulf Cooperation Council. Panelists include Dr. Michael Collins Dunn, Editor of The Estimate and Editor of The Middle East Journal. 11 a.m. - 12:30 p.m. Panel on What Future for the GCC Region, moderated by Anne Joyce, editor, Middle East Policy and Vice-President and Board Member, Middle East Policy Council. Keynote speaker is Prince Turki Al-Faisal, Ambassador of Saudi Arabia to the United States of America. 12:30 p.m. Luncheon keynote address by Dr. Hussein Al-Athel, Secretary General, Riyadh Chamber of Commerce and Industry. 2 p.m. Conference adjourns.

DOJ_NMG_0088803

Location: Ronald Reagan Building, 1300 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

US-RUSSIA _ 9 a.m. - 2 p.m. A group of leading scholars and policymakers from the United States and Russia discuss the deterioration of U.S-Russian relations over the past five years, Russia's use of energy as diplomatic pressure, how Russia's foreign policy is linked to the policies of economic and political recentralization inside the country, and what can be expected in the next two years as both Russia and the United States enter critical periods of presidential transition. Highlights: 1 p.m. Keynote Address: Thomas Graham Jr., National Security Council (off the record). Location: Wohlstetter Conference Center, 12th floor, AEI, 1150 17th St. NW.

LATINO VOTE _ 9:30 a.m. The National Association of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials' Education Fund releases an analysis of the Latino vote and its impact of the 2006 elections. Location: National Press Club.

JUDGES-POLITICS _ 10 a.m. David A. Schkade, University of California, San Diego, and Lisa M. Ellman, Mayer, Brown, Rowe & Maw LLP, holda news conference to discuss ``Are Judges Political? Location: National Press Club.

REDISTRICTING FORUM _ 10:15 a.m. News conference by the Campaign Legal Center, League of Women Voters, and the Council for Excellence in Government on the role of gerrymandered congressional districts in the 2006 elections, and the release of a report on redistricting reform, with Norman Ornstein of AEI, former Rep. David Scaggs, Nancy Tate of the League of Women Voters, and Trevor Potter of the Campaign Legal Center. Location: National Press Club.

MIDTERM ELECTIONS _ 11 a.m. - 12:30 p.m. George Washington University's Graduate School of Political Management hosts a panel discussion on the fate of the 2006 midterm elections, featuring leading political experts from both sides of the aisle and moderated by Christopher Arterton, dean of GWs Graduate School of Political Management. As campaigning draws to a close, the panel will focus in on the key races that will determine the outcome of Congressional control. Location: Room 2168, Rayburn House Office Building.

NORTH KOREA _ 12 p.m. Global Resource Services holds a briefing on NGO programs in North Korea. Location: National Press Club.

PRIVACY-MORALITY _ 12 p.m. Cato Institute book forum on ``Liberty for All: Reclaiming Individual Privacy in a New Era of Public Morality," with author Elizabeth Price Foley, Florida International University, and William A. Galston, Brookings Institution. Location: 1000 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

ANTI-AMERICANISM _ 5 p.m. The School of Advanced International Studies holds a program on anti-Americanism in Europe, with John Glenn of the German Marshall Fund and Andrew Kohut of the Pew Center for People and the Press. Location: Auditorium, 1619 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0088804

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, OCTOBER 31, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

US Unable To Secure Pakistani Arrest Of Al Qaeda Anthrax Expert ... 3
"Terror Kingpin" To Be Deported From UK To Algeria After US Drops Extradition Request ... 3
Padilla Seeks Dismissal Of Charges Claiming Torture While In Detention ... 3
Judge Refuses To Dismiss NYC Material Support Of Terrorism Trial ... 3
Colorado Lawmakers Seek Supermax Improvements ... 4
Distribution Of DHS Firefighting Grants Criticized ... 4

Homeland Response:

FBI Confirms Search Of Student's House Over Fake Boarding Pass Site ... 4
JetBlue Flight Diverted Over Unruly Passenger ... 5
Democrats Plan Homeland Security Investigations Should They Win A Majority ... 5

War News:

Cheney Suggests Terrorists Increasing Iraq Violence To Affect Outcome Of US Election ... 5
Hadley Meets With Maliki During Unannounced Iraq Visit ... 5
Casey Reportedly Recommending Iraq's Military Add 100,000 More Troops ... 5
US Death Toll For October Tops 100 As Sectarian Violence Continues In Iraq ... 6
Warner Says Iraqis Need Time To Curb Violence ... 7
Pentagon Rushes IED-Resistant Vehicles To War Zones ... 7
US Auditor Recommends Iraq's Government Meet "Milestones" Before Receiving Aid ... 7
Britain Evacuating Civilians From Basra ... 8
American Soldier Missing In Baghdad Left Base Without Permission ... 8
Schools Offer Some Respite For Iraqi Children ... 8
Robinson Blasts Rumsfeld, Says Bush Team, GOP At Fault For Iraq "Mistakes." ... 8
Pakistani Forces, CIA Predator Prone Destroy School Used As Al Qaeda Training Center ... 8
Pentagon Mounts Public Affairs Operation ... 9

Corporate Scandals:

Monster Worldwide Founder Resigns Amid Options Probe ... 9
Congress To Review SEC Oversight Of Hedge Funds ... 10
Delphi Settles Civil Fraud Charges With SEC ... 11
Pickens Pleads Guilty To Securities Fraud ... 11
Canadian Court Freezes Publisher's Assets In Hollinger Dispute 11

Criminal Law:

Fitzgerald Seeks To Avoid Armitage Issue During Libby Trial ... 12
Florida Prison Guards Stand Trial In Contraband-For-Sex Case 12
Judge Sets Date For Hawaii Death-Penalty Trial ... 12
Florida Man Faces Federal Pornography Charges ... 12
Florida County Commissioner Will Plead Guilty To Corruption Charges ... 13
Louisiana Police Chief Sentenced To Probation, Restitution For False Claim ... 13
US To Retry Pellicano-Related Perjury Case ... 13
California Energy Company CEO Sentenced To Eight Years In Prison ... 13
Many States Restrict Halloween Activity For Sex Offenders ... 14
FBI Reports Fewest Police Killed On Duty Since 2001 ... 14
St. Louis Officials Dispute Top Crime Ranking ... 14

Civil Law:

High Court To Hear Phillip Morris's Appeal Of $79.5 Million Punitive Damages Award ... 15
6th Circuit Panel Upholds Kentucky Law Requiring Tobacco Payments ... 16
Tenet To Sell California Hospital ... 16

Civil Rights:

US Makes Arrests In Arizona Human Smuggling Probe ... 16
Many Voters To Face New ID Poll ID Requirements ... 16
Voting Machine Company Denies Links To Venezuelan President ... 16
Pentagon Said To Ignore Risks Of E-Mail Voting For Troops ... 17
Michigan Voters Split On Proposition To Ban Racial Preferences 17
8th Circuit Panel Upholds Ban On South Dakota Abortion Warning Law Enforcement ... 17
Maryland Youth Prison Woes Become Campaign Issue ... 17
Discord Within ACLU Described ... 18

Antitrust:

DOJ Probing Sony Electronics Unit ... 18
SCOTUS Denies Stolt-Nielsen Appeal On Antitrust Amnesty Issue ... 18

Merck To Buy Sima Therapeutics For $1.1 Billion 18
Google Urges Microsoft To Allow Users' Search Choices 19
Microsoft Withdraws From Efforts To Limit AT&T-BellSouth Deal19
Schneider Electric To Buy American Power Conversion For $6.1 Billion..... 19
EU To Probe Qualcomm Royalties..... 20
NYTimes Claims US Patent System Is "Broken."..... 20

Environment:

Two Questioned In Probe Of California Wildfire..... 20
Federal Investigation Finds Cost Cutting Contributed To BP Texas City Blast..... 21

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Former FBI Agent Sentenced For Giving Information To Suspected Spy..... 21
Record Number Of Marijuana Plants Seized This Year In California 21
Law-Enforcement Official's Son Remains Free Despite Pleading Guilty To Marijuana Charge..... 22
Modern Trends Seen As Aiding Narcogangs 22
Pennsylvania Man Accused Of Impersonating DEA Agent..... 22
White House Criticized For "Campaigning" Against Marijuana Initiatives 22
In California, Court Ruling Keeps County From Joining Medical Marijuana Lawsuit..... 22
Chargers Linebacker Accused Of Violating NFL Drug Policy May Drop Appeal..... 22
Armed Pennsylvania Man Shot By Police Had Previous Gun Conviction 23
Federal Agents Arrest Salt Lake City Pipe Bomb Suspect..... 23

Immigration:

Border Arrests Down 8.4% 23

Congress-Administration:

Treasury To Pare Note Offerings After Drop In Budget Deficit.... 23
Growing Influence Of Inspectors General Examined 24
House Democrats Face The Prospect Of Divisive Leadership Contests..... 24
NASA Creates Venture Capital Firm To Finance Innovations..... 24
Fate Of Hubble Telescope To Be Announced Today..... 25
DHS, DOD Workers Brace For New Pay-For-Performance Systems 25
Federal Government Decisions Said To Exacerbate DC Region Sprawl 25

Other News:

Incomes, Savings Up Last Month..... 25
Banking Group Urges Simpler Credit Card Disclosure Rules 26
Bush Says "Terrorists Win And America Loses" If Democrats Have Their Way 26
Cheney Predicts A Democratic Victory Would Result In A "Massive" Tax Increase 28
Bush Family Takes Increasingly Prominent Role In GOP Campaigns..... 29
Hastert Has Made Few Campaign Appearances Since Foley Scandal Broke..... 29
GOP Claims Turnout Success In Early Voting In Several Tight Races..... 29
Generic Ballot Edge Suggests Democrats Will Win House Seats30
Network News Coverage Of Campaigns Said To Have Favored Democrats..... 30
Midterm Campaign Ads Seen As "Most Negative" In Modern Times 30
Republican Defectors Running In Key Races Against Former Colleagues 31
New Jersey Gay Marriage Ruling Could Benefit Republicans 31
Voters Disillusioned With Both Parties In Indiana..... 32
AFL-CIO Targeting Southern Races..... 32
Snow Campaigns For Talent In St Louis 32
Webb Leads Allen In Two New Polls..... 32
Coalition Of Black Political Leaders Endorse Steele 33
Santorum Aides Blame Predicament On National Climate 33
Kean, Menendez Seek To Rally Base In Final Campaign Stops 33
Despite Weak Opponent, Hutchison Seeks Strong GOP Turnout In Texas 34
NYPost Endorses Hillary Clinton For Senate, But Not Presidency 34
Harris Writing Book On Those Who Have "Wronged" Her..... 34
Democrats Could Regain Control Of Majority Of State Legislatures..... 34
Democrats Poised To Win Majority Of Gubernatorial Races 35
District Attorney Says Probe Into Gibbons Assault Allegation Reopened 35
Win Would Give Ehlich National Profile..... 35
Schwarzenegger Aides Said To Circumvent Gift Ban..... 35
Angelides Calls For "Comprehensive" Immigration Reform 36
States Seen As Taking Lead On Key Issues..... 36
Hunter Announces Bid For GOP Presidential Nomination 36
NYC Elite Reportedly Expect Bloomberg Presidential Run In 2008 36
Abstinence Programs To Target Young Adults As Well As Teens36
Fortieth Anniversary Of Reagan's Election As Governor Of California Marked..... 37
Barnes Praises Edsall's Book On "Red America."..... 37
LATimes Reporters' Book Examines GOP Dominance 37
Newspapers Report Dwindling Circulation Numbers..... 37
Opposition To Gambling And Medical Marijuana Said To Cost GOP Votes..... 37
US Cotton Subsidies Said To Impoverish Africans 37
Ahmadinejad Vows "Appropriate And Firm Response" To Any UN Sanctions..... 38
US Leads Anti-Proliferation Maneuvers In Persian Gulf..... 38
Bush Opposed To Japan, South Korea And Taiwan Getting Nuclear Weapons 38
US, Allies Launch Global Initiative To Combat Nuclear Terror Threat..... 39
Bolton Says Syria, Iran Trying To Destabilize Lebanese Government..... 39
Olmert Says Israel May Expand Gaza Military Operations 39

DOJ_NMG_0088806

Middle East Governments Await Post-Election Changes To US Policy 39
Natsios To Brief Bush This Morning On Darfur 40
Washington, Moscow Sign Agreement On Joint Military Operations 40
European Commission Criticizes Turkey On Human Rights, Role Of Military 40
UK To Regulate "Islamic Bonds." 40
British Government Report Says Global Warming Could Devastate Global Economy 40
Mexican Protests Seen As "Morphing" Into Political Movement.. 41
No Progress Reported In Sri Lanka Peace Talks 42
German-Polish Relations Worsen 42
Berlusconi Indicted For Corruption 42
Pinochet Put Under House Arrest, Indicted On Torture Charges 42
World Bank Urges Caution Regarding Migrants' Remittances.... 42
Edwards Urges Strong US Role In Uganda 42
WPost Urges Lula To Tackle Reforms, Step Away From "Ruinous Populism." 43

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 43

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington 44

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

US Unable To Secure Pakistani Arrest Of Al Qaeda Anthrax Expert. In a front-page story, the Washington Post (10/31, Warrick, 748K) reports that in December 2001, coalition troops in Afghanistan found al Qaeda documents which "told of a singular mission by a scientist named Abdur Rauf," a Pakistani who "traveled through Europe on a quest, officials say, to obtain both anthrax spores and the equipment needed to turn them into highly lethal biological weapons." But "precisely what Rauf achieved may never be known with certainty. That's because U.S. officials remain stymied in their nearly five-year quest to bring charges against a man who they say admitted serving as a top consultant to al-Qaeda on anthrax." Rauf "has been under scrutiny in Pakistan since he was detained there for questioning in late 2001, according to U.S. and Pakistani officials who agreed to talk about the case for the first time. But officially he remains free, and Pakistan now says it has no grounds for arrest. Last year…the FBI officially put the case on inactive status. 'We will never close the door, but the chances of getting him into the United States are slim to none,' said one U.S. intelligence official."

"Terror Kingpin" To Be Deported From UK To Algeria After US Drops Extradition Request. Time.com (10/30, Crumley) reports 40-year-old Algerian militant Abu Doha "is alleged by counter-terror officials to be a Qaeda-aligned terror kingpin and suspected of involvement in a number of plots around the world, including the 'Millennium Bomb' plot aimed at Los Angeles International airport in 2000. Yet, as things stand, Abu Doha looks set to be freed from prison in Britain and deported on immigration violations, after the U.S dropped its bid to extradite him over the LAX plot." The prospect "of his going free troubles security officials on both sides of the Atlantic, and leaves some bewildered by Washington's decision to drop its case against him." British authorities "say they don't have sufficient evidence to try Doha, and plan instead to deport him to his native Algeria." In "light of Algeria's traditionally ruthless treatment of Islamist militants, Amnesty International warns that Britain may be sending him home to face abuses."

Padilla Seeks Dismissal Of Charges Claiming Torture While In Detention. In a story distributed by McClatchy, the Miami Herald (10/31, Weaver, 310K) reports, "Jose Padilla, the former enemy combatant now accused of joining a suspected South Florida terror cell, says a federal judge should throw out an indictment against him because he was 'tortured by the United States government without cause or justification.' … On Monday, the U.S. attorney's office was given until Nov. 13 by the presiding judge to respond to Padilla's allegations." The Herald notes, "Padilla provides no evidence to support the allegations contained in a federal court motion filed this month, though his legal team has gathered details of his military detention."

Judge Refuses To Dismiss NYC Material Support Of Terrorism Trial. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/31, Neumeister) reports, "A judge on Monday refused to toss out charges against a musician, a doctor and two other men accused of supporting terrorists, even though defense lawyers argued they had been unfairly targeted for prosecution. U.S. District Judge Loretta A. Preska rejected claims that the men were snared through entrapment and outrageous conduct by an overzealous government beginning in late 2001." The AP adds, "The judge said a trial will begin in April or June for Dr. Rafiq Abdus Sabir, of Boca Raton, Fla., jazz musician and martial arts expert Tarik Shah, of New York, bookstore owner Abdulrahman Farhane, of Brooklyn, and Washington, D.C., cab driver Mahmud Faruq Brent, of Gwynn Oak, Md. An indictment in the case accuses Farhane and Shah of conspiring in 2001 to help an FBI cooperating witness send money to aid Islamic militants fighting Americans in Afghanistan."

DOJ_NMG_0088807

Under the headline "Doctor's Alleged Pledge Is Crux of Terror Case," the New York Sun (10/31, Goldstein) Sabir "has been kept in solitary confinement since he was arrested last year on charges that he swore fealty to Osama bin Laden in the presence of an undercover FBI agent. Yesterday…attorneys debated whether the unusual pledge Dr. Sabir allegedly made — an offer to treat wounded jihadists in Saudi Arabia — constituted a crime. The argument covered topics ranging from the Hippocratic Oath to the statute on material support of terrorism." Sabir lawyer Edward Wilford told Preska "that the defendant should not be prosecuted over the alleged pledge because a doctor has a right to help patients recover." Preska "said a ruling on whether to dismiss the charges against Dr. Sabir would come later," but she "did not seem swayed when Mr. Wilford pointed out that the material support of terrorism statute contains a specific exemption for providing medicine."

Colorado Lawmakers Seek Supermax Improvements. The Denver Post (10/31, Emery) reports, "Colorado's two U.S. senators have vowed to seek solutions to understaffing and security concerns at Supermax, home to the nation's most dangerous criminals." The Post continues, "Sen. Wayne Allard visited the prison Monday, and Sen. Ken Salazar visited Saturday. Both agree that increases in staffing and security measures are needed at the prison, which holds such notorious criminals as al-Qaeda member Zacarias Moussaoui and Oklahoma bombing conspirator Terry Nichols." The Post adds, "Salazar said he plans to talk this week to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, and Allard said he will talk to Bureau of Prisons Director Harley Lappin on Nov. 13 about the need for more funding for security upgrades. … 'The key issues are No. 1 staffing and whether or not the staffing levels are as high as necessary in order to ensure the public safety as well as the security of the guards working in the prison,' Salazar said. … Salazar said the federal government should also look at technology upgrades and building a perimeter fence to deter people from approaching the prison from the outside, which he said was a bigger threat than escape." The Post notes, "Earlier this month, the Department of Justice's inspector general reported that the federal prison system does not read all the mail or effectively monitor phone calls of prisoners. … Allard said the notorious criminals and terrorists housed at Supermax who are in isolation are not communicating with outsiders. The inspector general report addresses those criminals who have certain privileges, and not all of their communications are monitored, he said. … Also this month, a federal arbitrator found that job hazards at Supermax had increased because of low staffing. Joseph Lazar ordered the Federal Bureau of Prisons to boost safety for correctional officers at the prison."

Distribution Of DHS Firefighting Grants Criticized. The AP (10/31, Ben Evans) reports, "Georgia has twice the population of neighboring Alabama, yet Alabama agencies received more than double the amount of federal firefighting grants last year for trucks, gear and uniforms. The disparity was not an aberration. Alabama has been among the top grant winners in the Homeland Security Department's program for several years — apparently because it does a good job asking for the money. Statistics for the Assistance to Firefighters Grant program — the nation's largest firefighting grant initiative — show that states get widely varying shares of a $600 million federal pool. States that submit applications in large numbers, rather than those with the largest populations or highest risk factors, have more success in winning federal dollars.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI Confirms Search Of Student's House Over Fake Boarding Pass Site. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/31, Lenz) reports, "FBI agents searched the home of an Indiana University computer security student over the weekend after learning his Web page included a feature to print fake Northwest Airlines Corp. boarding passes, officials said Monday. Wendy Osborne, a spokeswoman for the FBI's Indianapolis office, said agents on Saturday searched the apartment of Christopher Soghoian, a 24-year-old doctoral student, in Bloomington, Ind. Osborne would not discuss what, if anything, was uncovered or taken as evidence." The AP notes, "Soghoian, who has not been charged or detained, declined to comment on the FBI investigation when reached by The Associated Press by e-mail Monday, but referred to his Web journal for information on the case."

CNET News.com (10/30, Evers) reported agents "raided" Sochoin's house, "seizing computers and other equipment, Soghoian wrote on his blog," and Osborne "confirmed that agents had searched Soghoian's home as part of a joint investigation with the Transportation Security Administration. 'We will conduct a thorough and complete investigation,' Osborne said. 'We are certainly concerned with any potential breach in security, particularly at the airports.'" CNET added, "The FBI will present the findings of its investigation to the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Indiana, which will determine whether Soghoian violated any federal laws, she said. At this point, the student has not been charged and he has not been arrested, Osborne said."

DOJ_NMG_0088808

JetBlue Flight Diverted Over Unruly Passenger. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/31) reports, "JetBlue flight from Boston to Fort Lauderdale was diverted to Orlando after a passenger became disruptive, authorities said." David Collyer "was taken off flight 457 and into FBI custody Sunday after a 'possible altercation with flight crew,' FBI spokesman Kevin Farrington said. Collyer, of Sharon, Mass., had to 'be physically restrained by flight crew and passengers' a JetBlue employee told an officer who arrived on scene, according to an Orlando Police Department report. Neither Collyer nor the 156 passengers and 6 crew members were injured." The Orlando Sentinel (10/31, Gutierrez, 246K) reports, "Magistrate James Glazebrook ordered…Collyer released from custody on a $10,000 unsecured bond. … Collyer said he was 'sorry' and then had no more comment as he left the federal building." The Sentinel notes, "An FBI agent arrested Collyer after an 'altercation with flight crew,' FBI spokesman Kevin Farrington said."

Democrats Plan Homeland Security Investigations Should They Win A Majority. The Washington Times (10/31, Hudson, 88K) reports Democrats plan to "immediately address fraud and waste at the Department of Homeland Security. Democrats vow to flex their subpoena and investigative muscles if elected to lead Congress next month and will take on President Bush's use of wiretaps. 'We have not had significant issues addressed from an oversight standpoint -- we've not issued one subpoena,' said Rep. Bennie Thompson, the Mississippi Democrat who as ranking member of the House Homeland Security Department is in line to lead the panel. … Both of the Democratic Capitol Hill leaders, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California, have said Mr. Bush is threatening civil liberties in the name of war and pledged to force the administration to obtain court orders before issuing wiretaps of terror suspects. Democrats say that Mr. Bush's wiretaps without court orders violate the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) -- created in 1978 to ensure court oversight -- and that they will legislate allowances to obtain the subpoenas in a speedy manner."

WAR NEWS:

Cheney Suggests Terrorists Increasing Iraq Violence To Affect Outcome Of US Election. The AP (10/31) reports, "Vice President Dick Cheney said Monday the increase of violence in Iraq is linked with efforts to influence the outcome of midterm elections in which Republicans are struggling to keep control of Congress. 'It's my belief that they're very sensitive of the fact that we've got an election scheduled and they can get on the Web sites like anybody else,' Cheney said. He said al-Qaida and other elements were trying to 'break the will of the American people' because 'they think we don't have the stomach for the fight long-term.'" Asked "if the attacks were timed to influence the US elections, Cheney said, 'That's my belief.'" USA Today (10/31, 2.27M) runs a brief summary of the AP story under the headline "Cheney: Iraq Violence Tied To US Elections."

Hadley Meets With Maliki During Unannounced Iraq Visit. The Washington Times/AP (10/31, Hurst) reports National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley "huddled with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and his security chief, Mouwafak al-Rubaie, during an unannounced visit to Baghdad, telling them he 'wanted to reinforce some of the things you have heard from our president.' Mr. al-Rubaie said last night that Mr. Hadley had discussed the work of a five-man committee that Mr. al-Maliki and Mr. Bush agreed to set up during a telephone conversation on Saturday. Mr. Hadley also presented proposals concerning the training and equipping of Iraqi security forces as well as security plans." The CBS Evening News (10/30, lead story, 2:30, Couric, 7.66M) reported Maliki, "according to US intelligence, is telling his inner circle the situation is nearly out of control."

The New York Times (10/31, Sanger, Burns, 1.21M) reports, "Though American officials would describe Mr. Hadley's talks only in the vaguest of terms, one option widely discussed in Washington and Baghdad in the days before his arrival, according to American and Iraqi officials, is a substantial increase in the number of American and Iraqi troops patrolling Baghdad. It would signal yet another effort to reassert control over the Iraqi capital, which officials in both governments said remains their top priority." Deputy national security adviser J. D. Crouch said Hadley "was in Iraq to express support for the Iraqi government and warned, 'He is not preconfiguring military options.' Mr. Crouch added that he was 'not aware' of anyone proposing an increase in American troops." The Times adds, "Other proposals now being discussed inside and outside the two governments range from how to permit greater autonomy for Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish sections of the country without splitting the country apart; how to share oil revenues among Iraq's population; and an amnesty for those who attacked Iraqi or American troops."

Casey Reportedly Recommending Iraq's Military Add 100,000 More Troops. The CBS Evening News (10/30, lead story, 2:30, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The day everyone is hoping for, the day American forces can finally come home from Iraq, seems more and more elusive. Just as the military announced that more than 100 US troops have died this month alone, our David Martin uncovered some exclusive information at the Pentagon today, information that's likely to keep Americans in Iraq longer than anyone expected. … CBS News has learned General George Casey, the US commander in Iraq, is expected to recommend the size of Iraqi security forces be increased by up to 100,000. This comes just as the US military is about to reach its long-stated goal of training and equipping 325,000 Iraqis to take over the fighting from American troops. Officials say the explosion of sectarian violence -- which General Casey calls a fundamental change in the nature of the threat -- now makes that number look inadequate. On top of that is the fact that any given day one quarter of the Iraqi army is on leave. Increasing the size of the Iraqi security forces would also mean more American soldiers would be needed to train and advise them. The US is also considering doubling from 12 to 25 the number of American advisors embedded in each Iraqi unit. General Casey is also expected to recommend equipping Iraqi security forces with more heavily armored vehicles…and heavier weapons."

DOJ_NMG_0088809

US Officers Said To Support Hard Deadline For Withdrawal From Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (10/31, Barnes, McManus, 918K) reports, "Growing numbers of American military officers have begun to privately question a key tenet of U.S. strategy in Iraq — that setting a hard deadline for troop reductions would strengthen the insurgency and undermine efforts to create a stable state. The Iraqi government's refusal to take certain measures to reduce sectarian tensions between Sunni Arabs and the nation's Shiite Muslim majority has led these officers to conclude that Iraqis will not make difficult decisions unless they are pushed. … Former Pentagon official Kurt Campbell said more officers are calling for deadlines after concluding that the indefinite presence of U.S. forces enables the Shiite-run Iraqi government to avoid making compromises. 'There is a new belief that the biggest problem that we face is that our forces are the sand in the gears creating problems,' said Campbell, coauthor of a book on national security policy. 'We are making things worse by giving the Iraqis a false sense of security at the governing level.'"

Trainers Fear Militia Infiltration Of Iraqi Police Could Delay Handover For Years. In a front page article, the Washington Post (10/31, Paley, 748K) reports, "Visitors to this violent neighborhood [Sholeh] in the Iraqi capital whisper that nearly all the police officers have split loyalties. ... And then one rainy night this month, the Sholeh police set up an ambush and killed Army Cpl. Kenny F. Stanton Jr., a 20-year-old budding journalist, his unit said. ... The top U.S. military commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., predicted last week that Iraqi security forces would be able to take control of the country in 12 to 18 months. But several days spent with American units training the Iraqi police illustrated why those soldiers on the ground believe it may take decades longer than Casey's assessment. Seventy percent of the Iraqi police force has been infiltrated by militias, primarily the Mahdi Army, according to Shaw and other military police trainers." Several disheartened US soldiers and Iraqi police officers are quoted.

US Death Toll For October Tops 100 As Sectarian Violence Continues In Iraq. ABC World News (10/30, story 3, 0:35, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There is a grim milestone to report from Iraq. The deaths of a Marine in Al Anbar province and a military policeman in Baghdad pushed the US toll in October to 101. That is only the fourth time that more than 100 US troops have been killed in one month. At least 81 Iraqis were killed today, including 33 that died in Baghdad's Sadr City, when a bomber to tore through a group of poor Shiite men seeking work."

In a similar report, NBC Nightly News (10/30, story 2, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Military announced the death of another military Marine. That brings the number of U.S. Military service members to 101. Also today, more than 80 Iraqis killed in attacks around that country. A bomb killed at least 26, wounded 60 in a crowded market in Baghdad."

The CBS Evening News (10/30, story 2, 1:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Here's how bad it was today. More than 80 Iraqis were killed, including 33 in just one bomb attack as lay laborers arrived for work in Sadr City. It's been an especially deadly month for US troops who are constantly facing new dangers." CBS (Logan) added, "US leaders have said their troops won't get involved in a civil war in Iraq, but American soldiers on the ground here now are already caught in a conflict between this country's two main ethnic grows more violent and more bloody everyday. For the soldiers left behind, memorial service are the last to say good-bye to fallen comrades. A brief moment to mourn before heading back out to continue the fight."

Reporting on the continuing violence, the Los Angeles Times (10/31, Ellingwood, Rifai, 918K) says it has "fed widespread misgivings about the Bush administration's handling of Iraq as Americans prepare to vote in midterm congressional elections next week. At the same time, US and Iraqi leaders have sought to smooth differences over how to cope with the back-and-forth violence by Sunni Arab insurgents and Shiite militias, including Sadr's Al Mahdi army, believed responsible for many of the hundreds of killings and kidnappings in recent months." The New York Times (10/31, Tavernise, 1.21M) reports "the violence…has radicalized many Iraqis, and moderates who refuse to yield to the militants are either being killed or driven out of the country."

DOJ_NMG_0088810

The Washington Post (10/31, A17, Anderson, 748K) reports "US and Iraqi forces had previously established a cordon around the teeming slum," Sadr City, "which is controlled by the Mahdi Army militia, in an attempt to find a kidnapped US soldier and a man known as Abu Deraa, who is considered Iraq's most notorious death squad leader. Shiite leaders seized on that US operation Monday to accuse the Americans of complicity in the market blast, saying that because they were in charge of searching all vehicles going in and out of the area, they must have allowed in the bomb that was detonated at the market. … Some residents of Sadr City, home to 2.5 million Shiites, also blamed US forces for the carnage, saying that the search for the missing soldier -- which began six days ago -- has forced the Mahdi Army underground, weakening the area's defenses." But "this week, some Mahdi Army members were visible with weapons on the streets." McClatchy (10/31, Price), the AP (10/31, Hurst) and Financial Times (10/31, Sevastopulo, Negus), among other sources, run similar stories this morning.

Warner Says Iraqis Need Time To Curb Violence. The Norfolk Virginian Pilot (10/31, Holden) reports, "Sen. John Warner said Monday that Iraqi leaders need more time to contain worsening violence in their country, but that 'every single day counts' when measured against the loss of American lives." Warner urged giving Prime Minister Maliki an opportunity to prove that "violence can be contained through continued diplomacy and not escalating military force," which Maliki purports. Warner "has visited Iraq eight times and has become increasingly measured in his assessment of the situation."

Pentagon Rushes IED-Resistant Vehicles To War Zones. USA Today (10/31, Vanden Brook, 2.27M) reports, "The military is rushing armored vehicles with specially designed hulls to Iraq and Afghanistan to limit the damage from roadside bombs, the No. 1 killer of U.S. troops. ... The new vehicles have a V-shaped hull, which disperses the force of an explosion and helps keep the vehicle from flipping over." A manufacturer, Force Protection, "says nobody inside a Buffalo [its product] has been killed in Iraq or Afghanistan despite encountering thousands of IED blasts." Senator Lindsey Graham "said the Pentagon has acted quickly to deploy the vehicles, without the kind of delays seen in sending body armor and armored Humvees to Iraq."

US Auditor Recommends Iraq's Government Meet "Milestones" Before Receiving Aid. The AP (10/31, Baldor) reports, "Federal auditors are recommending that the Iraqi government meet specific milestones of progress to receive any future aid for reconstruction, according to a report released Monday that echoes a message the Bush administration has delivered to Iraqi leaders. The study, issued by the special inspector general who audits U.S. work in Iraq, also concluded that reconstruction is being blocked by violence, and efforts to empower Iraqis to do more are fraught with problems 3 1/2 years after the U.S. invaded the country. The Iraqis should 'meet concrete milestones and political and economic benchmarks as a condition of future aid,' the report recommended. It said U.S. relief and reconstruction aid could be provided through conditional loans and be tied to specific actions by the Iraqi government." The AP notes the report also states, "The U.S.-funded phase of Iraq's relief and reconstruction has entered its concluding stages. The government of Iraq's success in building on the foundation established by the U.S. relief and reconstruction program will now depend in part on (Iraq's) ability to attract more support from other donors and the private sector.'"

The Washington Post (10/31, A17, Witte, 748K) reports that the US "has devoted more than $38 billion to relief and reconstruction in Iraq since the 2003 invasion, and yesterday's report does point to some successes. Electric capacity nationwide passed prewar levels in recent months, though in Baghdad it remains lower than before the war. Oil exports, at 1.66 million barrels a day, met Iraqi goals. Overall, 88 percent of U.S. projects have been completed, with only a small minority yet to begin. Out of the $18 billion reconstruction package Congress passed in November 2003, about three-quarters has been spent."

Thousands Of US Weapons Meant For Iraq's Military Are Missing. NBC Nightly News (10/30, story 3, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "there is new evidence that US tax money for rebuilding Iraq has been badly mismanaged and that thousands of American weapons might have fallen into the wrong hands." NBC's Lisa Myers added, "The US has not properly tracked a half million weapons bought for Iraqi security forces. In a new report reveals that 14,000 weapons are now considered missing. Government watchdogs say more than 13,000 glock semiautomatic pistols, 751 assault weapons and almost 100 machine guns cannot be accounted for in Iraq -- raising the possibility that they fell into the hands of insurgents. … Hundreds of thousands of weapons couldn't be tracked because the military failed to properly record serial numbers another report says that less than half the budget for some projects actually went to rebuild Iraq." NBC notes, "Investigators mostly blame the government's poor planning. But they also single out a Halliburton subsidiary, KBR. In this 2004 letter obtained by NBC news, a US official criticizes KBR for accruing indirect costs at a rapid paste and for failing to provide adequate cost information. Government watchdogs now say Halliburton tried to hide data from auditors."

NYTimes Praises The Work Of The IG For Iraq Reconstruction. The New York Times (10/31, 1.21M), in an editorial, writes that the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction "has distinguished itself as the most vigilant agency monitoring the money spent on the Iraq conflict. The agency, led by a Republican lawyer who once worked in the Bush White House, has previously reported on the contracting lapses and failures of supervision that allowed billions of taxpayer dollars to be wasted instead of being used to rebuild Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0088811

Britain Evacuating Civilians From Basra. The Los Angeles Times (10/31, Ellingwood, 918K) reports the British government "said Monday that it was moving most civilian staff members out of its compound in the southern Iraqi city of Basra because of rocket and mortar attacks by militias. Officials said the move was temporary. But the decision underscored the fraying security climate in southern Iraq, a largely Shiite Muslim region under the sway of various militias, such as that controlled by anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr. … A spokesman for the British Foreign Office said the consul general would remain in Basra with a small support staff."

American Soldier Missing In Baghdad Left Base Without Permission. ABC World News (10/30, story 5, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "new details about the American soldier who was abducted in Baghdad last week. He served as a translator for the military. He was born in Iraq, spoke Arabic. The military acknowledges she was married to an Iraqi woman. He left his base without permission to visit her family when he disappeared. And a massive military manhunt continues."

Schools Offer Some Respite For Iraqi Children. ABC World News (10/30, story 4, 2:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The violence changes Iraqis so many ways. But we have a story tonight about an oasis from the violence a place where children can be children." ABC added, "Being fine, in Baghdad's violence, is a relative concept. During the first period this morning, a bomb went off just a block away from this school. These children are so used to it, though, they quickly got back to work. They got scared, their family started calling on the phone, says this teacher. But after ten minutes, we calmed them down. Even though the danger is so close that the bomb shook the windows, this school is a daily refuge for the children. At least here, behind a locked gate, they are reasonably safe. Between classes, they can play in the yard. 'At home, we're afraid to go outside,' she says."

Robinson Blasts Rumsfeld, Says Bush Team, GOP At Fault For Iraq "Mistakes." In his Washington Post (10/31, 748K) column, Eugene Robinson writes, "Go ahead, people, you have your orders from Napoleon Bonaparte, I mean Donald Rumsfeld. 'Back off' and 'relax.'" Robinson charges, "Alexander the Great, I mean Donald Rumsfeld, may have authored the mistakes that have cost nearly 3,000 American lives, including more than 100 in October alone -- sending too few troops, disbanding the Iraqi army, failing to plan for an extended occupation, training Iraqi 'security forces' that promptly turned into sectarian militias. But George W. Bush, Dick Cheney, Condoleezza Rice and the rest of the Vulcans were with him every step of the way, and the Republican majority in Congress sang hosannas of praise like an amen chorus."

Pakistani Forces, CIA Predator Prone Destroy School Used As Al Qaeda Training Center. The AP (10/31, Khan) reports, "Pakistani troops and helicopters firing missiles killed as many as 80 militants training at a religious school used as an al-Qaida training center near the Afghan border, officials said. Local leaders said all those slain when the school, or madrassa, was destroyed were civilians." Army spokesman Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan "said initial estimates based on intelligence sources on the ground indicated that the attack killed about 80 suspected militants, who appeared to be in their 20s and were from Pakistan and other countries. 'These militants were involved in actions inside Pakistan and probably in Afghanistan,' Sultan told The Associated Press."

ABC World News (10/30, story 6, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that among those killed was "a cleric associated with al Qaeda's top deputy. Pakistan said all the dead were militants. Villagers claim that innocents were killed. Islamic leaders blame the US, but Pakistan denied any American involvement."

However, NBC Nightly News (10/30, lead story, 3:55, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) added, "NBC News has learned that the US had a major role in this operation and with 80 dead that makes this the largest number of suspected militants ever killed in a single counterterrorist attack. US officials tell NBC News the attack was carried out by a CIA Predator drone armed with Hellfire missiles and nearly a dozen Pakistani attack helicopters." NBC added, "The attack brought out thousands of protesters throughout Pakistan burning the American flag, shouting down with America. Down with Musharraf. The assault was similar to Predator air strikes that tried to kill Zawahiri in January."

The Washington Times/AP (10/31, Garwood) says "the raid threatens efforts by President Gen. Pervez Musharraf to persuade deeply conservative tribespeople to back his government over pro-Taliban and al-Qaida fighters, who enjoy strong support in many semiautonomous regions in northern Pakistan." The New York Times (10/31, Masood, 1.21M) says the attack also "threatens to disrupt a peace deal that was expected to be signed today between Bajur tribal leaders and the military. The agreement is meant to control the flow of weapons and militants into Afghanistan. A similar accord was signed with tribal leaders this year in neighboring North Waziristan." The Christian Science Monitor (10/31, Montero, 58K) runs a similar report under the headline "Pakistan Attack A Setback To Border Peace."

DOJ_NMG_0088812

The Washington Post (10/31, A15, Constable, Khan, 748K) reports, "Osama bin Laden and his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri, are widely believed to be hiding in the rugged Afghan-Pakistani border region, home to fiercely independent tribal peoples . Afghan officials also contend that Pakistan's side of the border is serving as a sanctuary for newly aggressive Taliban insurgents in Afghanistan." The attack "seemed to represent an abrupt shift from the Musharraf government's recent policy of seeking peaceful negotiations with extremists in the border regions. In the past several months, two peace deals were signed in the tribal areas of North and South Waziristan after sustained attacks there by the Pakistani military drew strong local opposition and caused heavy casualties on both sides."

Pentagon Mounts Public Affairs Operation. AFP (10/30, Mannion) reports, "The Pentagon is expanding its public affairs operations to counter 'inaccurate' news stories and editorials and exploit 'new media' to get its message out, its chief spokesman said, denying the effort was linked to the US elections." Eric Ruff "insisted that the new public affairs program was not prompted by either the elections or polls showing that only about 37 percent believe the war is going well." He "disclosed the expanded operations after questions were raised about a wall being built in the Pentagon press operations center." AFP states, "Dorrance Smith, the assistant secretary of defense for public affairs, has written a torrent of letters to editors in recent weeks seeking corrections or rebutting articles and editorials. ... US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, a strident critic of media coverage of Iraq, also has pushed for a sweeping overhaul in the way the military communicates with the public."

The AP (10/31) reports, "A memo obtained by The Associated Press shows the Defense Department is adding to its public relations staff. It plans to set up teams to quickly answer opponents' claims, develop messages for news cycles and coordinate officials or politicians to speak out on issues. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has said the thing that keeps him up at night is his belief that terrorists have been able to manipulate the media, while the Pentagon's communications efforts have been lacking."

Another AP (10/31) article reports, "In a memo obtained by The Associated Press, Dorrance Smith, assistant secretary of defense for public affairs, said new teams of people will 'develop messages' for the 24-hour news cycle and 'correct the record.'" Like AFP, the AP writes that spokesman Ruff "denied that the effort was set up to respond to the eroding public support for the war, or that it was aimed at helping in next week's elections."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Monster Worldwide Founder Resigns Amid Options Probe. The Wall Street Journal (10/31, A3, Bandler, Maremont) reports, "Monster Worldwide Inc.'s founder, Andrew McKelvey, resigned from the company's board after declining to be interviewed by lawyers conducting an internal investigation into backdating of stock options at the company." The Journal continues, "Mr. McKelvey, who founded the company that was the precursor of Monster 39 years ago, had been the company's chairman and chief executive until earlier this month, when he stepped down from both posts, citing the demands of dealing with the options probe. Yesterday, he resigned his remaining positions as director and chairman emeritus. Monster is the parent of the popular Monster.com job-search Web site." The Journal adds, "The broadening options-backdating scandal so far has focused on more than 150 companies, and white-collar attorneys say executives increasingly are refusing to cooperate with in-house probes for fear that their statements will be used against them by the government. But failure to cooperate makes it difficult or impossible for the executive to stay in his or her position. Nearly all of the companies involved are conducting internal probes, and typically turn over the results to federal investigators."

USA Today (10/31, Iwata) reports, "McKelvey was scheduled to meet Monday with a Monster special committee investigating the company's stock-option grants, but he changed his mind. … The company said in a statement that 'Mr. McKelvey had declined to be interviewed' and 'would not provide assurance that he would appear at a later date.'" USA adds, "McKelvey's attorney, Steven Reich of Manatt Phelps & Phillips, said in a letter Sunday to Monster's private attorneys that 'we need a good deal more time to get up to speed on this fact-intensive matter that covers a period of many years.' … The letter, addressed to attorney James Benjamin at law firm Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, also said that McKelvey was ill, was suffering from jet lag and lacked legal representation during a key meeting with the committee last July on the stock-option scandal. … When questioned, McKelvey did not understand the legal and accounting implications of stock-option backdating, or whether Monster engaged in improper practices, according to the letter filed Monday with the Securities and Exchange Commission."

The AP (10/31, Tong) reports, "Monster has received a subpoena from the U.S. attorney's office in the Southern District of New York over stock options and has said it wants to complete its own investigation by the end of the year." The

DOJ_NMG_0088813

AP adds, "McKelvey's full resignation from the board comes weeks after he stepped down from the posts of chairman and chief executive on Oct. 9. At that time, he retained a spot on the board and was named as a chairman emeritus. … Top executives who have recently resigned from other companies over options investigations include: UnitedHealth Group Inc. Chief Executive William McGuire, KLA-Tencor Corp. Chairman Kenneth Levy, CNET Networks Inc. Chief Executive Shelby Bonnie and McAfee Inc. CEO George Samenuk. McGuire quit as chairman earlier this month and will resign as CEO by Dec. 1. … So far, federal authorities have filed charges against former officials of two technology companies. And Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox said on Monday that he expected more such charges in the coming days."

SEC Head Sees More Options Cases. The AP (10/31, Gordon, Tong) reports, "With about 100 companies under investigation, new cases will be brought on suspicious timing of stock options grants in the near future, the head of the Securities and Exchange Commission said Monday. … Meanwhile, there have been an 'unprecedented' number of companies that have voluntarily reported irregularities in stock options awards to the authorities -- a cooperation that will be taken into account by the SEC in those cases, Chairman Christopher Cox said." The AP continues, "Federal authorities have filed charges so far against former officials of two technology companies. … 'I'd expect that we'll see more as a result of that process in the days ahead,' Cox told reporters. … His remarks came amid news that the former chief executive of Monster Worldwide Inc., parent of the world's largest job-search site, had resigned from its board after refusing to be interviewed about the company's past options practices." The AP adds, "Andrew J. McKelvey's resignation came weeks after he stepped down from the posts of chairman and chief executive on Oct. 9. At that time, he retained a board seat and was named chairman emeritus. … To date, at least 135 public companies have disclosed internal inquiries over options grants or investigations by the SEC or the Justice Department, and at least 39 executives and directors at 19 companies have been fired or resigned."

Report Finds Hundreds Of Missed Options Disclosure Deadlines. The San Jose Mercury News (10/31, Poletti) reports, "Hundreds of companies have missed the regulatory deadlines to disclose how many stock options they have granted to insiders, raising questions about whether more options grants may have been backdated even amid new tougher securities laws, according to a report by Glass Lewis." The News continues, "In an Oct. 20 report called 'The Backdating Scandal's Second Act?' Glass Lewis, an institutional shareholder advisory firm in San Francisco, noted that its research has identified hundreds of companies with late filings to the Securities and Exchange Commission. Those filings, called Form 4s, are now required within two days of the grants, per new securities laws as a result of Sarbanes-Oxley legislation. … 'This suggests backdating continued to occur after the adoption of new disclosure rules,' wrote Todd Fernandez, a senior research analyst at Glass Lewis, in the report. He noted there are many examples of companies that were late in disclosing grants to insiders and the stock price rose materially from the purported grant date to the disclosure date." The News adds, "Some examples Glass Lewis sited include Silicon Image of Sunnyvale, Hansen Natural of Corona, Calif., O'Reilly Automotive of Springfield, Mo., Digital River of Minneapolis, Websense of San Diego, and Medis Technologies of New York. … Glass Lewis said it reviewed hundreds of thousands of insider transactions from January, 2004 to June 2006, for its report."

Congress To Review SEC Oversight Of Hedge Funds. The Deal (10/31, Orol, Block) reports, "Congressional investigators are examining whether stock exchanges and the Securities and Exchange Commission are equipped to police trading activity ahead of market-moving deals, particularly as hedge funds become an increasingly large presence in the financial markets." The Deal continues, "At the request of Sen. Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, the Government Accountability Office earlier this month agreed to examine whether the SEC had adequate procedures in place to oversee stock exchange regulators, including the New York Stock Exchange and NASD. … Ostensibly, those exchanges are self-regulatory organizations, but the SEC ultimately is charged with ensuring that the public markets are carrying out their obligations to root out insider trading, fraud and other abuses." The Deal adds, "Financial industry sources say Grassley is right to suspect some fire behind the smoke of suspicious trading and that the SEC appears to suffer a backlog of referrals of suspected improper trading from the exchanges. … With the advent of decimalization, increased domination by institutional trading, short-term trading strategies by hedge funds, and the move to a for-profit model of the major trading venues, it's unclear whether the SRO's market surveillance budgets, staffing levels and computer technology are keeping up."

WSJournal Criticizes Politicians' Eagerness To Tighten Regulations On Hedge Funds. The Wall Street Journal (10/31, 2.03M) reports Senate Finance Chairman Charles Grassley "is circulating a letter to regulators looking for suggestions on how to regulate hedge funds. He's far from the only one. Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal is bidding to become the next Eliot Spitzer by doing to hedge funds what New York's AG did to the insurance industry. … So, just what is driving this push to regulate? First, until recently hedge funds have been growing like Topsy, and the 1998 meltdown of Long-Term Capital Management did little to diminish wealthy investors' appetite for new funds. Today there are more than 3,000 hedge funds, managing more than $1 trillion in assets. This growth has made them an increasingly attractive target for imperialist bureaucrats and rent-seeking politicians."

DOJ_NMG_0088814

Delphi Settles Civil Fraud Charges With SEC. The Washington Post (10/31, D1, Freeman) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission said yesterday that it settled civil fraud charges against embattled auto parts supplier Delphi Corp. and some of its former officials, while others vowed to fight." The Post continues, "The SEC named 13 individuals in the case, which alleges that officers at the company's highest level engaged in accounting schemes to mask Delphi's declining financial condition from 2000 to 2004. In one effort, the SEC said executives misrepresented warranty claims as pension costs to improve financial results. … Under terms of the settlement, Delphi faces no financial penalties." The Post adds, "The SEC said six individuals in the case agreed to settle the charges without admitting wrongdoing and will pay a total of $1.4 million in fines and other payments. The largest amount will be paid by Alan Dawes, Delphi's former chief financial officer, who agreed to pay $687,000."

The AP (10/31, Thomas) reports, "Delphi, the nation's largest auto supplier, filed for bankruptcy protection in October 2005. Resolving the SEC investigation could help the company move closer to emergence from bankruptcy next year." The AP continues, "The government said in a statement that the Troy, Mich.-based company had settled its charges and will not face penalties because of its cooperation with investigators. … Delphi Chairman and CEO Robert S. 'Steve' Miller said the auto supplier had 'cooperated fully with the commission's investigation and will continue to do so. We are pleased to put the SEC investigation behind us and consider this settlement an important step in our transformation process.'"

USA Today (10/31, Carty) reports, "Delphi's former CEO says he'll fight a lawsuit by the Securities and Exchange Commission that charges him and six other former Delphi employees with incidents of fraud from 2000 to 2004." USA continues, "J.T. Battenberg, Delphi's founding chairman and CEO from 1999 (when the supplier was spun off from General Motors) until he retired in June 2005, insists the actions he took were 'entirely lawful and proper.' … 'I fully cooperated with Delphi and the SEC in their investigations of this matter both before and after my retirement, and am disappointed — to say the least — that this lawsuit has been filed,' he said in a statement."

The Detroit News (10/31, Shepardson) reports, "n March 2005, following a 10-month internal investigation led by an outside law firm, Delphi ousted Dawes and then-chief accounting officer Paul Free, who was also charged in Monday's filing, and said many of the company's financial statements were inaccurate. It also removed at least four other officials. … The investigation into Delphi began in July 2004 after EDS, another former GM subsidiary, told the SEC in June 2004 about a $20 million loan in 2001 that Delphi booked as income. The SEC upgraded its probe into a formal investigation in August 2004. … The 79-page complaint filed in U.S. District Court in Detroit Monday was assigned to Judge Avern Cohn, who must approve the settlements."

Pickens Pleads Guilty To Securities Fraud. The Wall Street Journal/AP (10/31, C4) reports, "The son of billionaire oil tycoon T. Boone Pickens pleaded guilty to securities fraud Monday, admitting his role in a scheme to inflate the stock value of three companies so he could make hundreds of thousands of dollars illegally." The AP continues, "Michael O. Pickens, of Nocona, Texas, entered the plea in U.S. District Court in Manhattan after signing an agreement calling for him to be sentenced to as little as four years and nine months in prison or as much as five years and 11 months." The AP adds, "Judge Loretta A. Preska set sentencing for Jan. 30 after Mr. Pickens, 52, entered the plea to three charges of securities fraud. The charges carry a potential fine of $3 million. … Mr. Pickens was arrested July 18, 2005, and was accused of sending hundreds of thousands of hoax faxes throughout the U.S. in December 2004 to fraudulently induce investors to buy three stocks. … Prosecutors said each fax purported to be a handwritten note conveying a stock tip to a person, suggesting it had been mistakenly sent to each recipient. An indictment said the fake faxes caused the trading values and market prices of the stocks to increase dramatically. It said one stock's value almost doubled in one day."

Canadian Court Freezes Publisher's Assets In Hollinger Dispute. Bloomberg (10/31) reports, "The assets of F. David Radler, the former publisher of The Chicago Sun-Times, were recently frozen by a Canadian court at the request of Hollinger Inc., Conrad M. Black's former holding company, which is suing Mr. Black and Mr. Radler to recover management fees." Bloomberg continues, "A British Columbia Supreme Court judge in Vancouver granted the order on Oct. 25. Hollinger is suing Mr. Black and Mr. Radler to recover management fees and noncompetition payments. … The injunction, which applies worldwide, prohibits Mr. Radler and his company, F. D. Radler Ltd., from disposing of, mortgaging or transferring any assets, and freezes their bank accounts while the suit remains before the courts." Bloomberg adds, "Mr. Radler is allowed to spend up to $22,255 a month for living expenses and legal fees. The order will remain in effect until Nov. 9, unless the court agrees to extend it, the judge, Deborah Satanove, said in a three-page ruling. … Mr. Black's assets were frozen Aug. 18 at Hollinger's request by the order of an Ontario Superior Court judge. Mr. Black and his wife were limited to a monthly allowance of 50,000 Canadian dollars. Mr. Black and Hollinger agreed on Sept. 29 to replace the judge's order with a confidential settlement. … Hollinger, the holding company that Mr. Black used to control the newspaper publisher Hollinger International, is seeking 636 million Canadian dollars in damages. In July, Hollinger International changed its name to the Sun-Times Media Group. … In Chicago, Mr. Black faces 12 charges of racketeering, money laundering, wire fraud and obstruction of justice. He is accused of moving $92 million from Hollinger International through other companies and using Hollinger Inc. to enrich himself at shareholder expense. Mr. Black has denied any wrongdoing. His trial in Chicago is scheduled to start in March."

DOJ_NMG_0088815

CRIMINAL LAW:

Fitzgerald Seeks To Avoid Armitage Issue During Libby Trial. The AP (10/31, Apuzzo) reports Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald "told a federal judge Monday that he shouldn't have to explain during the upcoming trial of" Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby "why nobody was charged with leaking the identity of a CIA operative." The AP notes Libby's supporters "have accused Fitzgerald of singling out Libby while not charging the source of the leak, former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage. In court documents, Fitzgerald said he shouldn't have to address that issue at Libby's trial. While never addressing Armitage by name, Fitzgerald said it would be irrelevant to discuss other officials. 'If Mr. X was investigated for leaking classified information, the government's decision not to charge Mr. X should have nothing to do with the jury's role as the finder of fact in Libby's case,' Fitzgerald wrote. If jurors disagree with his decision not to charge anyone else, they might be less likely to convict Libby, Fitzgerald wrote."

Florida Prison Guards Stand Trial In Contraband-For-Sex Case. The AP (10/31, Kaczor) reports, "Lawyers for two prison guards charged in a contraband-for-sex scandal that ended in a deadly shootout told a jury Monday that the government's case relies on the testimony of inmates who are willing to lie in exchange for reduced sentences." The AP continues, "Gregory Dixon and Alan Moore, who both work at a federal prison for women, are accused of participating in a scheme to swap sex with female inmates for such commonplace items as gum, cigarettes and perfume. Both are charged with conspiracy and bribery. Dixon also is accused of witness tampering. … 'You will hear a lot of nonsense from inmates all trying to punch their tickets home,' said Thomas Findley, Dixon's lawyer, as the trial opened." The AP adds, "Authorities said the suspected plot ended June 21 in a shootout after prison guard Ralph Hill smuggled a gun into the Tallahassee Federal Correctional Institution and opened fire when FBI and Justice Department agents arrived to arrest him and other defendants. Hill and an FBI agent were killed. … Three guards have since pleaded guilty in the scheme, but none have been implicated in the shootout. Dixon and Moore have been suspended from their jobs. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Alan Sprowls acknowledged his key witnesses are convicted felons but promised the jury that the government will introduce sufficient evidence to show the guards abused their authority for personal benefit."

Judge Sets Date For Hawaii Death-Penalty Trial. The Honolulu Advertiser (10/31, Kobayashi) reports, "The first death penalty trial here since Hawai`i abolished capital punishment in the 1950s is scheduled to begin in October of next year." The Advertiser continues, "Army Spc. Naeem Williams pleaded not guilty today to a charge of murdering his 5-year-old daughter Talia Williams, who died July 16 last year. He faces the death penalty, which was authorized earlier this year by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales." The Advertiser adds, "Federal Magistrate Judge Leslie Kobayashi today set Williams' trial for Oct. 16, which is later than usual because of legal issues that may arise because the charge carries the death penalty. … Williams' wife Delilah Williams is also scheduled to go on trial with her husband on a charge of murdering Talia Williams, but the attorney general did not authorize the death penalty prosecution for her. Delilah Williams earlier pleaded not guilty. If convicted, she faces a maximum sentence of life in prison."

Florida Man Faces Federal Pornography Charges. The Bonita (FL) News (10/31, Zambo) reports that a Florida man claims "he was the real victim in the child pornography case he accused the federal government of manufacturing." Donald Deverso, a former Lee County (FL) school bus driver, "staunchly maintained his innocence Monday, telling a federal judge during his sentencing hearing that he was taken advantage of by a girl from the Philippines. … 'To keep calling these women victims — I didn't have any victims, your honor,' Deverso said before U.S. District Judge John E. Steele sentenced him to 16 years behind bars. 'I didn't write to them. They wrote to me.'" The News continues, "Deverso, 59 and of Cape Coral, was convicted on May 19 in the high-profile case. He was accused of keeping child porn on his home computer from May 11, 2002, through April 15, 2005. He also was charged with transporting child pornography in October 2004, and manufacturing it while he vacationed in the Philippines. Deverso photographed underage girls he met online through Asian dating Web sites, one victim and investigators testified in spring during his weeklong trial." The News adds, "Prosecutors said Deverso chatted with numerous women online, proposing marriage to them. Deverso remains married to his third wife, Zong Yu Deverso, whom he met on a Chinese brides Web site. Deverso countered that he never promised these others marriage, just that it was possible if they got along well. … Based on federal sentencing guidelines, Steele had to sentence Deverso to a minimum of 15 years in prison. He could have been sentenced to 20 years. … 'What kind of person flies around the world to take advantage of poor and desperate women?' Chief Assistant U.S. Attorney Doug Molloy asked. 'One who deserves the maximum penalty of incarceration this court can impose.'"

DOJ_NMG_0088816

Florida County Commissioner Will Plead Guilty To Corruption Charges. The Palm Beach Post (10/31, Dubocq) reports, "Former Palm Beach County Commission Chairman Tony Masilotti faces up to five years in prison and forfeiture of $9.5 million in cash and real estate for his leading role in a land deal conspiracy that stretched from 2000 to this past June, federal prosecutors said Monday. Masilotti, who in a sorrowful resignation letter said he will plead guilty, is expected to surrender Friday," but "still to be determined: when Masilotti formally will plead guilty and when he'll be dispatched to prison." US Attorney R. Alexander Acosta yesterday "hinted that more defendants could be charged in the case but declined to elaborate." The Post notes, "The investigation of Masilotti was triggered by an April report in The Palm Beach Post," and "within weeks of the report, the FBI and IRS swooped in and a grand jury was impaneled." FBI Miami SAC Jonathan Solomon "credited The Post. 'I'd just like to recognize them for their investigative reporting,' Solomon said at Monday's news conference. 'They did an outstanding job.'"

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (10/31, Hafenbrack, Franceschina, 265K) reports, "In one Palm Beach County deal, Masilotti is accused of receiving between $40,000 and $50,000 for his assistance in helping a developer solve traffic problems concerning land the Diocese of Palm Beach County was selling in the town of Royal Palm Beach. In another deal, Masilotti and family members allegedly got $100,000 in free air travel from a developer who did business with county in purchasing a former public horse riding area near Wellington." The Sun-Sentinel notes that in his letter indicating his intention to plead guilty, Masilotti "pledged to cooperate with the FBI, Internal Revenue Service and U.S. Attorney's Office, which have been investigating for six months his potential abuse of power."

Louisiana Police Chief Sentenced To Probation, Restitution For False Claim. KATC-TV Lafayette (10/30) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "Former Opelousas Police Chief Larry Caillier, who had a stellar career in law enforcement, was sentenced Monday in federal court for filing a false claim. His department was paid for bike patrols that never happened." US District Judge Richard Haik "sentenced him to five years probation, 10 months of house arrest and he must pay restitution to the U.S. Clerk of Court. The FBI determined Caillier owes $26,300." The Opelousas Daily World (10/31, Cochran) notes, "The conviction is the first and only found against the former chief, though the state remains poised to proceed with another 26 separate charges" against Caillier for "allegedly ordering OPD officers not to respond to disturbance calls and several other charges ranging from forgery to money laundering. Also still facing both federal and state charges in connection with the patrols is former OPD Maj. Ronnie Trahan," who was "charged last week in federal court with aiding and abetting Caillier in the filing of a false claim for reimbursement on the patrols."

The Baton Rouge Advocate (10/31, Burgess) reports Caillier and Trahan "were accused in a federal investigation that focused on a $225,000 U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development grant for bicycle patrols at public housing projects in Opelousas from 2000 to 2003. … Trahan told investigators that Caillier directed him to falsify time sheets to ensure that the Police Department billed $3,000 every two weeks, regardless of whether the money was earned by patrolling officers."

US To Retry Pellicano-Related Perjury Case. The Los Angeles Times (10/31, Krikorian, 918K) reports, "Federal authorities announced Monday that they will retry a former phone company employee acquitted last month of four of five charges in the first trial resulting from the wiretapping investigation of indicted private investigator Anthony Pellicano and others. Citing 'compelling' new evidence in the case, Assistant U.S. Atty. Daniel Saunders told U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer that the government would again prosecute Joann Wiggan for perjury for allegedly lying to a federal grand jury last October when she said she never retrieved a single message from her voicemail account at work. … Additionally, Saunders said, he expects a superseding indictment with additional charges against Wiggan to be returned in two weeks." The Times notes, "Though separate from the larger Pellicano case, the prosecution of Wiggan arose from the same FBI probe of the former private eye and allegations that he and others used a variety of illegal means, including wiretaps, to benefit his clients."

California Energy Company CEO Sentenced To Eight Years In Prison. The Orange County Register (10/31, Hammill) reports, "The former CEO of a defunct Los Angeles energy company who participated in a fraudulent investment scheme was sentenced to eight years in federal prison at the United States District Court in Los Angeles on Monday." Illya Bond "was also ordered by District Court Judge Percy Anderson to pay over $2.4 million in restitution to victims of fraud involving the PowerSource Corporation, a fraudulent company he formerly helmed. A federal jury convicted Bond on charges of conspiracy, mail fraud, wire fraud and making a false statement to special agents with the FBI in a January decision. He is the last in a series of seven defendants with ties to the company to be convicted and the sixth sentenced." KCAL-TV Los Angeles (10/30) noted, "Bond, who also used the name Frank Akberry, was convicted in January of conspiracy, mail fraud, wire fraud and lying to FBI agents."

DOJ_NMG_0088817

Many States Restrict Halloween Activity For Sex Offenders. USA Today (10/31, Koch) reports, "Many sex offenders, limited in where they can live or work, are under another restriction today: no costumes, no candy giving, no jack-o'-lanterns, no welcoming front-porch lights." USA continues, "Some states go further to protect children on the holiday. At least 10 states keep a special eye on sex offenders via house arrest or required meetings, through such programs as Operation Boo in California and Operation Trick No Treat in Virginia." USA adds, "In New Mexico, a convicted pedophile or violent sex offender who lives alone has, for the first time this year, a sign outside his door today that notifies the public of his offense, says Tim Olsen, a regional manager of the New Mexico Corrections Department. He says offenders must stay inside and keep outside lights turned off. … New Mexico, New Jersey, South Carolina and Tennessee are into their second year of precautions, although Tennessee only recently announced its restrictions after phone calls from anxious parents." USA notes, "In Virginia, which began its Halloween program in 2002, high-risk sex offenders on parole or probation must report to offices where they are held for several hours while kids go trick or treating. … Some states have had Halloween restrictions for years but are increasing surveillance. New York, which requires offenders to stay home between 3 p.m. and 6 a.m., is making checkup calls and unannounced visits. … Other states with Halloween restrictions include Illinois, North Carolina and Wisconsin."

FBI Reports Fewest Police Killed On Duty Since 2001. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/31, Jordan) reports, "The number of police officers nationwide who were killed by criminals while on the job in 2005 dipped slightly from a year earlier, FBI data released Monday show. An estimated 1,800 fewer cops were assaulted during the same time period – the lowest total since 2001." The AP notes, "Traffic duty proved to be the most lethal assignment for the officers, the report shows. Fifteen cops were killed during traffic pursuits or on traffic stops, compared with eight slain while making arrests and another eight who were ambushed."

St. Louis Officials Dispute Top Crime Ranking. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (10/31, Kohler, 300K) reports, "Here we go again: A publisher in Kansas, using a formula decried by criminologists, says St. Louis is the most dangerous city in the United States. And city officials are fuming. … 'This thing is bogus,' grumbled Jeff Rainford, chief of staff to Mayor Francis Slay. But bogus or not, Rainford said, there is good reason to worry the ranking could hurt St. Louis. Nancy Milton, spokeswoman for the St. Louis Convention & Visitors Commission, said she fielded phone calls Monday from convention planners concerned about what they were hearing." The Post-Dispatch notes, "Morgan Quitno's assessment is based on a given city's rates last year in six crime categories…as reported to the FBI. … Richard Rosenfeld, a criminologist at the University of Missouri at St. Louis, said Morgan Quitno's methodology is flawed because it compares places like Memphis, which includes miles of outlying areas, to St. Louis, where the city limits barely extend from the urban core."

The AP (10/31, Leonard) reports, "Mayor Francis Slay makes no bones about it: Morgan Quitno Press is dead wrong to call St. Louis the most dangerous city in the United States. … 'To suggest that St. Louis is more dangerous than Miami, New Orleans, Los Angeles and Chicago - it just doesn't make any sense.'" The AP notes, "Slay took issue with the study's methodology. He said the group used population figures from the U.S. Census Bureau that were too low, exaggerating the crime statistics. … Scott Morgan, president of Morgan Quitno, said he used a population estimate of 346,000 derived from an FBI report. Changing the figure to 353,000 doesn't change St. Louis's ranking, Morgan said."

Rankings Widely Noted In Local Media. Meanwhile, the Morgan Quitno rankings – officially released yesterday – garnered extensive local media across the country, with the stories all noting that the report was based on FBI crime statistics. Some examples: The Knoxville News Sentinel (10/31) reports Knoxville ranked "297th on a list of 371 cities," but "KPD spokesman Darrell DeBusk said the study appears flawed as far as Tennessee numbers are concerned." DeBusk noted, "All Tennessee law enforcement agencies use an incident based reporting system, versus the Uniform Crime Report system that most law enforcement agencies in the county use." The News Sentinel adds, "The FBI has recommended the incident based system as more accurate, but only a few states have adopted it so far, DeBusk said. … Visiting St. Louis on Thursday, FBI director Robert Mueller said it was too early to tell why some types of crime were rising faster in the Midwest. Mueller said the FBI is working harder to form partnerships with police departments to launch programs like St. Louis' Safe Streets task force, which focuses police efforts on problematic neighborhoods."

DOJ_NMG_0088818

WAVE-TV Louisville (10/30, MacDonald) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "Louisville made the list of the 10 safest large cities for the second year in a row. … But like so many things right now, the ranking has turned in to a political issue, with some saying it proves crime fighting efforts are working here, and others saying just the opposite." WAVE noted, "Shortly after visiting with school children Monday morning, Louisville Mayor Jerry Abramson said the ranking is proof things are working here in the River City." However, "Councilman Kelly Downard has made crime a major part of his own campaign for mayor and he disagrees with the Louisville's ranking, calling it a 'fluke.'"

WLNS-TV Lansing (10/30, Arla) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "Two Michigan cities follow" St. Louis – "Detroit at #2, and Flint ranks third. Lansing ranks as the 96th most-dangerous city. The new list gives the perception Lansing isn't that safe, but the Lansing Police Department says their numbers tell a different story. … The Lansing Police Department says the company omitted many other crimes for its list, like arson or drug arrests. Therefore, the department doesn't believe the numbers give an accurate picture."

WSOC-TV Charlotte (10/30) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "Charlotte has been named one of the most dangerous big cities in the country, but police say the ranking is wrong. … Morgan Quitno Press used Federal Bureau of Investigation numbers to determine how safe the cities are," ranking Charlotte eighth. "Charlotte-Mecklenburg police, however, say the group shouldn't compare cities using that method, and it's misleading." C-MPD Chief Darrel Stephens "also said not all of the FBI numbers are used in the ranking, so the data is selective."

The Newark Star-Ledger (10/31, Spoto) reports, "The day after it was named the safest place in the nation, Brick Township was soaking up the good press. Residents flagged down police officers to praise them for their hard work, and neighbors, friends and business people congratulated themselves on their good fortune. … But some were more than a little suspicious," and the report "does have a few quirks." Morgan Quinto "looks only at municipalities of 75,000 people or more. Brick Township is on the low side of that cutoff with an estimated population of 80,000. It joined only 11 other communities in the state." Therefore, "554 of New Jersey's 566 towns were excluded."

CIVIL LAW:

High Court To Hear Phillip Morris's Appeal Of $79.5 Million Punitive Damages Award. The Christian Science Monitor (10/31, Richey, 58K) reports, "Jesse Williams smoked two packs of cigarettes a day for 45 years. Following his death in 1997 after being diagnosed with lung cancer, his wife, Mayola, sued the Philip Morris tobacco company seeking $100 million in punitive damages. The Oregon jury that heard her case rejected the $100 million request. Instead, it awarded her $79.5 million. Tuesday, the case arrives at the US Supreme Court where lawyers for Philip Morris are asking the justices to strike down the punitive damage award as constitutionally excessive and fundamentally unfair. The case, Philip Morris v. Mayola Williams, is being closely watched to see whether a majority of justices are willing to issue strict guidelines to identify when a punitive damage award is unconstitutionally excessive."

The AP (10/30) reports, "Jesse Williams, according to his widow, never gave any credence to the surgeon general's health warnings about smoking cigarettes. … Nine years after Williams' death, the Supreme Court is considering this question: Can Williams' widow collect $79.5 million in punitive damages for fraud from the cigarette company Philip Morris USA?" The AP continues, "To the dismay of anti-smoking groups, the Supreme Court agreed to hear the company's appeal of a jury verdict in Oregon. … Philip Morris, the maker of Marlboros, is struggling to turn back unfavorable rulings by Oregon state courts in the Williams case. One ruling upheld the jury award after the Supreme Court sent the case back to Oregon once before to make sure it conformed to a 2003 high court opinion limiting punitive damages." The AP notes that "the Williams family is counting on justices to find that Philip Morris' conduct was so reprehensible that it justifies exceeding guidelines the court has laid out in two rulings in the past 10 years that struck down large awards. … One difference is that the earlier cases did not involve physical injuries. … The company doesn't deny making public statements rejecting a link between smoking and cancer; rather, it says there's no evidence Williams ever heard the statements or ever read them. … The court also will be looking at the decision of the state courts that declared it acceptable for the jury in the Williams case to consider harm by Philip Morris to other smokers for conduct similar to that which allegedly injured Williams."

The New York Times (10/31, 1.21M), in an editorial, notes the Supreme Court "has already indicated that at some point punitive damages become so large that they violate due process. But it has done a poor job of identifying that point. Originally, it laid down some reasonable factors for lower courts to consider, including how reprehensible they considered the defendant's conduct. But in 2003, the court put forth the dubious proposition that punitive damages should generally be in a 'single digit' ratio to actual damages — so with actual damages of, say, $100,000, punitive damages should be under $1 million. Constitutional principles can seldom be boiled down to a formula, and it is difficult to see why the court should rein in juries so tightly."

DOJ_NMG_0088819

6th Circuit Panel Upholds Kentucky Law Requiring Tobacco Payments. The AP (10/31, Barrouquere) reports, "Kentucky can continue to enforce laws requiring small cigarette companies to make payments to help cover smoking-related health costs, a federal appeals court ruled Monday." The AP continues, "The ruling means the state can continue collecting escrow payments from small cigarette companies that did not participate in the 1998 master settlement agreement between tobacco companies and 52 states and U.S. territories. Attorneys said it was the first ruling by a federal appeals court addressing the issue of whether states can force smaller companies to make the payments." The AP adds, "The landmark agreement in 1998 required payments to be made over 25 years and settled all of the state's lawsuits over the public costs of treating sick smokers. More than 30 states passed laws requiring nonparticipating cigarette-makers to make escrow payments. .. A three-judge panel from the 6th Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati turned away a challenge from three companies that said Kentucky laws effectively barred the businesses from selling tobacco in the state."

Tenet To Sell California Hospital. The Memphis Business Journal (10/31) reports, "The hospital that helped launch Tenet Healthcare Corp. on a painful four-year odyssey with the Department of Justice now has a new owner." The Journal continues, "Tenet announced late Friday that it had reached an agreement with a physician-owned company to take over the 306-bed Alvarado Hospital Medical Center in San Diego. The new owner, Plymouth Health, will pay $36.5 million for Alvarado, with the money going into Tenet general funds. The sale is expected to be completed by Dec. 31." The Journal adds, "Alvarado came under scrutiny four years ago when the Justice Department looked into the hospital's physician recruitment efforts, including the payment of some physician relocation expenses. The law is vague on the subject and two California juries were unable to reach a verdict in a case that was filed in 2003. … Tenet agreed to sell Alvarado as part of a deal to drop the case."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

US Makes Arrests In Arizona Human Smuggling Probe. The AP (10/31, Rotstein) reports from Tucson, AZ, "More than 40 people were arrested Monday in connection with a family-run smuggling ring that brought hundreds of illegal immigrants into the country, officials said." The AP continues, "The 44 arrests came after a two-year investigation into the ring, which operated out of the southern Arizona town of Bowie, officials said. Many of those arrested are American citizens, officials said. Eleven more suspects, including at least five Mexican nationals, remained at large Monday." The AP adds, "The ring recruited young women to smuggle migrants' infants through ports of entry, posing as their mothers, while the parents were smuggled through the desert separately, said John Lewis, the FBI special agent in charge in Arizona. … The operation smuggled people from Mexico into the U.S. for more than 10 years — most from Mexico, but also from El Salvador and the Dominican Republic, Lewis said. … 'This network organized, housed, fed, guided and transported large numbers of illegal aliens across the border,' said Paul K. Charlton, U.S. attorney for Arizona." The AP notes, "The suspects were named in an indictment this month. They included the suspected ring leader, Pablo Esteban Juarez, 31; his wife, Lori Gutierrez Juarez, 30; guides who walked people across the border; drivers who transported illegal immigrants; and 'money runners' who picked up smuggling fees."

The Arizona Republic (10/31, Wagner) adds, "Although the so-called Juarez Alien Smuggling Organization is based in Bowie, federal agents also made arrests in nearby Willcox and in New Mexico, California, Minnesota and Ohio. 'This is not just a couple of coyotes,' said Deb McCarley, an FBI spokeswoman. 'This was the entire organization from top to bottom that we took down.'"

Many Voters To Face New ID Poll ID Requirements. The Wall Street Journal (10/31, D1, Conkey, 2.03M) reports many Americans used to being asked for IDs at airports and in bars "will also hear it when they go to the polls. That's because nearly half of the states have passed laws -- many since widely publicized irregularities in the 2000 presidential race in Florida -- requiring voters to prove their identity before they're allowed to cast a ballot." But the laws 'are sparking confusion, partisan rancor and a frenzy of legal challenges in the days leading up to the midterm election." And "any voter in any state is entitled to cast a provisional ballot if he or she encounters a problem at the polling place. States do, however, vary on how they determine whether a provisional ballot is later counted and how long a voter has to come back and prove his identity."

Voting Machine Company Denies Links To Venezuelan President. The Wall Street Journal (10/31, A4, Davis, 2.03M) reports Smartmatic Corp., "whose voting machines will be used in midterm elections next week, says it adopted a complicated ownership structure to minimize taxes and protect intellectual property, and not to mask any control by Venezuela's government." Smartmatic, which is "owned by Venezuelan entrepreneurs who split their time between Boca Raton, Fla., and Caracas, has been caught up in a government probe over foreign ownership. On Election Day, Smartmatic equipment will be used in 16 states, including Florida and California, and the District of Columbia." The actions "of the voting-machine company are being reviewed by the Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S. The committee reviews foreign acquisitions to see if they pose national security concerns."

DOJ_NMG_0088820

The Washington Post (10/31, A4, Goldfarb, 748K) reports Smartmatic, the "nation's third-largest supplier of electronic voting machines said yesterday that it asked the federal government to review its purchase by a company controlled by Venezuelans to allay concerns that it is influenced by Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez." Smartmatic representatives "said that the Venezuelan government does not own and has never owned any part of the company."

Pentagon Said To Ignore Risks Of E-Mail Voting For Troops. The Washington Post (10/31, Nakashima, 748K) reports, "This year, thousands of soldiers around the world have the opportunity to vote in the Nov. 7 elections by e-mail." But computer security experts "inside and outside the government warned that the Pentagon's Federal Voting Assistance Program ignores the risks associated with unencrypted e-mail: interception, hacking and identity theft." The coauthor of a critical report, computer science professor David Wagner, said of the combination of faxing and e-mail options, "It's got all of the problems with unencrypted e-mail, plus your ballot is being routed through the Department of Defense. Will soldiers feel free to vote their conscience when they know that the DOD may be able to see how they voted? How do we know that the DOD or their contractors haven't modified soldiers' ballots in transit?"

Michigan Voters Split On Proposition To Ban Racial Preferences. The New York Times (10/31, Lewin, 1.21M) reports, "Three years after the Supreme Court heard Jennifer Gratz's challenge to the University of Michigan's affirmative action policy, she is still fighting racial preferences, this time in a Michigan ballot initiative." Gratz, a "white applicant who was wait-listed 11 years ago at the state's flagship campus here," said, "We have a horrible history when it comes to race in this country. But that doesn't make it right to give preference to the son of a black doctor at the expense of a poor student whose parents didn't go to college." The Times adds the ballot initiative, Proposition 2, "which would amend Michigan's Constitution to bar public institutions from considering race or sex in public education, employment or contracting, has drawn wide opposition from the state's civic establishment, including business and labor, the Democratic governor and her Republican challenger. But polls show voters are split, with significant numbers undecided or refusing to say where they stand."

8th Circuit Panel Upholds Ban On South Dakota Abortion Warning Law Enforcement. The AP (10/31, Brokaw) reports, "South Dakota cannot enforce a 2005 law that would require doctors to give additional warnings to women who seek abortions, a federal appeals panel ruled Monday." The AP continues, "In a 2-1 ruling, the panel of the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld a lower court's ruling that has prevented the state from enforcing the law. Planned Parenthood, which challenged the measure, has demonstrated a likelihood it will win in its argument that the law violates the U.S. Constitution, the panel said." The AP adds, "The law, passed by state lawmakers in 2005, would require doctors to tell women that abortions end human lives and may later cause serious psychological problems for women who have abortions. A woman also would have to be told she has a legal relationship with her unborn child and that the relationship would be terminated by an abortion that would end the child's life. … U.S. District Judge Karen Schreier of Rapid City issued an order preventing the state from enforcing the law while the lawsuit proceeds. The judge said Planned Parenthood has a fair chance of succeeding on its claim that the law violates the free-speech rights of doctors. … The state argues that the required information is medically accurate and supported by science. State lawyers contend the law would not curb reasonable access to abortion in South Dakota."

South Dakota Abortion Ban Initiative Seen As Likely To Fail. The Washington Times (10/31, Wetzstein, 88K) reports a South Dakota ballot "measure to ban almost all abortions in the state is likely to fail by a wide margin, a new poll says." Fifty-two percent "of 800 likely voters said they would vote 'no' next week on a law banning all abortions except to save the life of a mother, according to the poll, conducted for the Argus Leader newspaper in Sioux Falls, S.D." Forty-two percent of voters "said they would vote 'yes' for the ban, and 6 percent were undecided, according to the survey, which had a margin of error of 3.5 percent and was released in the newspaper's Sunday edition."

Maryland Youth Prison Woes Become Campaign Issue. The Washington Post (10/31, B02, Otto) reports, "When the $60 million Baltimore City Juvenile Justice Center opened in 2003, it was hailed as the kind of solution Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) had promised when he campaigned for office. … Within a year, independent monitors were describing conditions there as bad as those in the state's most notorious juvenile jails. A U.S. Justice Department report this summer found that the center has failed to 'adequately protect children from youth violence.'" The Post continues, "When Cheltenham Youth Facility shut down several of its dilapidated cottages in January 2004, advocates heralded a move toward smaller, more specialized centers. But today, some of the state's jails remain so crowded that teenagers sleep on the floor. … As Ehrlich faces a tough fight for reelection this fall, his bold promises to fix one of Maryland's most troubled systems have vexed his campaign. … 'The system has gotten worse in the last four years,' Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, Ehrlich's Democratic challenger, said in a recent interview. 'We're writing off too many young lives.'" The Post adds, "The governor defends his efforts, saying in a recent debate, 'We have made great strides on our juvenile justice system. We've changed the whole paradigm there.' … Ehrlich did not mince words about the troubled system when he ran for governor four years ago and laid the blame squarely on his Democratic opponent, Kathleen Kennedy Townsend. As lieutenant governor, Townsend had taken on juvenile justice as a priority. … But problems with violence and mismanagement ran deep in many of the nearly two dozen state-run facilities entrusted with more than 2,000 young offenders. The state's juvenile boot camps had been shut down because of brutality."

DOJ_NMG_0088821

Discord Within ACLU Described. In an op-ed for USA Today (10/31, 2.27M) Nat Hentoff, former member of the ACLU's national board, writes the ACLU "is in crisis, and impassioned supporters of its mission want change now. It's up to the national leadership to listen — and to resign. … ACLU members, donors, former staffers and board members, as well as civil liberties activists," are "supporting a website called SavetheACLU.org. The board of the South Carolina ACLU has also signed on. All are opponents of the present leadership — Executive Director Anthony Romero and President Nadine Strossen. … Particularly providing momentum to this rebellion was the decision of Romero's longtime predecessor as executive director, Ira Glasser, to become a leader of the opposition after initially remaining silent."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Probing Sony Electronics Unit. The AP (10/31) reports, "Sony Corp. said Tuesday that the U.S. Justice Department is probing its electronics unit." The AP continues, "The company received a subpoena from the Justice Department's antitrust division seeking information about Sony's static random access memory, or SRAM, business, company spokesman Atsuo Omagari said. … Sony intends to cooperate with the investigation, which it described as an industrywide inquiry." The AP adds, "Earlier this month, U.S.-based chipmaker Cypress Semiconductor Corp. said its SRAM operations were also under investigation by the U.S. Department of Justice. … A separate U.S. Justice investigation into price-fixing among DRAM companies has so far resulted in more than a dozen charges against individuals and more than $731 million in fines against Samsung Electronics Co., Elpida Memory Inc., Infineon Technologies AG and Hynix Semiconductor Inc."

SCOTUS Denies Stolt-Nielsen Appeal On Antitrust Amnesty Issue. The Wall Street Journal (10/31, A11, Anderson) reports, "The U.S. Supreme Court on Monday rejected Stolt-Nielsen S.A.'s last-ditch appeal to derail a federal indictment against it for price-fixing and other illegal cartel activities in the market for deep-sea chemicals shipping." The Journal continues, "The decision by the justices, announced with a brief order, clears the way for federal prosecution of the company on an indictment issued by a Philadelphia grand jury in September. Justice Samuel Alito, who worked on the case as an appeals court judge, recused himself." The Journal adds, "Stolt-Nielsen in 2004 became the first company to have amnesty revoked under the Justice Department's 13-year-old program. The company has waged an intense campaign to thwart Justice Department prosecution, arguing federal authorities wrongly canceled the amnesty agreement they had struck with the company that prevented its prosecution. Justice Department prosecutors, however, have argued in federal court that Stolt-Nielsen violated the terms of that agreement. … The Supreme Court in July and August twice turned away emergency appeals from the London-based shipping company before the indictments were announced. Stolt-Nielsen had asked the Supreme Court to review the ability of Justice antitrust officials to nullify the agreement without interference from federal courts."

The Financial Times (10/31, Waldmeir) reports, "Stolt-Nielsen volunteered information about antitrust violations in the parcel tanker market, in exchange for amnesty from the Justice Department. … But federal prosecutors later withdrew the amnesty and indicted the company, saying it breached its duty to co-operate. … 'These kinds of government [amnesty] programmes are not going to be worth anything if companies continue to be treated like this company was in this case,' says Robin Conrad of the National Chamber Litigation Center, legal arm of the US Chamber of Commerce, which argued that courts should have more power to enforce leniency deals."

Merck To Buy Sima Therapeutics For $1.1 Billion. The AP (10/31) reports, "Pharmaceutical company Merck & Co. said Monday it agreed to buy Sirna Therapeutics Inc., which is creating a new way to develop therapies based on RNA interference, for $1.1 billion in cash." The AP continues, "Merck's $13-per-share bid offers almost a 102 percent premium over Sirna's closing price of $6.45, down 5 cents, on the Nasdaq. Sirna shares surged $6.10, or 94.5

DOJ_NMG_0088822

percent, to $12.55 in aftermarket electronic exchange trading. The stock's 52-week high is $8.52, set in April." The AP adds, 'Sirna's RNA interference technology offers a new way to develop medicines and shows great promise in cancer research, Merck said. Sirna's operations would complement RNA work Merck has been doing since its 2001 acquisition of Rosetta Inpharmatics Inc., the company said. … Sirna's leading clinical development candidate is for the treatment of the wet-form of age-related macular degeneration, part of a broad collaboration with Allergan Inc. in ophthalmic diseases."

The Wall Street Journal (10/31, A16, Johnson) reports, "The deal moves Merck into a leading position in the field, coming on the heels of its 2001 purchase of Rosetta Inpharmatics. That acquisition gave the Whitehouse Station, N.J., drug maker the tools to look closely at the genes in a genome. With Sirna, Merck will have the ability to target -- instead of just locate -- certain parts of a cell for destruction, said Mervyn Turner, Merck's senior vice president of world-wide licensing and external research." The Journal adds, "Merck believes RNAi technology holds particular potential in cancer research because it could home in on genes that control cancerous cells, destroying them without harming surrounding normal cells. … Sirna only has a handful of drugs in development. Its most advanced treatment, which is in the second of three phases of human testing, is targeted at the wet form of age-related macular degeneration, a leading cause of blindness in the elderly."

Google Urges Microsoft To Allow Users' Search Choices. The AP (10/31) reports, "Google Inc. said Monday that it wants Microsoft Corp. to make sure users can easily choose Internet search engines in future products — but Google refused to say if changes Microsoft has already made to its upcoming operating system, Vista, have gone far enough." The AP continues, "David C. Drummond, Google's senior vice president of corporate development, spoke to reporters after meeting with European Union antitrust regulators but refused to give details on those talks, beyond saying there had been no particular agenda. … 'It's been our view that any new version of Microsoft products that include search, that that be done in a way that preserves user choice for search and other applications,' Drummond said. He said that Google would monitor the situation but that it was 'too early to tell' if there were would be any antitrust allegations arising from Vista." The AP adds, "Vista is Microsoft's first major update to the company's flagship operating system since Windows XP was released in late 2001. … Microsoft said this month it had changed Vista in several key sectors — including its search service — in an attempt to soothe European antitrust worries. Regulators had said they were concerned that computer manufacturers or consumers might be prevented from having a proper choice between different software packages."

Microsoft Withdraws From Efforts To Limit AT&T-BellSouth Deal. Bloomberg (10/31, Peterson) reports, "Microsoft Corp. distanced itself from a group lobbying for restrictions on AT&T Inc.'s proposed acquisition of BellSouth Corp., saying it won't seek to influence regulators weighing the purchase." Bloomberg continues, "The company, a founder of the It's Our Net Coalition, pulled its name from the member list after deciding not to weigh in on the $82 billion deal, spokeswoman Ginny Terzano said Monday. The group wants net neutrality rules to bar telephone and cable providers from charging new priority-access fees. … The 172-member coalition last week urged the Federal Communications Commission to impose 'meaningful and effective net neutrality safeguards' on the BellSouth deal. The group wants the FCC to bar AT&T, the biggest U.S. phone company, from favoring some companies over others that offer the same type of Web content or services, depending on how much they pay. … 'Microsoft has withdrawn its name from the It's Our Net Web site' while the FCC considers the deal, Terzano said in an e-mailed statement. 'However, we continue to support and will pursue other opportunities to obtain meaningful network neutrality policies.'" Bloomberg adds, "Terzano declined to comment on whether Microsoft will restore its name to the site after the FCC rules on the BellSouth purchase or say if the company has quit the group. The commission is scheduled to vote on the deal Friday."

Schneider Electric To Buy American Power Conversion For $6.1 Billion. The Financial Times (10/31, Strauss, Cameron) reports, "Schneider Electric, the French electrical equipment group, on Monday agreed to pay $6.1bn cash for American Power Conversion of the US to boost its capacity in back-up supply systems for the IT sector." The Times continues, "Marking a bold start for Jean-Pascal Tricoire in his first year as chief executive, the deal will be Schneider's first big acquisition since the failed merger in 2001 with Legrand, a domestic rival, which the European Commission overturned on antitrust grounds." The Times adds, "Mr Tricoire said the APC deal was 'a significant strategic move' that would strengthen Schneider's position in the electrical distribution sector, the fastest-growing segment of its core business. … However, analysts questioned the timing and price, given the uncertain outlook for IT spending in the US market, which accounts for close to half of APC's sales."

The Wall Street Journal (10/31, C6, Levitz) reports, "Both companies specialize in the critical-power market, making gear that helps firms withstand blips and outages.

DOJ_NMG_0088823

APC's bread and butter is smaller power systems, while Schneider's domain is with bigger entities. APC, however, has been migrating into the larger market." The Journal continues, "The French company is trying to quickly eliminate 'one of its key competitors' and break into the North American small-company critical-power market dominated by APC, says Boston analyst John Quealy, of Canaccord Adams, adding that 'my guess is that they struck first with a knock-out-punch type take-out price.'" The Journal adds, "Schneider and APC, of West Kingston, R.I., have benefited from a trend of corporate spending to protect computerized data from the effects of even small interruptions. The trend is being driven by several factors. New York's 2003 blackouts caused many firms to realize they couldn't afford to be out of commission for several hours, while new federal health-care privacy laws have prompted medical centers to add to data capabilities, creating more need for protection."

EU To Probe Qualcomm Royalties. Bloomberg (10/31, Newman) reports, "Qualcomm Inc., the world's second- largest maker of mobile phone chips, will be investigated by the European Union over allegations it overcharges Nokia Oyj, Ericsson AB and other handset manufacturers, people with knowledge of the situation said." Bloomberg continues, "The European Commission, the EU's Brussels-based antitrust authority, has told Qualcomm and phonemakers that it will open a formal probe of complaints over royalty rates in the next few weeks, said two people who declined to be identified because the decision isn't public. An EU probe could lead to Qualcomm being forced to lower its rates or fined as much as 10 percent of sales. … 'The impact on royalties would be significant and the impact on finances would be catastrophic,' said Richard Windsor, a mobile phone analyst at Nomura Securities in London. If the EU forces the company to cut the rate in half, Qualcomm's pretax profit in 2007 would drop by a third to $3.3 billion, he said. … The case focuses on how rewards are shared in the $200 billion industry to supply equipment for third-generation mobile phones, which allow users to access the Internet and play videos. Qualcomm contends it's owed royalties on all of the newest 3G handsets because it holds essential patents. Rivals say Qualcomm has fewer patents on 3G phones than on earlier generations and should lower its rates."

NYTimes Claims US Patent System Is "Broken." The New York Times (10/31, 1.21M), in an editorial, writes, "The broken American patent system has a knack for sanctioning the ridiculous. In the latest example, businesses are receiving patents for devising ways to obey the law — the tax code, to be more specific. What's next, a patented murder defense? As Floyd Norris reported recently in The Times, the broad category known as business-method patents (like patenting the idea of pizza delivery rather than the pizza itself) has expanded once again. Now it includes the legal ways that accountants and lawyers help their clients pay less tax. … Patents are supposed to encourage innovation, rewarding the individual for the greater good of society. But excessive or overly broad patents can slow business activity to the pace of cold molasses."

ENVIRONMENT:

Two Questioned In Probe Of California Wildfire. The Los Angeles Times (10/30, Willon) reports, "Investigators today questioned two 'people of interest' in the deadly Esperanza arson fire that killed four federal firefighters in Riverside County last week, a Riverside County sheriff's spokesman said. … No arrests were made and the people are not in custody." The Times continues, "The latest steps in the investigation came as firefighters expect to contain the blaze later tonight, the fifth day that the fire has burned. … Because four firefighters died, suspects could be charged with murder in connection with the arson. … 'We have two people we have questioned that are people of interest," Riverside County spokesman Tom Freeman said. 'Sheriff's personnel have not placed them under arrest.... We continue to work the case aggressively.' … The pool of reward money has reached $500,000." The Times adds, "Freeman did not provide any details about what led investigators to the two people, who were not identified. He said law enforcement and fire officials are investigating more than 250 leads that have been called into a special arson tip line. … Sheriff's officials cautioned that they may question many people in the ongoing investigation. … More than 50 investigators from the Riverside County Sheriff's Department, California Department of Forestry and Fire Protection, U.S. Forest Service and Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms are working on the arson case."

The AP (10/31, Hoffman) reports, "Sheriff's deputies took two men and three bags of material from a house in Cabazon, said neighbor Robert Dunham, 70, who lives three doors down from the residence a quarter-mile from where the fire started." The AP continues, "Authorities released little information about the two people who were interviewed at a sheriff's station and later released. No arrests had been made. … Authorities said the fire was deliberately set at the base of a slope in Cabazon, west of Palm Springs. Cabazon residents have said they saw two young men leaving the area where the fire began." The AP adds, "Since it started around 1 a.m. Thursday, the fire has burned 63 square miles, or 40,200 acres, as fierce Santa Ana winds swept through the region and fanned the flames. It was about 90 percent contained, and authorities expected full containment Monday night. It has destroyed 54 structures - 34 homes and 20 other buildings."

DOJ_NMG_0088824

Federal Investigation Finds Cost Cutting Contributed To BP Texas City Blast. The Wall Street Journal (10/31, A3, Cummins) reports, "Cost-cutting efforts by senior management at BP PLC contributed to a deadly explosion at a refinery in Texas last year, federal investigators said, a finding that ratchets up the legal stakes for the London-based oil giant." The board "alleged for the first time that high-level decisions to defer overhauls, cut staff and rein in costs at the Texas City, Texas, plant helped cause the accident, which killed 15 people and injured 180." The Journal says, "BP already faces a criminal probe into the accident as well as civil claims from victims and survivors' families. Though the board hasn't any regulatory role or prosecutorial powers, its findings could be taken up by civil litigants or by other agencies probing the disaster."

The Financial Times (10/31, McNulty) reports, "BP's global management was aware of 'significant safety problems' at the Texas City refinery and 34 other locations around the world well before last year's deadly explosion at the US plant, investigators said on Monday." The Times says, "The US Chemical Safety Board, an independent federal agency charged with investigating industrial chemical accidents, said internal BP documents prepared between 2002 and 2005 revealed knowledge of those problems before the March 2005 explosion killed 15 and injured 500 people in and around BP's biggest refinery." The CSB "report will also likely be used by the federal grand jury investigating whether to bring criminal charges against BP and its executives for the Texas explosion."

The Washington Post (10/31, D01, Mufson) reports, "The company said it has settled with the families of all but one of the workers killed in the Texas City, Tex., incident and with hundreds injured. But Brent Coon, the lead plaintiffs' lawyer in the refinery case scheduled to start next week, said that the Justice Department had been asking for documents for its own investigation. 'It's a good report,' Coon said. 'It says many of the things we've said all along.' … Merritt said that 'BP implemented a 25 percent cut on fixed costs from 1998 to 2000 that adversely impacted maintenance expenditures and infrastructure at the refinery.' She said maintenance spending had declined throughout the 1990s, when the refinery belonged to Amoco Corp. Once Amoco merged with BP, she said, further cuts were imposed. … In the 30 years before the explosion, a worker had died in an accident at the Texas City refinery on average of once every 16 months. … BP, while conceding responsibility, disputed Merritt's conclusions."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Former FBI Agent Sentenced For Giving Information To Suspected Spy. The Los Angeles Times (10/31, Krikorian) reports, "Seven years after she was suspended for allegedly disclosing classified material to a suspected Chinese spy, former FBI agent Denise K. Woo was sentenced Monday to probation and a $1,000 fine for improperly sharing confidential information, a misdemeanor." The Times continues, "Woo, 47, of Redondo Beach was transferred from white-collar investigations to a counterintelligence squad pursuing Chinese intelligence agents after her bosses learned in 1999 that she was friends with Jeffrey Wang, a Torrance engineer suspected by the FBI of committing espionage for China. Wang was never charged with a crime. … After her transfer, interviews show, she became convinced that Wang was innocent of wrongdoing and had been falsely accused of espionage by an FBI informant." The Times adds, "Though no charges were filed against Wang, Woo was accused by the FBI of inappropriately disclosing information about the probe to Wang. Suspended and later fired, Woo was then indicted two years ago for allegedly disclosing the existence of a national security wiretap on Wang's home telephone, revealing to Wang the identity of the FBI's confidential informant and lying to FBI agents. … Those felony charges, which carried a minimum 10-year prison sentence, were subsequently dismissed when Woo acknowledged in June that she had improperly passed along information about the FBI's confidential operative to Wang in October 1999." The Times notes, "Though authorities had no comment about the plea agreement, Woo said she had been unjustly accused at great personal expense to her and her family. … 'This is kind of a bittersweet ending to a long and continuing tragic injustice,' Woo said minutes after U.S. District Judge Gary Klausner imposed the sentence. 'I am relieved that after years of false allegations, my family and I can finally get on with our lives.'"

Record Number Of Marijuana Plants Seized This Year In California. The AP (10/31) reports, "California authorities seized a record number of marijuana plants this harvest season, uprooting nearly 1.7 million plants they valued at more than $6.7 billion, the state Department of Justice said Monday." The AP continues, "The 1,675,681 plants seized under the Campaign Against Marijuana Planting program beat last year's record of 1.1 million plants." The AP adds, "The state Justice Department's Bureau of Narcotic Enforcement, which leads the program, said the increase is largely due to more eradication teams, better aerial surveillance and air transport of law enforcement officers to the illegal plots. Gardens also are getting bigger, it said. … The program includes local, state and federal agencies that conducted 477 raids in 34 counties between late July and early October. Authorities said they made 27 arrests and seized 29 weapons. … Lake County had the most plants seized, with 314,603. It was followed by Shasta County (227,488), Mendocino (135,736) and Fresno (102,814)."

DOJ_NMG_0088825

Law-Enforcement Official's Son Remains Free Despite Pleading Guilty To Marijuana Charge. The New York Post (10/30, Alpert) reports a nationally known law-enforcement official's son, who "pleaded guilty nearly a year ago to trying to buy 400 pounds of pot from an undercover agent, is still free, while his co-defendant languishes in federal prison. Sean Timoney, 26, pleaded guilty on Dec. 21, 2005, to conspiring to possess with intent to distribute marijuana. Since then, his sentencing date has been postponed twice, allowing him to work and undergo drug counseling, his lawyer said." The younger Timoney "was busted Nov. 1, 2005, along with Jae Seu, 23, after they handed over a duffel bag stuffed with nearly $450,000 cash to a undercover Drug Enforcement Administration agent in a Rockland County motel room as a down payment for the marijuana. But the whole episode was a sting captured on tape, and Timoney and Seu were arrested as they left the motel."

Modern Trends Seen As Aiding Narcogangs. In the San Antonio (TX) Express (10/30), Henry Catto writes, "Modern trends in agriculture and communications and an insatiable desire among North Americans and Europeans for cocaine and heroin led to the growth of today's criminal narcogangs, which are prepared to do whatever it takes to supply these deadly habits. The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration estimates that 90 percent of the cocaine powder smuggled into the United States comes from Colombia. … Democracy seems to have provided some hope of solving these problems. Two good presidents in a row, Andres Pastrana and Alvaro Uribe, have made a difference."

Pennsylvania Man Accused Of Impersonating DEA Agent. The Pittsburgh (PA) Tribune-Review (10/31) notes that a Greensburg man "is in the Westmoreland County Prison after allegedly impersonating a federal Drug Enforcement Administration agent and choking a man at a Donegal Township bar." According to the Tribune-Review, Richard McCormick told police he was a DEA agent and was attempting to get another man to comply with his instructions.

White House Criticized For "Campaigning" Against Marijuana Initiatives. In the New York Times (10/31), op-ed columnist John Tierney writes, "This year the White House drug czar, John Walters, and his minions have been out campaigning in Nevada, Colorado and South Dakota, which have marijuana initiatives on the ballot. The drug warriors are still sounding the discredited alarms about youths turning into potheads. Their fervor's not surprising — they may even believe their own hype. What's surprising is the political stupidity of the meddling. Westerners, no matter what they think of marijuana, don't appreciate sermons from federal officials on how to vote." According to Tierney, in 2002, when the White House "campaigned against another marijuana ballot initiative in Nevada, the state's attorney general said it was 'disturbing' to see the federal interference in a state election."

SAFER Campaign Manager Seen As Fueling Colorado Marijuana Movement. According to the Washington Times (10/31, Richardson), if Coloradans "vote to legalize marijuana statewide next week, it will be almost entirely because of the efforts of a pudgy, clean-shaven 24-year-old University of Richmond graduate. Mason Tvert, campaign manager for Safer Alternatives for Enjoyable Recreation, has pushed Colorado to the forefront of the marijuana movement, first with his successful 2004 Denver campaign and now with the statewide Amendment 44. … Federal drug czar John P. Walters visited Colorado three times this year to denounce the effort, which almost every state lawmaker opposes. What Mr. Tvert brings to the table are energy, imagination, a knack for attracting free press and relentless tactics."

In California, Court Ruling Keeps County From Joining Medical Marijuana Lawsuit. The Desert Sun (10/30) reports Riverside County "will not join a legal challenge to California's medical marijuana law, scheduled to be heard in San Diego Superior Court Nov. 16. The county Board of Supervisors voted earlier this month to join the suit originally filed by San Diego, San Bernardino and Merced counties, but the court ruled Friday that Riverside would not be allowed to join the case. 'The court felt it was too late to intervene in the pending action in San Diego,' said Pam Walls, assistant county counsel." The suit "seeks to overturn state requirements that counties issue medical marijuana identification cards to patients with a doctor's recommendation to use the drug."

Chargers Linebacker Accused Of Violating NFL Drug Policy May Drop Appeal. The New York Times (10/31, Schmidt) reports San Diego Chargers linebacker Shawne Merriman "plans to drop his appeal of the four-game suspension he has received for testing positive for a performance-enhancing substance. A deal between Merriman's lawyer and officials from the National Football League over when the suspension would take effect was being worked out last night. … If Merriman does not drop the appeal by noon today, he must proceed with the appeal hearing that is scheduled for Nov. 7 in New York. The N.F.L., which has not commented directly on Merriman's case, is expected to announce the suspension as soon as Merriman drops the appeal."

DOJ_NMG_0088826

The San Diego Union-Tribune (10/30) reports Merriman, who "tested positive for the banned steroid Nandrolone earlier this month, maintains he was the victim of a tainted supplement. But he also knows he is unlikely to win his appeal based on the NFL's clearly stated policy that players are responsible for what they put in their body."

The AP (10/30) reports that if the appeal process "drags out and he loses, he could miss both of the Chargers' games against AFC West rival Denver, on the road Nov. 19 and at home on Dec. 10. The Chargers and Broncos are tied for the division lead at 5-2."

Armed Pennsylvania Man Shot By Police Had Previous Gun Conviction. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (10/30, Ove) reports, "The man shot by a Pittsburgh police sergeant in Beltzhoover yesterday after police said he pointed a gun at them is a felon who wasn't allowed to have a weapon and had already spent time in prison for carrying an illegal gun." The Post-Gazette continues, "Court records indicate Jamaar A. Blakey, 22, was on probation following a gun conviction in U.S. District Court in 2004. … Mr. Blakey, who is in serious condition at Mercy Hospital with a wound to his chest, was indicted in June 2004 under Project Safe Neighborhoods, a U.S. Justice Department initiative to combat gun violence that has sent many Pittsburgh-area felons to federal prison in recent years. Under federal law, felons can't have guns or ammunition." The Post-Gazette adds, "Mr. Blakey, who also has several drug convictions, was sentenced in November 2004 to 30 months in federal prison for possession of a handgun and ammunition on Feb. 28 of that year. He was released on Aug. 24 of this year and was serving three years of supervised release, the federal version of probation. … Pittsburgh police shot Mr. Blakey after they said he pointed a gun at an officer following a brief car chase.

Federal Agents Arrest Salt Lake City Pipe Bomb Suspect. The Salt Lake Tribune (10/31, Bergreen) reports, "Federal authorities have arrested a former Utah resident with possession of an unregistered destructive device stemming from a bomb explosion in September that caused the evacuation of the Salt Lake City Main Library. The single federal charge against Thomas James Zajac, formerly of Salt Lake City and Provo, was filed Friday and unsealed Monday after a joint investigation by the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, the Salt Lake City Police Department and the FBI." The Tribune notes, "The bomb…exploded on the third floor, destroying a large, double-paned window, but it caused no injuries."

IMMIGRATION:

Border Arrests Down 8.4%. The AP (10/31, Yen) reports, "US Customs and Border Patrol agents made fewer arrests of illegal immigrants trying to enter the country last year, the government said Monday in a report that credits stronger enforcement. Arrests fell 8.4 percent from 1.2 million in fiscal year 2005 to 1.1 million last year. It was the first decrease since 2003, the Homeland Security Department said in releasing its annual statistics on illegal immigration." The AP adds, "Statistics released Monday also show the government: Removed a record 186,600 illegal immigrants from the United States in the past year. That's a 10 percent increase from 2005. … Bearly tripled the number of fugitive operations teams, from 18 to 50, as part of efforts to locate, apprehend and remove criminal aliens."

The Washington Post (10/31, A5, Hsu, 748K) reports DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff "credited the drop of nearly 100,000 apprehensions largely to the Bush administration's strategy of deporting virtually all non-Mexican border crossers as fast as they are caught, deterring them and others in what had been the fastest-growing group of illegal immigrants. After quadrupling the previous four years, apprehensions of "other than Mexican" border crossers fell 57,144, or 35 percent, to 108,026 last year." However, "analysts immediately disputed Chertoff's claim of an unprecedented decline in arrests. … Experts instead called yesterday's announcement the administration's latest effort to walk a political tightrope in its handling of illegal immigration heading into the Nov. 7 congressional elections."

The Washington Times (10/31, Seper, 88K) notes Chertoff also "said a guest-worker program was needed to slow the flow of illegals into the United States, although conservative House Republicans have blocked efforts by the Bush administration to pass a temporary-worker bill. He said getting control of the border without such a program would be 'very, very difficult.'"

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Treasury To Pare Note Offerings After Drop In Budget Deficit. The Wall Street Journal (10/31, C7, 2.03M) reports, "The Treasury is expected to pare its three-year note offerings in this quarter's refunding, a move analysts say is a minor adjustment after the drop in the budget deficit." The Treasury "is likely to announce tomorrow the sale of $33 billion in debt securities, comprising $20 billion in three-year notes and $13 billion in 10-year notes, according to the median estimate of eight dealers surveyed by Dow Jones Newswires. That amount of three-year notes would be $1 billion less than last quarter's sale." The Treasury "yesterday reduced its estimate of the quarter's borrowing needs by 39% to $63 billion, citing a surge in corporate-tax receipts that left it with more cash than expected. But it also said borrowing needs would rise to a quarterly record of $175 billion in the January-March period."

DOJ_NMG_0088827

Growing Influence Of Inspectors General Examined. The Federal Times (10/31, Friedman) reports, "Under a cover that includes an image of a woman's midriff, a report released last month by the Interior Department's inspector general sums up thousands of employee visits to pornographic and gambling Web sites on office computers. … An Oct. 11 report by the Justice Department IG details a former Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives Bureau director's request for a lavish office with features like remote-controlled doors. … And at the Education Department, a September IG report describes officials' efforts to steer purchases away from disfavored textbook makers. The report quotes an e-mail in which a program director wrote, 'They are trying to crash our party and we need to beat the [expletive] out of them.'" The Times continues, "The spate of headline-grabbing revelations underscores a trend. With the explosion of government procurement and more contracts to audit, and with an expanded law enforcement role in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks, inspectors general have more work and responsibilities, observers of the oversight community say. … 'The mission of the inspector general has broadened very substantially over the years,' said former Transportation Department IG Kenneth Mead. … And more responsibility may mean more clout. The Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction got expanded budgetary purview through legislation signed Oct. 17 by the president. Earlier this month, the Justice Department announced the formation of a task force, composed mostly of IGs, to investigate procurement fraud. A House bill, currently before the Government Reform Committee, would make IGs harder to fire and allow them to submit budgets straight to Congress and the Office of Management and Budget, instead of agency heads. The legislation could include steps to increase coordination among IGs and other oversight organizations. The measures are intended to increase IGs' independence, which some think is lacking at agencies where IG budgets are controlled by management."

House Democrats Face The Prospect Of Divisive Leadership Contests. The Washington Post (10/31, A3, Romano, Weisman, 748K) reports, "As Democrats enter the final days of their push to take back control of the House in next week's election, two divisive backroom leadership fights are brewing within the party, raising fears that Democratic unity could be fraying even before the first votes are cast. For some Democrats, the battle between Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (Md.), the minority whip, who had been expected to ascend to majority leader without opposition, and Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.) threatens the party's efforts to appear ready to govern. In what could be another high-profile showdown, Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), the ambitious former White House aide who runs the Democratic campaign arm of the House, may seek the third-ranking post of majority whip, pitting him against Democratic Caucus Chairman James E. Clyburn (S.C.), the only African American in a leadership position." The Post notes, "This could exacerbate racial strains in the House, since both the Congressional Black Caucus and the Congressional Hispanic Caucus have complained that Emanuel is insensitive to minority concerns.

Democrats' Chairpersons Would Be Older, More Diverse. USA Today (10/31, Kiely, 2.27M) reports, "A Democratic takeover of the U.S. House would put more women and minorities in positions of power, as well as more senior citizens." House minority leader Nancy Pelosi "already has signaled that she will name committee chairpersons based on seniority. Republican Speakers Newt Gingrich and Dennis Hastert sometimes did not do so. The gavel would go to at least four African-Americans, including John Conyers of Michigan at the Judiciary Committee helm and three women, including California's Juanita Millender-McDonald and New York's Nydia Velázquez, who would be the only Hispanic committee leader. Barney Frank of Massachusetts, who is openly gay, would lead a committee. Currently, all of the House GOP committee chairmen are white and male. It would also increase the age of House chairpersons. In January 2005, 11 Republican committee leaders were younger than 60. Seven prospective Democratic chairpersons will be over 70 when the 110th Congress convenes in January."

NASA Creates Venture Capital Firm To Finance Innovations. The Washington Post (10/31, A19, Kaufman, 748K) reports, "Hoping to tap the innovation and daring of small aerospace and biomedical companies, NASA has created and funded a nonprofit venture capital firm that will invest government money in promising but underfinanced companies. The fund, called Red Planet Capital, is the government's third experiment with venture capitalism, after similar efforts sponsored by the CIA and the Army. Red Planet marks the first time that the federal government has started a venture capital fund for civilian purposes, but it is hardly a stretch. That is because a former president of the CIA-sponsored venture fund is Michael D. Griffin -- now the administrator of NASA." According to the Post, Lisa L. Lockyer, NASA program manager for the project, "said the fund will not only invest on its own in cutting-edge companies but will also join private venture capital firms to form investment syndicates. Together, she said, those partnerships will be able to invest far more money in selected companies than the government could. The NASA fund, which will be managed by three venture fund veterans selected by the agency through a competitive process, will receive $75 million in taxpayer funds over five years." NASA is interested in new rocket technologies, but "the agency is also looking for strategies and products related to keeping astronauts safe and healthy in space for long periods of time, Lockyer said."

DOJ_NMG_0088828

Fate Of Hubble Telescope To Be Announced Today. USA Today (10/31, 5A, Watson, 2.27M) reports that NASA Administrator Michael Griffin will announced today "whether the space shuttle will pay a service call to Hubble. If Griffin says yes, a flight to install two new scientific instruments, fix a third and upgrade telescope systems could launch as early as next winter. Despite the uncertainty, NASA engineers and astronauts have been quietly toiling on a plan to rescue the telescope. Space agency personnel have created new Hubble repair tools. They have outlined a rough mission schedule. And they have developed new repair techniques in hopes of fixing one of America's most cherished scientific instruments." The repair work itself is extremely delicate. Also, NASA "has added new safety precautions to every shuttle flight since shuttle Columbia disintegrated in 2003. Now every shuttle crew must spend an entire day in orbit inspecting the ship's thermal shield, a procedure that demands precious time and fuel. 'The biggest challenge … (is) how do we pack everything we need to do to assure a safe vehicle into a typical Hubble mission?' says astronaut Joseph Tanner, whose four shuttle flights included one to Hubble in 1997. 'It's not business like it used to be.'"

DHS, DOD Workers Brace For New Pay-For-Performance Systems. Under the headline, "Transition To Pay For Performance Makes Some Anxious," the Washington Post's (10/31, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "Many federal employees fear that as many tricks as treats lie ahead with their new pay systems." Bush "administration officials acknowledge that changes planned for two large departments, Defense and Homeland Security, have created a fair share of anxious employees. Some of that anxiety appears based on concerns that the new pay-for-performance systems could be manipulated to lower the government's payroll" and "pension costs" though the OPM, "which had a hand in designing the new systems" for DoD and DHS says, "that should not happen." The Post adds, "Under the new approach, the decades-old General Schedule, which provided predictable pay raises, will be replaced with the National Security Personnel System," and instead "of providing an across-the-board raise to all employees, as the General Schedule permits, the two departments will provide higher raises to their best workers and smaller or no raises to their low-rated employees."

Federal Government Decisions Said To Exacerbate DC Region Sprawl. The Washington Post (10/31, A1, MacGillis, 748K) reports, "As they battle sprawl, Washington area leaders say they face a stubborn foe, and it's not greedy developers or the tyranny of the automobile or the desire for big houses. It is the United States government. In scattering employees to the region's outer edges, local officials and planners say, the federal government has undermined efforts to concentrate growth near public transit and the area's urban core -- the strategy local officials see as key to reducing traffic and conserving resources in a booming region. The U.S. government, they say, has become a kind of master planner, making decisions, with little local input, that will shape Washington's commuting and development patterns for years."

OTHER NEWS:

Incomes, Savings Up Last Month. The New York Times (10/31, Peters, 1.21M) reports, "Americans' incomes rose last month at the quickest pace since June, but consumers did not respond by rushing out to splurge as gasoline prices fell from their summer peak. Instead, they spent at about the same pace and put more money aside. As a result, the nationwide personal savings rate came the closest it has in a year and a half to climbing out of the red." The Commerce Department "reported yesterday that personal income in September increased at a seasonally adjusted annual pace of 0.5 percent, compared with 0.4 percent in August. Personal consumption spending, meanwhile, rose 0.1 percent in September after a 0.2 percent increase in August." The net personal savings figure "improved in September to a seasonally adjusted annual pace of minus $15 billion, compared with minus $49 billion in August. And while Americans are still living richer lives than their paychecks can sustain, savings have not been healthier since May 2005. They have been in the red since the month before, in April 2005."

"Slowing Economy" Said To Have Pushed Oil Prices Lower. NBC Nightly News (10/30, story 6, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There is news on the economy tonight. It turns out a slowing economy had a big impact on the price of oil today. Crude dropped $2.39 today to $58.36 a barrel."

DOJ_NMG_0088829

Gasoline Prices Rise Slightly After Sustained Drop. USA Today (10/31, Healey, 2.27M) reports, "Gasoline prices are creeping back up after declining steadily for about three months. But there's disagreement about where prices go now. The U.S. average for a gallon of regular is $2.218, the U.S. Energy Information Administration said Monday, up 1 cent from last week." Fred Rozell of the Oil Price Information Service said, "I don't think we'll see any major increases until at least late February or early March. Numbers will hold steady or bounce between a fairly narrow range for a few weeks." But "EIA's latest fuel price outlook, published Oct. 10, isn't as optimistic. It forecasts an average of $2.29 for the current quarter. That means prices would drift back up about a nickel from the average $2.245 so far this quarter."

Economists Said To Be "Sharply Divided" On Whether Economy Is Recession-Bound. Under the headline ""Economists Sharply Divided On Where Economy Goes From Here," USA Today (10/31, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) reports, "November marks the five-year anniversary of the end of the last recession and the beginning of the latest US economic expansion." But whether the USA will have another five years of economic growth without sliding into recession -- at least matching the record 10-year expansion that ended in 2001 -- is an issue that sharply divides economists." In a USA TODAY "survey of economists conducted Oct. 13-18, 24 said the economy will continue to expand for at least another five years. But another 24 said the expansion will likely be truncated by a recession sometime before November 2011."

Core Inflation Data Expected To Keep Fed From Raising Rates. The Wall Street Journal (10/31, Conkey, Walsh, 2.03M) reports, "A closely watched measure of consumer prices eased somewhat last month, but inflation remains a big question for Federal Reserve policy makers and the economy. The Fed's preferred inflation measure -- the price index for personal consumption expenditures excluding food and energy -- rose 0.2% in September after an upwardly revised 0.3% gain in August, the Commerce Department said. Compared with a year earlier, this measure of 'core' inflation was up 2.4% last month, less than the 2.5% pace in August." The Journal adds, "Despite the slight downtick last month, the annual increase in the measure of core inflation remains well above the informal range of 1% to 2% that Fed policy makers would prefer. At the same time, the economy's growth rate in the third quarter was considerably below normal." That combination, economists said, "will continue to keep the Fed from raising or lowering interest rates until it becomes clear which is a more serious threat."

Banking Group Urges Simpler Credit Card Disclosure Rules. In an op-ed in USA Today (10/31), Ed Yingling, president and CEO of the American Bankers Association, writes, "With credit cards practically a necessity in today's marketplace, it's critical that consumers know how to use them. That's why the credit card industry is engaged in an effort, spearheaded by the Federal Reserve, to simplify and humanize the language we use. More important, this effort won't consist of lawyers and regulators imagining how consumers might react. The new disclosures will be tested with real, live consumers." Yingling continues, "Simpler won't be easy. As a recent study by the Government Accountability Office (GAO) points out, the legalese in credit card disclosures results from issuers' need to meet statutory requirements and their desire to avoid being sued. … So, there's work to be done on the disclosures — and we're doing it. Credit card lenders fully support the Federal Reserve's effort to make disclosures easier to read and understand so that consumers can make informed decisions." Yingling concludes, "Credit card customers have never had more choices or lower interest rates than they do today. … Broader access to credit for more people at lower rates — we think that's progress."

Bush Says "Terrorists Win And America Loses" If Democrats Have Their Way. Media reports on President Bush's campaign visits to Georgia and Texas emphasize the enthusiasm of the crowds, and what analysts are portraying as rather abrasive Bush rhetoric intended to fire up the GOP base. AFP (10/31, Lozano) reports Bush "charged that 'terrorists win and America loses' if opposition Democrats win November 7 legislative elections dominated by the unpopular Iraq war." Said Bush, "If you listen carefully for a Democrat plan for success, they don't have one. Iraq is the central front in the war on terror, yet they don't have a plan for victory. … The Democrat approach in Iraq comes down to this: The terrorists win and America loses. That's what's at stake in this election. The Democrat goal is to get out of Iraq. The Republican goal is to win in Iraq." The Los Angeles Times (10/31, Gerstenzang, 918K) says Bush unleashed "some of his toughest campaign attacks this political season," as he "listed several key anti-terrorism measures opposed by Democrats, noting that when it came to eavesdropping on suspected terrorists, detaining them or trying them, members of that party 'just say no.'"

The New York Times (10/31, Stolberg, 1.21M) quotes Bush saying, "We will not run from thugs and assassins." It was "a moment when the president could defend his record in Iraq to thunderous applause." The Times adds, "The back-to-back rallies created just the image White House strategists are seeking for the president in the waning days of the campaign: that of a confident leader, surrounded by adoring supporters. The intent is to fire up the party faithful and push them to the polls to vote, but at times it seemed as if Mr. Bush was the one getting fired up. The president seemed to relish playing the game of political expectations, as he tweaked Democrats for measuring for new curtains in Washington too soon." Said Bush, "You might remember that around this time in 2004, some of them were picking out their new offices in the West Wing." Bush "paused to absorb the laughter and applause, then added dryly, 'The movers never got the call.'"

DOJ_NMG_0088830

Bush also noted the recent gay marriage court ruling in New Jersey. The AP (10/31, Loven) reports Bush "has for months cast the midterm elections as a choice about just two issues: taxes and terrorism. Now, with polls predicting bleak results for Republicans, he is trying to fire up his party by decrying gay marriage." Said Bush, "For decades, activist judges have tried to redefine America by court order. … Just this last week in New Jersey, another activist court issued a ruling that raises doubt about the institution of marriage. We believe marriage is a union between a man and a woman, and should be defended." The line, says the AP, "earned Bush by far his most sustained applause at a rally of 5,000 people" in Georgia, "aimed at boosting former GOP Rep. Max Burns' effort to unseat a Democratic incumbent." A summarized version of the AP story on Bush's remarks on marriage appears on USA Today (10/31, 2.27M).

Like the AP, the Atlanta Journal-Constitution (10/31, Baxter, 399K) also says Bush "got his biggest response when he criticized the New Jersey Supreme Court for its decision last week opening the door to gay marriage or civil unions in that state." With Republicans "invoking Halloween images of what could happen if Democrats take over the House," Bush yesterday "focused on a section of the country that could help stave off a GOP nightmare Nov. 7: Georgia." Burns "faces Democratic Rep. John Barrow of Savannah in a district redrawn by the legislature last year to increase the odds for a GOP victory. Bush, who flew to Texas for more campaigning after the rally, will return Tuesday to Georgia, where he will speak at the Georgia National Fairgrounds and Agricenter in Perry for 8th District candidate Mac Collins." Democratic Rep. Jim Marshall "is the target in that race -- another where the lines were redrawn."

The Washington Times (10/31, Dinan, 88K), in a story titled "GOP Staples Restored To Bush Campaigning," says Bush "has started campaigning on conservative staples such as judicial nominees, border security and defining marriage as between a man and a woman -- themes that have been absent for most of the election season, but which he is now using to energize the party's base." Fox News' Special Report (10/30, Hume) said it was "a rare sight this campaign season, President Bush on the offense against a House Democrat" in Georgia.

NBC Nightly News (10/30, story 4, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) briefly mentioned Bush's stop, "along with Sen. Kay Hutchinson, for the write-in candidate who is trying to replace delay who resigned earlier this year." The CBS Evening News did not report on Bush's appearances, but ABC World News (10/30, lead story, 3:10, Gibson, 8.78M) led its broadcast with the story, reporting Bush "will be out almost every day until election day, campaigning." ABC (Raddatz) added, "They are calling this a Texas victory rally. It would be hard to tell, given the enthusiasm of this crowd, that the President's poll numbers are so low. In Georgia this morning a crowd ecstatic to see the President. And the President pumped to deliver votes." Bush was shown saying, "We will win this election, because our priorities and our values do not shift with the latest political opinion poll or focus group." ABC also reported, "The President's stop in Georgia was in one of those rare spots around the country where a Republican…has a chance to take back a Democratic seat. And…in Sugarland, Texas, the district where Tom DeLay once ruled, Republicans write-in Republican candidate Shelley Sekula-Gibbs is in a fight to the finish with Democrat Nick Lampson. Tomorrow, the President travels to Georgia again, and later in the week, Montana and Nevada, where the strategy is the same. … In every one of these places, the President will deliver his new rallying cry, 'just say, 'no' to Democrats.' … But there are plenty of Republican candidates who have said, 'no' to George Bush, felling his presence, with the black cloud of Iraq hanging over him, can only hurt their chances. In Indiana, Representative John Hostettler, whose seat is vulnerable, is touting his opposition to the war."

The Houston Chronicle (10/31, Mack, Hanson, 535K) reports that in Sugar Land, Bush told "2,000 cheering Republicans…that they should 'bring your pencil' to the polls and write-in the name of Shelley Sekula-Gibbs to succeed Tom DeLay in the U.S. House." The Chronicle adds, "Most voters won't really need a pencil to cast write-in votes because they'll use electronic voting machines. If they write in the councilwoman's name, they'll turn a dial selecting the 18-letter name a character at a time."

Bush followed up his campaign appearances with an interview with Sean Hannity on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (10/30). The President said he is confident Republicans will hold both houses because "most people, when they take a look at the candidates, and the positions of the candidates, realize that protecting this country and keeping this economy going are the two most important issues. And you can't protect the country if you retreat from overseas and you can't keep the economy growing if you raise taxes and that's exactly what the Democrats in the house would like to do."

Hannity asked him if a Democratic victory would "make the country more vulnerable, more susceptible." Bush responded, "I think if you don't think we are in a war, that you can't win the war. And I think a lot of the national Democrats believe that…Iraq is a distraction and not part of the war on terror. They have said so. And I strongly disagree. One reason I disagree is because Osama bin Laden feels like Iraq is a part of this war on terror. He has made it clear that he would like for us to leave before Iraq can defend itself or govern itself and sustain itself, so that he can have a safe haven from which to launch further attacks."

DOJ_NMG_0088831

In the course of the interview, Bush also said, "The thing that amazes me is the Democrat party used to be the party of you know Harry Truman and John Kennedy and Franklin Roosevelt. People who understood that you need to confront problems so a generation of people could grow up in peace. You know, it sounds hike to me some of their leaders are becoming isolationists and that's dangerous. Some of our people are isolationist, by the way."

Under the headline "Bush Says 'America Loses' Under Democrats," the Washington Post (10/31, A1, Abramowitz, 748K) reports "Democrats reacted sharply to the latest White House attacks. Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) said Bush 'resorted to the same tired old partisan attacks in a desperate attempt to hold on to power.' House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) said Bush is looking to retain a 'rubber-stamp Republican Congress that has done nothing to change our failed Iraq policy.'"

Poll Finds Race For DeLay's Old Seat Now A Statistical Tie. The Houston Chronicle (10/31, Mack, 535K) reports, "The Republican write-in effort to hold former Rep. Tom DeLay's congressional seat, once viewed as a long shot, has created a tight race, according to a Houston Chronicle-11 News poll. Thirty-five percent of respondents said they would vote for a write-in candidate, a statistical tie with the 36 percent support for Democrat Nick Lampson, according to the poll of more than 500 likely voters in the 22nd Congressional District. … One voter in four is still undecided." Libertarian Bob Smither, "the only person besides Lampson on the general election ballot, drew 4 percent support."

Democrats Seen As Unlikely To Radically Change US Policy On Iraq. The Christian Science Monitor (10/31, LaFranchi, 58K) reports, "In poll after poll, prospective voters name Iraq as the No. 1 issue in the upcoming midterm elections. So if voters tip one or both Houses of Congress out of Republican control, what impact would that have on the US war effort in Iraq and, more generally, on American foreign policy? … Don't expect too much, most experts say. For one thing, Democrats are not of one mind on what to do about Iraq. And while committees chaired by Democrats might hold more meetings and call more testifiers critical of some White House policies, Mr. Bush would still retain the power of the presidential bully pulpit. In addition, Bush's foreign policy in the second term has already evolved in a direction - away from unilateralism and toward greater cooperation - that suits both Bush's political opponents and moderates in his own party, some analysts say. For others, the differences between Bush and the Democrats on the big foreign-policy issues are really a matter of details and not starkly black and white."

Morris Urges Bush To Talk Less About Iraq, More About North Korea. Political analyst Dick Morris, during an appearance on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (10/30) said President Bush "made a big mistake last week on Wednesday when he had that press conference about Iraq. What he needed to do was to focus attention on national and homeland security, and by talking about the war in Iraq, which would seem to be closely related issue, and he sees them as merged, he ultimately was talking about a thing people think he has failed on rather than something he succeeded on. The other thing that I think he has not done, which he should do in the next eight days, is talk about North Korea, North Korea, North Korea. Nobody thinks he is winning in Iraq. You have to realize that he is winning in North Korea."

Cheney Predicts A Democratic Victory Would Result In A "Massive" Tax Increase. Vice President Cheney, during an appearance on Fox News' Your World with Neil Cavuto (10/30), was asked to predict what will happen if a Democratic majority in congress fails to renew President Bush's tax cuts, Cheney responded, "Remember the way the law is written. The cuts that we put in -- we cut the rate on capital gains and dividends to 15%. We reduced the marriage penalty and increased the child credit, phase out the death tax. … Those will automatically go back again -- the higher rates will automatically kick backing…around 2010 in most cases. So, if congress does nothing…rates are going up." Cheney added that if the Democrats become the majority party there will likely be "a massive tax increase, and I think that would do a lot of damage to the economy…it would raise the taxes on the average American family by a couple thousand dollars a year." Cheney also said, "I think the economy is in great shape. I look at where we have come when you think that we had to weather a recession, followed by 9/11, followed by Katrina – one of the worst natural disasters in history. The economy has come through all of that in great shape. …. I am hard put to think how the economy could be much better. … Housing is a little soft right now. But I think the economy is in great shape and a lot of that is due to the policies that the president and the Republican congress put in place, specifically the tax cuts."

Larry Kudlow, on CNBC's Kudlow & Company (10/30) interviewed Cheney last night regarding issues of special interest to the investor class. During the interview Cheney noted that Republicans "have been very clear that we want to extend the tax cuts we put into place, and the 15% rate on dividends and capital gains, is absolutely crucial to the economy. And reducing the marriage penalty, increasing the child credit and reducing the death tax, all those things have been a vital part of our program. … My vote in the Senate is what passed the '03 tax package because it was in fact a tie vote and the Democrats overwhelmingly opposed the measures and we supported them. And as long as we're here you won't see legislation pass to raise those taxes. The fact of the matter is if we were not here and the Democrats were in control, then there would be a very real increase and a very real prospect of increased taxes."

DOJ_NMG_0088832

Also during the Kudlow & Company (10/30) interview Cheney was asked why Republicans don't seem to benefiting from the recent stock market rally, and whether this reflects investors' preference for divided government, or, as Kudlow phrased it, "gridlock." Cheney replied that he believes the stock market "reflects the overall health of the economy and I like to remind people it is a Republican president and a Republican congress that put in place those tax cuts that, frankly, are at risk in this election. And if Charlie Rangel ends up as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, he said as much, he doesn't believe there is a single one of the Bush tax cuts that ought to be extended. And I think would be bad for the economy. And I don't know if the stock market would like it. I don't think it would."

Bush Family Takes Increasingly Prominent Role In GOP Campaigns. McClatchy (10/31, Montgomery) reports President Bush's "wife, father, mother, at least two of his siblings and a nephew have all become surrogate campaigners in the runup to the Nov. 7 midterm elections. … 'They're getting to seem more like the Kennedys,' said Stephen Hess, a professor of media and public affairs at The George Washington University, recalling the election-time activism of another famous political clan. 'There is no question that, on any particular day, they're all out campaigning for somebody.'" McClatchy adds, "the most visible family member on the campaign trail is first lady Laura Bush, who's shed any remaining vestiges of her reluctance about campaigning to plunge headlong into the 2006 political season. As of late last week, the first lady had appeared at 51 political events and helped raised $16 million. … Similarly, Bush's parents, former President George H.W. Bush and former first lady Barbara Bush, have repeatedly ventured out of their hometown of Houston to help their party's cause. The president's brother, Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, is also working on behalf on GOP candidates. Others have offered more limited assistance. George P. Bush, the son of Jeb Bush and the president's nephew, has appeared on behalf of several Hispanic Republicans."

Hastert Has Made Few Campaign Appearances Since Foley Scandal Broke. The New York Times (10/31, Leibovich, 1.21M) reports House Speaker Dennis Hastert "is spending a lot of time in his district these days." Hastert "had planned to be on the road in October, campaigning for Republican House members. But most of those events were canceled after Representative Mark Foley's sexually explicit e-mail messages to House pages became public and Mr. Hastert was criticized as not doing more to stop them. 'Sure, it bothers you,' Mr. Hastert said in an interview in his headquarters. 'But I understand, if I've got 15 television trucks sitting outside my house, and I've got a helicopter looking in the window, you probably don't want to bring that into somebody else's district.'" The Times notes Hastert "still makes a few carefully selected visits. He traveled Thursday to northeastern Tennessee, where he campaigned for the Republican candidate in a district no Democrat has carried in more than a century. On Monday, he was in Texas and Oklahoma City, where he attended a fund-raiser for a Congressional candidate whose Democratic opponent promptly accused her of aligning 'herself with the disgraced leadership of the Republican Party.'"

GOP Claims Turnout Success In Early Voting In Several Tight Races. The Wall Street Journal (10/31, McKinnon, Lovley, 2.03M) reports Republicans "say they have some good news in early-voting statistics that suggest their voter-turnout machine is providing an edge in some tight races." If the "trend holds, it could mean that early voting is growing -- and continuing to benefit Republicans, who exploited the practice in the 1990s." But Democrats "contend that Republicans are exaggerating their successes so far, by highlighting a few races, while ignoring problems they are having in motivating their troops around the country. Democrats also questioned several specific Republican claims, while noting their own early-voting numbers show they are starting to catch up with their rivals in early get-out-the-vote efforts in battleground states such as Iowa." Several of the examples Republicans "cite are coming from states and congressional districts where they have some of their strongest local organizations. And despite the strength of the Republican turnout machine in the past few election cycles, it's yet to be seen whether Republicans can replicate isolated success stories across the electoral map in a tight election year." The Journal reports the races cited by the GOP include NM1, the Ohio Senate race, FL13 and FL16, and GA3. Democrats "questioned the Republicans' claims, particularly regarding New Mexico's 1st District. They said Democrats are almost even with Republicans in the number of absentee ballots cast so far in the area, suggesting that the incumbent party is struggling even in a district where its volunteer organization is regarded as one of the best in the country."

Democrats Play Catch Up In Microtargeting Strategy. The Wall Street Journal (10/31, A1, Dreazen, 2.03M) reports that in the "final week before the election, Democrats pushing to convert their lead in the polls into control of Congress are pinning their hopes of success on an increasingly common tactic for pumping up voter turnout: microtargeting." The technique "aims to identify potential supporters by collecting and analyzing the unprecedented amount of information now readily available -- from census data to credit-card bills -- to profile individual voters. Political strategists then tailor messages to entice those prospects to the polls, using the same methods marketers use to sell autos or aspirin to consumers." Microtargeting "could make the difference in important House and Senate races in states such as Minnesota, Ohio and Pennsylvania." Alexander Gage, "president and founder of TargetPoint Consulting, an Alexandria, Va., microtargeting firm that works for the Republican Party, estimates that successful microtargeting can bring congressional campaigns an additional 5,000 to 10,000 votes, a number that could be decisive in a House race." Democrats are "playing catch-up to Republicans, whose use of microtargeting in 2004 energized millions of new voters who backed President Bush." A "key player for Democrats is Copernicus Analytics, a small and little-known firm based here that made its name last year by helping to propel Democrat Timothy Kaine to victory in the Virginia governor's race. Big-money, Democratic-leaning clients from the AFL-CIO to Emily's List, a group that backs pro-choice female candidates, have enlisted Copernicus this election year." Focusing "on 29 races, Copernicus says it already has helped campaigns identify more than a million potential new supporters, a significant number given that many races in the closely divided nation are likely to be decided by thin margins."

DOJ_NMG_0088833

Generic Ballot Edge Suggests Democrats Will Win House Seats. In an AP news analysis (10/31), Liz Sidoti says the Democrats' advantage on the generic ballot test in many polls suggests "Republicans are likely to lose House seats on Nov. 7," but "just how many seats — and whether the GOP sustains enough losses for Democrats to rise to power — is less clear." The "latest AP-AOL News poll showed 56 percent of likely voters said Democrats, while 37 percent said Republicans, a 19 percentage-point advantage less than two weeks before voters choose a new House. The gap was 10 percentage points in early October." Andrew Kohut of the Pew Research Center said, "The question traditionally has done a good job of measuring the popular vote, and the popular vote is a good predictor of the number of seats each party will win." The AP adds, "However, he and other analysts say, because congressional seats have been redistricted through the years to make Republican districts more GOP and Democratic districts more Democratic, there's less of a relationship between the popular vote and the exact number of seats won, which makes for somewhat unreliable forecasts." The AP report does not include a forecast of how many seats the GOP may lose.

Barone Says Midterm Outcome Unlikely To Create Long-Term Partisan Consequences. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (10/31, A18), Michael Barone says, "If the Democrats are justified in preparing to change the drapes today, the questions to ask are: How enduring will be such a partisan switch? How much change in public policy will it accomplish? To the first question, the likelihood of an enduring partisan switch is not high -- if you believe the polls showing the leading Republicans, Rudy Giuliani and John McCain, walloping the best-known Democrats, Hillary Rodham Clinton and Al Gore, in 2008. Changes in public policy? Well, the lead item on the Democrats' wish list is to raise the minimum wage, a law first passed in 1938. Not exactly a new idea. I don't know what the results of the midterm elections of 2006 will be. But I doubt that they will have the sweeping partisan or policy consequences of the midterm elections of 1874 and 1894, or 1938 and 1994."

Network News Coverage Of Campaigns Said To Have Favored Democrats. In USA Today's "Media Mix" column (10/31), Peter Johnson reports, "Network news coverage has favored Democratic candidates in the midterm election, and the page scandal involving former congressman Mark Foley has been the main story line, drawing almost as much coverage as Iraq and terrorism combined, a new study finds." An analysis by the Center for Media and Public Affairs "of midterm election stories aired on the ABC, CBS and NBC evening newscasts Sept. 5-Oct. 22 found that 2006's coverage has been almost five times as heavy as in the 2002 midterm elections: 167 stories, compared with 35 four years ago." The study "found that three out of four evaluations of Democratic candidates' chances of winning — such as sound bites — were positive, compared with one out of eight for Republicans. Coverage has been dominated by two major themes: the effects of the Foley scandal, and the impact the Bush presidency is having on the party's congressional candidates." The Foley scandal "produced 59 stories alone, compared with 33 on Iraq and 31 on terrorism/national security issues." Director Robert Lichter said, "What's hurting Republican candidates is the media's focus on two non-candidates: Mark Foley and George W. Bush."

Midterm Campaign Ads Seen As "Most Negative" In Modern Times. The Christian Science Monitor (10/31, Feldmann, 58K) reports "experts say" the midterm election "is probably the most negative US election campaign in modern times. Nasty, misleading ads have been around for decades, and it's impossible to prove empirically that the 2006 campaign tops them all, but the wave of over-the-top claims has caught the attention of both casual observers and professionals." Evan Tracey, a campaign ad analyst at TNS Media Intelligence in Arlington, Va., said, "Politics has always been a contact sport, but it really does feel like the rhetoric has crossed a line. We've had ads with baby-crying noises from dumpsters, Playboy mansions, criminals coming over the border creating crime and mayhem. And that's the tame stuff." The Monitor adds, "Perhaps the most talked-about ad of this cycle took shots at Rep. Harold Ford (D) of Tennessee, who is running for the Senate. The ad - which ended with a blond, scantily clad woman saying, 'Call me' - was perceived by some viewers as racially motivated, since Mr. Ford is black and the woman in the ad is white." But as "distasteful as negative ads can be to the viewing public, many campaign experts defend them for their ability to provide useful information to voters." Brooks Jackson, director of the Annenberg Political Fact Check project, said, "There's nothing inherently wrong with negative advertising, if it's accurate." The Monitor adds, "Often, though, negative ads contain a kernel of truth that is distorted beyond the point of fairness." Between the "two House campaign committees, the Republicans are beating the Democrats in the race to the bottom. According to a report released last week on Factcheck.org, the NRCC so far this cycle has spent $41.9 million attacking Democrats and $5 million supporting Republicans - about 8 to 1 negative versus positive advertising. The DCCC has spent $18 million on attacks and $3.1 million on positive ads - a 5 to 1 ratio."

DOJ_NMG_0088834

Each Of "Seven Worst Immigration Campaign Ads" Said To Come From Republicans. The Wall Street Journal (10/31, Rutkoff, Johnson, 2.03M) devotes its entire "Border Lines" column to the illegal immigration issue's impact on this year's midterm elections. The Journal notes that the New Republic Online features a "list ranking 'the seven worst immigration campaign ads,' which coincides with an editorial excoriating" the GOP, which is "the party behind each and every one. … 'The genre has several hallmarks,' TNR's editorial explains. 'It evokes a fear of lawlessness and a sense of growing social decay; it impugns opponents with a lack of patriotism (MITCHELL AGAINST ENGLISH LANGUAGE, reads the bottom of the screen in one of Representative J.D. Hayworth's ads3).'" Meanwhile, "All but the Hayworth ad, from Arizona, originate from states that are located far from the Mexican border."

Republicans Accused Of Debasing Political Campaigns. The Washington Post's E. J. Dionne (10/31, A21) writes, "this year's campaign will mark the moment when Republican leaders who govern in the name of conservatism turned definitively away from hope and waged one of the most trivial and ugly campaigns in our country's history. … My hope is that principled conservatives will rebel against those who are dragging their once forward-looking movement through the mud."

USA Today's DeWayne Wickham (10/31) claims Republicans "have dusted off their Southern strategy playbook" and are employing "subtle racism" as "a new twist on the more blatant appeals the GOP used to make to whites who were angered by the Democratic Party's embrace of the civil rights movement."

Republican Defectors Running In Key Races Against Former Colleagues. The Washington Times (10/31, Hurt, 88K) reports, "Call it the year of the former Republican. At a time of widely expected Republican losses in both chambers of Congress, a new breed of politician has emerged: former Republicans challenging Republican incumbents." Virginia Democratic Senate candidate James Webb is "most famous," but then "there's Tim Mahoney, a Florida Republican-turned-Democrat running for the seat of disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley." In New York, "former Republican Jack Davis is giving Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds one of the biggest challenges of his career. Mr. Davis, a multimillionaire businessman, says he wants to end illegal entry without granting amnesty, opposes higher taxes and wants to kill the death tax." In Florida's 13th CD, "former banker and former Republican Christine Jennings is running as a Democrat for the seat being vacated by Rep. Katherine Harris. She, too, is running on tax cuts and greater fiscal responsibility in Washington." All are "the kind of Democrats that Republicans have a difficult time hating. Hearing them explain why they left the Republican Party is like listening to voters today talk about why a growing number of them are tired of Republicans in Washington."

New Jersey Gay Marriage Ruling Could Benefit Republicans. McClatchy (10/30, Thomma) reports, "In the final stretch before Election Day, embattled Republicans feel as if they've received a gift from an unlikely donor: advocates of gay marriage." Republicans "think that last week's ruling by New Jersey's Supreme Court ordering equal rights for gay couples - seven of whom had sued for the right to marry - is re-energizing Christian conservatives, who had been losing interest in and passion for politics. Republicans predict that could draw more conservatives to the polls next week, especially in the eight states that will vote on proposed amendments to their state constitutions to ban gay marriage." The eight states "comprise Virginia, Tennessee - coincidentally two states with razor-close Senate races that could decide which party controls the Senate next year - Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota and Wisconsin." Turnout among conservative Christians could also help the GOP candidate in Virginia's 2nd CD.

Democrats Making Inroads Among Evangelicals In Ohio. The New York Times (10/31, Kirkpatrick, 1.21M) reports Rep Ted Strickland, Ohio Democrat gubernatorial candidate "and former Methodist minister, opened his campaign…with a commercial on Christian radio vowing that 'biblical principles' would guide him in office. In his first major campaign speech, Mr. Strickland said 'the example of Jesus' had led him into public service. He has made words from the prophet Micah a touchstone of his campaign. Ohio, where a groundswell of conservative Christian support helped push President Bush to re-election two years ago, has become the leading edge of national Democratic efforts to win over religious voters, including evangelicals." The Times notes, "In 2004, 76 percent of white evangelical Christians in Ohio voted for" President Bush, but "in a recent New York Times/CBS News poll, 53 percent of the same voters approved of the president's performance, and 42 percent disapproved. … Strickland faces a Republican opponent, J. Kenneth Blackwell, who speaks just as openly about his evangelical faith, staunchly opposes abortion rights and same-sex unions and carries the endorsement of several nationally known Christian conservatives. But in a recent Quinnipiac University poll, Mr. Blackwell led Mr. Strickland among white evangelical voters by only three percentage points, which is within the margin of error."

DOJ_NMG_0088835

Voters Disillusioned With Both Parties In Indiana. ABC World News (10/30, story 2, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "One of the earliest indicators" of how Democrats will fare in their effort to pick up 15 House seats to win a majority "will be Indiana. The polls close there early, and Republican incumbents are fighting to hold three seats there against strong Democratic challenges." ABC (Reynolds) added, "The voters' vocabulary in this Republican stronghold should give any incumbent pause. President Bush won the district by 13 points two years ago, but today," you "hear about Iraq all over." Worse for "the GOP is when Iraq isn't topic number one, corruption in the Congress is." Speaking with disillusioned Republican voters "all sounds practically like a commercial for the Democrats. Until you talk to a Democrat." A "bipartisan lack of answers, and an avalanche of attack adds. So no wonder why so were out here on a wet night to watch a high school football game. It's one contest they can cheer about."

AFL-CIO Targeting Southern Races. Bloomberg (10/31, Chipman) reports the AFL-CIO "is pushing into unfriendly territory -- the South -- in an effort to gain new political friends and help its Democratic allies win control of Congress." The labor group "has included contests in at least five states in the largely non-union South on its list of targeted races in the Nov. 7 midterm election, one that it says is vital to the future of organized labor." The AFL-CIO "says it's spending a record $40 million this year to defeat Republicans nationwide. The money is being used to mobilize some 13.5 million union members, affiliated workers and their families through door-to-door visits, phone calls, direct mailings and leafleting." But some political experts "as well as Republican critics, eying organized labor's shrinking membership and declining clout, question whether the AFL-CIO can deliver enough votes to make a difference." Dick Wadhams, "campaign manager for Senator George Allen, a Virginia Republican who is one of the AFL-CIO's targets," said, "Union leadership is so oftentimes out of touch with its members that it's actually immaterial what union leaders do."

Snow Campaigns For Talent In St Louis. The AP (10/31, Kabel) reports that Sen. Jim Talent "was in the St. Louis area Monday night for a fundraising event that featured White House spokesman Tony Snow. The stop at the St. Louis Hilton Frontenac was one of more than a dozen Snow is making for Republican candidates around the country ahead of the Nov. 7 elections." Snow said, "There's no reason to do politics unless it's to make a difference. … If you've got the right attitude, you can get a lot of stuff done. Jim's done that." Snow "spoke on topics ranging from energy policy to the war in Iraq and how the nation has changed since Sept. 11, 2001. He said the U.S. operation in Iraq is a chance to spread democracy."

Webb Leads Allen In Two New Polls. The AP (10/31, Lewis) reports a "new statewide poll Monday showed Democrat Jim Webb with a slight lead in next week's close Senate race against Republican incumbent George Allen." Among likely voters, "the former Republican was the choice of 50 percent of those surveyed while 46 percent favored Allen and 4 percent were undecided." The poll of 597 likely voters (+/- 4%), was conducted by Opinion Research Corp. for CNN over October 26-29. Among the 'larger sample of 904 registered voters, the results were about even, with 48 percent of the respondents backing Webb, 46 percent for Allen and 5 percent undecided." The poll is "the first to show Webb with an advantage in a mean and expensive campaign in once reliably Republican Virginia whose outcome could be pivotal in determining whether an embattled GOP can retain control of the Senate." While Webb supporters "crowed over the results, longtime Allen adviser Christopher J. LaCivita said the poll was skewed because half of it was conducted over the weekend." The AP adds the "latter two days of the survey, however, reflect two intensive days of news coverage of Allen's claim that selected sexually explicit passages in some of Webb's six gritty novels about war are demeaning to women."

The Washington Times (10/31, Bellantoni, 88K) reports that in a Rasmussen Reports poll, Webb leads Allen "for the first time." The poll of 500 likely voters (+/- 4.5%), conducted on October 29, shows 48% would vote for Webb and 46% would vote for Allen. Webb "leads with 51 percent to 46 percent for Mr. Allen when the results include 'leaners,' or undecided voters who are leaning toward one candidate. When leaners are included, 3 percent remained undecided."

DOJ_NMG_0088836

Coalition Of Black Political Leaders Endorse Steele. The Washington Post (10/31, B1, Wiggins, 748K) reports on the front page of the Metro section that a "coalition of black Democratic political leaders from Prince George's County led by former county executive Wayne K. Curry endorsed Republican Michael S. Steele's bid for the U.S. Senate yesterday." The support "from Curry, five County Council members and others barely a week before Election Day reflects their continued disappointment that the Democratic Party has no African American candidates at the top of the ticket and a sense that the county is being ignored, officials said." Ron Walters, "a political science professor at the University of Maryland, said the endorsements could be significant." Walters said, "This is going to go through the black community like a rocket. It's going to be the talk of the county, the state, maybe even the nation." The Post adds the "politicians were joined at a news conference in Largo by about a half-dozen business leaders, including Ron Lipscomb, a trustee of the state Democratic Party."

The Washington Times (10/31, A1, Miller, Ward, 88K) reports the story on the front page, noting Curry said, "The [Democratic] Party acts as though when they want our opinion, they'll give it to us. It's not going to be like that anymore." Curry "and the lawmakers said Democratic leaders repeatedly have snubbed the black community and their county, noting the lack of party support for the Senate campaign of former National Association for the Advancement of Colored People chief Kweisi Mfume, who lost the Democratic primary to Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin." The Democratic ticket "lacks black candidates, they said, and candidates from Prince George's County, which is home to more than 320,000 registered Democrats -- the most of any jurisdiction in Maryland."

Santorum Aides Blame Predicament On National Climate. The New York Times (10/31, Toner, 1.21M) reports, "There is no better snapshot of the brutal political climate facing many Republicans in these final days than this: Senator Rick Santorum, the third-ranking Republican in the Senate, stubbornly behind in the polls, warning with anger and growing frustration that voters should not — must not, for their own good — reject him for his Democratic opponent, Bob Casey, the state treasurer." In a critique of "Casey's national security credentials, the Santorum campaign has run a television commercial that shows a mushroom cloud, missiles streaking through the air and the faces of North Korean, Iranian and terrorist leaders. It concludes, 'We just can't take a chance on Bob Casey.'" Santorum kicked off "the final stretch of his campaign with a series of speeches on 'The Gathering Storm,' offering a dark, Churchillian vision of the threats facing the United States — like the threats, he said, that faced England in the years leading up to World War II." But he "all but acknowledges that the national security issues that proved such a fundamental strength for the Republicans in 2002 and 2004 are far riskier for his party this year." Santorum's advisers "blame the national climate for his difficulties; in a state like Pennsylvania, which often leans Democratic, the plummeting popularity of President Bush and the Republican-led Congress was bound to hit hard. In fact, several Republican House incumbents are also fighting for their political lives in Pennsylvania this year." But Santorum's "own personality and political style have also played a role, political strategists and analysts say."

NBC Nightly News (10/30, story 5, 2:20, Reid, 9.87M) reported Santorum is "one of the Senate's most combative conservatives, leading the charge against abortion. Pushing Congress to intervene in the Schiavo case and nearly always supporting President Bush. This is a tough year for Republicans, largely because of the war in Iraq. That's why so many of them have put distance between themselves and President Bush on that issue. Not Rick Santorum. The war is too important, he says, to put politics ahead of principle." Sen. Rick Santorum: "You don't walk away from people because it's smart politically to do it. It offends me. I believe you stand up for what you believe in." Reid: "Democrats were so eager to beat Santorum, they tapped Bob Casey Jr., son of a popular former governor and an abortion opponent like Santorum. Casey's cultural conservatism has helped him maintain a lead of more than 10 points in the polls." Bob Casey: "This crowd is ready for a new direction." Reid: "Casey says Santorum's harsh partisanship has been his undoing." Casey: "What he has done is judge people and finger point and frankly lecture people. We don't need that any longer. We're tired of that."

Kean, Menendez Seek To Rally Base In Final Campaign Stops. The New York Times (10/31, Chen, Jones, 1.21M) reports Republican Thomas H. Kean Jr. "began the last full week of his campaign for the United States Senate by getting on his knees to be blessed by Korean-American pastors in Cliffside Park on Monday. Hours later and just eight miles away in another Bergen County town, he mingled with Italian-American firefighters and community leaders at Lodi Hose Company 2." Meanwhile, Sen. Robert Menendez "attended two events in the Democratic stronghold of Camden County. On Tuesday morning, he planned to be back in the same area for a breakfast with veterans accompanied by former Senator Max Cleland of Georgia, a Vietnam veteran who lost his legs in the war." With just "eight days until the election, this is the time when candidates in New Jersey pack their schedules with appearances all over the state, often from dawn until the dinner hour. And with most polls showing Mr. Menendez, the Democratic incumbent, holding a slight lead over his Republican opponent, both he and Mr. Kean are frequently hurrying through their lengthening schedules by sticking to the same issues and repeating accusations." But there is "a purpose in the seemingly frantic game of hopscotch from Camden to Lodi or Somerset to Asbury Park hinting at the strategy shaping the final days of the campaign. And geography, not surprisingly, is a major factor." For Kean, "that means a lot of time in such Republican strongholds as Morris County and some communities along the Jersey Shore as well as repeated forays to Bergen County, the state's wealthiest and most populous region, which is viewed as a battleground area." For his part, Menendez "plans to adhere to classic Democratic strategy by zeroing in on such urban areas as Camden, Essex and Hudson Counties, and appealing to ethnic minorities and organized labor, core party constituencies."

DOJ_NMG_0088837

NYTimes Corrects Editorial On Timing Of Kean Donations. The New York Times (10/31, 1.21M) reports, "An editorial yesterday about the New Jersey Senate race incorrectly described the timing of donations to the campaign of Thomas Kean Jr. by executives of Horizon Blue Cross and Blue Shield of New Jersey. The checks were written for a fund-raiser for Mr. Kean that took place before the submission of legislation that maintained a tax exemption for the companies. Mr. Kean did not receive the money on the same day that he voted for that legislation. The reference was based on an article in The Star-Ledger of Newark that the newspaper subsequently corrected."

Despite Weak Opponent, Hutchison Seeks Strong GOP Turnout In Texas. The Dallas Morning News (10/31, Gillman, 500K) reports that for Republican Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, Texas "is a line in the sand. The nightmare isn't so much that she'll lose her own re-election bid, it's that the ill national mood will flip control of Congress." Hutchison said, "It is a tough year. It is a tough year because times are tough. Because you've got boots on the ground. As Margaret Thatcher once said to George Bush 41, now is not the time to go wobbly." The Morning News adds that although "most analysts expect her to cruise to a third term," Hutchison is "running hard, dashing across West Texas one day last week, exhorting Republicans in one city after another to get out and vote." It's a "message meant to fire up Republican loyalists, though it also seemed to validate their anxieties. Sure, they'll keep the Texas seat, but what about the House and Senate?" On the way to Midland, "an aide hands her a faxed copy of a Kerrville Daily Times story. Kinky Friedman voted for her. 'She is not without charms,' the independent candidate for governor told the paper." Hutchison will "write a thank-you, but her ballot will go to Gov. Rick Perry, her fellow Republican, whom she had thought about challenging instead of running for re-election."

NYPost Endorses Hillary Clinton For Senate, But Not Presidency. The New York Post (10/30, 608K) endorsed Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "for re-election to the United States Senate. Surprised? Well, so are we - a little. But, then, there really isn't much of a choice in this race." Clinton has "been a pretty good senator - popular with her colleagues and as productive as a first-term legislator from the minority party probably can be. Think of her as Sen. Pothole Redux (apologies to Alfonse D'Amato). Meanwhile, her positions on numerous issues - particularly involving national security - have been much closer to the political center than we would have expected." But "what about the White House?" We "think she's done such a good job these last six years that she'd do well to serve six more. If not 12. Re-elect Hillary. In 2012."

Harris Writing Book On Those Who Have "Wronged" Her. The Washington Post (10/31, C1, Copeland, 748K) reports Florida Senate candidate Katherine Harris "says she is writing a tell-all about the many people who have wronged her. This includes, but is not necessarily limited to: the Republican leaders who didn't want her to run, the press that has covered her troubled campaign, and the many staffers who have quit her employ, whom she accuses of colluding with her opponent. She is vague about what, precisely, makes her a victim, but she says she has it all documented." Harris said, "It's going to be a great book." The Post adds, "If it is, it may be one of very few things that go well for the two-term Republican congresswoman. Once beloved by the Republican leadership for her role in overseeing the 2000 recount that delivered the presidency to George Bush, Harris was snubbed by those old friends before the primary. Republican chieftains, considering her too polarizing to win a statewide race, tried to recruit others, and Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R) said publicly that she could not win." The "way Harris sees it, a vast left- and right-wing conspiracy, encompassing both the 'liberal media' and the Republican 'elite,' is attempting to keep her out of the Senate."

Democrats Could Regain Control Of Majority Of State Legislatures. The New York Times (10/31, Johnson, 1.21M) reports, "More than 6,000 state legislative seats in 46 states are on the Nov. 7 ballot, and like the seismic state elections in 1994 and 1974 the cumulative impact of the outcomes could be immense, with Democrats possibly gaining control of a majority of state capitols for the first time in a decade." Most "significantly, the groundwork for redrawing Congressional districts after the 2010 census will be done under the 50 capitol domes, and the party in power will set the table for those discussions in ways favorable to its interests. Gains made this year, analysts say, will help give incumbents a leg up in the final elections leading up to the redistricting." If the Democrats "take control of a majority of the legislatures, which polls indicate could happen, women could also attain leadership positions in greater numbers, since Democratic women in state capitals outnumber Republican women by nearly two to one." One indication "of both parties' interest in the local races is the money that has been flowing into them." The Democratic Legislative Campaign Committee "plans to spend $9 million to $10 million on legislative races, up from $6 million to $7 million in 2004. Its counterpart, the Republican State Leadership Committee, has nearly doubled spending on state races, including for legislators, to $20 million." Republicans 'control both chambers in 20 states, Democrats in 19. One state, Nebraska, has a nonpartisan legislature, while the parties split control in the remaining 10 states." States to watch "on Election Day include Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, Nevada, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Tennessee and Wisconsin, where Republicans have narrow majorities in the lower house or senate. Democrats have narrow majorities in Colorado, Maine and Montana."

DOJ_NMG_0088838

Democrats Poised To Win Majority Of Gubernatorial Races. The CBS Evening News (10/30, story 6, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "While the polls indicate" California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "will be back, in other states, some Republican candidates may, in fact, be on their way to getting terminated." CBS (Borger) added, "It may not be as sexy as regaining control of the House or the Senate, but for Democrats, winning a majority of governorships could be just as important. Right now, Republicans have the advantage with control of 28 states. The Democrats have 22. They need just four more to reach a majority. That's a real possibility with at least nine Republican states up for grabs." Gov. Bill Richardson, Chairman of Democratic Governors Association: "It's going to be probably a bigger loss for President Bush losing a majority of governorships than it is either the House or Senate." Borger: "Consider the battleground state of Ohio. In the last presidential election Republicans controlled the state's voting process. Democrats charged they didn't get an accurate count." Gov. Richardson: "This is why it's so important to win in these states and in big states like Ohio, like Pennsylvania, like Wisconsin."

District Attorney Says Probe Into Gibbons Assault Allegation Reopened. The AP (10/31, Nakashima) reports District Attorney David Roger said "authorities have reopened their investigation into a cocktail waitress' claim that a Republican congressman running for governor assaulted her in a parking garage after a night of drinking." Roger said "the case involving Rep. Jim Gibbons — which had been closed after the woman, Chrissy Mazzeo, dropped her complaint — is under investigation again." Mazzeo, "a Las Vegas Strip casino waitress, accused Gibbons, 61, of pushing her up against a wall Oct. 13 and propositioning her. Mazzeo, 32, said she had been pressured and offered cash from people linked to the Gibbons campaign to drop the complaint." Gibbons, who is "in a close race with Democratic state Sen. Dina Titus for Nevada's open governor's seat, has denied wrongdoing and sued Monday to force police to release surveillance videos he said would disprove Mazzeo's claim." Gibbons "led Titus 47 percent to 41 percent in a poll released Friday. Most of the polling took place after the allegations were reported but before Mazzeo held a news conference Oct. 25 to recount her version of the events."

Win Would Give Ehlich National Profile. The Washington Post (10/31, A1, St. George, 748K) reports after "20 years of pulling out victories at the ballot box -- young and on the rise in the state House and in Congress before his election as governor at age 44," Republican Gov. Bob Ehrlich "is now trailing his opponent, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley (D), in an array of polls. But Ehrlich has come from behind before. This is the 16th contest of his political career. He has never lost." Matthew Crenson, a political science professor at Johns Hopkins University, said if Ehrlich wins, "his political profile will change markedly." As a "two-time Republican victor in a predominantly Democratic state, 'he will emerge as a figure in national Republican politics.'" The Post adds that if Ehrlich "loses, he will be thrust out of elective office for the first time since he was 28." Even "many of his critics say the 48-year-old governor is likable -- affable and unpretentious, the kind of guy who slaps backs, cracks jokes, talks sports. He has a strong streak of the Everyman." But they "also say the competitive edge that has helped him win football games and political campaigns has sometimes worked against him during his four years as governor."

Schwarzenegger Aides Said To Circumvent Gift Ban. The Los Angeles Times (10/31, Nicholas, 918K) reports, "After allowing his staff to accept tens of thousands of dollars' worth of gifts from business interests, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger is now worried about the appearance of a conflict of interest and has barred them from taking even a free cup of coffee. But the policy, stricter than state law, hasn't stopped the perks. Schwarzenegger aides over the last year have been given free tickets to Disneyland and San Francisco Giants baseball games; to Rolling Stones concerts and Sacramento Kings basketball games." Schwarzenegger chief of staff Susan Kennedy "sent a memo to the governor's aides in August explaining that by taking gifts, even if the law allows it, they could create a public perception that they have been compromised. … But the Spartan ethic comes with loopholes. Kennedy is scheduled to join lawmakers and state officials on a 12-day trip to South America next month that is sponsored by a tax-exempt group financed partly by energy companies and other businesses that lobby in Sacramento."

DOJ_NMG_0088839

Angelides Calls For "Comprehensive" Immigration Reform. In a Los Angeles Times op-ed (10/31), Democratic gubernatorial candidate Phil Angelides says, "On Thursday, President Bush put his signature on a measure authorizing a new fence along 700 miles of the 1,952-mile-long border between the United States and Mexico. Funds for the fence may never be provided, and the fence may never get built. Regardless of its future, the fence legislation alone is no substitute for the kind of comprehensive immigration reform that California and the nation need." Such reform "starts with full funding for the strong border security provisions originally provided in the 2004 Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act in response to the recommendations of the 9/11 commission. The act calls for at least 2,000 new, permanent border agents a year and 8,000 new detention beds a year for five years." Border control, "by itself, is not a solution." Immigration policy "must deal realistically with the major engine of illegal immigration: the economy's demand for immigrant labor. The federal government must enact rational and reasonable guest-worker programs that match immigrant workers with the nation's workforce needs. We need to end the shadow economy in which undocumented workers toil without regulation and without the protection of law."

States Seen As Taking Lead On Key Issues. The CBS Evening News (10/30, story 5, 4:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "California is leading the way in the battle against what's been called -- fairly or not -- a do-nothing Congress. In a CBS News/New York Times poll, two out of three Americans said this Congress has accomplished less than the House and Senate typically do. Now California is starting another trend saying, hey, if you can't handle it, we will." CBS (Hughes) added, "In northern California's Fourth District, Republican Congressman John Doolittle's own name points to his biggest problem. His challenger can't say it enough." Lieutenant Colonel Charlie Brown (RET), California candidate for Congress: "It's been a do-nothing congress and John Doolittle has done very little to change that." Hughes: "But Doolittle's home state has done a lot to change it. Trend-setting California is at it again, leading a host of other states in tackling ground-breaking issues the Federal Government won't touch. It began in 2004. When voters here thumbed their noses at Federal restrictions on embryonic stem cell research and approved a $3 billion initiative." Now, "six more states are following California, funding stem cell research the Feds won't. Here's another example: Global warming. As Washington argues and does little or nothing, California has passed the nation's most restrictive law on greenhouse gas emissions." Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger: "This will lead to us leading the way for other states and for other nations." Hughes: "And the list goes on, from prescription drug discounts to a new minimum wage that will rise to $8 an hour in 2008."

Hunter Announces Bid For GOP Presidential Nomination. The Los Angeles Times (10/31, Perry, 918K) reports Rep. Duncan Hunter, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, "announced plans today to make a longshot bid for his party's 2008 nomination for president. Hunter said his campaign will feature the two issues that are his trademarks: support for the U.S. military and opposition to illegal immigration." The AP (10/31, Spagat) reports, "The declaration to form an exploratory committee allows the 13-term California congressman to begin raising money and organize supporters in early Republican primary states such as Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina. … He had not been on any list of potential 2008 candidates." The Washington Post (10/31, A3, Geis, 748K) reports Hunter "was a leader in the construction of a 14-mile fence along the U.S.-Mexico border south of San Diego, and he cosponsored legislation that President Bush signed last week to build 700 miles of additional fencing along the border."

NYC Elite Reportedly Expect Bloomberg Presidential Run In 2008. The Washington Post's Richard Cohen (10/31, A21) writes, "If you should happen to go to dinner here, the talk will inevitably turn to any one of the many presidential candidates the Empire State has to offer. … Increasingly…the hum is also about the politically audacious Michael Rubens Bloomberg, 44th on Forbes magazine's list of the richest Americans and, as it happens, the mayor of this fair city. He might also be running. I say 'might' because Bloomberg has gone from the firm 'no' he offered me some months ago to a more intriguing 'I'm considering it' that he offered someone I talked with recently. Indeed, among this city's moneyed, journalistic (not, alas, the same thing), entertainment, financial and other sorts of elites, there are always one or two at the table who say, with great solemnity, that they happen to know Bloomberg will indeed run for president as an independent."

Abstinence Programs To Target Young Adults As Well As Teens. USA Today (10/31, Jayson, 2.27M) reports, "The federal government's 'no sex without marriage' message isn't just for kids anymore. Now the government is targeting unmarried adults up to age 29 as part of its abstinence-only programs, which include millions of dollars in federal money that will be available to the states under revised federal grant guidelines for 2007. The government says the change is a clarification. But critics say it's a clear signal of a more directed policy targeting the sexual behavior of adults." Wade Horn, assistant secretary for children and families at the Department of Health and Human Services, "said the revision is aimed at 19- to 29-year-olds because more unmarried women in that age group are having children. … 'The message is 'It's better to wait until you're married to bear or father children,' ' Horn said. 'The only 100% effective way of getting there is abstinence.'"

DOJ_NMG_0088840

Fortieth Anniversary Of Reagan's Election As Governor Of California Marked. The CBS Evening News (10/30, story 10, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "At the hilltop Presidential library where Ronald Reagan is buried and his life is on display, his widow Nancy and political luminaries gathered today to celebrate the beginning. … The day 40 years ago when Reagan was elected governor of California."

Barnes Praises Edsall's Book On "Red America." In an op-ed for the Washington Times (10/31, 88K) the Weekly Standard's Fred Barnes writes, "If Tom Edsall isn't America's greatest political writer, he's close to it. … The first [test] is whether one who analyzes politics is willing to write against preference. Mr. Edsall is, and 'Building Red America' is a perfect example. He is a liberal, especially on social and cultural issues, who persuasively chronicles how Republicans have gained the upper hand in politics today and explains why Democrats, even if they defeat Republicans in the midterm elections on Nov. 7, are not poised to become the majority party again anytime soon."

LATimes Reporters' Book Examines GOP Dominance. The Christian Science Monitor (10/31, Pinkus, 58K) reports, "The new book "One Party Country: Republican Dominance in the 21st Century" examines the nuts-and-bolts of the way Republicans have been building this sturdy foundation aimed at achieving successive election victories. At a time when Republicans have not articulated a clear strategy in the Iraq war and have bungled the aftermath of hurricane Katrina, 'One Party Country' suggests that the immediate priority and long-range plan of the Republican Party is wrapped up in winning elections. With so much of the focus on electoral tactics, the offshoot is that governing the country takes a secondary role. … Written by two investigative reporters for the Los Angeles Times, Tom Hamburger and Peter Wallsten, this book shows the signs of incisive journalistic digging."

Newspapers Report Dwindling Circulation Numbers. The Wall Street Journal (10/31, B2, Steel, 2.03M) reports, "Nearly every major U.S. newspaper suffered circulation declines in the past six months, according to the newspaper industry's twice-yearly report from the Audit Bureau of Circulations, the latest confirmation of the difficulties facing the industry as readers flock to the Web and other outlets for news. Average daily circulation of the 770 newspapers reporting results to the ABC dropped 2.8% on a year-to-year basis during the six months ended Sept. 30, according to an analysis from the Newspaper Association of America, an industry-trade group. … The circulation report, which comes on the heels of several major publishers reporting weaker ad revenue for the third quarter, is likely to reinforce concerns among investors about the industry's prospects." The New York Times (10/31, Seelye, 1.21M) reports it "lost about 3.5 percent of its circulation both daily and Sunday. The Washington Post's declines were nearly the same. The Wall Street Journal's daily paper fell by less than 2 percent but its Weekend Edition, which comes out on Saturday, reported a 6.7 percent drop." The Washington Post (10/31, D3, Ahrens, 748K) reports the Los Angeles Times "lost 8 percent of its daily circulation -- the most of any of the nation's largest newspapers -- over the past six months, potentially lowering its value even as suitors line up to bid on its parent company."

Opposition To Gambling And Medical Marijuana Said To Cost GOP Votes. The New York Times' John Tierney (10/31) writes, "One of the G.O.P. Congress's few achievements this year was a law to crack down on Internet gambling, an industry that counted eight million American customers last year — about four times the membership of the Christian Coalition. The new law hasn't stopped the online gamblers from betting, but it will give them second thoughts about voting Republican. The Republican war on marijuana — the chief priority of the current drug czar — isn't playing any better in the heartland. More than 40 percent of people over the age of 12 have tried marijuana, and more than three-quarters of Americans support legalizing it for medical purposes. The White House and the Justice Department have had little luck in their attempts to stop states from legalizing medical marijuana, but they have succeeded in alienating voters.

US Cotton Subsidies Said To Impoverish Africans. The Los Angeles Times (10/31, 918K), in an editorial, writes, "A century and a half ago, the U.S. cotton industry fueled a booming trade in African slaves and indirectly helped spark the Civil War. One big difference between then and now is that although American cotton is still afflicting Africa, now the Africans suffer at home rather than here. Cotton is a staple crop for many West and Central African countries, where a difference of a few pennies in the price of a pound of fiber can mean the difference between deprivation and relative prosperity. And an explosion of U.S. cotton exports over the last decade, fueled by one of the most obscene corporate welfare programs this country has ever seen, has increasingly helped tip the scales toward deprivation over there. On Wednesday, trade ministers from four African countries whose economies are being savaged by U.S. cotton subsidies came to Washington to discuss the issue with U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab and Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns. They left with little more than vague promises. President Bush, cowed by powerful congressional Republicans from farm states, has done nothing to stop a surge in agricultural subsidies during his administration."

DOJ_NMG_0088841

Ahmadinejad Vows "Appropriate And Firm Response" To Any UN Sanctions. The AP (10/31, Karimi) reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "warned on Monday that his country would respond with an 'appropriate and firm response' to any U.N. sanction over its nuclear program." The "hard-line leader" is quoted saying, "Efforts by the big powers will only incite anger and hatred. Iranian nation will respond to restrictive activities with an appropriate and firm response." Meanwhile, "key [UNSC] members were considering a draft European resolution that would impose punishing measures on Iran over its disputed nuclear program." Moscow and Beijing "have shied away from imposing punitive measures on their trade partner Iran, saying they prefer a diplomatic solution to the impasse. But the United States says the proposed sanctions are not tough enough. Russian President Vladimir Putin told Ahmadinejad [yesterday] that Moscow strongly favors further negotiations on Tehran's nuclear program, the Kremlin said." Also, IAEA head Mohamed El-Baradei "said at the U.N. that his organization has not been able to verify that Iran's nuclear program is peaceful."

Stephens Criticizes "Busheir Exception." Bret Stephens writes in the Wall Street Journal (10/31, A19, 2.03M), "Does the Bush administration seriously mean to give Iran a nuclear bomb? Look carefully at the confidential text of a forthcoming UN Security Council resolution, and the answer, it would seem, is yes. … Through diplomatic efforts spearheaded by Undersecretary of State Nick Burns, the administration is prepared to endorse a European draft of a UN resolution that imposes limited sanctions on the Islamic Republic for flouting its Aug. 31 deadline to stop enriching uranium." Stephens focuses its criticism of the resolution on "the Bushehr exception, so broad the Iranians could drive a truck through it -- or, to be more precise, a truck carrying 330 kilograms of reactor-grade plutonium. That's enough to make about 55 Nagasaki-type atomic bombs." Bushehr "is a light-water nuclear reactor that Russia began building for Iran in the mid-1990s over the objections of the Clinton administration. Ten years on, the billion-dollar facility is nearly complete: All that remains to make it operable is reactor-grade uranium, which Moscow promises to supply by next October. In a sop to the Russians, the draft resolution specifies that the prohibition on technology transfers to Iran 'shall not apply to supplies of items, materials, equipment, goods and technology, nor to the provision of technical assistance or training, financial assistance, investment, brokering or other services...related to the construction of Bushehr I.'"

US Leads Anti-Proliferation Maneuvers In Persian Gulf. The New York Times (10/31, Fattah, 1.21M) reports, "More than two dozen countries, including three gulf states, practiced intercepting and searching vessels suspected of trafficking in unconventional weapons in major military maneuvers on Monday that emphasized their coordination and willingness to aggressively block the spread of arms. The daylong exercise, about 20 miles outside Iranian territorial waters, seemed to signal to Iran, too, that a coalition of Western powers and neighboring states was intent on denying it access to nuclear, chemical and biological weapons, even on its doorstep." US "officials insist that the training exercise, planned since January, was not related to tensions over Iran's uranium enrichment activities." The Times says, "Iran warned the exercise's participants on Monday against acts that could destabilize the region. Military officials taking part in the exercise said that Iranian patrol boats came close to coalition ships in recent days, inspecting their activities and positions." Monday's exercise "was the first training maneuver in the Persian Gulf under the Proliferation Security Initiative, an American-led effort that seeks to coordinate and develop procedures for intercepting smugglers of unconventional weapons."

Bush Opposed To Japan, South Korea And Taiwan Getting Nuclear Weapons. The AP (10/31) reports, "President Bush said Monday he would oppose helping Japan, South Korea and Taiwan develop nuclear weapons to guard against any threat from a nuclear-armed North Korea. 'I think the less nuclear armament in the Far East, the better off the world will be,' the president said in an interview." Bush "said the United States should work closely with its allies in Asia on a missile defense system. 'Our missile defense systems are getting better and better because of the money that we have been spending over the past five years,' he said."

US General Says More North Korean Nuclear Tests Expected. The AP (10/31, Herman) reports the top US

DOJ_NMG_0088842

general in South Korea, Army Gen. B.B. Bell, said Monday that more nuclear tests "can be expected" by North Korea, and "stressed that US and South Korean forces could deter any aggression." Gen. Bell "didn't cite specific intelligence that another test was imminent, but said that could be expected in the future as part of North Korea's weapons program." The Washington Times (10/31, Salmon, 88K) Gen. Bell also "dismissed reports that his forces were preparing a pre-emptive strike on the North."

Report Accuses China Of Aiding North Korean Nuclear Program. The Washington Times (10/31, Gertz, 88K) says "China helped North Korea develop nuclear weapons and in the past year increased its support to Pyongyang, rather than pressing the regime to halt nuclear arms and missile activities, according to a congressional report." The "final draft report of the US-China Economic Security Review Commission also says that Chinese government-run companies are continuing to threaten U.S. national security by exporting arms to American enemies in Asia and the Middle East." The report "is based on public testimony and highly classified intelligence reports made available to its members and staff. It indirectly criticizes the Bush administration for failing to pressure Beijing into joining US-led anti-proliferation programs and calls for Congress to take action to force the administration to do more."

China May Be Using Oil To Press North Korea. The New York Times (10/31, Kahn, 1.21M), meanwhile, reports China "cut off oil exports to North Korea in September during heightened tension over North Korea's nuclear and missile programs," according to Chinese trade statistics. Calling it an "unusual move," the Times says there is "no clear indication that the September figures represent a policy shift by China." China did not announce a reduction in oil exports, and the Times says it "remains possible the statistics are an anomaly or that supplies were cut because North Korea did not need more oil in September." Chinese officials declined to comment.

US, Allies Launch Global Initiative To Combat Nuclear Terror Threat. The AP (10/31, Thorne) reports on the launching of the Global Initiative to Combat Nuclear Terrorism, saying, "the world's five leading nuclear powers and seven other nations kicked off a new program Monday aimed at keeping nuclear weapons beyond the reach of terrorists." Robert Joseph, the US Undersecretary of State for Arms Control and International Security, is quoted saying, "The concern is fundamental -- we must stop terrorists from acquiring nuclear weapons." Washington, Moscow, Beijing, London, Paris, Rome, Tokyo, Ottawa, Ankara, Canberra, Rabat and Astana "signed two agreements on common principles and 'terms of reference' that were not immediately made public after the start of the two-day meeting in Rabat." The AP adds, "While Russia and the United States have been at odds on how to rein in Iran's suspect nuclear program, the two countries combined to provide the impetus for this international effort to keep atomic arms from terrorist groups."

Bolton Says Syria, Iran Trying To Destabilize Lebanese Government. The AP (10/31, Lederer) reports Ambassador Bolton "accused Syria and Iran on Monday of trying to destabilize Lebanon's democratically elected government by violating a U.N. arms embargo." Bolton stressed that Syria's obligations to respect a UN arms embargo authorized by the Security Council in August "are particularly important as it is the one country other than Israel that borders Lebanon." He also called on Syrian President Bashar Assad "to abide by the commitment he made to Secretary-General Kofi Annan to support the resolution and the arms embargo."

Olmert Says Israel May Expand Gaza Military Operations. The New York Times (10/31, Myre, 1.21M) reports, "Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel said Monday that the Israeli military might expand operations in the Gaza Strip in an attempt to halt Palestinian rocket fire, but that there was no intention to reoccupy the territory." His comments "came on another day of turmoil, in which Palestinian gunmen kidnapped a Spanish aid worker in southern Gaza and held him for several hours before releasing him, and a Palestinian militant was killed in northern Gaza in disputed circumstances."

Middle East Governments Await Post-Election Changes To US Policy. The AP (10/31, Reid) reports, "Arab governments are looking for change in U.S. policy in the Middle East after the midterm elections, hoping a politically weakened President Bush will talk with Iran and Syria, show greater interest in the Palestinians and find a way out of the crisis in Iraq. Israel too is watching for any sign of change in U.S. strategy — especially toward the Palestinians, Syria and Iran. … 'If the U.S. is going to help itself, its policy needs to change in the Middle East,' the Saudi ambassador to the U.S., Turki al-Faisal, said Monday in Washington. He urged the U.S. to start by pressing Israel to relinquish all occupied Arab land — and Jerusalem — to the Palestinians. Many Arab officials question, however, whether the Democrats have better answers to the region's problems. They consider the Democrats traditionally more supportive of Israel than the GOP is. Even as they eye the possible political upheaval in the United States, Arab countries like Egypt and Saudi Arabia are maintaining close ties to the Bush administration."

DOJ_NMG_0088843

Faisal Asks Washington To "Push" Tel Aviv Towards Peace Talks. AFP (10/31) reports Saudi Ambassador Prince Turki al-Faisal "firmly urged the Bush administration to push Israel into opening final peace talks with the Palestinians." He told the National Council on US-Arab Relations "that the United States was the only nation with the power to jolt the stalled international roadmap to Middle East peace into motion." AFP adds the Administration "has been less willing than many of its predecessors to engage in nuts and bolts peacemaking between Israel and the Palestinians -- despite calling for the formation of a Palestinian state."

Natsios To Brief Bush This Morning On Darfur. AFP (10/31) says President Bush "will meet his special envoy for Sudan, Andrew Natsios, [today] to get an update on efforts to end violence in Darfur, the White House said." The 9:00am meeting will "discuss the humanitarian crisis in the war-wracked Darfur region amid stalled attempts to bolster an international peacekeeping presence there." AFP says that discussion "comes roughly one week after [NSA Hadley, Secretary Rice and Assistant Secretary Frazer] held talks on Darfur at the White House."

Washington, Moscow Sign Agreement On Joint Military Operations. The AP (10/31) reports Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said his Russian counterpart, Gen. Yuri Baluyevsky, Monday signed a cooperation agreement that "lays out plans for joint activities for the coming year," officials said. Details of the agreement were not disclosed.

Trade Deadline Missed, But Officials Say Deal Is Close. The Financial Times (10/31, Dinmore) reports the US and Russia are "close" to a bilateral trade agreement that would remove a big hurdle to Russia's entry into the World Trade Organization, "but Tuesday's self-imposed deadline will not be met," US trade officials said Monday. "Both sides believe we are close, and we fully expect to continue our close co-operation to reach an agreement," the USTR's office said. US trade officials, however, "would not say what issues remained unresolved" following a week of talks in Washington with Maxim Medvedkov, Russia's chief WTO negotiator.

European Commission Criticizes Turkey On Human Rights, Role Of Military. The Financial Times (10/31, Dombey, Schmid) reports, "Turkey's bid for European Union membership will be dealt a fresh blow next week when an official report will slate Ankara for failing to make enough progress on freedom of expression, curbing the use of torture and establishing civilian control over the military. The draft European Commission report, obtained by FT Deutschland, the FT's sister paper, comes at a particularly sensitive time, with EU officials struggling to keep the accession talks alive." The Times adds, "Some EU member states, including the UK, fear that the pro-European consensus within Turkey may be fragmenting, and that the debate within the union on future enlargement has had the effect of alienating Turks, rather than encouraged reform."

Rumsfeld Meets Turkish Counterpart. The AP (10/30) reports, "Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld thanked his Turkish counterpart Monday for NATO ally Turkey's support for the anti-terror operation in Afghanistan and the reconstruction effort in northern Iraq, the Defense Department said. ... Other items on the Rumsfeld-Gonul agenda included Turkey's support for the U.S.-sponsored Proliferation Security Initiative against the spread of weapons of mass destruction; the NATO summit scheduled Nov. 28-29 in Riga, Latvia; regional security, including arms sales and defense cooperation; and other NATO issues. Turkey has a major interest in the northern Iraq question, where Iraqis of the Kurdish ethnic group live."

UK To Regulate "Islamic Bonds." The Financial Times (10/31, Tett) reports, "Britain looks set to become the first western country to introduce a regulatory regime to support the domestic issuance of sukuk – so-called 'Islamic bonds', or those which do not pay overt interest." The move "is intended to ensure that companies in London can issue sukuk as easily as traditional corporate bonds, boosting the City of London's role in this fast-growing sector of the global capital markets. … The UK hopes to introduce the new framework to support the issuance of sukuk in London next year, via parliamentary legislation."

British Government Report Says Global Warming Could Devastate Global Economy. The Los Angeles Times (10/31, Murphy, 918K) reports from London, "A major study issued Monday concludes that without rapid and substantial spending, global warming will reduce worldwide productivity on the scale of the Great Depression, devastate food sources, cause widespread deaths and create hundreds of millions of refugees." The report, commissioned by the British government, "warns that failure to act could cost up to 20% a year in lost income worldwide. Acting now, however, could bring about meaningful control of greenhouse gases at an annual cost of 1% of global gross domestic product, it says." The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (10/31, Emling, 399K) notes the "600-page report by former World Bank chief economist Sir Nicholas Stern" predicted that "taking the steps needed now to reduce greenhouse gas emissions would cost about 1 percent of global GDP each year."

The CBS Evening News (10/30, story 7, 0:50, Phillips, 7.66M) reported, "Pay now or pay a lot more later is the report's stark conclusion. World economies, it says, must invest 1% of their GNP now to reduce global warming gases or it warn there is will be a planet wide slow down of 20% due to drought, floods, and general economic collapse. That's a catastrophe on the sale of the Great Depression of the 1930s. The British hope this new economic argument can do what the environmental argument hasn't: Convince skeptical governments in China and the US to act now as well."

DOJ_NMG_0088844

The Financial Times (10/31, Adams, Harvey) reports, "Tony Blair, British prime minister, is set to use the review by Sir Nicholas Stern, former World Bank chief economist, to announce a dramatic change to his stance on environment policy by calling for a new treaty that could set binding targets for carbon emissions. In the past two years, Mr Blair has written off the prospect for signing a 'Kyoto II' treaty, acknowledging strong US opposition to any attempt to impose emission targets." But "he will now try and inject fresh life into stalled talks on a post-Kyoto agreement, believing that George W. Bush, US president, could back proposals early next year for an international 'cap and trade' market for carbon trading." Blair "will press Angela Merkel, Germany's chancellor, at a meeting in London on Friday to use her presidency of the Group of Eight richest nations next year to reach agreement on the key recommendations in the Stern report."

Under the headline "In Britain, All Parties Want To Color The Flag Green," the Washington Post (10/31, A18, Sullivan, 748K) reports Blair "warned Monday that the world is heading toward 'disastrous' and 'irreversible' climate changes. Meanwhile, David Cameron, the popular leader of the opposition Conservative Party, vowed to install a wind-power generator and solar panels at the prime minister's residence if he wins the office." Blair and Cameron "are rivals, but their shared outspoken devotion to fighting global warming…illustrates the unity among leaders across the political spectrum here on the dangers of climate change and, in the absence of US leadership, their apparent determination to make Britain a world leader on the issue." The Post adds, "In a clear reference to President Bush, Blair used a column in the Sun newspaper Monday to say, 'The case for action is the final piece of the jigsaw to convince every single political leader, including those in America, China and India, that this must be top of their agenda.'"

USA Today (10/31, Vergano, 2.27M) reports, "The report moves economic discussion of how humanity should deal with global warming to center stage, says Alden Meyer of the Union of Concerned Scientists in Washington, D.C., a science advocacy group." The report "is endorsed by such economic heavyweights as Nobel Prize winner Joseph Stiglitz of Columbia University." But "critics, such as statistician Bjorn Lomborg of Denmark's Copenhagen Consensus Center, suggest ills such as disease and malnutrition are potentially more costly than global warming."

The Washington Post (10/31, A18, Eilperin, 748K) also reports "some economists questioned the British study's projections," saying they "overestimated the impact of global warming on the world's economies, especially those of developed nations. At the same time, these critics said the report's assertion that it would cost only 1 percent annually of global GDP to curb climate change underestimated how much spending would be required. 'There's just a very small part of GDP" in industrialized nations "that's affected by weather in a direct or indirect way,' said Jerry Taylor, a senior fellow at the libertarian Cato Institute, which accepts some contributions from fossil-fuel companies. 'It's very difficult to sketch out this disaster scenario.'"

UN Data Show CO2 Emissions Still Rising. The Wall Street Journal (10/31, A6, Fialka, 2.03M) reports, "A United Nations agency said most industrial nations continue to increase their emissions of carbon dioxide and other so-called greenhouse gases thought to be warming the Earth's atmosphere, despite pledges under the Kyoto Protocol during the next six years to make a 5% cut." While "the shuttering of heavily polluting factories in the former Soviet Union and its satellites makes it appear as though industrial nations as a group reduced their emissions by 3.3% from 1990 to 2004," the agency "said that without that statistical blip, the US and most other industrial nations have increased their emissions by 11%."

Nicholas Kristof writes in the New York Times (10/31, 1.21M), "We know what is needed: a carbon tax or cap-and-trade system, a post-Kyoto accord on emissions cutbacks, and major research on alternative energy sources. But as the Times's Andrew Revkin noted yesterday, spending on energy research and development has fallen by more than half, after inflation, since 1979." The column concludes, "Melting glaciers and corroding pteropods aren't as sensational as a Congressional page scandal, or as urgent as the Iraq war. But they are just as scandalous. We have no responsibility greater than as stewards of our planet, and we're blowing it."

Mexican Protests Seen As "Morphing" Into Political Movement. The Washington Post (10/31, A15, Roig-Franzia, 748K) reports that after sending 4,500 federal police officers to quell protests in Oaxaca Sunday, Mexican President Vincente Fox Monday declared that "social order and peace has been restored." However, the Post says Fox's declaration "seemed out of sync with events on the ground." Although the standoff "began as a teachers strike, it has morphed into a political movement" as "an umbrella group with an ambitious mission of social and economic reform has taken over." The group, the Popular Assembly of the People of Oaxaca, or APPO, have "voted not to budge until the Oaxaca state governor, Ulises Ruiz, steps down." The AP (10/31, Stevenson), Los Angeles Times (10/31, Enriquez, 918K) and New York Times (10/31, Lacey, 1.21M), among other sources, also report on the situation in Oaxaca.

DOJ_NMG_0088845

No Progress Reported In Sri Lanka Peace Talks. The Financial Times (10/31, Leahy) reports that relations between the Sri Lankan government and the rebel Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, the two sides "have deteriorated so much" that during talks over the weekend in Geneva the two sides "could not agree even on this modest goal" of an "agreement on a schedule for more talks." The Times says that "for the long-suffering people of Sri Lanka, the news could hardly have been worse. There is little to stop the two sides intensifying their slide back towards full-scale hostilities under the guise of the island's four-year-old ceasefire agreement."

German-Polish Relations Worsen. The Washington Post (10/31, A15, Whitlock, 748K) reports, "It had already been a bad year for German-Polish relations, but things really soured this month when naval warfare between the two countries nearly broke out on the Baltic Sea. On Oct. 17, the Polish Coast Guard fired warning shots at a German tourist ship after it tried to evade inspection in the Polish port of Swinoujscie and made a run for the German border with three Polish customs officers on board." Although "[n]o one was wounded or killed," the incident "only added to a string of diplomatic slights, political insults and other indignities that have left Germany and Poland feeling more raw about each other than perhaps at any time since the end of World War II. Poles have been smarting for more than a year over Germany's decision to bypass their energy-dependent country by routing a major gas pipeline to Russia under the Baltic." Poles are also upset about "efforts by some Germans to sue for monetary compensation for property their families were forced to abandon after the defeat of the Third Reich" and "recent historical exhibits in Berlin that highlighted the hardships faced by millions of German refugees after World War II."

Berlusconi Indicted For Corruption. The Financial Times (10/31, Michaels) notes former Italian premier Silvio Berlusconi "and David Mills, his former lawyer, were on Monday ordered to stand trial on corruption charges by a judge in Milan. In a further deepening of the pair's legal woes, the judge accepted the prosecutors' request for a trial into allegations that Mr. Berlusconi paid Mr. Mills at least $600,000 after the lawyer had given favourable testimony at other trials of Mr. Berlusconi in the 1990s." Berlusconi "has been beset by allegations of wrongdoing in his business empire for years," and "has been convicted on some occasions but the convictions have either been overturned on appeal or annulled by statutes of limitations." The Times adds, "Whatever the outcome of the trial, people close to the Milan prosecutors admit that it is very unlikely that a conviction will stand and that either man will go to jail."

The AP (10/31, Barry) adds Berlusconi "has a long history of legal troubles linked to his business interests based in Milan. In past cases, he was either acquitted or cleared of the charges because the statute of limitations had expired. He has always maintained his innocence."

Pinochet Put Under House Arrest, Indicted On Torture Charges. The AP (10/31) reports former Chilean President Gen. Augusto Pinochet "was placed under house arrest and indicted for the first time on torture charges for abuses at a secret detention center where President Michelle Bachelet and her mother were once held, [Judge Alejandro Solis] reported Monday." He is charged "with one homicide, 35 kidnappings and 24 cases of torture at Villa Grimaldi, one of the most infamous detention centers in the early years of his 1973-1990 dictatorship. Pinochet's chief defense lawyer, Pablo Rodriguez, had said he will appeal Solis' ruling 'all the way to the Supreme Court if necessary. We will use all the legal means at our disposal.'" Pinochet "has been indicted on human rights charges several times before, but this is the first time he faces torture charges."

The Los Angeles Times (10/31, 918K), in an editorial, says that "whatever happens in these proceedings, it is clear that Pinochet, at this late stage in his life, is unlikely to be held accountable for his actions. What is more dismaying is the degree to which many in Chile continue to defend the general's brutal actions when he ran the country from 1973 to 1990. Indeed, it has taken accusations of financial improprieties to taint Pinochet, once hailed as an austerity-embracing, selfless anti-communist, in the eyes of Chilean conservatives. … We can only hope that the latest round of proceedings against Pinochet will allow some of his victims to testify against him, and thus may offer up a mirror for all of Chilean society to come to terms with its dark past.

World Bank Urges Caution Regarding Migrants' Remittances. The Financial Times (10/31, Lapper, Editor) reports, "The World Bank will on Tuesday urge policymakers to take a more cautious approach towards the development potential of remittances, the multi-billion dollar financial flows sent home by migrant workers in North America, Europe and Asia." In a report "analysing their significance in Latin America and the Caribbean, bank economists argue that remittances are not 'manna from heaven', that the benefits have been 'overestimated' and that associated social and economic costs in developing countries have not been taken into account."

Edwards Urges Strong US Role In Uganda. Former Sen. John Edwards writes in the Washington Post (10/31, A21, 748K), "At a moment of tremendous global hardship -- from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan to the killing fields of Darfur -- it is rare to find hope. So when there is the possibility for peace, we must seize it. That's why one of the world's great tragedies, the conflict in Northern Uganda, deserves our attention. It is perhaps the worst humanitarian catastrophe to have gone practically unnoticed by most of the world. … To witness the ravaging of Northern Uganda is searing. But meeting its people inspires hope. During a recent visit, I went to the Palabek-Kal camp, where thousands have been crammed into a makeshift village. Hearing their stories of suffering and survival made two points abundantly clear: They are praying for peace every moment, and they expect the world community to do everything possible to help them achieve it. Their yearning was deeply moving, and their collective intensity and faith to build a better future in the midst of such hardship was powerful." Edwards adds that how the US acts toward Uganda, "and if and how we lead -- will send a message throughout Africa and the rest of the world about what America stands for. We must not sit idly by as Uganda's people strive for peace."

DOJ_NMG_0088846

WPost Urges Lula To Tackle Reforms, Step Away From "Ruinous Populism." The Washington Post (10/31, A20, 748K) editorializes, "Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva overcame some formidable negatives to win reelection as Brazil's president on Sunday, including a squalid series of corruption scandals and a lackluster record of growth during the past four years by Latin America's largest economy. But the reasons for his victory are mostly positive. The former metalworker and union leader, universally known simply as Lula, has been able to mobilize millions of Brazil's poor, who previously were largely excluded from the country's developing economy and democracy. Many of those people have seen tangible improvement in their lives thanks to Lula's policies, which have lifted some 8 million people out of poverty in a country of 185 million." The Post urges Lula to "tackle the reform of the state, even while continuing programs for the poor. He has the opportunity to propel himself, and Brazil, into a position of leadership in Latin America by demonstrating how poverty can be addressed by sensible and sustainable policies rather than ruinous populism."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Launching A Journey They'd Never Imagined."
"A bishop's Divided House."
"Living Among The Dead."
"Resistance To Deadlines For Iraq Is Weakening."
"Governor's Ban On Staff Perks Isn't Perfect."
"It was the Joanne And Truman Show."

USA Today:
"Abstinence Message Goes Beyond Teens."
"The Case For D-Wade."
"The Case For LeBron."
"Feds May Mandate Sprinkler Systems."

New York Times:
"Spate of Bombs Sweeps Baghdad; Cleric Faults U.S.."
"Democrats Are Seen To Gain In Statehouse Races."
"U.S. Drops Bid Over Royalties From Chevron."
"A G.O.P. Leader And Star Struggles For Traction."
"In Son's Race, Father Sees Cuomo Comeback."
"Campaign To End Race Preferences Splits Michigan."
"In Boulder, Runners Gather In Guarded Isolation."

Washington Post:
"Bush Says 'America Loses' Under Democrats."
"In Baghdad, A Force Under The Militias' Sway."
"Who's That Pretty Pachyderm?."
"Agencies' Outward Migration Irks Officials."
"A Politician Who Thinks Like A Linebacker."
"Suspect and A Setback In Al-Qaeda Anthrax Case."

Washington Times:
"Black Democrats Support Steele."
"China Cited As N. Korea Backer."
"Raids Kills 80 At Pakistani School."
"Haunts To Avoid For Scaredy-Cats."
"Highflying Southwest Takes A Dive."

Detroit Free Press:
"Champion For Cause Is Uniting Enemies."
"Frightfully Political."
"U.S. Delphi Deals Phony."
"Battenberg Denies Guilt; Dawes Settles."
"Airport Pick-Me-Up."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Foes In Judicial Contest Go Dirty."
"Georgia Can Preserve GOP Grip, Bush Says."
"Tusk, Tusk, Is That The Way I Look?"
"Beloved Cookbook Regains Its Favor."

Houston Chronicle:
"Hutchinson Leads Radnofsky 2-To-1."
"Bewareed The Tiniest Blood Suckers."
"Truth Stranger Than Fiction."
"For $16 Million, Port Will Get A Makeover."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Bush Hits Campaign Trail; Campaign 2006-Indiana; Iraq-American Death Toll; Iraq Sectarian Violence-Children; Missing American Soldier-Iraq; Al Qaeda Training School;

DOJ_NMG_0088847

Fast Food Healthier; Banning Transfats-New York; California Wildfires; Gallaudet Student Protest; Explaining The Titanic.
CBS: Iraq Changing Course; Iraq Sectarian Violence; Military Families-California; California Wildfires; States Taking The Lead; Campaign 2006-Governors Races; Global Warming; Fast Food Healthier; Gallaudet School Protest; Reagan's California.
NBC: Al Qaeda Training School Destroyed; Iraq-American Death Toll; Iraq War-Money Mismanagement; Bush Hits Campaign Trail; Bush Hits Campaign Trail; Pennsylvania Senate Race; Oil Prices; Stock Market; Fast Food Healthier; California Wildfires; Premature Babies Increase; Forced To Retire; Fallen Soldiers.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Bush-Midterm Campaigning; Iraq-US KIAs; Pakistan-Al Qaeda-Linked Training Facility, US Intelligence; KFC-Transfats; Iraq-Midterms; Federal Government-Adult Abstinence Training; GA-Bat Infestation.
CBS: Bush-Iraq; General Casey-Iraq; Iraq-US KIAs; Bush-Midterm Campaigning; Midterm Races; CA- Esperanza Wildfire; NASA-Hubble Announcement; VT-Syringe Attacks; Halloween Treats-Calorie Levels.
NPR: Baghdad-Car Bomb; Iraq-US KIAs; Iraq-Missing US Soldier; Pakistan-Protest Of Attack On Al Qaeda-Linked Training Facility; Bush-Midterm Campaigning; US Economy-Interest Rate Hikes; CA-Esperanza Wildfire; Jamaica-Investigation Of Former Pro Boxer's Death; Red Cross-Organizational Changes; Tokyo-Stock Market.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Attends a Georgia Victory 2006 rally. Georgia National Fairgrounds and Agricenter, Perry, Ga.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Speaks at a North Carolina Victory 2006 Rally, Western North Carolina Agriculture Center, Fletcher, NC; speaks at a Tennessee Victory 2006 rally, Meadow View Conference Resort and Convention Center, Kingsport, Tenn.; speaks at a Tennessee Victory 2006 rally, the Factory at Franklin, Franklin, Tenn.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: AFGHANISTAN-BUSINESS _ Representatives of major US corporations, development organizations, and government agencies convene for the US-Afghan Business Matchmaking Conference, kicking off the second Afghanistan Investment Support Agency U.S. promotional road show, ``Investing in Afghanistan: the Heart of Asia." Highlights: 10:30 a.m. Commerce Secretary Gutierrez speaks on US-Afghan commercial relations. Location: Four Seasons Hotel, 2800 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

US-ARAB RELATIONS _ The National Council on U.S.-Arab Relations sponsors the 15th annual Arab-U.S. Policymakers Conference. Highlights: 9:15 a.m. Panel on the Gulf Cooperation Council. Panelists include Dr. Michael Collins Dunn, Editor of The Estimate and Editor of The Middle East Journal. 11 a.m. - 12:30 p.m. Panel on What Future for the GCC Region, moderated by Anne Joyce, editor, Middle East Policy and Vice-President and Board Member, Middle East Policy Council. Keynote speaker is Prince Turki Al-Faisal, Ambassador of Saudi Arabia to the United States of America. 12:30 p.m. Luncheon keynote address by Dr. Hussein Al-Athel, Secretary General, Riyadh Chamber of Commerce and Industry. 2 p.m. Conference adjourns. Location: Ronald Reagan Building, 1300 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

US-RUSSIA _ 9 a.m. - 2 p.m. A group of leading scholars and policymakers from the United States and Russia discuss the deterioration of U.S-Russian relations over the past five years, Russia's use of energy as diplomatic pressure, how Russia's foreign policy is linked to the policies of economic and political recentralization inside the country, and what can be expected in the next two years as both Russia and the United States enter critical periods of presidential transition. Highlights: 1 p.m. Keynote Address: Thomas Graham Jr., National Security Council (off the record). Location: Wohlstetter Conference Center, 12th floor, AEI, 1150 17th St. NW.

LATINO VOTE _ 9:30 a.m. The National Association of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials' Education Fund releases an analysis of the Latino vote and its impact of the 2006 elections. Location: National Press Club.

JUDGES-POLITICS _ 10 a.m. David A. Schkade, University of California, San Diego, and Lisa M. Ellman, Mayer, Brown, Rowe & Maw LLP, holda news conference to discuss ``Are Judges Political? Location: National Press Club.

REDISTRICTING FORUM _ 10:15 a.m. News conference by the Campaign Legal Center, League of Women Voters, and the Council for Excellence in Government on the role of gerrymandered congressional districts in the 2006 elections, and the release of a report on redistricting reform, with Norman Ornstein of AEI, former Rep. David Scaggs, Nancy Tate of the League of Women Voters, and Trevor Potter of the Campaign Legal Center. Location: National Press Club.

MIDTERM ELECTIONS _ 11 a.m. - 12:30 p.m. George Washington University's Graduate School of Political Management hosts a panel discussion on the fate of the 2006 midterm elections, featuring leading political experts from both sides of the aisle and moderated by Christopher

DOJ_NMG_0088848

Arterton, dean of GWs Graduate School of Political Management. As campaigning draws to a close, the panel will focus in on the key races that will determine the outcome of Congressional control. Location: Room 2168, Rayburn House Office Building.

NORTH KOREA _ 12 p.m. Global Resource Services holds a briefing on NGO programs in North Korea. Location: National Press Club.

PRIVACY-MORALITY _ 12 p.m. Cato Institute book forum on ``Liberty for All: Reclaiming Individual Privacy in a New Era of Public Morality," with author Elizabeth Price Foley, Florida International University, and William A. Galston, Brookings Institution. Location: 1000 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

ANTI-AMERICANISM _ 5 p.m. The School of Advanced International Studies holds a program on anti-Americanism in Europe, with John Glenn of the German Marshall Fund and Andrew Kohut of the Pew Center for People and the Press. Location: Auditorium, 1619 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0088849

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, October 31, 2006 9:03 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Tuesday, October 31, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061031.pdf; dojclips061031.doc

This morning's Department of Justice News Clips is attached.

Website: You can also read today's briefing, including searchable archive of past editions, at http://www.BulletinNews.com/justice.

Full-text Links: Clicking the hypertext links in our write-ups will take you to the newspapers' original full-text articles.

Interactive Table of Contents: Clicking a page number on the table of contents page will take you directly to that story.

Contractual Obligations and Copyright: This copyrighted material is for the internal use of US Department of Justice employees only and, by contract, may not be redistributed without BulletinNewsâ€™ express written consent.

Contact Information: Please contact us any time at 703-749-0040 or Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com. Use of this email address will automatically result in your message being delivered to everyone involved with your service, including senior management. Thank you.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, OCTOBER 31, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Suspect And A Setback In Al-Qaeda Anthrax Case (WP) 4
The Terror Suspect Who May Go Free (TIME) 7
Padilla: Dismiss Charges (MH) 8
NYC Terror Trial Likely In Spring For Musician, Doctor, 2 Others (AP) 9
Doctor's Alleged Pledge Is Crux Of Terror Case (NYS) 10
Sens. Look For Supermax Fix (DENP) 10
Federal Fire Grants Shown To Vary Widely (AP) 11

Homeland Response:

Student Searched Over Fake Boarding Pass (HC/AP) 12
DIY Boarding Pass Site Gets Shut Down (CNET) 13
Flight To Ft. Lauderdale Diverted Due To Disruptive Passenger (BRAH) 13
Unruly JetBlue Passenger Apologizes To Magistrate (ORS) . 14
Democrats Wait In The Wings With Subpoenas (WT) 14

War News:

Cheney: Iraq Violence Linked To Election (AP) 17
Cheney: Iraq Violence Tied To U.S. Elections (USAT) 17
Hadley On Visit Asserts U.S. View (WT/AP) 18
U.S. Envoy Arrives In Iraq As Tough Options Loom (NYT) 19
RESISTANCE TO DEADLINES FOR IRAQ IS WEAKENING (LAT) 21
In Baghdad, A Force Under The Militias' Sway (WP) 23
Reprisals Feared After Blast (LAT) 25
Bombs Sweep Baghdad; Cleric Faults US (NYT) 26
At Least 26 Killed By Market Blast In Sadr City (WP) 28
Dozens Killed In Baghdad Blast (MCT) 28
October U.S. Death Toll In Iraq Hits 101 (AP) 30
US Death Toll In Iraq Tops 100 In October (FT) 31
Warner Says Iraqis Need Time To Curb Violence (NVP) 32
IED-resistant Vehicles Speeding To War Zones (USAT) 32
Auditors Want Rules For Iraq Aid (AP) 33
Auditors Say Shift Of Rebuilding To Iraqis Appears 'Broken Down' (WP) 34
The Untracked Guns Of Iraq (NYT) 35
British Civilians Being Moved From Basra (LAT) 36
Don't Worry. Just Back Off. (WP) 36
Pakistani Attack On Al-Qaida Kills 80 (AP) 37
Raid Kills 80 At Pakistani School (WT/AP) 38
Pakistan Ties Site It Attacked To Militants (NYT) 39
Pakistan Attack A Setback To Border Peace (CSM) 41
Pakistan Strike Called Response To U.S. Reports (WP) 42
Pentagon Mounts Public Affairs Ops To Counter Bad News, Exploit "New Media" (AFP) 44
Pentagon Ramping Up Public Relations Efforts (AP) 44
Pentagon Boosts Public Relations Arsenal (AP) 45

Corporate Scandals:

Monster's Founder Quits Board Amid Options Probe (WSJ) .. 46
Monster's Founder Steps Down As Chairman Emeritus (USAT) 47
Ex-CEO Of Monster Worldwide Resigns From Board Over Stock Options Investigation (AP) 48
More Options-tied Cases Likely (AP) 49
Missed Deadlines Raise Possibility Of More Backdated Option Grants (MERCN) 49
SEC's Grip On Hedge Funds Reviewed (DEAL) 50
Targeting Hedge Funds (WSJ) 52
Delphi Settles Charges With SEC (WP) 53
SEC Files Fraud Charges Against Delphi And Former Top Executives (AP) 54
Delphi's Ex-CEO To Fight Fraud Charges (USAT) 55
Nine Ex-Delphi Execs Charged With Fraud (DEN) 56
Michael Pickens Enters Guilty Plea Associated Press (WSJ) 57
Radler Assets Frozen (NYT) 57

Criminal Law:

Prosecutor Argues Issues For Leak Trial (AP) 58

Fla. Prison Guards Stand Trial (AP-Y) 58
Date Set For Death-penalty Trial (HONADV) 59
Lee Man Claims He Was Victim In Pornography Case (BONITAN) 59
Masilotti Charged (PALMBEACHP) 61
Feds Charge Masilotti With Conspiracy, Allege He Made Millions On Secret Land Deals (FLSUNSEN) 61
Former Chief Caillier Sentenced (KATC-TV) 62
Former Chief Gets 10 Months Of House Arrest (OPELDW) ... 62
Former Opelousas Police Chief Sentenced (BRADV) 63
Retrial Sought In Perjury Case (LAT) 64
Newport Beach Man Sentenced In Fraud Case (OCR) 65
Newport Beach Man Gets 8 Years In Investment Scam (KCAL-TV) 65
Many Sex Offenders Restricted Tonight (USAT) 65
Number Of Police Killed, Assaulted Dips (WP/AP) 66
City Fears Crime Report Fallout (SLPD) 67
St. Louis Mayor Disuptes Crime Ranking (BVND) 68
KPD Says "most Dangerous Cities" List Flawed (KNOXNS) .. 68
Candidate For Mayor Disputes Louisville's Ranking Among Top 10 'Safest Cities' (WAVE-TV) 70
2 Michigan Cities Top List Of Most Dangerous In Nation (WLNS-TV) 70
Charlotte Ranked Eighth Most Dangerous Large City (WSOC-TV) 71
In The Most Secure Town, A Most Pleasant Afterglow (NSL) 71

Civil Law:

Supreme Court Case: Are Jury Awards Too High? (CSM) 73
High Court To Hear Tobacco Firm's Appeal (AP) 74
Assessing The Damages (NYT) 75
Appeals Court Upholds Kentucky Law Requiring Tobacco Payments (AP) 76
Tenet Selling Infamous Hospital (MEMBIZ) 77

Civil Rights:

Arrests Made In Smuggling Probe In Ariz. (AP) 77
44 Seized In Migrant Smuggling Syndicate (AZREP) 78
Attention, Voters: Have Your ID Ready In Many States, New Rules On Identification At The Polls Spark Confusion, Controversy By CHRISTOPHER CONKEY (WSJ) 79
Maker Of Voting Machines For U.S. Denies Ties To Chávez, Venezuela (WSJ) 80
Voting Machine Firm Denies Chavez Ties (WP) 81
E-Mail Voting Comes With Risks (WP) 82
Campaign To End Race Preferences Splits Michigan (NYT) 83
Court Upholds Ban On Enforcement Of Abortion Warning Law (FINDLAW/AP) 85
Ban On Abortions Trails In New Poll (WT) 86
Chronic Troubles At Youth Jails Haunt Campaign (WP) 86
Battle For The ACLU (USAT) 88

Antitrust:

U.S. Justice Dept. Probing Sony Unit (AP) 89
High Court Denies Appeal By Chemicals Shipper (WSJ) 90
US Rejects Business Amnesty Test Case (FT) 90
Merck To Buy Sirna For $1.1B In Cash (AP-YBIZ) 91
Merck Purchase Of Sirna Boosts Efforts In Gene-Silencing Field By AVERY JOHNSON (WSJ) 91
Microsoft Urged To Keep Users' Choice (AP-Y) 92
Microsoft Leaves Group Asking BellSouth Limits (BLOOM) .. 92
Schneider Swoops In On US Group (FT) 93
APC Deal Reflects Demand For Data Protection (WSJ) 94
Qualcomm To Be Probed By EU On Royalties, People Say (Update1) (BLOOM) 94
Pay To Obey (NYT) 96

Environment:

2 'People Of Interest' Questioned In Esperanza Fire (LAT) 96
Firefighters Gain On Calif. Wildfire (AP) 98
U.S. Cites Cost Cuts' Role In BP Refinery Blast Safety Board Lays Blame With Top-Level Decisions, Raising Firm's Legal Risks By CHIP CUMMINS (WSJ) 98
BP 'knew Of Safety Problems' At Refineries (FT) 99
Cost-Cutting Led To Blast At BP Plant, Probe Finds (WP) 100

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Ex-FBI Agent Is Sentenced In Plea Agreement (LAT) 101
California Seizes Record Number Of Pot Plants (AP) 102
COP KID'S LOOSE COLLAR (NYPOST) 102
Colombia Has Long Way To Go, But It's On Right Path (SAE) 103
DEA (PTR) 104
The Immoral Majority (NYT) 104
Richmond Graduate Fuels Colorado Pot Movement (WT) .. 105
Riverside County Cannot Join Medical Marijuana Suit (DS) 106
Merriman Is Expected To Drop His Appeal (NYT) 106
Merriman May Drop Suspension Appeal (SDUT) 107
L.T. Goes Bananas; Merriman Uncertain About Drug Test Appeal (AP) 109
Armed Man Shot By Police Has Previous Gun Conviction (PPG) 109
Feds Make Arrest In SLC Library Bombing (SLT) 110

DOJ_NMG_0088852

Immigration:

Government Says Border Arrests Decline (AP) 110
Immigration Arrests Down 8% For Year (WP).....111
Drop In Border Arrests Tied To Enhanced Security (WT) 112

Congress-Administration:

Treasury May Trim Note Offerings Borrowing Estimate Is Cut Amid Lower Deficit, Surge In Corporate-Tax Receipts By CAMPION WALSH And BENTON IVES-HALPERIN (WSJ) 113
IGs' Increasing Influence (FEDTIMES).....114
Fights Brew Over House Posts (WP).....117
If Dems Take Over The House ... (USAT).....118
NASA Invests In Its Future With Venture Capital Firm (WP)...120
Daring Hubble Repair Plan Awaits 'go' (USAT) 121
FEDERAL DIARY: Transition To Pay For Performance Makes Some Anxious (WP).....122
Federal Agencies' Outward Migration Irks Area Officials (WP) 124

Other News:

Incomes Rose Last Month; Spending Was Restrained (NYT)125
Gasoline Prices Inching Up Again (USAT).....126
Economists Sharply Divided On Where Economy Goes From Here (USAT).....127
Core Inflation Measure Eases But Leaves Questions For Fed (WSJ) 128
We Support Simplicity (USAT).....129
Bush: Democrats Lack Plan To Win Iraq War (AFP) 130
America Loses If Democrats Win, President Says (LAT) 131
Bush Rallies G.O.P. Faithful In Georgia And Texas (NYT) ..132
Bush Hits Hard At Gay Marriage (AP).....133
Bush Campaigns In GOP-friendly Georgia (AJC).....134
GOP Staples Restored To Bush Campaigning (WT).....134
Bush Stumps For Sekula-Gibbs In Sugar Land (HC) 135
Bush Says 'America Loses' Under Democrats (WP).....136
Write-in Tightens Race In District 22 (HC).....138
What Would Democrats Do About Iraq? (CSM) 139
Bush Family Members Hit The Campaign Trail (MCT) 141
Controversy Gives Hastert Time At Home (NYT) 142
Republicans See Edge From Early Voting (WSJ).....143
Democrats, Playing Catch-Up, Tap Database To Woo Potential Voters (WSJ).....145
Analysis: GOP Likely To Lose House Seats (AP).....147
The Six-Year Itch By MICHAEL BARONE (WSJ) 148
Heavy Coverage At Midterm Favors Democrats, Study Says (USAT).....149
As Election Nears, A Flood Of Nastiness (CSM) 150
On The Fence On Election Day; Naming 'Worst' Immigration Ads (WSJ).....152
Republicans' Double Negatives (WP) 154
Ad Echoes GOP's 'Southern Strategy' (USAT) 155
Former Republicans Campaign As Democrats (WT) 156
GOP Seeks To Benefit From Gay Marriage Ruling (TSSC) 157
In Ohio, Democrats Show A Religious Side To Voters (NYT)158
Union Heads South To Recapture U.S. Political Clout (Update1) (BLOOM) 159
Talent Tells GOP Faithful To `get Busy' Getting Out The Vote (BVND).....161
New CNN poll shows Webb with slight edge on Allen (AP)...162
Poll Shows Webb Leading Allen For First Time (WT).....163
Black Democrats Cross Party Lines To Back Steele For U.S. Senate (WP).....163
Black Democrats Support Steele (WT).....165
A G.O.P. Leader And Star Struggles For Traction (NYT) 166
Hopscotch In New Jersey Senate Race (NYT) 167
Correction (NYT) 169
Hutchison Works To Keep GOP In Power (DMN).....169
CLINTON: 12 MORE YEARS (NYPOST).....171
Campaign Gone South (WP) 171
Democrats Are Seen To Gain In Statehouse Races (NYT) .174
Nev. Congressman Assault Probe Reopens (AP) 176
A Politician Who Thinks Like A Linebacker (WP).....176
GOVERNOR'S BAN ON STAFF PERKS ISN'T PERFECT (LAT) 179
The Holes In The Border Fence Plan (LAT) 181
Rep. Hunter Aims For White House (LAT).....182
Rep. Hunter Exploring Presidential Run (AP-Y).....183
Rep. Hunter To Explore White House Bid (WP).....184
An Oval Office For Mayor Mike? (WP).....184
Abstinence Message Goes Beyond Teens (USAT).....185
Blue America (WT).....186
The Republican Party: An Incredible Knack For Winning (CSM).....187
Newspaper Circulations Slide More (WSJ).....188
Newspaper Circulation Falls Sharply (NYT) 189
With Tribune On Block, L.A. Times Circulation Down 8% (WP).....190
Cotton-picking Subsidies (LAT).....191
Iran Warns Of Response To Nuke Sanctions (AP) 192
Giving Iran The Bomb (WSJ) 193
U.S.-Led Exercise In Persian Gulf Sets Sights On Deadliest Weapons (NYT) 194

DOJ_NMG_0088853

Bush Opposes Nukes For Allies (AP) 195
More N. Korea Nuke Tests Said Expected (AP) 196
U.S. General Denies Any Plans For Attack (WT) 197
China Cited As N. Korea Supplier (WT) 197
China May Be Using Oil To Press North Korea (NYT) 199
Meeting Held On Stopping Nuke Terrorism (AP) 200
Bolton Faults Syria, Iran On Lebanon (AP) 201
Olmert Says Israel May Widen Military Role In Gaza (NYT) . 202
Mideast Governments Watching U.S. Vote (AP) 203
US Must Press Israel: Saudi Ambassador (AFP) 204
Bush To Meet US Sudan Envoy Tuesday (AFP) 205
Russian, U.S. Military Chiefs Ink Pact (AP) 205
US And Russia Miss Deadline On Trade (FT) 206
Report Puts Turkey's EU Hopes In Jeopardy (FT) 206
Rumsfeld Hosts Turkish Defense Secretary For Wide-ranging Talks (IHT/AP) 207
UK To Ease Issuance Of 'Islamic Bonds' (FT) 207
Pay Now Or Later For Warming, Study Says (LAT) 208
British Alarmed By Global Warming Financial Risks Cited; Gore Named Adviser (AJC) 209
UK Pushes For New Climate Change Treaty (FT) 210
In Britain, All Parties Want To Color The Flag Green (WP) .. 211
Warming Poses A Fiscal Threat (USAT) 212
Warming Called Threat To Global Economy (WP) 213
Emissions Of CO2 Continue To Rise Despite Pledges (WSJ) 214
Scandal Below The Surface (NYT) 214
Two Forces Maintain Siege Of Oaxaca (WP) 215
Protesters Vow To Retake Oaxaca Center (AP) 216
Oaxaca Divided As Police Regain Control Of Plaza (LAT) ... 217
Mexican Protesters Try To Protect Their Rallying Cry (NYT) 219
Crisis As Sri Lanka Talks Go Nowhere (FT) 220
Leaders Struggle To Repair Polish-German Ties (WP) 221
Berlusconi And Former Lawyer To Stand Trial (FT) 222
Berlusconi To Face Corruption Trial (AP) 223
Pinochet Is Placed Under House Arrest (AP) 223
Chile On Trial (LAT) 224
Call For Caution Over By Migrants' Cash (FT) 224
To End Uganda's Nightmare (WP) 225
Victory For Lula (WP) 226

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Suspect And A Setback In Al-Qaeda Anthrax Case (WP)

By Joby Warrick

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

Scientist With Ties To Group Goes Free

In December 2001, as the investigation into the U.S. anthrax attacks was gathering steam, coalition soldiers in Afghanistan uncovered what appeared to be an important clue: a trail of documents chronicling an attempt by al-Qaeda to create its own anthrax weapon.

The documents told of a singular mission by a scientist named Abdur Rauf, an obscure, middle-aged Pakistani with alleged al-Qaeda sympathies and an advanced degree in microbiology.

Using his membership in a prestigious scientific organization to gain access, Rauf traveled through Europe on a quest, officials say, to obtain both anthrax spores and the equipment needed to turn them into highly lethal biological weapons. He reported directly to al-Qaeda's No. 2 commander, Ayman al-Zawahiri, and in one document he appeared to signal a breakthrough.

"I successfully achieved the targets," he wrote cryptically to Zawahiri in a note in 1999.

Precisely what Rauf achieved may never be known with certainty. That's because U.S. officials remain stymied in their nearly five-year quest to bring charges against a man who they say admitted serving as a top consultant to al-Qaeda on anthrax -- a claim that makes him one of a handful of people linked publicly to the group's effort to wage biological warfare against Western targets.

DOJ_NMG_0088854

Rauf, 47, has been under scrutiny in Pakistan since he was detained there for questioning in late 2001, according to U.S. and Pakistani officials who agreed to talk about the case for the first time. But officially he remains free, and Pakistan now says it has no grounds for arrest. Last year, in an acknowledgment of the impasse in its four-year joint investigation with Pakistan, the FBI officially put the case on inactive status.

"We will never close the door, but the chances of getting him into the United States are slim to none," said one U.S. intelligence official, who, like others, agreed to discuss the case on the condition that he not be identified by name.

The documents that first revealed Rauf's role were part of a large stack of papers discovered in a house after coalition forces overran an al-Qaeda base in Kandahar, in southern Afghanistan. He emerges from documents and interviews as one of the most intriguing, and in some ways most troubling, figures in an international investigation into al-Qaeda's biological weapons program.

With the evidence against Rauf, some U.S. officials say they are perplexed about why Pakistani authorities have refused to further pursue him, while acknowledging that the case presents both legal and political difficulties for Pakistan.

To terrorism experts, Rauf is a symbol of a dangerous convergence: a marriage of militancy and technical expertise that could someday yield new kinds of highly lethal weapons to be used against civilians.

"He was someone who at least understood the professional procedures and methods," said Milton Leitenberg, an expert on biological weapons with the University of Maryland's Center for International and Security Studies who reviewed the seized documents. "In theory, if he went in the laboratory and tried and tried, maybe he could have gotten it right."

Exactly how far al-Qaeda progressed with Rauf's help is not publicly known. No one has turned up any links between his work and the U.S. anthrax attacks, in which spores were mailed in letters to news organizations and U.S. Senate offices. Coalition forces discovered rudimentary laboratories in Kandahar but no evidence of bioweapons production. Yet both the White House and a presidential commission have hinted at additional findings suggesting that the terrorists were much further along than was first thought.

Last year's presidential commission on intelligence failures, led by retired judge Laurence H. Silberman and former senator Charles S. Robb (D-Va.), described al-Qaeda's biological program as "extensive" and "well-organized," particularly with regard to "Agent X," a pathogen that terrorism experts say was almost certainly anthrax.

"Al-Qaeda had acquired several biological agents possibly as early as 1999, and the necessary equipment to enable limited, basic production of Agent X," the commission said.

U.S. officials are even more reticent in discussing possible links between al-Qaeda's anthrax program and the 2001 U.S. attacks, which killed five people and briefly shut down the U.S. Capitol. Privately, FBI officials doubt that such a link exists. They note that the attacks came with an explicit warning -- a letter advising the victims to take penicillin, resulting in a far lower death toll -- but without an explicit claim of responsibility. "It doesn't fit with al-Qaeda's modus operandi," one intelligence official said.

Yet U.S. officials have been unable to rule out al-Qaeda or any other group as a suspect. Earlier this month, FBI officials acknowledged that the ultra-fine powder mailed five years ago was simply made and could have been produced by a well-trained microbiologist anywhere in the world.

Several leading bioterrorism experts still contend that the evidence points to al-Qaeda or possibly an allied group that coordinated its attack with the Sept. 11, 2001, strikes on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. These experts point to hijacker Mohamed Atta's inquiries into renting a crop-duster aircraft and to an unexplained emergency-room visit by another hijacker, Ahmed Ibrahim A. Al Haznawi, for treatment of an unusual skin lesion that resembled cutaneous anthrax.

Whether or not al-Qaeda was involved, U.S. officials and bioterrorism experts agree on this: The alliance between the terrorist group and a little-known Pakistani scientist could have yielded disastrous results in time.The Quest for Anthrax

For all his expertise, Rauf was hardly the ideal candidate for helping al-Qaeda realize its ambition of making biological weapons.

The tall, thin and bespectacled scientist held a doctorate in microbiology but specialized in food production, according to U.S. officials familiar with the case. He had to learn about anthrax and other bioterrorism agents as he went along, slowing his progress considerably.

DOJ_NMG_0088855

"He could potentially do a great deal of harm because of his knowledge and skills," said one U.S. intelligence expert connected with the case. "On the other hand, he lacked the specific knowledge and training al-Qaeda needed most."

Exactly how he became acquainted with Zawahiri remains unclear. Rauf worked at the prestigious Pakistan Council of Scientific and Industrial Research in his home town of Lahore, and officials speculate that he may have crossed paths professionally with Zawahiri, a physician.

In any case, captured documents suggest a close collaboration between the two men as they sought equipment for a bioweapons lab.

"I hope my letter will find you in the best of health and circumstances by the God Almighty," Rauf writes to Zawahiri in one of three intercepted notes.

The heavily redacted notes and other documents were obtained from the Defense Department through the Freedom of Information Act after they were first described in the journal Science in a 2003 article by three researchers at the National Defense University. Rauf's name was redacted, but U.S. and Pakistani officials confirmed his authorship in interviews with The Washington Post. Rauf's name was first publicly associated with the documents by Ross Getman, a New York lawyer who maintains a Web site devoted to the 2001 anthrax attacks.

Rauf was a member of the Society for Applied Microbiology, an international professional organization based in Britain, and he appears to have used his membership to make contacts and arrange visits related to his quest. One note from Rauf was handwritten on the group's stationery, apparently while he was attending a 1999 scientific conference at Porton Down, Britain's premier biodefense research center in the southern city of Wiltshire.

Rauf, who writes to Zawahiri in occasionally faltering English, admits in one note to several setbacks. For starters, he had found a supplier who could sell him Bacillus anthracis -- the bacterium that causes anthrax -- but it was a harmless strain incapable of killing anyone.

"Unfortunately, I did not find the required culture of B. anthrax -- i.e., pathogenic," he writes to Zawahiri. He then describes a new attempt to acquire a lethal strain from a different lab.

In a later note he is more upbeat, telling his patron he had "successfully achieved the targets" and had "tried to solve technical problems of our work." He ticked off a list of items he had acquired or arranged to purchase, including respirators, a fermenter used for growing bacteria and vaccines to protect lab workers against accidental exposure.

Rauf also describes an unusual visit -- apparently as the guest of another scientist -- to a high-containment biological lab where dangerous pathogens such as anthrax are kept.

"I visited along with [the host] all the units . . . including the special confidential room in which thousands of cultures are placed," the note reads.

Another handwritten note includes a crude diagram of a biological lab, identifying how space should be allocated for major tasks such as animal testing and growing bacteria.

A recurring theme in the notes is money, or Rauf's apparent lack of it. He complains in one note that his salary was cut while he was on leave from his job for postdoctoral research. "This is highly objectionable, unaffordable and unpracticable with me," he writes.

Rauf's money demands may have led to a falling-out with Zawahiri, who appears to have decided to explore other options for obtaining bacteria and lab equipment, said Rohan Gunaratna, an al-Qaeda expert with the Institute of Defense and Strategic Studies in Singapore.

Gunaratna said al-Qaeda leaders also collaborated with Yazid Sufaat, a member of an allied Southeast Asian group called Jemaah Islamiyah, in purchasing equipment for the Kandahar lab. Sufaat, who once studied chemistry at California State University at Sacramento, has been in custody since late 2001.

"Rauf was financially driven, and al-Qaeda didn't entirely trust him," Gunaratna said.Investigation Breaks Down

Rauf's detention kicked off a joint U.S.-Pakistani investigation that at first was remarkably successful.

"There was great cooperation at the start," said one U.S. intelligence official who closely followed the case.

The FBI's New York office took the lead U.S. role, and its agents worked closely with the CIA and bureau officials in Pakistan in carrying out interrogations. Though not formally charged with any crimes, Rauf consented to questioning and provided useful leads, U.S. and Pakistani officials said. But problems began when the U.S. side sought to expand the investigation with the goal of pursuing criminal charges, including possible indictment and prosecution in the United States, officials from both countries confirmed.

DOJ_NMG_0088856

In earlier cases, the Pakistani government incurred the wrath of Islamic leaders when it sought to prosecute professionals for alleged ties to al-Qaeda.

In 2003, the Pakistanis shut off U.S. access to Rauf. According to Pakistani officials familiar with the case, there simply was not enough evidence showing that he succeeded in providing al-Qaeda with something useful.

Since then, Rauf has been allowed to resume his normal life. Whether he has returned to his former workplace is unclear; officials at the research council declined to respond to requests for information about the scientist. Attempts to contact Rauf in Lahore were unsuccessful.

"He was detained for questioning, and later the courts determined there was not sufficient evidence to continue detaining him," said Tariq Azim Khan, Pakistan's information minister. "If there was evidence that proved his role beyond a shadow of a doubt, we would have acted on it. But that kind of evidence was not available."

Special correspondent Kamran Khan in Karachi, Pakistan, contributed to this report.

The Terror Suspect Who May Go Free (TIME)

By Bruce Crumley

Time, October 31, 2006

On the face of it, Abu Doha would appear to be the sort of case for which the U.S. offshore detention system was created. The 40-year-old Algerian militant is alleged by counter-terror officials to be a Qaeda-aligned terror kingpin and suspected of involvement in a number of plots around the world, including the "Millennium Bomb" plot aimed at Los Angeles International airport in 2000. Yet, as things stand, Abu Doha looks set to be freed from prison in Britain and deported on immigration violations, after the U.S dropped its bid to extradite him over the LAX plot.

The prospect of his going free troubles security officials on both sides of the Atlantic, and leaves some bewildered by Washington's decision to drop its case against him. British authorities say they don't have sufficient evidence to try Doha, and plan instead to deport him to his native Algeria. What happens then? "Either Doha is left free to do as he pleases, and probably one day vanish to resume his plotting work," says a French counter-terror official. "Or the Algerians cite some pretext for arresting and jailing him, and ensure he's not a threat to anyone."

Doha (a.k.a. "The Doctor," Rachid, Amar Makhlolif, and Didier Ajuelo) was arrested in February 2001 while trying to travel from London to Saudi Arabia on a fake passport. Six months later, the U.S. filed an extradition request after a Federal grand jury indicted Doha as a co-conspirator in the LAX plot, based on evidence and an affidavit signed by would-be bomber Ahmed Ressam that Doha had overseen the attempted attack. "[Doha] actually moved Ressam from Afghanistan back to Canada" to plan and execute the Millennium bombing, explains a senior U.S. intelligence official. But after initially sharing his knowledge of terror networks, Ressam ceased cooperating with prosecutors sometime in 2003 — and even after two years of coaxing and cajoling, claims to have "forgotten" the information he'd earlier provided.

In August, 2005 — shortly after Ressam was sentenced to 22 years in prison — U.S. officials withdrew the Doha indictment, explaining that "Ressam's testimony would have been an essential part in the Government's evidence at trial against Abu Doha."

Even though Ressam refused to testify in court, the fact that he had spilled the beans on Doha and evidence pointing to Doha's role as a Qaeda recruiter raises questions over the U.S. decision to drop the extradition request — particularly if the consequence of doing so is that Doha will go free. With no terror related charges pending, Doha faces an immigration hearing in early 2007 that may end with his deportation from Britain. In Washington, officials at the U.S. Departments of State and Justice, as well at the CIA, refused to comment on Doha's case. (Each referred TIME to the other departments for an answer as to how the U.S. could lose its purchase on such a major alleged terror suspect.) Says one European security official with long involvement in the investigation of Doha's activities, "There is something strange about this case."

U.S. officials are certainly aware of the danger of Doha being turned loose. "There's concern about what he'll do," says the U.S. intelligence official. "After he's released, he'll probably return to his old friends. Anybody who's been engaged in a potential plot against us — and who we believe will return to being engaged with the same group that he was beforehand — would cause some problems."

DOJ_NMG_0088857

French and U.S. officials concur on a picture of Doha's activities during the 1990s that included serving as al Qaeda's coordinator for Europe, and recruiting scores, perhaps hundreds, of young Muslims into clandestine network, sending many for training in Afghanistan at a specially designated camp,

Although France, Italy and Germany had evidence tying Doha to specific plots, they refrained from making their own extradition requests once the U.S. had signaled its intention to put Doha on trial. But now that the U.S. case has been dropped, it's too late for the Europeans to step in, because the cases in which they would have charged Doha have already been tried, and can't legally be reopened without new evidence against him.

The French are incredulous at the prospect of Doha going free. "How can you have Abu Zubaydah, Khaled Sheikh Mohammed, and who knows how many low-level fighters in secret camps and let someone of Abu Doha's stature free by deporting him?" the French counter-terrorism official asks. "It's incomprehensible that someone with his profile will be deported to freedom and allowed to resume his activities."

So incomprehensible, in fact, that some suspect it won't be that simple. In light of Algeria's traditionally ruthless treatment of Islamist militants, Amnesty International warns that Britain may be sending him home to face abuses. "If Abu Doha is deported as planned, he faces grave danger of detention and torture in Algeria," says an Amnesty spokesman in London, who says at least 12 specific cases of alleged secret detention and torture in Algeria have been reported to his group since 2002. In August, a British court ruling struck down challenges to such deportations on human rights grounds, citing Algeria's recently-applied Charter For Peace and Reconciliation — which offers pardons to security force members and surrendered radicals responsible for violent crimes — as a guarantee of fair treatment for deportees. Amnesty mocks that decision and its application in the Doha case, given British officials' own description of Doha as an active security threat rather than the repentant jihadist that Algiers might pardon.

Doha's attorneys are fighting his deportation, but did not respond to multiple requests to comment on the allegations made against their client by counter-terror officials. British Home Office officials would not comment beyond confirming that Doha's deportation case is based on an "immigration violation." Amnesty International fears a darker agenda. "The government claims Abu Doha is a security threat, yet can't convict him of anything here — so they send this dangerous man to what one might presume would be freedom in Algeria," the Amnesty spokesman says. "It's very difficult not to wonder if this is being done with the prior knowledge that Algeria will be interning and perhaps interrogating Abu Doha on behalf of the U.S. or U.K."

Padilla: Dismiss Charges (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, October 31, 2006

Jose Padilla, the former enemy combatant now accused of joining a suspected South Florida terror cell, says a federal judge should throw out an indictment against him because he was ``tortured by the United States government without cause or justification."

Padilla -- a U.S. citizen who called Fort Lauderdale home during the 1990s -- claims he was so mistreated in military detention by interrogators that prosecutors should be barred from trying him on terrorism charges in Miami federal court.

On Monday, the U.S. attorney's office was given until Nov. 13 by the presiding judge to respond to Padilla's allegations.

Padilla claims he was isolated in a tiny cell around the clock, deprived of sleep on a steel bunk with no mattress, shackled and manacled for hours on end, and threatened with being cut with a knife and having alcohol poured on the wounds. He also claims he was given drugs against his will -- believed to be LSD or PCP -- ``to act as a sort of truth serum during his interrogations."

Padilla's allegations in court papers mark the first time he has given his account of his detention in a U.S. Navy brig in South Carolina from June 2002 until December 2005. Padilla, 36, had been in the Middle East allegedly training with the al Qaeda terrorist group before his arrest by the FBI in the United States on May 8, 2002.

NO EVIDENCE CITED

DOJ_NMG_0088858

Padilla provides no evidence to support the allegations contained in a federal court motion filed this month, though his legal team has gathered details of his military detention. He was transferred to the Federal Detention Center in downtown Miami in January.

President Bush dropped Padilla's designation as an enemy combatant almost a year ago after administration officials accused him of plotting to detonate a radiological "dirty bomb" on U.S. soil. No formal charges were filed. Padilla's bid to challenge his military detention was not taken up by the U.S. Supreme Court.

Now that Padilla is in federal custody, he is trying to prove to U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke that the government's conduct during his military detention was so "outrageous" that his constitutional rights were violated. That should be grounds for dismissing the Miami indictment against him, he argues.

The indictment alleges that he and two other Muslim men were part of a North American terror cell that conspired to provide material support -- money, recruits and other resources -- for terrorist activities abroad.

Padilla's attorneys -- Michael Caruso, Anthony Natale, Orlando do Campo and Anthony Patel -- concede that his bid for freedom is a formidable challenge.

APPEAL POSSIBLE

The government's prosecution of Padilla and his two co-defendants has not gone as smoothly as first envisioned by Bush administration officials. The trial, set for Jan. 22, might be delayed while Miami prosecutors appeal Cooke's dismissal of the first count in the indictment, which alleged that Padilla and two others ``conspired to murder, kidnap and maim persons in a foreign country . . . to advance violent jihad."

Cooke's ruling -- if it stands -- effectively eliminates the possibility of life sentences for the three defendants. If Padilla, Adham Amin Hassoun and Kifah Wael Jayyousi are convicted on the remaining terror charges, they could face up to a maximum 15 years in prison.

Hassoun, the alleged ringleader, got to know Padilla at Fort Lauderdale-area mosques during the 1990s and is accused of recruiting him for jihad overseas.

NYC Terror Trial Likely In Spring For Musician, Doctor, 2 Others (AP)

By Larry Neumeister

AP, October 31, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) — A judge on Monday refused to toss out charges against a musician, a doctor and two other men accused of supporting terrorists, even though defense lawyers argued they had been unfairly targeted for prosecution.

U.S. District Judge Loretta A. Preska rejected claims that the men were snared through entrapment and outrageous conduct by an overzealous government beginning in late 2001.

She said evidence in the case could be viewed as showing the men had made statements and taken actions making them "predisposed to commit these crimes" even before the government sent a confidential informant to record their conversations and gather evidence.

The judge said a trial will begin in April or June for Dr. Rafiq Abdus Sabir, of Boca Raton, Fla., jazz musician and martial arts expert Tarik Shah, of New York, bookstore owner Abdulrahman Farhane, of Brooklyn, and Washington, D.C., cab driver Mahmud Faruq Brent, of Gwynn Oak, Md.

An indictment in the case accuses Farhane and Shah of conspiring in 2001 to help an FBI cooperating witness send money to aid Islamic militants fighting Americans in Afghanistan.

Brent was accused of conspiring to help Lashkar-e-Taiba, which the United States designated a terrorist organization in December 2001. Prosecutors said Sabir, who was educated in the Ivy League, agreed to treat holy warriors, or jihadists, in Saudi Arabia.

All the defendants have pleaded not guilty and are being held without bail. Prosecutors, who had no comment on the judge's ruling Monday, have said evidence in the case includes information taken from the computers of the defendants, firearms, videotapes and taped conversations.

DOJ_NMG_0088859

Sabir's lawyer, Edward Wilford, said the doctor only promised to provide medical treatment and there was no difference between what he wanted to do and what volunteers for Doctors Without Borders or the American Red Cross do.

"He's willing to provide medicine; that's what a doctor does," said Wilford, who also filed a motion to dismiss the charges against his client based on that argument.

The judge said she would rule later on that motion.

Families for the defendants attended the morning-long proceeding and brought along some of their small children, who made enough noise in the courtroom to attract smiles and laughter from the defendants, who sat handcuffed in the jury box.

As the defendants entered and left the courtroom, they waved, smiled and called out to friends and family members, who did the same.

Doctor's Alleged Pledge Is Crux Of Terror Case (NYS)

By Joseph Goldstein

New York Sun, October 31, 2006

Rafiq Sabir, a Columbia University-trained doctor, has been kept in solitary confinement since he was arrested last year on charges that he swore fealty to Osama bin Laden in the presence of an undercover FBI agent.

Yesterday, in U.S. District Court in Manhattan, attorneys debated whether the unusual pledge Dr. Sabir allegedly made — an offer to treat wounded jihadists in Saudi Arabia — constituted a crime. The argument covered topics ranging from the Hippocratic Oath to the statute on material support of terrorism.

Dr. Sabir, of Boca Raton, Fla., is one of four men charged in a wide-ranging conspiracy to aid Al Qaeda and send money to jihadists in Afghanistan and Chechnya. The case is scheduled for trial sometime next year.

Dr. Sabir's attorney, Edward Wilford, told the judge, Loretta Preska, that the defendant should not be prosecuted over the alleged pledge because a doctor has a right to help patients recover.

"It's not as though he's setting up a laboratory somewhere trying to find a way to make jihadists stronger," Mr. Wilford said. "Does it make sense to have a statute that stops doctors from treating people?"

Judge Preska said a ruling on whether to dismiss the charges against Dr. Sabir would come later. She expressed skepticism at Mr. Wilford's criticism of the law.

Whether the law makes sense "is a policy question" better left to Congress, Judge Preska said.

Judge Preska also did not seem swayed when Mr. Wilford pointed out that the material support of terrorism statute contains a specific exemption for providing medicine. Judge Preska seemed to interpret the exemption as pertaining only to pills and drugs, not medical care.

"It says medicine," Judge Preska said. "It doesn't say medical support or personnel."

The prosecutor in the case, Karl Metzner, said Dr. Sabir's pledge to aid wounded Al Qaeda operatives "was a completely different scenario" than the example of a doctor on call who treated a wounded jihadist who came to him looking for medical attention.

Sens. Look For Supermax Fix (DENP)

By Erin Emery, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, October 31, 2006

The funding for the prison housing terrorists and other notorious criminals is the focus of Allard and Salazar.

Florence - Colorado's two U.S. senators have vowed to seek solutions to understaffing and security concerns at Supermax, home to the nation's most dangerous criminals.

Sen. Wayne Allard visited the prison Monday, and Sen. Ken Salazar visited Saturday. Both agree that increases in staffing and security measures are needed at the prison, which holds such notorious criminals as al-Qaeda member Zacarias Moussaoui and Oklahoma bombing conspirator Terry Nichols.

Salazar said he plans to talk this week to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, and Allard said he will talk to Bureau of Prisons Director Harley Lappin on Nov. 13 about the need for more funding for security upgrades.

"The key issues are No. 1 staffing and whether or not the staffing levels are as high as necessary in order to ensure the public safety as well as the security of the guards working in the prison," Salazar said.

Salazar said the federal government should also look at technology upgrades and building a perimeter fence to deter people from approaching the prison from the outside, which he said was a bigger threat than escape.

Earlier this month, the Department of Justice's inspector general reported that the federal prison system does not read all the mail or effectively monitor phone calls of prisoners.

Allard said the notorious criminals and terrorists housed at Supermax who are in isolation are not communicating with outsiders. The inspector general report addresses those criminals who have certain privileges, and not all of their communications are monitored, he said.

Also this month, a federal arbitrator found that job hazards at Supermax had increased because of low staffing. Joseph Lazar ordered the Federal Bureau of Prisons to boost safety for correctional officers at the prison.

Lazar found that assaults and threats by inmates increased after the Bureau of Prisons implemented a "mission-critical roster" - the lowest level of staffing needed to run a safe and secure institution - in March 2005. Since then, the number of correctional officers has dropped by about 12 percent.

"They've actually been going below those staffing levels," said Mike Schnobrich, a union official. "What the correctional officers in (Supermax) and across the Bureau of Prisons are saying is that right now, something in the system is broke. It's not been run as safe as it can be."

In a meeting Monday between Fremont County and Florence leaders, officials expressed concerns about radio incompatibility between the region's first responders and between Bureau of Prisons officers. They also raised concerns about transporting prisoners who land at the Fremont County Jail and the well-being of officers who work in the prison and have families in the community.

Fremont County Sheriff James Beicker expressed frustration that the process to receive money from the Department of Homeland Security had been mired in bureaucracy.

State Rep. Buffie McFadyen, whose district includes Supermax, said: "I'm hoping by educating our own Colorado delegation to the job at Supermax that they in turn will educate others around the country as to why this facility deserves funding and why the mission of this facility is no less important to the homeland security to this country than the Department of Defense."

Erin Emery can be reached at 719-522-1360 or eemery@denverpost.com.

Federal Fire Grants Shown To Vary Widely (AP)

By Ben Evans

AP, October 30, 2006

Georgia has twice the population of neighboring Alabama, yet Alabama agencies received more than double the amount of federal firefighting grants last year for trucks, gear and uniforms.

The disparity was not an aberration. Alabama has been among the top grant winners in the Homeland Security Department's program for several years — apparently because it does a good job asking for the money.

Statistics for the Assistance to Firefighters Grant program — the nation's largest firefighting grant initiative — show that states get widely varying shares of a $600 million federal pool. States that submit applications in large numbers, rather than those with the largest populations or highest risk factors, have more success in winning federal dollars.

For example, Alabama departments were awarded $21.7 million in grants in 2005, or $4.76 per person, in a state with a population of about 4.5 million.

Georgia, with about 9 million people, received $10.4 million, or $1.15 per person. Alabama departments submitted 677 applications, while Georgia submitted 342.

"All we do is work to be as aggressive as we can," said Alabama's director of homeland security, Jim Walker. "It's really a matter of reading the guidelines and ... getting the word out."

DOJ_NMG_0088861

Pennsylvania has topped the list in recent years. Submitting 1,939 applications in 2005, the state's local departments won $41.3 million in grants, or about $3.32 per person. Agencies in California, which sent 524 applications, got $26.3 million, or about 73 cents per person.

Nevada submitted just 44 applications and got $2.1 million, or about 88 cents per person, while Montana submitted 224 applications and received $6.8 million, or $7.25 per person.

Homeland Security officials emphasize that while other federal grants are focused on potential terrorist attacks in large urban areas, the firefighting grants — as designed by Congress — were established before the Sept. 11 attacks and are aimed at building basic capabilities at local departments. The applications are scored by industry peers and grants are awarded largely based on those reviews, the officials said.

"A lot of this comes back to the fact that some states have taken a very active role," said George Foresman, undersecretary for preparedness at Homeland Security, noting that Pennsylvania is known for its vast, tight-knit network of small departments. "It just differs from state to state."

The geographical discrepancies, however, are evidence of the debate about whether Homeland Security dollars should be spent on what traditionally has been a local responsibility, said Paul Light, a New York University professor of public service who focuses on organizational performance.

The Bush administration, which has sought to cut the program's budget, and other critics say the money should be targeted toward higher-risk areas.

Firefighting professionals say the money is critical for building a nationwide emergency network, noting for example that thousands of firefighters poured into Louisiana after Hurricane Katrina.

They also point out that demand for the grants overall has far exceeded available funding. The Homeland Security Department typically gets some 20,000 applications a year and rejects two-thirds of them.

Rich Duffy, assistant to the general president at the International Association of Fire Fighters union, said the grant application process is relatively easy and some departments are simply more attuned to the program.

"We've done our best to alert our members to the availability of funds," Duffy said. "It's not just the fire departments, though. It's the cities. You're dealing with a bureaucracy on a city level as well that probably just doesn't understand it."

First authorized in 2000, the program lets local departments apply for money to be used on clothing, tools, training equipment, vehicles and other needs. Most grants are less than $300,000, although cities can get as much as $2 million.

Larger departments, in cities with populations of 50,000 or more, are required to provide a 20 percent funding match, compared with just 5 percent for smaller agencies.

___

On the Net:

Grant program: http://www.firegrantsupport.com/afg

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Student Searched Over Fake Boarding Pass (HC/AP)

By Ryan Lenz, Associated Press Writer

Houston Chronicle, October 31, 2006

— FBI agents searched the home of an Indiana University computer security student over the weekend after learning his Web page included a feature to print fake Northwest Airlines Corp. boarding passes, officials said Monday.

Wendy Osborne, a spokeswoman for the FBI's Indianapolis office, said agents on Saturday searched the apartment of Christopher Soghoian, a 24-year-old doctoral student, in Bloomington, Ind. Osborne would not discuss what, if anything, was uncovered or taken as evidence.

"Obviously we have a concern for passenger safety and security," she said.

Soghoian, who has not been charged or detained, declined to comment on the FBI investigation when reached by The Associated Press by e-mail Monday, but referred to his Web journal for information on the case.

DOJ_NMG_0088862

Soghoian said last week that the boarding pass generator he created was intended to illustrate flaws in airport security. The passenger name on the fake boarding pass was "Bin Laden/Osama," though users were able to input a different name, he said.

According to Soghoian, no one could use the fake pass to actually board a flight _ so long as the airline's computers were working _ because the bar code would not match other information on the pass.

On his Web journal "slight paranoia," Soghoian posted the FBI's sealed search warrant, dated Oct. 28, and said the FBI had "ransacked" his home and taken his computers.

"I didn't sleep at home last night. It's fair to say I was rather shaken up," Soghoian wrote Saturday after an FBI visit. "I came back today, to find the glass on the front door smashed."

In recent posts, Soghoian asked for lawyers to contact him, and established a legal defense fund through PayPal, which manages Web-based money transfers.

Soghoian said he built his Web site to mimic Northwest Airlines boarding passes because he had one handy after flying the Minneapolis-based carrier on a recent flight.

DIY Boarding Pass Site Gets Shut Down (CNET)

By Joris Evers, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News.com, October 31, 2006

Student in FBI probe says he created Web site to underscore security problems with print-at-home airline boarding passes.

A Web site that let anyone with an Internet connection and a printer create fake airline boarding passes has been shut down after federal agents visited the creator.

FBI agents raided Christopher Soghoian's home over the weekend, seizing computers and other equipment, Soghoian wrote on his blog. They first visited him Friday afternoon with a request to take the site down, but when he got online, he found that the site had already been removed, he wrote.

Soghoian, reached via e-mail on Monday, declined to comment for this story, citing advice from his lawyers to lie low.

Wendy Osborne, a spokeswoman for the FBI's Indianapolis office, confirmed that agents had searched Soghoian's home as part of a joint investigation with the Transportation Security Administration. "We will conduct a thorough and complete investigation," Osborne said. "We are certainly concerned with any potential breach in security, particularly at the airports."

Soghoian, a computer security student at Indiana University Bloomington built the Web site to underscore an airport security weakness, he wrote. The site was spotlighted late last week after Wired News and ABC News reported on it. U.S. Rep. Edward Markey, a Massachusetts Democrat, called for Soghoian's arrest, but then backed off on Sunday.

The FBI will present the findings of its investigation to the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Indiana, which will determine whether Soghoian violated any federal laws, she said. At this point, the student has not been charged and he has not been arrested, Osborne said.

Soghoian's "Northwest Airlines Boarding Pass Generator" let people create boarding passes that look virtually identical to the ones printed from the Northwest Airlines Web site. They could be used to get past airport security, but not to get on an airplane, because the airline would have no record of the reservation, Soghoian said.

"I have not flown, or even attempted to enter the airport with one of these fake boarding passes," Soghoian wrote Friday. "I haven't even printed one out. All I have done is create PHP script, which highlights a security hole made public by others before me."

The Web site went online last Wednesday and immediately attracted attention. Bruce Schneier, a noted security expert, linked to it from his blog on Thursday. Schneier highlighted the same issue with the print-at-home boarding passes on his mailing list more than three years ago. U.S. Sen. Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat, warned of the same security issue last year and again in April this year.

Flight To Ft. Lauderdale Diverted Due To Disruptive Passenger (BRAH)

The Bradenton Herald, October 31, 2006

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. - JetBlue flight from Boston to Fort Lauderdale was diverted to Orlando after a passenger became disruptive, authorities said.

DOJ_NMG_0088863

David Collyer, 30, was taken off flight 457 and into FBI custody Sunday after a "possible altercation with flight crew," FBI spokesman Kevin Farrington said.

Collyer, of Sharon, Mass., had to "be physically restrained by flight crew and passengers" a JetBlue employee told an officer who arrived on scene, according to an Orlando Police Department report. Neither Collyer nor the 156 passengers and 6 crew members were injured. Details of the incident were not being released pending an investigation, Farrington said.

Collyer, who was charged with flight interference, appeared in court Monday, he said. He was released on $10,000 unsecured bond, according to the South Florida Sun-Sentinel.

A telephone call placed to his public defender was not immediately returned Monday.

The Airbus A320 departed Boston Logan International Airport at 5:08 p.m. and was scheduled to land at Fort Lauderdale International Airport at 7:35 p.m. Flight crew members decided to take a precautionary measure and land at Orlando International Airport where Collyer was taken into custody for questioning, said Sebastian White, a spokesman for JetBlue.

"We don't have details of exactly what was happening, but our flight crew take whatever precautionary measures were necessary," White said.

After a two-hour delay, the flight continued to Fort Lauderdale without the passenger. It landed in Fort Lauderdale at 11:05 p.m.

Unruly JetBlue Passenger Apologizes To Magistrate (ORS)

By Pedro Ruz Gutierrez, Sentinel Staff Writer

The Orlando Sentinel, October 31, 2006

A passenger who was arrested Sunday night after authorities say he became disruptive on a Boston-Fort Lauderdale JetBlue flight was released after appearing before a magistrate in Orlando's federal court.

Magistrate James Glazebrook ordered David Collyer released from custody on a $10,000 unsecured bond. The incident aboard Flight 457 forced the crew to make an unscheduled landing at Orlando International Airport. Collyer said he was "sorry" and then had no more comment as he left the federal building in downtown Orlando this afternoon.

An FBI agent arrested Collyer after an "altercation with flight crew," FBI spokesman Kevin Farrington said. No one was injured.

The Airbus A320 departed Boston Logan International Airport at 5:08 p.m. and was scheduled to land at Fort Lauderdale International Airport at 7:35 p.m. Flight crew members decided to take a precautionary measure and land at OIA.

After a two-hour delay, the flight continued to Fort Lauderdale without the passenger. It landed in Fort Lauderdale at 11:05 p.m.

Democrats Wait In The Wings With Subpoenas (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, October 31, 2006

Both political parties say America's safety requires the next Congress to improve mass-transit security and intelligence efforts, but Democrats think it must immediately address fraud and waste at the Department of Homeland Security.

Democrats vow to flex their subpoena and investigative muscles if elected to lead Congress next month and will take on President Bush's use of wiretaps.

"We have not had significant issues addressed from an oversight standpoint -- we've not issued one subpoena," said Rep. Bennie Thompson, the Mississippi Democrat who as ranking member of the House Homeland Security Department is in line to lead the panel.

"Leadership, in agreement with the chairman, just decided that it [investigations] was not a priority," Mr. Thompson said. "That will not be a problem with the new Congress."

Democrats have an outside chance of taking complete control of Congress, but a better chance of winning one chamber, and in this series, The Washington Times will look at how such a transfer of power will affect U.S. policy and politics.

DOJ_NMG_0088864

Both of the Democratic Capitol Hill leaders, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California, have said Mr. Bush is threatening civil liberties in the name of war and pledged to force the administration to obtain court orders before issuing wiretaps of terror suspects.

Democrats say that Mr. Bush's wiretaps without court orders violate the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) -- created in 1978 to ensure court oversight -- and that they will legislate allowances to obtain the subpoenas in a speedy manner.

"We will pass tough and smart legislation to deal with this important legislation," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Mr. Reid.

Probing deeper

Mr. Bush had fought to conduct the war on terror on his own terms but recently sought congressional authority for the most contentious programs, including the National Security Agency's (NSA) wiretapping without court orders.

The House passed a bill allowing the NSA to listen to phone calls between the United States and overseas, but the Senate did not pass legislation before adjourning for the elections.

Mr. Bush uses the issue on the campaign trail, holding up House Democrats' votes against the program as a reason they should not be trusted with control of Congress.

"The American people must fully understand that the vast majority of Democrats opposed the right of this administration to have a tool necessary to protect you," he said while campaigning last week. "We just have a different view. They must not think we're at war."

Democrats say Republicans have been negligent in overseeing various departments and programs related to the nation's security. They say investigations would lead to subpoenas and oversight hearings of waste, fraud and abuse within emergency, immigration and transportation safety agencies.

Mr. Manley said there is a need for increased oversight "because there has been none for the last six years, especially in homeland security."

"Mr. Reid is a strong supporter of the need for proper and adequate oversight and feels this Congress has utterly failed on oversight of the administration's programs, and that's one thing he intends to push for," Mr. Manley said.

Brian Darling, a former Senate staffer and director of Senate relations for the Heritage Foundation, says the Bush administration should prepare for an onslaught of subpoenas from the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee.

"It will be two years of investigations, just short of impeachment hearings," Mr. Darling said. "You will see two years of subpoenas to investigate Bush."

Mrs. Pelosi has promised multiple investigations but has said "impeachment is off the table."

"It is a waste of time," Mrs. Pelosi said. "Making them lame ducks is good enough for me."

Besides wasting money, Democrats say Republicans have consistently failed to properly fund port and mass-transit security, improperly distributed first-responder money without regard to a jurisdiction's threat level and failed to implement recommendations from the September 11 commission.

Actions, not words

Republican staffers say a Democrat-led Congress would devolve into a constant fight over increasing spending levels for security -- and possibly over the structure of the Republican-created DHS.

One staffer for the House Homeland Security Committee called the agenda "Pelosi talking points" and says Congress has implemented 39 of 41 of the September 11 commission's recommendations.

"Democrats have stood in the way of several of the most important reforms, and just last month, 162 House Democrats voted against the terrorist tribunals bill, another key recommendation of the commission," the staffer said, including in the count an independent legislator who caucuses with the Democrats.

"They're just trying to talk tough on homeland security. Facts tell a different story."

Republicans point out that they not only created a department to protect the homeland, but also pushed through legislation to ramp up border security, port security and the tracking of terrorist finances.

DOJ_NMG_0088865

Republicans note that every Democrat voted against making the House Homeland Security Committee a permanent panel, and that, if in control, Republicans would continue to prepare the U.S. for another attack and work to identify vulnerabilities and threats against critical infrastructure.

"Since September 11, 2001, Republicans in Congress have worked hard to strengthen our national security and have several accomplishments to show for it," said Rep. Peter T. King, New York Republican and House Homeland Security Committee chairman.

"These accomplishments include: stronger port security, improved chemical plant security, reforms to FEMA, over $30 billion in federal funding and enhanced interoperable communication systems for first responders, and sound border security reforms."

Mr. Bush rejected the two remaining September 11 commission recommendations to declassify the top-line intelligence budget and give to the Defense Department lead responsibility for directing and executing paramilitary operations, whether clandestine or covert.

Democrats say they are also frustrated by a lack of leadership from Mr. King, who Mr. Thompson said failed to protect the panel's authority in committee turf wars.

Authority over the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) and the Coast Guard, once held by the homeland-security committee, is now in the purview of the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee chaired by Rep. Don Young, Alaska Republican.

"We have ceded power by our inaction," Mr. Thompson said.

Common ground

In comparison, the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee is one of the most amicable, bipartisan panels on Capitol Hill. It is led by Sen. Susan Collins, Maine Republican and chairman, and ranking member Joe Lieberman of Connecticut.

Reached by phone for an interview on Oct. 20, Miss Collins was in Connecticut campaigning for Mr. Lieberman, who lost the Democratic primary after siding with Mr. Bush on the war in Iraq and is running as an independent.

"I have a great relationship with Joe Lieberman, and although I very much want to remain chairman, I think the committee would continue to produce bipartisan consensus legislation under his leadership," Miss Collins said.

Sen. Frank R. Lautenberg, New Jersey Democrat, is threatening to challenge Mr. Lieberman's ascension to committee chairman, and other Democrats have suggested that Mr. Lieberman's support for the war would impede his ability to investigate the administration.

"Most of the committee Democrats are people whom I work very well with, but there are a couple who have been extremely partisan in their approach," Miss Collins said. "If one of them were able to somehow bump Lieberman, then it would change the nature of the committee, and my prediction is it would be far less productive."

"It would be a contentious committee," Miss Collins said.

Mr. Darling says the current Senate committee is "consensus-oriented."

"They don't have much conflict on that committee, and they have passed some significant port-security legislation because there is no partisan [rancor]," he said.

The Senate committee has conducted active oversight and investigations and issued subpoenas, including on the government's response to Hurricane Katrina.

Hundreds of interviews with witnesses and more than 800,000 pages of evidence were reviewed in 23 hearings, and lead to the FEMA reorganization legislation. Miss Collins and Mr. Lieberman also authored the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act and Chemical Facility Anti-Terrorism Act.

Leslie Phillips, Mr. Lieberman's committee spokeswoman, said the senator has not indicated what his agenda might be should Democrats take over the Senate.

"But as the ranking member, he has demonstrated a willingness to aggressively investigate government accountability and the failure of government to adequately regulate various industries," said Miss Phillips, citing the Enron investigation, FEMA, and September 11 investigations.

DOJ_NMG_0088866

"It is fair to say his agenda would include more resources for homeland security and vigorous oversight of the department and FEMA," Miss Phillips said.

WAR NEWS:

Cheney: Iraq Violence Linked To Election (AP)

AP, October 31, 2006

Vice President Dick Cheney said Monday the increase of violence in Iraq is linked with efforts to influence the outcome of midterm elections in which Republicans are struggling to keep control of Congress.

"It's my belief that they're very sensitive of the fact that we've got an election scheduled and they can get on the Web sites like anybody else," Cheney said. He said al-Qaida and other elements were trying to "break the will of the American people" because "they think we don't have the stomach for the fight long-term."

Asked if the attacks were timed to influence the U.S. elections, Cheney said, "That's my belief."

Eight days before the elections, Cheney sat down for interviews for Fox News Channel's `Your World with Neil Cavuto' and CNBC's "Kudlow & Company."

Now in its fourth year, the Iraq war is a political liability for Bush and Republican allies. The U.S. death toll for October alone exceeds 100 — the fourth deadliest month for U.S. troops since the war began in March 2003. Over the course of the war, more than 2,800 Americans have died.

Cheney, who 17 months ago said the insurgency was in its last throes, said that "there's going to be probably a continued level of violence for some considerable period of time in Iraq." He said that unlike other wars, it was unlikely there would be some dramatic turning point that signals progress.

"There is progress," Cheney said. "It's just — you're not going to see the kind of thing ... a victory like Midway in World War II where we sank all the enemy carriers, or a surrender ceremony at the end of the war. It's the kind of thing where you have to keep grinding it out day after day after day. It's tough."

Cheney: Iraq Violence Tied To U.S. Elections (USAT)

USA Today, October 31, 2006

Vice President Cheney said Monday that the increase of violence in Iraq is linked with efforts to influence the outcome of the elections Nov. 7 in which Republicans are trying to keep control of Congress.

"It's my belief that they're very sensitive of the fact that we've got an election scheduled and they can get on the websites like anybody else," Cheney said of insurgents in Iraq during an interview with Fox News.

He said al-Qaeda and other elements were trying to "break the will of the American people" because "they think we don't have the stomach for the fight." The U.S. death toll for October has topped 100, making it the fourth-deadliest month since the war began in 2003.

Bush blasts 'activist judges,' gay marriage

President Bush decried gay marriage and "judicial activism" at a campaign stop in Statesboro, Ga. "For decades, activist judges have tried to redefine America by court order," Bush said. "Just this last week in New Jersey, another activist court issued a ruling that raises doubt about the institution of marriage. We believe marriage is a union between a man and a woman." The line earned Bush sustained applause at a rally for former GOP congressman Max Burns' effort to unseat Democratic incumbent John Barrow. The New Jersey Supreme Court ruled that same-sex couples must be given the benefits of married couples.

Calif. congressman aims for presidency

Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., said he will form an exploratory committee to begin raising money and organizing supporters for a possible 2008 presidential bid. "This is going to be a long road, (and) it's a challenging road; there's going to be some rough and tumble, but I think it's the right thing to do for our country," Hunter, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said at a news conference in San Diego.

DOJ_NMG_0088867

Hunter, 58, is a familiar face on Capitol Hill and at the Pentagon as chairman of the panel that oversees military policy. Carl Luna, a political science professor at San Diego's Mesa College, said Hunter may be preparing himself for losing his chairmanship of the committee if Democrats take control of the House. “He doesn't want to have to go from being chairman of a powerful committee to just another back-bencher,” Luna said.

Michael J. Fox: ‘I'm not going to go away'

Actor Michael J. Fox campaigned in Ohio for Democratic Senate candidate Sherrod Brown, saying the country needs leaders who support scientific research. Fox, who has Parkinson's disease, has been campaigning across the nation for candidates who favor federal funding for research using embryonic stem cells, which he says could lead to a cure. Brown, an Ohio congressman, is challenging GOP Sen. Mike DeWine, who opposes federal money for such research.

In a speech to 150 supporters, Fox responded to criticism from radio talk-show host Rush Limbaugh, who suggested Fox was “off his medication or acting” in a political ad. “I had a run-in with a less-than-compassionate conservative,” Fox said. “I guess I'm not supposed to speak with you until my symptoms go away. Or maybe I'm just supposed to go away. But I'm not going to go away.”

12 accused of voter registration fraud

Twelve people have been charged with tricking voters in Orange County, Calif., into registering as Republicans, prosecutors said. The defendants, ranging in age from 19 to 52, were accused of fraudulently registering 37 voters as Republicans between August 2005 and February 2006. The suspects were hired to register new Republicans by private firms paid by the Orange County Republican Party, prosecutors said. No charges were filed against the companies or the party.

The recruiters were paid $10 a head for newly registered Republicans in a district represented by U.S. Rep. Loretta Sanchez, a Democrat. Voters were asked to sign petitions for lower taxes or stricter sex-offender laws, then tricked into signing voter registration cards, county prosecutor Anthony Rackauckas said.

Hadley On Visit Asserts U.S. View (WT/AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

The Washington Times, October 31, 2006

BAGHDAD -- National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley huddled with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and his security chief, Mouwafak al-Rubaie, during an unannounced visit to Baghdad, telling them he "wanted to reinforce some of the things you have heard from our president."

Mr. al-Rubaie said last night that Mr. Hadley had discussed the work of a five-man committee that Mr. al-Maliki and Mr. Bush agreed to set up during a telephone conversation on Saturday. Mr. Hadley also presented proposals concerning the training and equipping of Iraqi security forces as well as security plans.

"It was a useful visit," Mr. al-Rubaie said, but he refused to give any details, saying only that Mr. Hadley's meetings were limited to Mr. al-Rubaie and Mr. al-Maliki.

The meetings came as the American death toll for October rose past 100. A member of the 89th Military Police Brigade was killed in east Baghdad yesterday, and a Marine died in fighting in insurgent-plagued Anbar province the previous day, raising to 101 the number of U.S. service members killed in October, the fourth-deadliest month of the war.

At least 81 other persons were killed across Iraq, including 33 who died when a suspected Sunni insurgent bomber detonated his device among a group of day laborers in Sadr City. The blast tore through food stalls and kiosks shortly after 6 a.m. The blast wounded 59.

According to an Associated Press count, October has produced more Iraqi civilian deaths -- 1,170 so far -- than any other month since the AP began keeping track in May 2005.

The White House said Mr. Hadley was not on a mission to repair ragged relations, accounts of which it said had been "overblown" by the press.

"Absolutely not," said Gordon Johndroe, spokesman for the National Security Council in Washington. "This is a long-planned trip to get a firsthand report of the situation on the ground from the political, economic and security fronts."

DOJ_NMG_0088868

Last week Mr. al-Maliki issued a string of bitter complaints -- at one point saying he wasn't "America's man in Iraq" -- after U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad announced adjustments in America's Iraq strategy.

The ambassador announced that the prime minister agreed to implement a set of timelines, prompting Mr. al-Maliki to accuse the White House of infringing on his government's sovereignty and say that he was not consulted.

By week's end, Mr. al-Maliki and President Bush held a hastily convened video conference call and agreed to speed the training of Iraqi forces and the return of control over all territory to the Iraqi army.

The case of a kidnapped American soldier, meanwhile, took a curious turn when a woman claiming to be his mother-in-law said the soldier was married to her daughter, a Baghdad college student.

She said the soldier was with the young woman and her family when hooded gunmen handcuffed him and threw him in the back seat of a white Mercedes last week. The marriage would violate U.S. military regulations.

U.S. Envoy Arrives In Iraq As Tough Options Loom (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And John F. Burns

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 30 — President Bush's national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, arrived in Baghdad on Monday on an unannounced trip to discuss how to pull the country back from the brink.

Though American officials would describe Mr. Hadley's talks only in the vaguest of terms, one option widely discussed in Washington and Baghdad in the days before his arrival, according to American and Iraqi officials, is a substantial increase in the number of American and Iraqi troops patrolling Baghdad. It would signal yet another effort to reassert control over the Iraqi capital, which officials in both governments said remains their top priority.

Those officials cautioned that no decision had been made about that option, which would amount to a third effort this year to contain the spreading violence in Baghdad. On Monday evening, J. D. Crouch, the deputy national security adviser, said Mr. Hadley was in Iraq to express support for the Iraqi government and warned, "He is not preconfiguring military options." Mr. Crouch added that he was "not aware" of anyone proposing an increase in American troops.

Other American officials said that such options have been informally discussed. They said that before any American forces in Baghdad could be increased, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq would have to deliver more Iraqi troops, who would patrol the streets of the capital along with the Americans and take the lead whenever possible.

Other proposals now being discussed inside and outside the two governments range from how to permit greater autonomy for Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish sections of the country without splitting the country apart; how to share oil revenues among Iraq's population; and an amnesty for those who attacked Iraqi or American troops.

Many of these options may not be dealt with for months, because Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds within the "unity government" in Baghdad are still far apart on issues touching on Iraq's division of power and wealth.

In an interview Friday evening, Mr. Hadley said that "I wish you could find a silver bullet that could solve this in 30 days," but that "I doubt it."

He described a series of American goals, including a new effort to get more financial and other support from neighboring states, saying that "given the risks of chaos in Iraq, and given the threat and aspirations of Iran," each country in the region has "a huge stake" in a stable Iraq. But such appeals have failed in the past.

Mr. Hadley faces critics — many in his own party — who say that the Bush administration's effort has devolved to picking the least bad of a dismal set of options, and that the administration must lower its sights for a democratic Iraq and simply regain a semblance of stability there.

"It is folly to think we can win in Iraq the way some of us thought possible in 2003," Eliot A. Cohen, the director of the Center for Strategic Studies at the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies, wrote this month in The Wall Street Journal.

Speaking in Baghdad on Sunday as Mr. Hadley headed to Iraq to meet him, Mowaffak al-Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser, seemed to set out a Shiite vision when he said that while Shiites "have the numbers" in Baghdad, Sunnis who joined in building the new Iraq could look forward to "sharing the wealth" in oil.

DOJ_NMG_0088869

But he implied that Sunnis were having difficulty reconciling to the new political realities. "Some of these politicians are not prepared, mentally or psychologically, to make the compromises necessary for us to live cohabitively," he said.

More Troops

In the interview on Sunday, Mr. Rubaie declined to discuss specifics of recent conversations with Washington over increasing troop levels. But he said, "Baghdad is the core of the issue." When it comes to turning the tide of the war, he said, "It's Baghdad, Baghdad, Baghdad."

American officials in Washington and Baghdad who discussed changes in the Baghdad security plan, including possible troop increases, said it was unlikely that any announcements would be made until after the elections on Nov. 7. Bush administration officials have said that any major changes in American policy will require bipartisan support, and they are clearly waiting to see which party will control the House, and possibly the Senate, before proceeding. A week ago, General George W. Casey Jr., the top American commander in Iraq, said that if he needed more troops, "I will ask for the troops we need, both coalition and Iraqi."

In Washington, the debate over whether to increase troops comes as the White House seems to be groping for new ideas. The administration has resisted efforts to increase the overall number of American troops in Iraq. At times, tours have been extended for individual brigades, which amount to about 5,000 troops, for 90 days or so. But recent history suggests that any plan to significantly increase the American deployment in Baghdad would require more sweeping changes, by keeping 10,000 to 30,000 troops in Baghdad beyond their scheduled rotations home, even as new troops rotate in.

In the interview on Friday evening, Mr. Hadley declined to discuss internal deliberations. Still, he said: "Everyone says there is no military solution to the problem. That's true. But you also have this Catch-22 element to the problem. You can't have security without political and economic progress, but it's hard to have political and economic progress without security. There is some minimum element of security you need."

Outside experts who favor an American withdrawal say that almost all the options now being considered would be doomed to failure.

"It's not going to make any difference," said Peter W. Galbraith, the author of "The End of Iraq" (Simon & Schuster) and a scholar at the Center for Arms Control and Non-Proliferation. "It's not a country, and you can't build an army in the midst of a civil war. And elements of the Iraqi army are partisans in the civil war. You can't use the combatants as if they were neutral players."

Regional Governments

In Washington, Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, the top Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, has called for the establishment of three regional governments — one Kurdish, one Sunni, one Shiite — responsible for administering their own regions. The idea is adapted from one first proposed by Leslie H. Gelb, the former president of the Council on Foreign Relations.

So far the Bush administration has opposed solutions that would give the regions too much autonomy for fear that could ultimately lead to partition. In Washington on Monday, [a news wire] reported, the Saudi ambassador to the United States, Prince Turki al-Faisal, said any partition of Iraq would lead to "ethnic cleansing on a massive scale, sectarian killing on a massive scale."

This month, Iraq's new Parliament approved a law that empowers the country's 18 provinces to assemble into regions, but that delays, for 18 months, any practical steps toward forming those regions, in a bid to defuse the explosive political tensions that underlie the debate.

Nearly a year after national elections, the Sunnis, and not just the insurgents, remain unreconciled to the loss of primacy they enjoyed for generations — and to the loss of revenue they enjoyed under Saddam Hussein. "The problem is that in 2003 the Sunnis got 70 percent of the oil, and now they are being asked to take 20 percent," Mr. Galbraith said.

Meanwhile, the Shiites, or at least the leaders of the religious parties that control the government, have become increasingly strident in insisting that after generations of Sunni domination, it is now their turn to rule. While a process of ethnic and religious separation is already under way in cities including Baghdad, Mosul and Kirkuk — with tens of thousands of people from the three principal communities fleeing to safer havens in those parts of the country where they are in the majority — any policy that explicitly espoused this kind of separation would be likely to ignite an even fiercer struggle.

DOJ_NMG_0088870

The subtext for the debate is the struggle for control of the country's oil and gas revenues. The Iraqi Constitution, narrowly adopted last year, envisages a formula for dividing the revenues among provinces or regions proportional to the populations in each area, with some adjustments. Though the timetable set by the American and Iraqi governments calls for legislation to be passed on the issue by the end of October, there is now little chance it will happen before the end of the year.

Reconciliation and Amnesty

When he took office in May, Mr. Maliki made national reconciliation a centerpiece of his policy. But today it is foundering.

At the dispute's heart is the issue of a possible amnesty. It would cover both those responsible for the repressive violence during Mr. Hussein's 24 years in power, and the killing that has ensued, by insurgents and sectarian militias, since his fall.

Shiite politicians, in particular, have adamantly opposed any amnesty that would cover the decades of Shiite suffering under Mr. Hussein, or the widespread killing of Shiites by Sunni insurgents since the American-led invasion in 2003. As Shiite death squads have killed Sunnis over the past year, Sunni politicians, too, have hardened their stand. American officials, eager to promote Iraqi reconciliation, have still balked at any provision to spare insurgents or sectarian militiamen who have killed American soldiers.

Iraqi officials designated by Mr. Maliki to lead the reconciliation effort now seem to be despairing.

"Iraq has only two options, fragmentation or civil war," Sayed Ayyad Jamaluddin, a secular Shiite who is a member of the Maliki-appointed Higher Council for National Reconciliation, said last month. "And civil war," he added, "will be a catastrophe, because it will be fought on the basis of religion."

A Strongman

Some American experts have suggested that the Bush administration should abandon the effort to create a Western-style democracy and throw its weight behind a stronger Iraqi government. Mr. Cohen, in the Wall Street Journal article, which the White House e-mailed to reporters because it concluded that a withdrawal of American troops would be disastrous, wrote that "a junta of military modernizers might be the only hope of a country whose democratic culture is weak, whose politicians are either corrupt or incapable." But he also highlighted the downsides of returning to a strongman government.

Iraqi newspapers have adopted the theme of a government change, speculating on the possible composition of a "national salvation government," backed by the United States, that would wrest power from the Shiite alliance that chose Mr. Maliki for prime minister. Iraqi officials have said that Mr. Maliki has been deeply shaken by rumors that he might be forced from office by year's end. However, President Bush, in two conversations over the past two weeks, has assured him of support.

RESISTANCE TO DEADLINES FOR IRAQ IS WEAKENING (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes And Doyle Mcmanus, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

More U.S. officers doubt insurgents would gain, and believe that Baghdad must be pushed.

WASHINGTON — Growing numbers of American military officers have begun to privately question a key tenet of U.S. strategy in Iraq — that setting a hard deadline for troop reductions would strengthen the insurgency and undermine efforts to create a stable state.

The Iraqi government's refusal to take certain measures to reduce sectarian tensions between Sunni Arabs and the nation's Shiite Muslim majority has led these officers to conclude that Iraqis will not make difficult decisions unless they are pushed.

Therefore, they say, the advantages of deadlines may outweigh the drawbacks.

"Deadlines could help ensure that the Iraqi leaders recognize the imperative of coming to grips with the tough decisions they've got to make for there to be progress in the political arena," said a senior Army officer who has served in Iraq. He asked that his name not be used because he did not want to publicly disagree with the stated policy of the president.

Former Pentagon official Kurt Campbell said more officers are calling for deadlines after concluding that the indefinite presence of U.S. forces enables the Shiite-run Iraqi government to avoid making compromises.

DOJ_NMG_0088871

"There is a new belief that the biggest problem that we face is that our forces are the sand in the gears creating problems," said Campbell, coauthor of a book on national security policy. "We are making things worse by giving the Iraqis a false sense of security at the governing level."

For months, the Bush administration has been politely prodding the Iraqis on political and security reforms including the sharing of oil revenue, a crackdown on Shiite militias and constitutional changes. The discussions so far have yielded little, prompting experts to question whether the Iraqi government will ever compromise if there is no penalty for failing to make hard choices.

Over the last week, Bush administration officials have spoken about possible timetables for progress in Iraq, but softened their suggestions after talks with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki.

Although top administration officials are still steering clear of discussing the timing of American troop withdrawals, the officers' comments come alongside public statements by prominent Republicans who have begun talking about the need to establish a date that the U.S. will begin to draw down, whether or not the Iraqi government takes steps toward political compromise.

President Bush and other administration opponents of hard deadlines have argued that telegraphing troop departures would help the insurgents.

Once the U.S. sets a withdrawal date, the Sunni-led guerrillas know how long they must hang on before American troops are gone, the administration has argued.

Opponents of timetables also fear that small drawdowns will unleash public demand for more dramatic withdrawals, allowing violence fomented by Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias to erode whatever political advances have been made.

Military officials generally have agreed with the civilian leadership that a deadline would strengthen insurgent and militia groups. But the failure of the Iraqi government to move forward on key political and security measures has left senior military leaders frustrated.

Although U.S. military leaders remain wary of the consequences of imposing deadlines, increasingly officers say they are starting to look more attractive. The shift in opinion is a sign that gridlock in the Iraqi government is seen as a greater threat to achieving stability in Iraq than the insurgency itself.

John Batiste, a retired major general who commanded a division in Iraq and has been critical of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, said that setting a date for a drawdown of combat brigades must be considered. Before the deadline, Batiste said, the U.S. also needs to step up its effort to advise and train the Iraqi military and police.

"Holding the Iraqi government accountable is important, and that has everything to do with setting expectations and timelines," Batiste said. "It also has everything to do with doing all we can to ensure they are capable completing the task they are trying to do."

Some officers who have served in Iraq believe that much of the Iraqi government is not functioning effectively. Finding ways to force the sectarian factions to put aside their differences and focus on improving security and basic services must be the top priority in Iraq, these officers say. Without government reform, the Iraqi security forces are unlikely to ever be strong enough to take on the insurgency or the sectarian militias.

"It's basic counterinsurgency," said a military officer who has served in Baghdad and did not want to publicly disagree with the president's stated policy. "You have to have a trusted, capable government."

Some in the military argue that publicizing a timetable for reducing forces is far less damaging to a counterinsurgency campaign than the administration has suggested.

Many officers, particularly those who adhere to the military philosophy of former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, a retired Army general who served as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, believe that deadlines are necessary to avoid getting mired in an endless war fueled by enmity between Iraq's long-subjugated Shiite population and the Sunni Arabs who ran the government under Saddam Hussein.

"The Powell Doctrine is all about overwhelming numbers of troops with specific missions, with specified end-states, for specified durations with — go figure — an exit strategy," said the officer who has served in Baghdad. "To not mention this stuff is actually counter to the contemporary military mind-set."

DOJ_NMG_0088872

Although Democrats like Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the ranking minority member of the Armed Services Committee, have long argued that a deadline is the best way to move development of the Iraqi security force forward, opponents of the administration are no longer the only ones making the argument.

A number of Republicans now have either explicitly endorsed timelines for troop drawdowns or voiced support for considering a strategy shift.

Among them are Rep. Christopher Shays of Connecticut, Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and Richard L. Armitage, Powell's former top deputy at the State Department.

Sen. John W. Warner, the Republican chair of the Armed Services Committee, has called for a new approach if the security situation does not improve.

"The key to this thing is impressing upon that government that they've got to come to grips with what is causing this increase in violence and killing both Iraqis and our own armed forces," Warner said this month on Fox News.

Without a deadline, Maliki will not tackle the difficult problem of bridging Sunni and Shiite political disagreements, said Michael Rubin, a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute and a former Coalition Provisional Authority official.

"Maliki will not hit the benchmarks, but that doesn't mean we shouldn't give them," said Rubin, who does not favor troop withdrawals as a penalty. "Iraqis approach deadlines by doing nothing until two days before, and then locking themselves in smoke-filled rooms and only then do they … try to hash out a solution."

Officially, administration officials remain opposed to discussing deadlines.

Nevertheless, with the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad drafting a series of benchmarks for the Maliki government, there were signs last week that the administration had eased its opposition to timetables and might take a tougher stance with the Iraqi government.

Former Pentagon official Campbell said that military officers would not be discussing their change of heart over timetables if administration officials had not signaled a new willingness to shift positions.

"Even though there are deep reservoirs of unhappiness in the military about certain aspects of administration policy, active-duty guys are very reluctant to publicly disagree with the leadership," he said.

"But the signals are clear from the administration that it is acceptable to talk about timetables. They are taking their cues from their civilian masters."

*

julian.barnes@latimes.com
doyle.mcmanus@latimes.com

In Baghdad, A Force Under The Militias' Sway (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The signs of the militias are everywhere at the Sholeh police station.

Posters celebrating Moqtada al-Sadr, head of the Mahdi Army militia, dot the building's walls. The police chief sometimes remarks that Shiite militias should wipe out all Sunnis. Visitors to this violent neighborhood in the Iraqi capital whisper that nearly all the police officers have split loyalties.

And then one rainy night this month, the Sholeh police set up an ambush and killed Army Cpl. Kenny F. Stanton Jr., a 20-year-old budding journalist, his unit said. At the time, Stanton and other members of the unit had been trailing a group of Sholeh police escorting known Mahdi Army members.

"How can we expect ordinary Iraqis to trust the police when we don't even trust them not to kill our own men?" asked Capt. Alexander Shaw, head of the police transition team of the 372nd Military Police Battalion, a Washington-based unit charged with overseeing training of all Iraqi police in western Baghdad. "To be perfectly honest, I'm not sure we're ever going to have police here that are free of the militia influence."

DOJ_NMG_0088873

The top U.S. military commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., predicted last week that Iraqi security forces would be able to take control of the country in 12 to 18 months. But several days spent with American units training the Iraqi police illustrated why those soldiers on the ground believe it may take decades longer than Casey's assessment.

Seventy percent of the Iraqi police force has been infiltrated by militias, primarily the Mahdi Army, according to Shaw and other military police trainers. Police officers are too terrified to patrol enormous swaths of the capital. And while there are some good cops, many have been assassinated or are considering quitting the force.

"None of the Iraqi police are working to make their country better," said Brig. Gen. Salah al-Ani, chief of police for the western half of Baghdad. "They're working for the militias or to put money in their pocket."

U.S. military reports on the Iraqi police often read like a who's who of the two main militias in Iraq: the Mahdi Army, also known as Jaish al-Mahdi or JAM, and the Badr Organization, also known as the Badr Brigade or Badr Corps.

One document on the Karrada district police chief says: "I strongly believe that he is a member of Badr Corps and tends to turn a blind eye to JAM activity." Another explains that the station commander in the al-Amil neighborhood "is afraid to report suspected militia members in his organization due to fear of reprisals."

American soldiers said that although they gather evidence of police ties to the militias and present it to Iraqi officials, no one has ever been criminally charged or even lost their jobs.

Among the worst of the suspected Mahdi Army members is Lt. Col. Musa Khadim Lazim Asadi, station commander of the Ghazaliyah patrol police. "He has stated to us that he does not believe the Mahdi Militia is a bad organization," a military report said. "He had a picture of Sadr in his vehicle until we said something about it."

"He is a cancer to the station and the people of Ghazaliyah," the report concluded.

On a recent visit to the blue-and-white facility, located in one of the most violent parts of the city, even other police officers in the building complained that Asadi and his subordinates are corrupt and tied to the militias. "They steal vehicles and kill people," said 1st Lt. Sarmad Sabar Dawood, assistant commander for the local police, which is independent of the patrol police. "In fact, we are investigating Colonel Musa and the patrol police for criminal behavior."

But when U.S. military officials visited Asadi on a recent afternoon, he not only denied that his men were involved in the militias or crime but refused to acknowledge that there had been any killings in the area at all. Although scores of tortured bodies are often found in the neighborhood, Asadi said the murders all took place somewhere else.

At his response, 1st Lt. Cadetta Bridges shook her head in disbelief. "This guy is a crook and a liar," said Bridges, 31, of Upper Marlboro. "They're all crooks and liars."

Shaw, 32, of Alexandria, turned the conversation to the confusing division of Iraqi police forces into three autonomous parts: patrol police, regular police who investigate cases, and traffic police. The U.S. military has proposed reorganizing the force so that there is one commander in each neighborhood responsible for all the police. So far, Shaw said, Iraqi officials have not been receptive.

The problems with the tripartite division were evident in Sholeh. Sitting in Asadi's second-floor office, Shaw asked him if he worked with the regular police on the ground floor.

"Of course not," Asadi replied brusquely. "Why do we need to coordinate with them?"

Visibly exasperated, Shaw and Bridges quickly left and headed for a police station in Mansour, a relatively safe neighborhood in central Baghdad, to meet with a police major they described as one of the better cops they'd encountered.

When Shaw asked what the police in Mansour were doing to reduce the violence, the major said: "There is nothing the police can do. The only solution is to create a government that will take away the militias. Then everything will be fine."

The major, who asked to be identified as Abu Ahmed because he feared for his safety if his full name was published, sat in a closet-size room that he hardly ever leaves. Orange-and-brown sheets covered a tiny bed next to his desk.

"I can't go home or I'll be killed," said Abu Ahmed, who sees his children only when police officers can bring them to the station. He sighed as he looked at photographs of two recently assassinated officers. "And it's getting worse. So much worse."

"I think I must quit soon," he said quietly.

DOJ_NMG_0088874

Arabi Araf Ali, a police officer in the southern neighborhood of Dora, said police do little more than pick dead bodies up off the street. In the station's parking lot nearby, a colleague washed off a police truck that had just been used to retrieve the corpses of five Shiite men slaughtered that morning. Brain matter littered the ground.

"Some parts of Dora are so dangerous," Ali added, "that we cannot even pick up the bodies there without Americans. We are just too afraid."

The Iraqi police are not the only ones who feel unsafe. The American soldiers and civilians who train the Iraqis are constantly on guard against the possibility that the police might turn against them. Even in the police headquarters for all of western Baghdad, one of the safest police buildings in the capital, the training team will not remove their body armor or helmets. An armed soldier is assigned to protect each trainer.

"I wouldn't let half of them feed my dog," 1st Lt. Floyd D. Estes Jr., a former head of the police transition team, said of the Iraqi police. "I just don't trust them."

Jon Moore, the deputy team chief, said: "We don't know who the hell we're teaching: Are they police or are they militia?"

The trainers agree that Ani, the new police chief for western Baghdad, is an honest cop who is trying to get the police force in order. But Ani acknowledged in a meeting with U.S. officials that he does not plan to root out and fire militia members.

"I don't have that power," he said. "There are people higher than me that control that."

Among Ani's bosses are the police chief for all of Baghdad, who has been linked to the Mahdi Army, and the minister of the interior, who is a member of Sadr's political bloc.

"I think he's trying to do the right thing," said Lt. Col Aaron Dean, the battalion commander, as he walked to his Humvee after the meeting with Ani. "But I know they're all under certain influences. If you take a big stand against the militias, they're going to come after you."

The difficulty of eliminating corruption and militias from the Iraqi police forces can be exasperating for the American soldiers who risk their lives day after day to train them. "We can keep getting in our Humvees every day, but nothing is going to work unless the politicians do their job and move against the militias," Moore said.

Sitting in the battalion's war room with four other members of his team, Moore estimated it would take 30 to 40 years before the Iraqi police could function properly, perhaps longer if the militia infiltration and corruption continue to increase. His colleagues nodded.

"It's very, very slow-moving," Estes said.

"No," said Sgt. 1st Class William T. King Jr., another member of the team. "It's moving in reverse."

Reprisals Feared After Blast (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood And Said Rifai

The Los Angeles Times, October 31, 2006

Baghdad — Yousef Badr stood among dozens of fellow laborers who rose early and gathered on a grimy street corner in the Sadr City neighborhood with their battered hand tools and hopes for a day's pay.

The bomb blast that shattered their morning ritual, killing 31 people and injuring more than 50 on Monday, was the first large-scale attack on the predominantly Shiite Muslim neighborhood in more than a month, and stoked fears that a wave of retaliatory killings would soon follow.

"It was a huge explosion," said the 30-year-old Badr, who described being thrown to the ground by the blast in the heart of the neighborhood of 2.5 million.

Shrapnel ripped through the crowd and peppered ramshackle kiosks where laborers bought tea and hot soup as they waited to be hired for $8 to $10 a day. Among the dead was a tea seller known to regular customers by her nickname, Um Hattab.

Iraqi officials said the explosives were packed in a car. But witnesses said the bomb appeared to have been hidden in a bag left at the site, where a crater was hard to distinguish from the numerous potholes.

Several residents said the attack was revenge for a neighborhood protest a day earlier against a days-long U.S. military operation that has severely restricted movement in and out of Sadr City. The neighborhood is a stronghold of the Shiite militia led by anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr.

DOJ_NMG_0088875

"They're trying to quiet us down so that we won't hold any more demonstrations," said Ouda Gumar, a 50-year-old plasterer, as residents collected strewn tools and bloody scraps of clothing into separate piles nearby.

Five car bombs exploded elsewhere in the capital Monday, killing at least a dozen other people and injuring more than 30. Fifteen bodies were discovered throughout the city.

The attacks came as the U.S. military reported the deaths of two troops. An unidentified member of the 89th Military Police Brigade died of wounds from small-arms fire Monday in eastern Baghdad, and a Marine died in combat Friday in Al Anbar province. The Marine was identified as Sgt. Luke J. Zimmerman, 24.

The deaths brought military fatalities to at least 101 in October, according to the website icasualties.org, which tracks casualties in the Iraq conflict.

Early today, the military announced two more Monday deaths, taking the monthly toll to 103. Gunfire hit one soldier during combat operations in western Baghdad, and a roadside bomb killed the other south of the capital.

The rising U.S. death toll and persistent sectarian violence have fed widespread misgivings about the Bush administration's handling of Iraq as Americans prepare to vote in midterm congressional elections next week.

At the same time, U.S. and Iraqi leaders have sought to smooth differences over how to cope with the back-and-forth violence by Sunni Arab insurgents and Shiite militias, including Sadr's Al Mahdi army, believed responsible for many of the hundreds of killings and kidnappings in recent months.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, who is Shiite, has urged President Bush to give Iraqi security forces more leeway to deal with armed groups. But some of the main Shiite militias are tied to groups that make up Maliki's power base, raising questions about his ability and willingness to combat them.

Amid tense exchanges between the two administrations, U.S. national security advisor Stephen Hadley made an unannounced visit to Baghdad on Monday to meet with his Iraqi counterpart and Maliki on military coordination.

The Iraqi government issued a brief statement afterward saying the officials worked on details of a joint commission on security, training and reconciliation that Bush and Maliki agreed to Saturday.

In other developments, Maliki blamed "the dirty hands of terrorism" for the fatal shooting Monday of Issam Rawi, a prominent Sunni politician and leading member of the hard-line Muslim Scholars Assn.

In Sadr City, residents quickly sought to resume their routines. Few seemed to believe it would be the last attack. A bombing in the neighborhood last month killed more than 30 people.

Sadr released a statement criticizing what he called an American embargo on Sadr City and the Karada neighborhood in central Baghdad, where U.S. forces have imposed a series of roadblocks since the apparent kidnapping last week of an Iraqi American soldier.

The soldier was secretly married to an Iraqi woman and was abducted when he visited her in Karada, the New York Times reported Monday, citing people who said they were his in-laws. Those people identified the soldier as Ahmed Qusai al-Taei, 41. The military has not identified the missing soldier.

Bombs Sweep Baghdad; Cleric Faults US (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, October 31, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 30 — A spasm of violence seized the capital on Monday. Forty-six Iraqis were killed in six bombings across the city and a moderate Sunni Arab figure was gunned down by two men on motorcycles.

The American toll for October rose to 102, the highest since January 2005, with the military's announcement of three more deaths.

In a single deadly strike, 33 Shiite laborers gathered around food stalls in a Sadr City square were killed when a bomb in a bag exploded at 6 a.m., scattering glasses of tea and remains of breakfasts. The workers had been waiting for offers of $10-a-day jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0088876

The attacks continued as the American national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, met in Baghdad with Iraqi officials. He came to discuss the work of a committee set up by the leaders of the two governments on Sunday, whose aim includes giving Iraqis more control over their troops.

The attack in Sadr City came despite the American Army cordon that has been in place for a week in a search for a missing soldier, whom the military believes was taken there. It was the fifth bomb in the area, Al Mudhafar Square, where poor workers line up to seek work, said Haidar Said, a police captain on duty when the bomb exploded.

"Please deliver this message," said Officer Said. "This city has suffered a lot. These are poor people. We want to reach our voice to the world."

It is attacks like the one in Sadr City, a Shiite slum, that anger Shiite leaders and put pressure on Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, a Shiite, to press for more of a hand in security, which is controlled almost exclusively by the American military.

The security cordon has caused major traffic jams and cut off much of the movement in and out of the area, drawing the ire of Iraqis. The district is the center of support for Moktada al-Sadr, a radical cleric who called on his followers to fight American troops twice in 2004. In a statement on Monday, Mr. Sadr threatened action if the American cordon continued.

"If this siege continues for long, we will resort to actions that I will have no choice but to take, God willing, and when the time is right," he said, according to The Associated Press.

Less than an hour after the bomb struck, two men on motorcycles shot and killed Issam al-Rawi, a geology professor, on his way to class. Two associates were wounded. Born in 1949, Mr. Rawi was one of the most moderate voices among Sunni Arabs. But the violence here has radicalized many Iraqis, and moderates who refuse to yield to the militants are either being killed or driven out of the country.

"They murdered one of the few burning candles," said Abdul Mahdi Talib, dean of the Science College at Baghdad University. "We considered him a man for all."

In the Green Zone, a walled area where the Iraqi government and American Embassy are located, Mr. Hadley met with his opposite number, Iraq's national security adviser, Mowaffak al-Rubaie. In a statement, Mr. Rubaie said the men discussed the work of a committee established by Mr. Maliki and President Bush to speed training for the Iraqi Army.

The talks felt far away to Officer Said, the police captain, who spent most of the morning gathering bodies in the square in Sadr City. He described a horrific tableau of staggering wounded victims and of bodies missing limbs. Some families lost several members. In one Sadr City hospital, four brothers were being treated. Two died and two others were wounded, with one losing his leg, said a visitor at the hospital.

A politician who supports Mr. Sadr, Nasir al-Saidi, was at the hospital and he spoke angrily against the American military and the Iraqi government as victims were rushed in.

Officer Said said the cordon actually hindered the authorities' ability to move the victims to hospitals outside.

One of the wounded blamed the cordon for blocking the Mahdi Army, the grass-roots fighting force of Mr. Sadr's supporters, and in turn making the neighborhood less safe.

The cordon "forced Mahdi Army members who were patrolling the streets to vanish," said Ali Abdul Ridha, who was lying next to his brother in a hospital bed, The A.P. reported.

Others, though, said the militia was the reason why the bomb was planted.

The bombs kept exploding, killing Iraqis in small but steady numbers. Some of the Sadr City victims were taken to Yarmouk Hospital, and there a bomb went off around 2:30 p.m., killing one person and wounding five more. In the Bayaa neighborhood, 4 people were killed and 15 wounded. In Amel, a mixed area, three were killed and six wounded.

In another assassination, Raad Naem al-Jeheshi, a Shiite who led an organization of former Iraqi prisoners, was gunned down in Dora, a Sunni suburb that American troops had swept.

The militants' use of government uniforms for deception continued in a particularly grim way on Monday, when a suicide bomber dressed as a police officer passed through two checkpoints in the police headquarters in Kirkuk, north of Baghdad. Three people were killed, including a 5-year-old, the child of a woman who works as a cleaner. Thirteen were wounded.

Total Iraqi deaths reported for the day was 81, The A.P. said, including bodies found in rivers near Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0088877

Violence in Baghdad was also responsible for an American's death, when a member of the 89th Military Police Brigade was killed Monday in the eastern part of the city. Another soldier died when the vehicle in which he was riding was struck by an explosive device south of Baghdad.

The other American whose death was tallied on Monday was a marine who was killed in fighting in Anbar Province the day before.

At Least 26 Killed By Market Blast In Sadr City (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, October 31, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 30 -- A bustling market in Baghdad's Sadr City became the capital's latest killing ground early Monday when a bomb hidden amid trash and clutter exploded in a fiery inferno, killing at least 26 people and wounding 60, a spokesman at Iraq's Interior Ministry said.

The explosion occurred about 7 a.m. at the busy Circle 55 intersection, a popular gathering point in the Shiite slum for construction laborers looking for a day's work. The blast spewed shards of metal, blew up three nearby cars and left a huge crater in the pavement.

U.S. and Iraqi forces had previously established a cordon around the teeming slum, which is controlled by the Mahdi Army militia, in an attempt to find a kidnapped U.S. soldier and a man known as Abu Deraa, who is considered Iraq's most notorious death squad leader.

Shiite leaders seized on that U.S. operation Monday to accuse the Americans of complicity in the market blast, saying that because they were in charge of searching all vehicles going in and out of the area, they must have allowed in the bomb that was detonated at the market.

"The entrances and exits in and out of Sadr City are still under the control of the Iraqi and occupation forces," said Mohammed al-Kaabi, a spokesman for Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, leader of the Mahdi Army and head of a strong political bloc in Iraq's government. "Since the entrances to the city are in the hands of the Americans, they let it in and slaughtered the people."

Some residents of Sadr City, home to 2.5 million Shiites, also blamed U.S. forces for the carnage, saying that the search for the missing soldier -- which began six days ago -- has forced the Mahdi Army underground, weakening the area's defenses. But this week, some Mahdi Army members were visible with weapons on the streets.

A U.S. military spokesman, Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, denied that coalition forces were responsible for the explosion, saying it occurred "despite our security efforts."

Meanwhile, the U.S. military reported that a Marine was killed Sunday in Anbar province west of Baghdad and that a member of the 89th Military Police Brigade was killed Monday in the eastern part of the capital. In addition, the Pentagon reported the death of a Marine on Friday in Anbar. So far, 101 U.S. troops have been killed in Iraq this month, making October the deadliest month for American forces since January 2005, when 107 soldiers were killed.

Across the country, at least 81 Iraqis were killed Monday, according to an Associated Press count.

At least 12 people were killed and 41 were wounded in five car bombings in the capital, and three were killed and six injured in two roadside bombings there, according to local police, Interior Ministry officials and wire service reports.

Elsewhere in Iraq, at least 21 people were killed in bombings and other violence, including three people who died when a suicide bomber wearing an explosives belt walked into a local police headquarters in the northern city of Kirkuk and detonated himself, according to Kirkuk police Capt. Emad Khider. He said a 5-year-old girl was among those killed in the blast. Ten people were injured.

Dozens Killed In Baghdad Blast (MCT)

By Jay Price

McClatchy Newspapers, October 31, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0088878

BAGHDAD, Iraq — An explosion in Baghdad's Sadr City neighborhood on Monday killed at least 28 people, stoking tension between U.S. forces and followers of Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, whose Mahdi Army militia is suspected in the kidnapping of a U.S. soldier.

Residents in Sadr City charged that American forces, who've had the Shiite Muslim area virtually surrounded for four days, must have allowed the attacker into their community as part of an effort to win the release of the kidnapped soldier. U.S. officials rejected the accusation.

The explosion came as the number of U.S. service members killed this month reached 101, making October the deadliest month for the American military in nearly two years. Military officials said the latest American killed was shot by a sniper at about 9:30 a.m. in eastern Baghdad. He wasn't identified, pending notification of his family.

The explosion that rocked Sadr City struck just before 8 a.m. in an area popular with day laborers looking for work. Initial reports said the blast came from a bomb hidden under garbage, but a spokesman for the Interior Ministry later said a car bomb was responsible. At least 60 people were wounded.

Many of the dead and wounded were buying breakfast from a woman selling tea and cheese, said Fa'ez Thani, 36, who was about 100 yards away. Thani, a former soccer player, sprinted to the smoking crater debris. Hours later, his voice still trembled.

"I found a real massacre, legs, hands and heads scattered everywhere," he said. "I and my friends were carrying the bodies not knowing who was alive and who was dead."

Then he helped gather scraps of flesh from the blood-covered pavement and put them in bags. "I will never forget this in my life," he said.

Anger had already been rising in the sprawling Shiite district of more than 2 million, a stronghold for Sadr and his Mahdi Army militia.

U.S. and Iraqi troops have all but closed off Sadr City since the kidnapping of the soldier last week, and residents have had to wait hours to pass through checkpoints to enter or leave the neighborhood.

Adding to the anger were raids on at least nine offices of Sadr's political wing - apparently part of the search for the missing soldier - and a raid last Wednesday by Iraqi and U.S. forces seeking a top Shiite death-squad leader. That raid left at least 10 people dead and sparked criticism from Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, whose refusal to disarm Sadr's militia has rankled U.S. officials.

After Monday's bombing, hundreds of people milled in the streets around the carnage. Some carried rifles and rocket-propelled grenade launchers.

A spokesman for Sadr's political wing pledged there would be no violence, however.

"The Sadrists are committed to what Sadr told them, and he ordered them to stay quiet and this is what they do," said Sheik Naser al-Sa'edi.

Haider Mahdi, 26, a university student who was about to leave his house to run an errand when the blast shook his windows, said Sadr City was more secure before the Americans surrounded it last week.

"We used to secure our own neighborhood," he said. "Volunteers like me and other young guys would search vehicles and strangers to protect our own neighborhood. Because there is no presence of security forces here, we have to protect ourselves."

U.S. spokesmen provided few details of the 101st U.S. military death, saying only that the soldier belonged to the 89th Military Police Brigade and that he'd been shot by a sniper.

Earlier, the military confirmed the 100th death - a Marine assigned to Regimental Combat Team 5 who died Sunday in Anbar Province.

There were at least five other car bombs in Baghdad on Monday, killing 13 civilians and wounding 43 more, according to police. Another car bomb just north of the capital killed two more and injured three.

At least 15 bodies were recovered in southern Baghdad - all were handcuffed and bore signs of torture - and a top Sunni politician, Issam Rawi, was assassinated near his home.

DOJ_NMG_0088879

